The next consuls were M. Aquilius Julianus and P. Nonius Asprenas [p], appointed by Tiberius, whose appointment Caius did not think fit to alter [q]. In the beginning of the year the senate and consuls bound themselves by a solemn oath to observe all the laws and constitutions of Augustus and Caius, without mentioning those of Tiberius; and this omission passed into a custom, which ever after obtained. At the same time, vows were made for the safety of Caius and his sisters. Dion Cassius observes, that on the same day, a slave, named Macaon, placing himself upon the bed of Jupiter Capitolinus, foretold many dreadful calamities; and when he had done, killed first a small dog, which he had brought with him, and then himself. This year, Caius appointed Soemus prince of the Iturean Arabs; gave Armenia Minor, and soon after part of Arabia, to Cotys king of Thrace; and to his cousin Rhemetalces that part of Thrace which Cotys had held; to Polemon he gave the territories of Pontus, which his father Polemon had possessed [r]. Suetonius tells us, that Caius, having advanced this year Flavius Vespasianus to the ædileship, and being one day angry with him for his remissness in seeing the streets kept clean, which was part of his province, he commanded his guards to take some of the dirt, and besmear with it the ædile's embroidered robe. This some interpreted as a presage of Vespasian's future

Impending calamities foretold by a slave.

[n] Suet. c. 23. [o] Idem, ibid. [p] Dio, p. 646. Noris epson. [q] Noris ibid. [r] Dio, ibid. p. 649.

grandeur [s]; no doubt when they ſaw him already poſſeſſed of the empire. Dion Caſſius and Suetonius give us diſmal accounts of the many cruelties practiſed by this bloody idiot, in the ſecond year of his reign. Among the reſt he tells us, that one day, finding there were no criminals condemned to fight with the wild beaſts, according to the barbarous cuſtom which obtained at Rome, he commanded ſuch of the people as were already come to ſee the ſhews, to be thrown to them, having firſt ordered their tongues to be cut out, that they might not diſturb with their cries and complaints his inhuman diverſion. Finding it very chargeable to maintain the wild beaſts, which were kept for ſuch entertainments, he often viſited the priſons in perſon; and, ordering all the priſoners to be ranged in a gallery before him, ſentenced many of them to be thrown to the wild beaſts, without examining whether they were guilty or innocent. Once in particular, as they ſtood drawn up before him, he commanded all to be taken away to feed his beaſts, "a calvo ad calvum", that is from ſuch a bald head, whom he pointed out, to another. Great numbers of old men, of infirm perſons, and of ſuch as were reduced to poverty, met with the ſame cruel fate, the inhuman tyrant pretending, that by ſuch unheard-of barbarities he conſulted the public welfare, ſince he delivered the ſtate from perſons who were but ſo many burdens to it. A Roman knight whom he had cauſed to be caſt to the wild beaſts, crying out that he was innocent, he ordered him to be taken up, his tongue to be cut out, and then to be thrown in again. It was his conſtant cuſtom to oblige parents, though free from all guilt, to aſſiſt at the execution of their children, and often ordered them to be aſſaſſinated the following night in their houſes. To one of them, who pretended ſickneſs and begged to be excuſed, he ſent his own litter [t]. Having cauſed the ſon of an illuſtrious Roman knight, named Paſtor, to be dragged to priſon, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he was remarkable for his comelineſs and the tallneſs of his ſtature, the unhappy father went immediately to intercede for his child. But the cruel monſter, inſtead of hearkening to his tears and entreaties, commanded the innocent youth to be executed without delay; and when the news of his death was Various inſtances of Caius's cruelty.

[s] Suet. in Veſp. c. 5.

[t] Suet. c. 26, 27. Dio, p. 647.

was brought, to inſult nature itſelf, he invited the diſtreſſed parent to dine with him that very day, and forced him, by threatening to treat in the like manner his other ſon, if he betrayed any ſymptoms of grief, to drink to exceſs, and in height of his affliction to ſhew ſuch outward ſigns of joy, as would have been at any other time altogether unbecoming a perſon of his rank and age [u]. One Caninius Iulus having in a private converſation adviſed Caius with great liberty to alter his conduct, as he was withdrawing, That you may not flatter yourſelf, Caninius, with vain hopes, ſaid the emperor, I have already ſigned the warrant for your death. At theſe words Caninius, without ſhewing the leaſt concern, turning about, I return you thanks, ſaid he, moſt gracious prince, for this favour. As the decree of the ſenate, granting to condemned perſons ten days reſpite, was in this inſtance obſerved by Caius, the undaunted Caninius during that interval never betrayed the leaſt uneaſineſs; inſomuch, that the centurion, who came, when the ten days were expired, to ſee the ſentence put in execution, found him playing, with his uſual calmneſs, at cheſs. When the executioner appeared, he ſtarted up with a chearful countenance, embraced his friends, and, taking his leave of them, told them, that he ſhould ſoon know whether or no the ſoul was immortal; that in the very article of his death he would particularly mind in what manner it abandoned the body, and after his death return to acquaint his friends with the ſtate of ſouls after their ſeparation. He then offered his neck to the executioner, with the intrepidity of a true hero [w]. The emperor, if ſuch an inhuman madman deſerves that name, aſſiſted in perſon at moſt executions; ſo great was the delight he took in cruelty and bloodſhed; but always cauſed the mouths of thoſe, who ſuffered in public, to be ſtopt, either with their cloaths or a ſponge, leſt they ſhould upbraid him with his wickedneſs [x]. He ſeldom ſuffered them to be diſpatched at once, deſiring they might feel themſelves dying, which was his uſual expreſſion. While he was at table, he often cauſed criminals, and ſometimes innocent perſons, to be racked in his preſence, nay, and their heads to be cut off by a ſoldier, who did it with great ſkill and dexterity. Being once miſtaken in the name of a perſon, and cauſing him to be executed inſtead of another, when he underſtood his error, 'Tis no matter, ſaid he, he deſerved it as well as the other.

The conſtancy and intrepidity of Caninius Iulus.

[u] Senec. de ira, l. ii. c. 33. [w] Idem ibid. c. 14. [x] Idem, ibid. c. 19.

Five of the gladiators, called retiarii, becauſe they uſed in fighting certain nets, having yielded to the like number of ſecutores, who were their antagoniſts, he commanded them to be ſlain; but one of the five, ſnatching up his arms, killed all the conquerors. This action Caligula looked upon as cruel, lamented it in public, and loaded all thoſe with curſes who were ſo hard-hearted as to behold it. As he pretended to great ſkill in fencing, a famous gladiator, with whom he often fought in jeſt, pretending to be conquered, fell down at his feet, as the gladiators, who were overcome, uſed to do. But his flattery coſt him dear; for Caius, taking advantage of his fall, ſtabbed him with a dagger; then with a branch of palm-tree, the ſymbol of victory, in his hand, he ran up and down triumphing, as if he had fairly overcome him. As one night at ſupper he burſt ſuddenly into a loud laughter, and the conſuls, who ſat near him, deſired with great reſpect to know the cauſe of his mirth: What makes me ſo merry, ſaid he, is, that I can have both your throats cut with the leaſt nod of my head. A victim being brought to the altar and ready to be offered, he appeared unexpectedly among the reſt in the habit of a prieſt, and, lifting up the ax, as if he deſigned to kill the victim, he knocked out the brains of the prieſt who ſtood by him. Having demanded of one, who had been baniſhed by Tiberius, and recalled by him, how he employed himſelf in his exile, upon his anſwering, that he had conſtantly prayed for the death of Tiberius, that he might come to the empire, he immediately concluded, that thoſe, whom he had baniſhed, prayed likewiſe for his death; and upon that preſumption diſpatched officers to the iſlands, with orders to put them all to the ſword without mercy [i]. To theſe and innumerable other acts of cruelty, related at length by Suetonius and Dion Caſſius, the latter adds the death of Macro and his wife, whom Caius with the utmoſt ingratitude cauſed to be put to death this year. To Macro he was indebted both for his life and empire, and had promiſed him the government of Egypt, the higheſt poſt to which a knight could aſpire. But, inſtead of the promiſed reward, he ordered both him and his wife, as ſome hiſtorians have written [k], to diſpatch themſelves with their own hands. With them were put to death all their children, nay, and their ſlaves, ſo that not one of the whole family was left alive.

The death of Macro and his wife.

Macro

[i] Suet. c. 30—34.

[k] Philo legat. p. 1000.

Macro indeed, according to the character Tacitus gives us of him, deſerved ſo tragical an end, but not at Caius's hands. The true cauſe of his death was, if Philo is to be credited, his uſing with more liberty, than the tyrant could endure, the authority which his eminent ſervice gave him; but Caius charged him with other crimes, and pretended, that, unmindful of his condition, he had even challenged an equal ſhare in the ſovereign power [l]. The next perſon he ſacrificed to his cruelty was M. Silanus, whoſe daughter he had married in Tiberius's reign, a man of a moſt illuſtrious deſcent, and highly eſteemed by all on account of his great experience in affairs, his prudence, and eminent probity. He took upon him to diſapprove Caius's wild meaſures, and ſuggeſt others to him, by which, if followed, he would have anſwered the expectation the public had entertained of him. But the jealous idiot, having a mighty opinion of his own abilities, and looking upon thoſe as his enemies who found fault with his meaſures, reſolved to lay hold of the firſt opportunity to rid himſelf of ſo troubleſome a counſellor; which he did accordingly on the following occaſion. One day all on a ſudden he took it into his head to divert himſelf on the ſea, Silanus, who could not endure the agitation of the ſhip, begged to be excuſed from attending him: this Caius imputed to him as a great crime, pretending, that he remained aſhore with a deſign to ſeize on the empire, in caſe any misfortune had happened to him; and upon this groundleſs pretext he obliged him to cut his own throat with a razor [m] (K). The death of Si- M. Silanus put to death

[l] Idem, 101. Dio, p. 647. [m] Dio, p. 646. Suet. c. 23.

(K) Julius Grecinus, father to the famous Agricola, had ſome time before been ordered by Caius to accuſe Silanus, and put to death for declining that infamous office. Grecinus was a ſenator, no leſs famous for his eloquence, than his probity (26). Seneca often mentions him, and tells us, that not having wherewithal to defray the charges of the public ſhews, which he was obliged to exhibit in virtue of his office, one Fabius Perſicus, a man of great wealth, but of an indifferent character, ſent him a very conſiderable ſum; which he refuſed, anſwering his friends, who found fault with his unſeaſonable generoſity; Would you have me to accept a favour of one with whom I ſhould lanus was followed by that of many other perſons of great diſtinction, whom he condemned, under pretence that they had been acceſſory to the death of his mother or brothers; though his real motive was to ſeize on their eſtates; for he had already ſquandered away great part of the immenſe treaſure left him by Tiberius. This year about the month of July died his ſiſter Druſilla. She had been given by Tiberius five years before to L. Caſſius Longinus, and taken from him ſoon after by Caius, who lived publicly with her, as if ſhe had been his own wife, and had, during his ſickneſs, appointed her to ſucceded him in the empire [n]. He had maintained with her, as well as with his other ſiſters, if Suetonius is to be credited, a criminal converſation, even before ſhe was married. When ſhe died, ſhe was according to Dion Caſſius [o], the wife of M. Lepidus. That writer gives us a very particular account of the extraordinary honours conferred upon her by Caius after her death. She was immediately ranked amongſt the gods, and thenceforth ſtyled the goddeſs Druſilla, which impious title the proſtitute bears on ſome Greek medals, which have reached our times [p]. A ſenator, by name Livius Geminus, declared in full ſenate upon his oath, that he ſaw her carried up to heaven [q]. Seneca rallies him with a good deal of humour upon this viſion, but nevertheleſs choſe rather to adore the divinity of Druſilla, than incur the diſpleaſure of the prince. The emperor's paſſion for his ſiſter appeared no leſs fooliſh after her death, than it had been infamous during her life. He immediately left Rome, and ſhould not care to eat a meal's meat? Rubellius, who had been conſul, but was a man of the ſame ſtamp with Perſicus, ſent him a larger ſum than the other, which he likewiſe rejected; but Rubellius preſſing him, he begged to be excuſed, ſaying, Neither have I accepted any thing of Perſicus (27). The ſame writer tells us elſewhere (28), that he was murdered by Caius's orders, becauſe he was a better man, than was expedient for any one to be under a tyrant. He wrote a book upon agriculture, which is quoted by Columella (29). Pliny likewiſe ranks him among writers (30).

(26) Tacit. vit. Agricol. c. 4.

Druſilla dies, and is honoured as a goddeſs.

Caius's grief.

[n] Suet. c. 24. [o] Dio, p. 648. [p] Vide Goltz. c. 39. [q] Dio, ibid.

(27) Senec. de ben. l. ii. c. 21. (28) Idem epiſt. 29. (29) Columell. l. i. c. 1. (30) Plin. in hiſt. l. xiv, & xv.

and, after having wandered ſome time up and down Campania, he paſſed over into Sicily, where he exhibited moſt magnificent ſhews, and repaired at a vaſt charge the walls of Syracuſe, and ſome temples that were decayed with age. He ridiculed many things, which were looked upon by the Sicilians as miracles; but was ſo terrified with the ſmoke and noiſe of mount Ætna, that he fled from Meſſena in the night, not having courage enough to wait till day appeared [r]. Upon his return to Rome, he purſued the courſe of his cruelties with more barbarity than ever. If any one betrayed joy, it was on account of the death of Druſilla; if ſorrow, it was on account of the divine honours that were paid her; and both were crimes againſt the ſtate, and puniſhed with death: inſomuch, that they were all at a loſs how to comport themſelves, it being alike capital to mourn and to rejoice [t].

His marriages and divorces.

Caius had continued a widow ever ſince the death of Junia, the daughter of Silanus. But C. Calpurnius Piſo marrying one Livia Oreſtilla, and inviting him to his wedding, when the ſolemnity was over, he commanded the bride to be carried to his own palace, and there married her; but divorced her a few days after, and in the term of two years, or two months as ſome will have it, baniſhed both her and Piſo, under pretence that they had lived together [u]. Not long after he married Lollia Paulina, the grand-daughter of M. Lollius, whom Auguſtus, as we have related elſewhere, had appointed governor of Caius Cæſar, when he ſent him into the eaſt. Lollia was already married to C. Memmius Regulus, governor of Macedon and Achaia; but Caius having heard in a private converſation, that her grandmother had been famous for her beauty, he immediately ſent for her, forced her from her huſband, and married her [w] (L); but in a ſhort time not only put her away, but threatened her with death, if ſhe either returned to her former huſband, or married any other man [x]. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of her in the following reign.

And

[r] Senec, ibid. Suet. c. 51.
[t] Senec. ad. Polyb. c. 36.
[u] Suet, c. 25. Dio, p. 646.
[w] Suet, ibid. Dio, p. 648. Euſeb. chron.
[x] Suet, & Dio, ibid.

(L) Lollia Paulina was herſelf very remarkable for her beauty. Pliny tells us, that he ſaw her adorned with a prodigious quantity of His pride and folly.

AND now the bloody monſter, finding no one dared to oppoſe his ſovereign will and pleaſure, notwithſtanding the many murders he daily committed, began to look upon himſelf as raiſed above the condition of a mortal man. To confirm himſelf in this ridiculous fancy, he is ſaid to have uſed the following no leſs ridiculous argument: As thoſe to whoſe care ſheep, oxen, and other cattle are committed, are themſelves neither ſheep nor oxen, but of a nature infinitely ſuperior to the condition of thoſe animals; ſo thoſe who are ſet over all men and creatures in the world, ought not to be regarded as men, but reverenced like gods [y]. He firſt betrayed this extravagant fancy at an entertainment with ſome foreign kings, who came to pay him homage. As ſome diſpute aroſe amongſt thoſe princes about the nobility of their extraction, Caius ſtarting up, repeated a verſe of Homer in the perſon of Ulyſſes; Let there be but one king, one lord below; and was for aſſuming immediately the diadem, and changing the government into a monarchy. But being told that he was already above all the kings and monarchs of the earth, he began from that time to challenge the honours paid to the demi-gods, ſuch as Hercules, Bacchus, Tryphon, &c. aſſuming the dreſs in which they were repreſented, and appearing ſometimes with a lion's ſkin about his ſhoulders and a club in his hand, to perſonate Hercules; ſometimes with wings at his feet, and a caduceus in his hand, like Mercury, &c. But he ſoon thought it beneath him to be honoured only as a demigod, and claimed the ſame worſhip that was paid to Apollo, Mars, and Jupiter himſelf; nay, he cauſed the heads to be taken off their ſtatues, and his own to be put in their room. He often placed himſelf in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, between the ſtatues of thoſe brothers, to be adored by all who came to offer their vows to them. He enlarged his palace, and brought one wing of it cloſe to the temple of thoſe two fabulous deities, which he altered to the form of a portico, that the gods themſelves, as he uſed to ſay, might ſerve him in quality of porters.

Claims divine honours.

[y] Philo. ibid. p. 1002.

of pearls and emeralds, which had formerly belonged to her grandfather M. Lollius (31).

(31) Plin. l. ix. c. 35.

porters. He frequently changed his godhead, being one day a male deity, and another a female; ſometimes Jupiter, at other times Mars; ſometimes Neptune or Apollo, and ſometimes Venus, &c. But above all he liked to be called Jupiter, the head and chief of the Pagan deities; and that he might be eſteemed a true Jupiter, he had inventions to imitate thunder and lightning; and when the thunder was ſuppoſed to fall, he uſed to throw a ſtone againſt heaven, with the impious defiance in Homer; Do you take me from hence or I'll take you. He often went to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and, placing himſelf by his ſtatue, ſometimes whiſpered to it, then laid his ear cloſe to it, as it were to receive an anſwer. Sometimes he ſeemed to be very angry with Jupiter, and was once heard to tell him in a threatening ſtyle, that he would ſend him back into Greece (M). At length being overcome by the importunity of the gods, His Impiety.

(M) Dion Caſſius tells us, that a Gaul ſeeing him one day ſitting on a throne in the figure of Jupiter, could not help burſting into a loud laugh; which Caius hearing, called him to him, and aſked him, What do you take me for? For a great fool anſwered frankly the Gaul. This affront, which would have coſt a ſenator or knight his life, Caius diſſembled in the Gaul, thinking it perhaps below him to exert his vengeance on ſo contemptible a perſon; for he was by profeſſion a ſhoe-maker (32). He cauſed all the temples of Greece to be ſtript of their ſtatues, pictures, and other ornaments which he conveyed to Rome, crouding with them his own temple, his palace, his villas, and his gardens (33). He ordered the famous ſtatue of Jupiter Olympius, done by Phidias, and had in great veneration by the Greeks, to be tranſported to Rome. We are told, that the ſhip, which was building for that purpoſe, was burnt by lightning; and that as often as the workmen attempted to remove the ſtatue, a great noiſe was heard, like that of perſons deriding their attempt. Memmius Regulus, governor of Greece, who was charged to ſee the celebrated ſtatue conveyed to Rome, wrote to Caius, acquainting him that he could not obey his commands on account of ſome extraordinary prodigies, and becauſe the workmen aſſured him, that if once removed, it would fall to pieces. Hereupon, in the tranſport of his rage, he abuſed and threatened Jupiter for daring to oppoſe his ſovereign will, and would have put to death Memmius, had he not been firſt put to death himſelf (34).

(32) Dio, p. 660, 661. (33) Philo legat. 104. Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1. (34) Dio, p. 662. Joſeph. ibid.

gods, as he fooliſhly gave out, who deſired his company, he joined his palace to the capitol by an arch built over the temple of Auguſtus; and ſome time after, that he might yet be nearer, he laid the foundations of a new houſe in the court of the capitol [z]. At length his pride, folly, and impiety carried him ſo far, that he would have a temple for himſelf, which he built at a vaſt charge, and dedicated to his own divinity, placing in it his ſtatue in gold, done to the life, and every day cloathed in the ſame robes which he himſelf wore. He likewiſe inſtituted prieſts and prieſteſſes to officiate in his new temple, the greateſt and richeſt men in Rome, ſo great was their debaſement at this time, purchaſing the infamous prieſthood, with vaſt ſums; for Caius ſold it at ſuch an extravagant price, that his uncle Claudius, not having wherewithal to diſcharge the debt, eight millions of ſeſterces, ſays Suetonius, which he contracted on that occaſion, was obliged to ſurrender all his effects to his creditors, who publicly ſold them by auction [a]. The ſacrifices, which his prieſts daily offered him, were peacocks, pheaſants, Numidian hens, &c. And as though his other follies were not ſufficiently extravagant, he became at laſt prieſt to himſelf, and admitted to the ſame dignity his wife Cæſonia, whom he married the year following; and alſo his horſe, the moſt proper prieſt of all for ſuch a deity [b]. Beſides the temple which he built to himſelf in his palace, the ſenate decreed him another, which was begun in this, and ended in the following year [c]. He ordered a temple to be erected to his godhead at Miletus, which might ſerve for all Aſia; and becauſe it was not finiſhed at the time he expected, he commanded a magnificent temple, which that community was building in honour of Apollo, to be conſecrated to himſelf [d]. All nations, people, and cities, erected temples and altars to this new divinity, ſacrificed victims, and ſwore by his name [e]. But none were more forward in paying him this impious worſhip, than the inhabitans of Alexandria. The Jews alone, who were very numerous in that city, refuſed to bend their knees to the new idol, which brought upon them that cruel perſecution from the Alexandrians,

Inſtitutes prieſts in honour of his own deity:

Temples built, and ſacrifices offered to him.

[z] Suet. c. 22. & 52. Dio, p. 660, 661. Philo. p. 1003.
[a] Suet. in Claud. c. 9. Senec. de ira. l. iv. c. 22.
[b] Idem in Calig. c. 22. Dio. p. 660.
[c] Dio. in excerpt. Val. p. 673.
[d] Idem ibid. p. 670. 671.
[e] Joſeph. bell. Judaic. l. ii. c. 17.

ans, which we have deſcribed in our hiſtory of that nation. The diſtreſſed Jews diſpatched embaſſadors to Rome to lay their ſufferings before Caius, and beg his protection. At the head of this embaſſy was Philo, who gives us a very particular account of it, as we ſhall do from him.

His ſecond conſulſhip.

THE following year, Caius reſumed the faſces, having for his collegue Lucius Aproniius Cæſianus (N), but held them only thirty days [f]. When he entered upon his conſulſhip, and alſo when he reſigned it, he took the uſual oaths, like a private citizen; but while he thus affected popularity, he filled the city with blood and ſlaughter, cauſing thoſe very perſons, who had been impriſoned by Tiberius, and by himſelf ſet at liberty, to be dragged to priſon again, and executed for the pretended crimes with which they had been charged in the former reign [g]. The people not aſſiſting at the ſhews, which he exhibited almoſt every day, with the aſſiduity he expected, he commanded the public granaries to be ſhut up, with a deſign to ſtarve them, and laid hold of all opportunities that offered to do them what miſchief he could. Once in particular he cauſed them all to be driven by his guards out of the circus, on which occaſion great numbers of the common people were cruſhed to death in the throng, and above twenty knights, and as many women of diſtinction. At another time, becauſe they did not declare for the gladiators whom he favoured, he cauſed the ſails, which covered the amphitheatre, to be taken down; and having thus expoſed them to the ſcorching heat of the ſun, he threatened with preſent death ſuch as ſhould offer to ſtir [h].

His hatred to the Roman people.

His inhuman wiſh.

Nay, the acclamati-

[f] Dio. p. 649. Suet. c. 17. Tacit. annal. 6. c. 4. Noris ep. con. p. 28. [g] Dio. ibid. [h] Suet. c. 26.

(N) Cæſianus held the conſulſhip till July, with Sanvinus, or rather anquinius Maximus, governor of Rome, who had been ſubſtituted to Caius. Sanquinius had been likewiſe conſul under Tiberius, but in what year we find no-where recorded (58). Cn. Domitius Corbulo was alſo conſul at this time, from the firſt of July, as is commonly believed (59), to the fourth or ſecond of September, when Caius ignominiouſly depoſed both conſuls (60). Corbulo's collegue was ſo affected with the affront, that he laid violent hands on himſelf, and Caius named in his room Domitius Afer, a celebrated orator (61).

(58) Dio. l. lix. p. 651. (59) Goltz. faſt. p. 238.
(60) Dio. ibid. p. 665. Suet. c. 25. (61) Goltz. ibid.

ons of the people in the theatre differing one day from his, he uttered the inhuman wish, that the whole Roman people had but one neck, that he might dispatch them all at a blow. He often wished for some great calamity, as if the monster himself had not been curse and calamity enough. He envied Augustus the happiness of an army massacred, and Tiberius the sad disaster at Fidenæ, where fifty thousand persons were maimed, or perished, by the fall of an amphitheatre. In short, declaring himself an open enemy to his people, he often made use of the expression of the old tragedian: Oderint dum metuant; let them hate me as much as they please, so they do but fear me. On the other hand, the people considering him no longer as their lawful sovereign, but as their implacable enemy, one day, to be revenged on him, rising up, abandoned the shews, which he was exhibiting at an immense charge; which piqued him to such a degree, that he immediately left Rome and retired to Campania, whence he did not return to the city till the feast of his sister Drusilla, which he solemnized with extraordinary magnificence [i]. Historians this year take notice of the foolish regard he paid to one of his horses, named Incitatus, whom he often invited to his table, fed with gilt oats, and presented with the most delicious wines in cups of gold. His table was all of marble, his manger of ivory, his collar of pearls, and his coverings of rich purple. He appointed him a great number of attendants, and supplied him with furniture no less magnificent than his own, that he might receive and entertain, in a manner suitable to his rank, such as came to wait upon him; for he was a member of the college of Caius's priests, and collegue to Claudius, to Cæsonia, and to the chief nobility of Rome; nay the emperor designed to raise him to the consulship, and would have honoured him, as was commonly believed, with that dignity, if he had lived longer [k].

The foolish regard he paid to his horse Incitatus.

Caius had hitherto disapproved of Tiberius's conduct, and seemed to be greatly pleased with the invectives that were uttered against him. But this year, coming one day to the senate, he told the conscript fathers, that he, who was emperor, might well censure the measures of his predecessor; but that it seemed very strange to him, that they should

[i] Dio. p. 650. Suet. c. 30.

[k] Dio. p. 650. Suet. c. 55.

ſhould preſume to find fault with one who had governed them as their lord and ſovereign. You inveigh againſt him, ſaid he, as a tyrant, for having put many worthy citizens to death, without reflecting that you yourſelves are involved in the ſame guilt, ſince he cauſed none to be executed, who had not been firſt convicted by your evidence, and condemned by your decrees. Since you honoured him ſo much during his life, it ill becomes you thus to inſult his memory after his death. Your conduct ſhews me what I may expect from you when I am gone. Having ſaid many things to this purpoſe, in the end he upbraided the ſenate as the creatures and dependents of Sejanus, as the betrayers of his mother and brothers, as a herd of mean-ſpirited ſlaves and flatterers, and concluded with introducing Tiberius, addreſſing him in the following terms: you have ſaid nothing, O Caius, but what I have by long experience found to be true; deſpiſe them therefore as unworthy of your eſteem and affection, and uſe them with all the ſeverity they deſerve. They all hate you in their hearts, wiſh for your death, and will aſſaſſinate you, if they can with impunity. Lay aſide therefore all hopes of winning their affections, deſpiſe their impotent rage, and employ all your thoughts about your own ſafety: whatever moſt conduces to that, is moſt juſt and equitable. By this means you will have nothing to fear, you will enjoy your pleaſures in ſafety, and at the ſame time be honoured by them; for they have not the courage to oppoſe you. If you ſtudy to gain their affections, you may perhaps acquire an empty reputation, which will die with you; but muſt reſign your power, which will offer them an opportunity of attempting upon your life, and deſtroying you; for the yoke of ſovereignty is ever grating; a prince is honoured ſo long as he is dreaded; when he is not feared, he is deſpiſed; and woe to that prince, whoſe ſubjects are more powerful than he [1]. Caius having thus ſpoke, revived the law of treaſon, and withdrawing from the ſenate, retired forthwith into the country. The ſenators, thunder-ſtruck with ſuch an unexpected ſpeech, and in the utmoſt conſternation on account of the dangers that threatened them; for who had not exclaimed againſt Tiberius? were not capable of coming to any reſolution that day; but the following long ſpeeches were made in commendation of ſo merciful, ſo gracious a prince, who after ſuch juſt and well deſerved reproaches, had had been so generous as not to exert his vengeance: they enacted a decree, ordering the day, on which he made this memorable speech, to be yearly solemnized with victims and sacrifices as a festival; and heaped innumerable other honours upon a prince, who had given such glaring instances of his clemency and good-nature. One would think that such praises must have passed for satire and mockery. But ambition is a credulous passion: Caius was highly pleased with such honours and praises; but nevertheless put afterwards many of those to death, who had spoken ill of Tiberius, though he hated all who spoke well of him [m].

His odd ſpeech to the ſenate.

Revives the law of majeſty.

[1] Dio. ibid. p. 652. Suet. c. 30.

The slavish spirit of the senate.

Caius builds a bridge upon the sea.

This year is also remarkable for the famous work which Caius undertook at Puteoli: it is difficult to determine which was greater, the folly or the extravagancy of the attempt. To shew his power and greatness, and that he was able to walk upon the sea as well as the land, he caused an infinite number of ships to be gathered together in all parts, and a great many new ones to be built, which were all brought into the bay of Baiæ and Puteoli in Campania. There from the point of Baiæ to the opposite shore of Puteoli they were placed in two rows in the form of a crescent, being fastened and moored together with anchors, chains, and cables. So many ships were employed in this foolish undertaking, that none being left to convey corn to Rome, the city was greatly distressed by famine, which continued to the reign of Claudius [n], and to the great satisfaction of Caius, swept off daily great numbers of the people. Seneca tells us, that when Caius was killed, there was not sufficient corn in the public granaries to maintain the people eight days longer [o]. When the ships were well fastened and secured, vast quantities of large planks and boards were laid over them, and covered with earth. Then to make this stupendous work the more magnificent and surprising, he sent for an infinite number of artificers and workmen, who, at an immense charge and with incredible expedition, Caius punishing the least remissness with present death, built houses and convenient inns on the bridge for the reception of the emperor and his numerous retinue. Into these public houses was conveyed fresh water in pipes from the land, Caius taking delight in such things only, as to others seemed impossible. When this wonderful work was completed, Caius

The expence and extravagance of this undertaking.

[m] Dio. ibid.

[n] Idem. p. 652. Suet. c. 37. Joseph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1.

[o] Senec. de brev. vit. c. 18.

tus repaired to it with all the great lords of Rome, being attended by immenſe crouds of people, who flocked from every quarter to behold this mighty pomp. Upon his arrival at Baiæ he offered ſolemn ſacrifices to the gods, eſpecially to Envy; leſt the other deities ſhould be touched with jealouſy in ſeeing their glory eclipſed by his. Then proudly adorned with magnificent robes of gold, and armed with the breaſtplate of Alexander the Great, having a civic crown on his head, accompanied with the great officers of his army and all the nobility of Rome, he mounted on horſeback, and entering upon the bridge at Baiæ, rid with an awful majeſty to Puteoli. There he reſided the remaining part of the day, and the following night, when with an infinite number of torches, lanthorns, and other lights placed in different parts of the work, the ſea, the neighbouring mountains, and the ſhore, were illuminated to a vaſt diſtance, Caligula boaſting, that he had turned the night into day, as well as the ſea into land. The next day he appeared in the habit peculiar to the charioteers in the circus, and in a chariot drawn by two ſtately horſes, being attended by young Darius, the Parthian hoſtage, a ſquadron of his guards in bright armour, and a great train of his friends magnificently attired, and likewiſe in their chariots; he ſet out on his return to Baiæ, but halted about the middle of the bridge; and there, aſcending a magnificent throne, made a ſolemn oration in praiſe of his own exploit in riding ſo many miles upon the ſea, and of the pains and care taken by his ſoldiers and workmen, among whom he diſtributed large rewards. He ſpent all the day and the next night in this place, revelling and banquetting with his friends; and when he began to be heated with wine, that he might perform ſome memorable action before he left his bridge, he all on a ſudden cauſed great numbers of people to be thrown into the ſea, without diſtinction of friend or foe, noble or ignoble; and when they attempted to climb up into the veſſels, he ordered them to be thruſt off; ſo that many periſhed, tho' the far greater part ſaved themſelves, however drunk, by ſwimming, the ſea proving extremely calm and ſmooth the whole time, which Caius fooliſhly aſcribed to the reſpect Neptune had for him as a more powerful deity [p]. After this Caius returned to Rome, and entered the Cauſes many perſons to be thrown into the ſea.

[p] Dio. p. 653. Suet. c. 37, 19. Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 6. & l. xix. c. 1. Senec brev. vit. c. 18.

the city in triumph, for having overcome, as he boaſted, nature itſelf. Upon his departure, the bridge, as Dion Caſſius ſeems to inſinuate [q], was immediately broke down, and the ſhips employed in it reſtored to the owners. In ſuch wild and uſeleſs attempts did Caius ſquander away in the ſpace of two years, beſides his ordinary revenues, the immenſe treaſure left by Tiberius, amounting to eighteen millions of our money. As to the motive, which prompted him to ſuch an extravagant undertaking, authors are not agreed (O).

His avarice and enormous actions.

Caius having by this and many other extravagancies exhauſted and drained his exchequer, he betook himſelf to all manner of rapine, inventing ſuch kinds of penalties, confiſcations, and impoſts, as had never before been heard of. He would not allow any one to be legally a citizen of Rome, whoſe grant ran in the following terms; "to him and his poſterity," unleſs he was his ſon, pretending that the word poſterity did not extend beyond that degree; ſo that moſt of the Roman citizens were obliged to purchaſe their freedom anew. He declared the wills void of all, from the beginning of Tiberius's reign, who had not named either that prince or himſelf amongſt their heirs. Hereupon ſeveral perſons named him in their wills amongſt their friends and children, which he knowing, cauſed them under ſeveral pretences to be put to death, that he might receive his ſhare the ſooner; nay, he was heard once to ſay, that it was a great preſumption in them to live, and keep him out of his inheritance. No commodity whatever, nor even the neceſſaries of life, were exempt from ſome tax or other. For all actions at law, in what place ſoever commenced, he exacted the fortieth

[q] Dio. ibid.

(O) Some write, that he built this bridge in imitation of Xerxes, who laid a wonderful one over the Helleſpont, as we have related in our hiſtory of Perſia. Others ſay, that being then upon the point of invading Germany and Britain, he deſigned to terrify them with the report of ſome extraordinary work. But Suetonius tells us, that when he was but a boy, he was informed by his grandfather, that Caius had been put upon this undertaking by certain aſtrological predictions of the celebrated Thraſyllus, who, finding Tiberius unreſolved as to his ſucceſſor, yet more inclined to his own grandſon, than to Caius, told him, it was as hard a matter for Caius to be emperor, as it was for him to ride over the gulph of Baiæ. Suetonius's grandfather lived under Caius, and had this intelligence from perſons who were in high favour with him (62).

(62) Suet. c. 19.

tieth part of the thing in controverſy, and laid heavy fines on ſuch as were convicted either of compounding, or dropping the ſuit. He enacted a law, enjoining all artificers, labourers, porters, carriers, &c. to pay into the exchequer the eighth part of their daily gains. Every proſtitute was obliged to pay a certain proportion of what ſhe earned; nay, he was not aſhamed to turn his own palace into a brothel-houſe, maintaining there great numbers of proſtitutes, and ſending his officers to invite people of all ranks to his diverſions. He received the money himſelf of ſuch as came, and ordered his officers to enter their names in his books, as of perſons well affected to Cæſar. He likewiſe encouraged gaming-houſes, frequenting them himſelf; nay, at laſt he appointed an apartment in his own palace for gameſters, and there ſpent great part of his time. We are told, that one day, in the midſt of his game, obſerving two Roman knights of great eſtates accidentally paſſing by, he immediately went down, cauſed both to be apprehended, and their eſtates to be confiſcated; and then returning with joy to his game, boaſted, that he had never had a better throw. Another time wanting money for his ſtake, he went down, and cauſed ſeveral noblemen to be put to death; then returning told the company, that while they ſat playing for ſmall ſums, he had won ſix hundred thouſand ſeſterces. He uſed frequently to expoſe to ſale the effects of the condemned perſons, and oblige the rich citizens to buy them at the price he was pleaſed to ſet upon them; which was ſo high, that many noble families were by that means reduced to poverty. He forced, not to mention others, a wealthy citizen, by name Apollonius Saturninus, to pay nine millions of ſeſterces for thirteen gladiators, whom he expoſed to ſale with all the furniture of the amphitheatre. A daughter being born to him about this time, he complained publicly of his poverty, not only as an emperor, but as a father; but applied to his own uſe all the preſents and contributions made by the people for the education and portion of the child[r]. The law of majeſty, which he revived, proved an inexhauſtible fund for the encreaſing of his revenues. Dion Caſſius enumerates a great many worthy citizens, who were put to death for no other crime but their great wealth; and tells us, that one Junius Priſcus, prætor, who had been condemned and executed under colour of ſome other crime, being found after his death poſſeſſed but of a ſmall eſtate, the emperor cried out, I have been impoſed upon; Junius

Turns his palace into a brothel and a gaming-houſe

[r] Suet. c. 38.—43.

was not guilty (P). Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, had acquired great wealth in that province, and beſides, his great power, and the reputation he had gained amongſt the ſoldiery, gave Caius no ſmall uneaſineſs, who thereupon recalled him with a deſign to put him to death, under pretence, that through his negligence the Parthians had driven Tiridates from Deſigns to deſtroy Lucius Vitellius governor of Syria.

(P) Dion Caſſius tells us in this place how Domitius Afer eſcaped condemnation. He was, ſays Tacitus (63), more famous for his eloquence than his integrity. He had been under Tiberius a zealous accuſer, and acted that part againſt Claudia Pulchra, an intimate friend and couſin to Agrippina, as we have related above. It was not, however, this that provoked Caius againſt him, but his being eſteemed the moſt eloquent orator of his age, which glory Caius thought due to himſelf; and therefore reſolved to rid himſelf of the only perſon who diſputed it with him. Domitius erected this year a ſtatue to the emperor with an inſcription, importing, that he was conſul the ſecond time in the twenty-ſeventh year of his age. This he meant as a compliment; but Caius, who wanted a pretence to deſtroy him, pretended, that he thereby reproached him with his youth, and a violation of the laws, forbidding any one to be raiſed to the conſular dignity at that age. He therefore took upon him to accuſe him himſelf, and delivered in the ſenate a long ſpeech, which he had compoſed againſt him. Domitius, inſtead of anſwering it, which, without all doubt, would have coſt him his life, extolled the eloquence of the ſpeaker, admired the propriety of his expreſſions, repeated the moſt remarkable paſſages, giving them their due weight, and pointing out their beauties, &c. When he was ordered to make his defence, inſtead of anſwering the emperor's oration, he threw himſelf at his feet, acknowledged him for his maſter in eloquence, and declared, that he deſpiſed life after he was thus bereaved of the glory on which he piqued himſelf, of being eſteemed the beſt orator of his age. Caius was ſo well pleaſed with this pretended ſubmiſſion, that he not only forgave him, but raiſed him that very year to the conſulate. Caliſtus, one of Caius's freedmen, whom Domitius had gained, and who had proved very ſerviceable to him on this occaſion, having one day made uſe of the liberty which Caius allowed him to complain of the bitter invectives, which he had uttered againſt one, whom he knew to be free from all guilt, the emperor returned him this anſwer; would you have had me to loſe ſo fine a diſcourſe (64)? Philo places in this year the maſſacre from the kingdom of Armenia, which had been given him by Tiberius. Vitellius was a man of good talents and qualifications, had eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the army, and in the government of provinces, ſays Tacitus [s], exerciſed the integrity of a primitive Roman. But his dread of Caligula changed him into a contemptible ſlave, and he is handed down to poſterity as a pattern of the moſt infamous flattery. For the firſt time Caius deigned to admit him to his preſence, he appeared before him in a modeſt dreſs, and accoſted him with the ſame ceremonies that were practiſed by the Romans, when they approached their gods, that is having his head covered with a veil, turning himſelf round, and then falling down proſtrate before him [t]. Caius was ſo taken with this unexpected behaviour, that he not only forgave him, but thenceforth numbered him amongſt his moſt intimate friends. For he was the firſt who introduced amongſt the Romans the cuſtom of approaching the emperors, as the Parthians and other eaſtern nations did their monarchs [u]. We ſhall have occaſion to relate in the courſe of this hiſtory other inſtances of his ſlaviſh ſpirit, and ſervile ſubmiſſion. He was ſucceeded in the government of Syria by P. Petronius, of whom hereafter. We are told, that maſſacre of the exiles, and tells us, that Caius, not being able one night to take any reſt, being haunted, as it frequently happened, with inward horrors, he began to think, that the baniſhed perſons were too happy, that they lived in eaſe and tranquillity, and wanted neither the neceſſaries nor conveniencies of life. Hereupon concluding with himſelf, that it was not reaſonable criminals ſhould enjoy any happineſs, as ſoon as day appeared, he made a liſt of the moſt eminent perſons amongſt them, and diſpatched officers with orders to put them all to death, which occaſioned an univerſal mourning among the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome. At the head of this black liſt was Flaccus, who had been governor of Egypt, and confined a few months before to the iſland of Andros (65). Euſebius fixes this cruel execution to the laſt year of Caius's reign (66); but Philo places it before the diſgrace of Lepidus, which happened this year (67).

(63) Tacit. annal. vi. c. 52.

(64) Dio. p. 644, 645.

Who forfeits his reputation to ſave his life.

[s] Tacit. annal. l. vi. c. 32. [t] Suet. in vit. c. 2. [u] Dio. p. 661. Philo legat. p. 1008. Suet. ibid.

(65) Philo in Flacc. p. 990, 991. (66) Euſeb. in chron. (67) Idem ibid.

Seneca was about this time in imminent danger of loſing his life for no other crime, but having pleaded a cauſe in the ſenate with great eloquence, and univerſal applauſe. This Caius, who was preſent, and pretended to be the beſt orator of his age, could not bear, and would therefore have diſpatched him, had he not been aſſured by one of his courteſans, that Seneca was affected with a diſtemper, which would ſoon corrupt his body, and put an end to his life [w] (Q).

The laſt of Auguſt, being his birth-day, the conſuls forgot to warn the people to obſerve it as a feſtival; which incenſed Caius to ſuch a degree, that on the ſecond of September he depoſed them, and cauſed their rods to be broken. This proved ſo ſenſible a mortification to them, that one of them not able to brook it, laid violent hands on himſelf. The pretence, that Caius took for thus ſtripping them ignominiouſly of their dignity, was, their obſerving the ſecond of September, the anniverſary of the battle of Actium, as a feſtival. This indeed was cuſtomary; but the emperor, who was deſcended from Auguſtus by his mother Agrippina, and from Antony by his grandmother Antonia, told his friends before, that the conſuls could not avoid giving him on that day a favourable pre-

Caius depoſes both the conſuls.

tence

[w] Dio, p. 655.

(Q) Caius deſpiſed the eloquence of Seneca, though then in great vogue, calling his writing "ſand without lime". Caius himſelf was no mean orator, had a great fluency and command of words, eſpecially when he declaimed againſt any one: and ſuch a clear voice and diſtinct pronunciation, that he was heard at a great diſtance. He took great delight in writing anſwers to ſuch orators as had performed with applauſe. He often pleaded in the ſenate for or againſt ſuch perſons of diſtinction as were accuſed, not being governed therein by friendſhip or enmity, but by the ſubject; for he was ready to accuſe a friend, or defend an enemy, according as he thought the ſubject moſt proper to diſplay his eloquence. When he declaimed, he conſtantly invited, by a public proclamation, the knights to hear him, who never failed to applaud him; and indeed he well deſerved their applauſe, for though he under valued the other liberal arts, he ſtudied eloquence with great application, and ſpoke very pertinently, eſpecially in accuſing (68).

(68) Suet. c. 53.

tence to revenge the late affront, either by omitting to celebrate the victory of Auguſtus, or by ſolemnizing the defeat of Antony [x]. Accordingly, the conſuls having, according to cuſtom, celebrated with the uſual ceremonies the anniverſary of the Actiac victory, they were the ſame day depoſed by Caius's orders, under pretence that they had ſolemnized not ſo much the victory of Auguſtus, as the defeat of his great-grandfather Antony. The city was then three days without conſuls, that is the third, fourth and fifth of September [y]; but on the ſixth, Domitius Afer, and another, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us, were nominated to that dignity. After this Caius forbad the boaſted victories gained by Auguſtus in Sicily and at Actium to be ſolemnized for the future, ſaying, that they had proved tragical and calamitous to the Roman people, though at the ſame time he gave out, that his mother Agrippina was not the daughter of Agrippa, but of Auguſtus by his own daughter Julia. Thus he choſe rather to aſperſe the memory of his great grandfather, and owe his birth to an abominable inceſt, than derive his pedigree from Agrippa who was not of an illuſtrious deſcent [z] (R). Dion Caſſius obſerves in this place, that Caius being jealous of the power and courage of L. Piſo, proconſul of Africa, and probably the ſon of that Piſo, who was ſuppoſed to have poiſoned Germanicus, took from him and his ſucceſſors the command of the legion quartered there, and the Numidian auxiliaries, and gave it to a lieutenant. Theſe lieutenants, by degrees, became more powerful than the proconſuls, and were in after-ages ſtyled Counts of Africa [a]. This regulation was introduced, according to Tacitus [b], one or two years before, while M. Silanus was proconſul Forbids the victories of Auguſtus to be ſolemnized.

[a] The origin of the counts of Africa.

[x] Dio, ibid.
[y] Suet. c. 26.
[z] Suet. c. 23.
[a] Dio, p. 656.
[b] Tacit. hiſtor. l. iv. c. 48.

(R) He uſed to ſpeak very contemptuouſly, not only of Agrippa, but of his great grandmother Livia Auguſta, calling her Ulyſſem ſtolatum, that is, in our language, an Ulyſſes in petticoats. In a letter to the ſenate, he reflected on her pedigree, pretending that Aufidius Lingo, her grandfather by the mother, was but a a common Decurio at Fundi, though it appeared from the public records, that he had diſcharged very conſiderable offices at Rome (69).

69) Idem, c. 23.

of Africa. It is not eaſy, nor indeed of any importance, to decide, which of theſe two writers may be in the right.

Prepares for war againſt the Germans.

Towards the end of the year, Caius undertook an expedition into Gaul, under colour of oppoſing the Germans, who were ſaid to have committed ſome hoſtilities; but his real motive was to plunder that wealthy province, and likewiſe Spain, after he had with extravagant tributes and taxes quite drained Italy. He never mentioned this deſign, till going one day to Mevania, at a ſmall diſtance from Rome, to ſee the celebrated river and foreſt of Clitumnus, he was adviſed to complete the number of the Batavians, who were then his guards. Upon this he took a fancy to make war upon the Germans, and, without farther deliberation, ordered a great number of legions and auxiliaries to be drawn together, new levies to be made with great diligence, and a prodigious quantity of proviſions to be got ready. His orders being executed with ſurprizing expedition, he immediately began his march, moving ſometimes with ſuch haſte, that the prætorian cohorts were obliged, which had never before been practiſed, to have their ſtandards brought after them on their ſumpter-horſes; at other times ſo ſlowly, that he ſeemed to walk only for his diverſion. He was carried the beſt part of the way in a litter on eight mens ſhoulders, having ſent before meſſengers, commanding the neighbouring cities to have their high-ways well ſwept and watered, that he might not be troubled with duſt. He was attended in this mock expedition, by Herod king of Batanea and Trachonitis, and by Antiochus king of Comagene, and followed by a long train of gladiators, comedians, buffoons, looſe women, &c. with whom he ſpent his whole time [c]. When he arrived at the place, where the legions were encamped that guarded the banks of the Rhine, he reviewed his forces, which amounted to two hundred, or two hundred and fifty thouſand, men. To acquire the reputation of a ſevere and ſtrict obſerver of military diſcipline, he diſmiſſed with ignominy and diſgrace ſeveral old officers, who had ſerved their time, pretending that they were unfit for the ſervice, but in reality to exempt himſelf from the obligation of paying them the rewards due to veterans [d]. He paſſed the Rhine, but after advancing a few miles into the country he returned without having killed or ſeen a ſingle

His march.

[c] Dio, p. 656. Suet. c. 43. [d] Suet. c. 44. Dio, p. 657, 658.

a ſingle enemy, though one would have judged from his mighty preparations, that he would have over-run the whole country. Tacitus tells us, that one Brinio or Brenno, prince of the Caninefates, ridiculed with impunity this fooliſh expedition of Caius [e]. And indeed, well he might; for while he, who had threatened the barbarians with utter deſtruction, was paſſing in his chariot through a narrow lane, and his troops were forced to break their ranks on account of the narrowneſs of the place, one happening to ſay, that great would be their confuſion, if the enemy ſhould appear, he immediately threw himſelf out of his chariot, mounted on horſeback, and flew back to the bridges with a deſign to repaſs the river; but finding them crouded with the ſervants and baggage of the army, he made them hand him from one to another, and convey him over their heads, thinking he could not too ſoon get out of the enemies country [f]. Being afterwards recovered from his fright, and well aſſured that there was nothing to fear, he cauſed ſome of his German guards to croſs the Rhine, and after having concealed themſelves for ſome time in a neighbouring foreſt, to riſe out of their ambuſcade in a great tumult and hurry; that upon the alarm, which this would occaſion, word might be brought him that the enemy was at hand; which being done accordingly, the mock hero ſtarting up from his dinner, and putting himſelf at the head of a party of the prætorian horſe, haſtened to oppoſe the enemy, and advancing to the foreſt, there ſpent the remaining part of the day in cutting down trees to erect trophies for ſo ſignal a victory. Upon his return he reproached with cowardice thoſe who had not followed him, but rewarded ſuch as had borne with him the brunt of the day with a new ſort of crowns, which, to diſtinguiſh them from all others, he called exploratoriæ. But this expedition, however glorious and ſucceſsful, not ſatisfying his martial ardor, he reſolved to ſignalize himſelf by ſome other ſtill more noble atchievement. With this view he ordered ſome children whom he kept as hoſtages, to be privately conveyed away, and word to be brought him that they had made their eſcape; upon which he immediately mounted on horſeback, purſued the ſuppoſed fugitives with a detachment of cavalry, and brought them back loaded with chains. After theſe noble atchievements, he wrote a letter letter to the ſenate, complaining of them and the people, for indulging themſelves in banquets, pleaſures, and diverſions, while Cæſar was fighting, and expoſed for their ſafety to ſo many perils and hazards. But the moſt glorious of all his exploits was his receiving under his protection Adminius, who being baniſhed by his father Cynobelinus, one of the kings of Britain, fled to him with a ſmall retinue. This ſeemed to him ſo memorable an action, that he immediately wrote boaſting letters to the ſenate, as if he had ſubdued the whole iſland, ſtrictly enjoining the meſſengers to ride directly through the forum to the palace, and not to deliver his letters to the conſuls, but in the preſence of the ſenate aſſembled in the temple of Mars. In the mean time he cauſed himſelf to be ſeven times proclaimed emperor by his victorious troops on the banks of the Rhine [g].

His fright and conſternation.

His exploits.

[e] Tacit. hiſt. l. iv. c. 15. [f] Suet. c. 44. & 51.

His boaſting letters to the ſenate.

His extortions and cruelties in Gaul.

The Gauls would have reckoned themſelves happy, had he done them no more harm, than he did the enemy. But his avarice, equal to his prodigality, prompted him to haraſs and oppreſs that unhappy nation with ſuch extortions, as reduced even the moſt wealthy to beggary. Not ſatisfied with the great preſents, which he obliged both the cities and particular perſons to make him, he cauſed the moſt wealthy men in the province, though free from all guilt, to be accuſed of treaſon, that he might ſeize their eſtates, which he ſold in perſon, obliging others to purchaſe them at the price he thought fit to put upon them. Having one day loſt at dice an immenſe ſum, he cauſed the regiſters, which ſerved for the cenſus, to be brought to him; and writing a liſt of thoſe who poſſeſſed the greateſt eſtates in the province, ordered them to be immediately put to death, and ſeized all their effects [h].

The conſpiracy of Lentulus and Lepidus.

About this time, was diſcovered a conſpiracy againſt Caius; but whether it was real, or only ſuppoſed, is ſtill uncertain (S). Lentulus and Lepidus were ſaid to be at the [g] Idem, c. 44.—46. Dio. p. 657. [h] Dio. ibid.

(S) Dion Caſſius ſpeaks of it as an imaginary conſpiracy (24); but Suetonius ſuppoſes it to have been a real one (25). Lipſius takes it to be that plot which Tacitus mentions to have been diſcovered to Caius by Anicius Cerealis (26).

(24) Dio. p. 657. (25) Suet. in Claud. c. 9. (26) Tacit. annal. xvi. c. 17.

the head of it. Cneius Lentulus Getulicus had commanded the legions in higher Germany for the ſpace of ten years, Tiberius not daring to remove him, as we have related in the hiſtory of that prince's reign. But he was doomed to death by Caius, ſays Dion [i], for no other crime, but becauſe he was greatly beloved by the ſoldiery on account of his clemency and good-nature. Some monuments have reached our times of the ſacrifices which were offered on the twenty-ſeventh of October, by way of thankſgiving for the happy diſcovery, ſays the inſcription, of the wicked deſigns of Cn. Lentulus Getulicus [k]. His employment was given to Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor, who, the next day after his arrival in the camp, gave ſignal inſtances of his zeal for military diſcipline, of which more in his reign. M. Æmilius Lepidus is ſuppoſed to have been the ſon of Julia, Auguſtus's grand-daughter, and ſiſter to Agrippina the mother of Caius [l], who nevertheleſs condemned him as guilty of treaſon, and charged a tribune, by name Decimus, to cut off his head [m] (T). At the ſame time, he condemned his two ſiſters, Agrippina and Livilla or Julia, as guilty of adultery with Lepidus, and privy to the conſpiracy; and confined them to the iſland of Pontia, adding with threats, that he had ſwords as well as iſlands [n]. After this he wrote a letter to the ſenate, acquainting them that he had eſcaped a dangerous conſpiracy, and inveighing with great bitterneſs againſt his ſiſters, whom he was not aſhamed to charge with moſt infamous crimes. He ſent three daggers to Rome to be confe-

Caius baniſhes his ſiſters, Agrippina and Livilla.

[i] Idem ibid. [k] Grut. p. 117. [l] Tacit. annal. vi. c. 30. [m] Dio. p. 648, Senec. ep. 4. [n] Suet. c. 29. Dio. p. 657.

(T) M. Lepidus was greatly, nay too much beloved by Caius, if Dion does not confound him with M. Lepidus Mneſter, the mimick, with whom Caius maintained a ſcandalous commerce (27). Æmilius was admitted by the emperor to the great employments five years before the age preſcribed by the laws; nay, we are told, that Caius promiſed to name him for his ſucceſſor. But Lepidus, notwithſtanding the kindneſs ſhewn him by the emperor, debauched his two ſiſters Agrippina and Livilla, or Julia, hoping, as was ſuppoſed, by his familiarity with them, to raiſe himſelf to the empire.

(27) Suet. c. 36.

confecrated there to Mars the avenger, with an inſcription, importing, that they had been deſigned for his deſtruction; and obliged Agrippina to carry from Gaul to Rome the urn with the bones of Lepidus. He ſold all the furniture, jewels, ſlaves, and even the freedmen of his ſiſters, after their condemnation. As he degraded himſelf to ſell them in perſon, he put his own price upon them, and obliged the Gauls to purchaſe them. This kind of traffick proving very advantageous, he ordered the rich furniture of the imperial palace, with the robes of Marc Antony, of Auguſtus, of his mother Agrippina, and others of the imperial family, to be ſent him from Rome, and ſold them in the ſame manner. So many carriages and beaſts of burden were employed in conveying the furniture of the imperial palace from Italy to Gaul, that no horſes being found to turn the mills, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, the city was reduced to great ſtreights for want of bread °. But, notwithſtanding the immenſe and almoſt incredible ſums, he raiſed by theſe ſales, he ſtill wanted money, being no leſs boundleſs in his prodigality (U), than iniquitous in his extortions.

By what vile means he raiſed money in Gaul.

When

° Suet. ibid.

(U) In luxury, ſays Suetonius (28), and extravagance, he far outdid all the prodigals of his age. He uſed baths of ſweet oils with the moſt coſtly perfumes that could be purchaſed. At his entertainments he often cauſed the largeſt pearls to be diſſolved in vinegar, to diſplay his grandeur and magnificence. Sometimes to divert himſelf with his gueſts, he cauſed empty diſhes of pure gold to be ſerved up, which he diſtributed among them, ſaying, that at Cæſar's table their bread and meat muſt be nothing but gold. For ſeveral days together he took delight in throwing down from the top of a tower conſiderable ſums among the people. He built certain galleys of cedar, having the ſterns, which were of ivory, adorned with precious ſtones, the ſails of various ſilks, the cabins and galleries ſpacious and convenient, with great variety of vines and fruit-trees, under the ſhade of which he often dined, coaſting along the ſhore of Campania, with great pomp and ſplendor, being entertained by the mixed melody of voices, and all ſorts of inſtruments. In all his buildings he conſidered nothing but his own particular fancy, and thought nothing anſwerable to his grandeur, but what to others ſeemed

(28) Suet. c. 37.

WHEN the death of Lepidus and Getulicus was known at Rome, Flavius Veſpaſianus, then prætor, and afterwards emperor, who ſtudied to inſinuate himſelf by any means into the emperor's favour, was for throwing the bodies of the conſpirators into the Tiber, and depriving them of the honour of ſepulture. Neither did the ſenate omit ſo favourable an opportunity of heaping new honours upon the prince; amongſt others they decreed him an ovation, and deputed his uncle Claudius, with ſeveral other perſons of the firſt rank drawn by lot, to go into Gaul, and congratulate him in their name upon the diſcovery of ſo dangerous a conſpiracy, and the deſerved vengeance he had taken on the conſpirators. But Caius, not ſatisfied with the honours decreed him, eſpecially with an ovation, and complaining of the ſmall number of the deputies, ordered ſome of them to return even before they entered Gaul, as if they had been ſpies, and received the others with great coldneſs. He chiefly reſented their ſending his uncle, as if he were a child, and wanted a governor. He did not, however, ſend him back, but treated him in a moſt ignominious manner [p]; nay, we are told, that he cauſed him to be thrown into a river the moment he arrived [q]. After this the ſenate decreed him greater honours, and ſent him a more numerous deputation; which he received with great marks of ſatisfaction, and even went out to meet the deputies ſeemed impoſſible. He raiſed pillars and towers in the ſea, cut his way through rocks of the moſt impenetrable flint, levelled mountains, raiſed plains and vallies, &c. (29). Joſephus obſerves, that he never undertook any thing worthy of a prince, that is, uſeful to the public, except an harbour, which he began in the neighbourhood of Rhegium for the convenience and ſafety of the ſhips, which conveyed corn from Alexandria to Italy; but this he left unfiniſhed (30). Suetonius (31) enumerates ſeveral works, which he undertook, but none of any uſe to the public, except a fine aqueduct, which Claudius finiſhed fourteen years after. Frontinus mentions another aqueduct amongſt the works of Caius, but upon what authority we know not. He cauſed an obeliſk to be brought out of Egypt, which Suetonius deputies [r]. In the mean time, proſecutions were carried on at Rome againſt the friends of Caius's ſiſters, and of thoſe who had been executed for the late conſpiracy. Several ædiles and prætors were obliged to lay down their employments, and appear before the ſenate in the habit of criminals. Among the reſt Sophronius Tigellinus, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of Nero, was baniſhed for a criminal correſpondence with Agrippina. Theſe proceedings terrified the ſenate, who apprehended ſtill greater evils from a prince, who was cruel by nature, and gave ear, as was ſuppoſed, to the pernicious counſels of the kings Agrippa and Antiochus.

New honours decreed him by the ſenate.

[p] Dio. p. 658. [q] Suet. in Claud. c. 9.

(29) Idem, c. 29. (30) Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 2. (31) Suet. c. 21.

He marries Cæſonia.

CAIUS, after the condemnation of his ſiſters, divorced his wife Lollia Paulina to marry Milonia Cæſonia, who was neither beautiful nor young, being already the mother of three children by another huſband, who was ſtill alive. She had, however, a particular talent and addreſs in gaining the affections of all with whom ſhe converſed; inſomuch, that Caius loved her entirely, and lived longer with her than any other [s] (W). He married her, according to Suetonius, [r] Dio, ibid. [s] Dio, p. 658. Suet. c. 25.

Suetonius (32) calls the great obeliſk, and placed it in the circus on mount Vatican. The ſhip, in which it was conveyed to Rome, was the fineſt and largeſt that had ever appeared on the ſea till Pliny's time, who tells us, that four men could ſcarce fathom the maſt of this extraordinary veſſel (33). He deſigned to rebuild the palace of Polycrates at Samos, to finiſh the temple of Apollo Didymæus at Miletus, and to found a new city on the top of the Alps; but his favourite project was to cut the iſthmus of Corinth, and open a communication between thoſe two ſeas; in which undertaking he was attended with no better ſucceſs than thoſe who attempted it after him (34). Seneca mentions an immenſe ſum expended by him in one banquet (35); and Pliny ſpeaks of a ſplendid and coſtly entertainment, which he gave to fifteen gueſts in the hollow of a plane-tree, framed in the form of a room (36).

(W) Cæſonia was daughter to Veſtilia, who, if Pliny is to be credited (37), was delivered of two children in ſeven months time, (32) Suet. in Claud. c. 20. (33) Plin. l. xxvi. c. 40. (34) Plin. l. iv. c. 4. Suet. c. 21. (35) Senec. ad Hely. c. 9. (36) Plin. l. xii. c. 1. (37) Plin. l. vii. c. 5.

Suetonius, the ſame day that ſhe was delivered of a daughter, declaring himſelf her huſband, and the father of the child [t]. But Dion ſays, that he married her about a month before her delivery [u]. To the child he gave the name of Julia Druſilla, carried her to the temples of all the goddeſſes in Rome, and put her into the arms of Minerva, as if to that powerful goddeſs he committed the care of her education [w]. He laid her likewiſe at the feet of Jupiter Capitolinus, ſaying, that ſhe was common to him and Jupiter, and leaving all men to judge which of her parents was the greateſt, and from which ſhe derived the more noble origin [x]. But nothing more aſſured Caius, that ſhe was his daughter, for her mother was not renowned for her chaſtity, than her natural fierceneſs, of which ſhe ſoon gave ſufficient indications, by ſcratching and tearing the faces of the little children who played with her [y]. Upon her birth Caius complained of his poverty, as we have hinted above, and obliged the people to contribute large ſums for the educating and marrying her ſuitable to her rank, which he applyed to his own uſe. He likewiſe declared by an edict, that on the firſt of January he intended to receive new-year's gifts, which he did accordingly, ſtanding in the porch of the palace, while the people and nobility with full hands and time, of one in eleven, and of Cæſonia in eight. All theſe children lived, as the ſame writer obſerves, to a competent age, and enjoyed good health. Suetonius tells us, that Cæſonia gained and maintained the affections of Caius by her monſtrous lewdneſs (38). After her huſband's death, ſhe was charged with having fixed his affection to her with an amorous potion, which affecting his brain, had diſordered his underſtanding, and occaſioned that fury and madneſs which had brought ſo many calamities upon the ſtate. Whether ſhe adminiſtered to him any ſuch potion, is uncertain; but this ſerved as a pretence for the conſpirators to diſpatch both her and her daughter after the murder of Caius (39). Suetonius tells us, that the emperor often ſhewed her to his ſoldiers habited like them, and to his friends without any garment (40).

His meanneſs.

[t] Suet. ibid. [u] Dio, ibid. [w] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 673. Suet. ibid. [x] Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1. [y] Suet. ibid.

(38) Suet. c. 25. (39) Joſeph. ibid. c. 2. Juvenal. ſatyr. 6. v. 515 (40) Suet. c. 25.

and laps poured out their preſents before him [z]. Auguſtus had formerly received new-year's gifts, according to the Roman cuſtom, but not out of covetouſneſs, as Caius, who is ſaid to have ſuch a paſſion for money, that his chief delight was to walk bare-foot, and even to roll himſelf upon heaps of gold, which he had accumulated by all manner of rapine [a].

Galba defeats the Germans.

THIS year, the Germans, having no doubt drawn together their forces to oppoſe Caius, made upon his departure an inroad into Gaul; but were repulſed by Galba with ſuch vigor and expedition, that Caligula could not forbear commending and rewarding both him and his troops, though he generally uſed out of jealouſy and envy, to diſcountenance ſuch of his officers as had gained any conſiderable advantage over the enemy. Caius, who was then in Gaul, aſſumed the whole glory of this action to himſelf, and acquainted the ſenate with it by a letter, which he ſent wrapt up in the branch of a laurel, the ſymbol of victory, boaſting, that he had utterly defeated the enemy's numerous forces, and put them out of a condition of diſturbing for the future the tranquillity of Gaul [b]. Veſpaſian, then prætor, begged he might be allowed to exhibit extraordinary ſports on occaſion of ſo ſignal a victory [c] (X). This year;

Herod Antipas baniſhed.

Herod Antipas was by Caius deprived of his tetrarchy of Galilee, which was given to king Agrippa, and baniſhed to Lions, as Joſephus writes in one place [d], or ſent into Spain, as he tells us in another [e]. Perhaps Caius, who came this year with Agrippa into Gaul, ordered him to remove from Lions to Spain, where he died. He had enjoyed his tetrarchy forty-eight years, during which time he built [z] Idem ibid. [a] Idem, c. 42. [b] Perſius, ſatyr. 6. [c] Suet. in Veſp. c. 2. [d] Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. [e] Idem, bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 16.

(X) On this occaſion probably happened what we read in Suetonius, viz. that Caius, upon the news of the motions of the Germans, ſeized on all the ſhips he could get, in order to convey himſelf into the Levant, comforting himſelf with this thought, that he ſhould keep his tranſmarine provinces, though the enemy poſſeſſed themſelves of Italy and Rome itſelf, as the Senones had formerly done (41).

(41) Suet. c. 51.

built a new city in the moſt delightful ſpot of Galilee, which from Tiberius he named Tiberias. But of his actions and cauſe of his diſgrace, we have ſpoken in our hiſtory of the Jews.

THE following year, Caius was conſul without a colleague for the firſt twelve days, not deſignedly, but becauſe he was not acquainted ſooner with the death of the perſon who had been named for his collegue, and died at Rome a few days before he was to enter upon his office [f]. Caius began his third conſulſhip at Lions, and it was probably on that occaſion, that he exhibited the magnificent ſports deſcribed by Dion Caſſius and Suetonius. At the ſame time, he ordained a ſolemn contention of eloquence, both in Greek and Latin, obliging thoſe who were overcome to give rewards to their competitors, and to make ſome compoſition or other in their commendation. Thoſe who gave no ſatisfaction at all were condemned to blot out with a ſponge, and even with their tongues, what they had wrote, unleſs they choſe rather to be whipt like ſchool-boys, or to be thrown into the Rhone [g]. Hence an antient poet, ſpeaking of one who was in fear, ſays, that he trembled like an orator, ready to declaim at Lions before the altar of Auguſtus [h]. Of this altar at Lions, and the ſports yearly exhibited there in honour of the deified Auguſtus, we have ſpoken in the hiſtory of his reign.

Sports exhibited by Caius at Lions.

CAIUS held the conſulſhip only twelve days; and when news of his reſignation was brought to Rome, two new conſuls, probably Publicola and Nerva (Y), were nominated.

[f] Dio. p. 653. Suet, c. 17. [g] Suet. c. 20. [h] Juven. ſatyr. 1.

(Y) Onuphrius takes theſe two to be the conſuls of this year, becauſe S. Proſper marks them as the conſuls of the foregoing year, when, according to the general opinion of the chronologers, that office was diſchaged by Caius Cæſar and L. Apronius Cæſianus. The ſame writer pretends, that Sex. Nonius Celer and Junius Quintilianus, ſet down by Frontinus (42) as conſuls between the years thirty-eight and forty-nine of the chriſtian æra bore that dignity from the firſt of July to the end of this year (43).

(42) Front. de aquæd. p. 119. (43) Onuph. in faſt. p. 298.

nated. The firſt decree they made was, that the anniverſary of the death of Tiberius and Druſilla ſhould be ſolemnized in the ſame manner, as that of Auguſtus. This diſtinction Caius had required in a letter to the new conſuls [i]. As for Caius, he began the year with the murder of Ptolemy, king of Mauritania, and couſin-german to his father Germanicus (Z). He had invited him to his court, and received him at his arrival with great demonſtrations of kindneſs; but obſerving one day, as he entered the theatre to behold the ſports, that the luſtre of his purple drew upon him the eyes of the whole company, he cauſed him, no doubt out of jealouſy, to be immediately arreſted, condemned him to baniſhment, and privately ordered him to be maſſacred on his journey [k]. Dion Caſſius aſcribes his death to the great riches he poſſeſſed [l]. Be that as it will, the Mauritanians, upon the news of his death, revolted, being ſtirred up by Edemon, one of the deceaſed prince's freedmen, deſirous to revenge the death of his maſter. The inhuman and imperious tyrant cauſed likewiſe Mithridates king of Armenia to be arreſted, but only condemned him to baniſhment. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of this prince in the following reign.

The murder of Ptolemy king of Mauritania.

Caius's memorable expedition againſt Britain.

Caius, before he left Gaul, gave out, that he deſigned to invade Britain, and accordingly ordered his troops from all quarters to march to the Gauliſh ſhore oppoſite to the iſland. He ſoon came to the place of the rendezvous himſelf, and upon his arrival drew up his men along the coaſt, embarqued on a magnificent galley, and having advanced a ſmall way from the ſhore, returned ſuddenly, and, aſcending his tribunal, ordered the warlike engines to be diſpoſed in order and to the beſt advantage, the trumpets to ſound, and the ſignal of battle to be given.

[i] Dio, p. 659. [k] Suet. c. 35. [l] Dio, p. 659.

(Z) He was the ſon of Cleopatra Selene, daughter of Antony and the celebrated Cleopatra, as Germanicus was the ſon of Antonia, daughter to the ſame Antony. Juba, the father of Ptolemy, was firſt king of Mauritania, which Auguſtus made him exchange for part of Getulia, and the countries formerly poſſeſſed by Bocchus, that is, the two Mauritanias, the Tingitana and Cæſariana (44).

(44) Dio, l. lv. p. 567. Tacit, annal. l. xi. c. 5. & 23.

given. Neither ſoldiers nor officers could conceive what he had in view, till at length, all on a ſudden he ordered them to gather the cockle-ſhells on the ſhore, and to fill with them their laps and head-pieces, ſaying, Theſe are ſpoils of the conquered ocean, due to the palace, due to the capitol. Then, to reward his fellow-ſoldiers for ſo glorious a victory, he diſtributed among them a very conſiderable ſum, bidding them be merry, and enjoy in ſafety the rewards of their valour; and that ſo glorious a conqueſt might never be forgot, he cauſed a high tower to be erected, according to the model of the Pharos at Alexandria, for ſetting up lights to direct ſhips at ſea in the night [m]. A modern writer [n] will have the tower built on this occaſion to be that which ſtands at the entry of the port of Boulogne, and is called by the natives la tour d'ordre.

AND now Caius thought of nothing but the preparations for a triumph due to his noble atchievements. Accordingly he wrote to his officers at Rome, enjoining them to get every thing ready for the moſt magnificent triumph that had ever been ſeen; but at the ſame time warning them, not to put him to any extraordinary expence, ſince every man's eſtate was at their diſpoſal. Before he left Gaul, he choſe the talleſt men of that province, without diſtinction of rank or condition, to grace his triumph, giving them German names, and obliging them to learn that language, to let their hair grow and colour it red, that they might paſs for Germans. He likewiſe commanded the gallies, in which he and his chief officers had put to ſea, to be conveyed to Rome, for moſt part of the way, by land [o]. Before he left Gaul, he took it in his head to put thoſe legions to the ſword that had mutinied after the death of Auguſtus, and in a manner beſieged his father Germanicus and himſelf, then an infant. His officers, with the utmoſt difficulty, diſſuaded him from cutting them all off; but could not by any means divert him from decimating them for a crime, which had been, ſo many years before, committed and forgiven. Notwithſtanding the warm remonſtrances of his friends and chief officers, he ordered them to aſſemble without arms to receive his commands. The legionaries, not ſuſpecting in the leaſt his deſign, readily obeyed, and in the mean time, the cavalry began to ſurround them. This

His folly and ambition.

His cruel deſign.

[m] Suet. c. 46. Dio, p. 659.
[n] Buch. de Belg. l. iv. c. 12.
[o] Suet. c 47.

gave them ſome umbrage, and many of them ſlipt away to take their arms, with a deſign to ſell their lives dear, in caſe any violence was offered them; which the coward no ſooner perceived, than he diſmiſſed the aſſembly and fled, making what haſte he could to reach Rome, that he might vent his rage upon the ſenate, for the wrong he pretended they had done him by not decreeing him a triumph, though he had declared the year before, that they had no right to decree him any honours, and that he would puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity, if they pretended to aſſume it [p]. They chiefly were at a loſs how to behave with reſpect to his pretended conqueſt of Britain. To compliment him on his victory, looked like mockery; on the other hand, they were told, that he ſpoke ſeriouſly of it as a noble exploit. What reſolution they took in the end we find no-where recorded. Suetonius only tells us, that they diſpatched an embaſſy to him, conſiſting of the moſt conſiderable men of their order, entreating him to haſten his return to the city. The deputies met him on his journey towards Rome, not yet recovered from his late fright, and with the utmoſt ſubmiſſion preſented their requeſt to him in the name of their whole body. I will come, anſwered Caius, I will come, and bring this along with me; laying his hand on the hilt of his ſword. He even declared by an edict, which he cauſed to be ſet up in the city, that he would return; but it ſhould be only for the knights and people; as for the ſenate, he would for the future be to them neither a prince nor a citizen. As he drew near Rome, he forbad any of the ſenators to meet him. He would not, however, enter the city in triumph, but contented himſelf with an ovation, making his entry on the laſt of Auguſt, which was his birth-day, four months and ſome days before his death [q]. From this time he reſolved utterly to extirpate the ſenate, and would have put his wicked deſign in execution, had he not been prevented by death. In the four months he lived, he cauſed ſeveral ſenators of diſtinction to be inhumanly murdered, one in particular for no other crime, but becauſe he begged leave to ſhut his eyes, being commanded by him, though nothing was laid to his charge, to aſſiſt at the execution of his ſon [r]. For the bloody and inhuman monſter took great delight, as we hinted above,

Sets out for Rome.

He threatens the ſenate.

[p] Suet. c. 48. [q] Suet. c. 49. [r] Suet. c. 27. Dio, p. 660.

in thus tormenting the moſt innocent parents. It was commonly reported, that he deſigned to cut off the moſt conſiderable men of the ſenatorial and equeſtrian order, and then remove the ſeat of the empire to Antium, and from thence to Alexandria. This report gained great credit after his death, when two books were found in his cabinet, one with the title of gladius, the ſword, the other of pugio, the dagger, both containing the names of many eminent perſons whom he deſigned to deſtroy [s]. Theſe books were committed to the cuſtody of Protogenes, one of the miniſters of his cruelty [t]. Beſides theſe books was found a great cheſt filled with various ſorts of poiſons, which, being by Claudius's orders thrown into the ſea, infected the waters, and deſtroyed a vaſt quantity of fiſh [u]. However, he was ſomewhat reconciled to the ſenate before his death on the following occaſion: Protogenes, his chief favourite, coming one day unexpectedly into the ſenate, under colour of delivering ſome meſſage from the prince, and all the ſenators crouding round him to pay their court to him, he fixed his eyes on Scribonius Proculus, and with an angry tone; How dare you, ſaid he, preſume to appear before me, you who are an enemy to Cæſar? There wanted no more; the other ſenators inſtantly fell upon him with their daggers, ſtabbed him in ſeveral places, and then delivered him over, as a public enemy, to the mob, who tore him to pieces, and dragged his mangled members about the ſtreets, Caius beholding with great pleaſure ſo diſmal a ſpectacle [w]. Suetonius tells us, that this worthy ſenator was thus inhumanly butchered, merely to ſatisfy Caius, who, taking a fancy to ſee a ſenator thus mangled, had, without the leaſt provocation, pitched upon him. Neither was his cruelty ſatiated, till the limbs and bowels of the innocent victim were brought before him. Being highly pleaſed with ſo diſmal a ſight, and the readineſs the ſenate had ſhewn to take vengeance on his ſuppoſed enemy, he declared himſelf by a public edict reconciled with that body [x]; and the ſenate on their ſide, to acknowledge ſo great a favour, honoured him ſometimes with the title of Hero, and ſometimes of God; which ſcandalous flattery puffed him up to ſuch a degree, that thenceforth he ſhewed himſelf more ambitious than ever of divine honours, puniſhing with death, or dooming to the mines, or to the drudgery of mending the public roads, perſons of great merit and diſtinction, for neglecting to invoke his celeſtial genius:

Various inſtances of his cruelty.

[s] Idem, c. 49. [t] Dio, ibid. [u] Suet. ibid. [w] Idem, c. 28. Dio, ibid. [x] Suet. ibid.

genius : nay, ſome, for pretended offences againſt his godhead, were firſt torn and mangled with ſtripes, and then ſawed aſunder (A).

The inconſtancy and fickleneſs of Caius's temper.

DION Caſſius, after a long detail of his cruelties, and the diſmal effects of his pride, avarice, lewdneſs, prodigality, &c. obſerves in this place, that he was chiefly remarkable for the inconſtancy and fickleneſs of his humour, which often hurried him in a moment from one extreme to another ; and concludes his obſervations with the following words : Sometimes he liked to ſee his palace crowded, and ſometimes would ſee no company, not his moſt intimate friends : he was out of humour when any petition was preſented to him ; and more ſo, when no-body appeared to aſk him any favour ; ſometimes he diſpatched buſineſs with great expedition ; at other times he was ſlow and tedious, putting off from day to day matters which required the greateſt diſpatch : he ſquandered away immenſe treaſures with a prodigality which knew no bounds, and amaſſed new ſums with the moſt ſordid avarice : ſometimes he was pleaſed with liberty of ſpeech and abhorred flattery ; but all on a ſudden puniſhed the leaſt liberty, and took delight in being flattered : he often pardoned thoſe who were guilty y Dio, p. 661.

(A) What Pliny relates (45), if true, might have ſufficiently convinced him both of his folly and weakneſs. For that writer tells us, that the laſt time he left Rome, as he went by ſea from Aſtura to Antium, his galley, which was attended by many others, ſtopt all on a ſudden ; and while the other veſſels purſued their courſe, continued immoveable, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of four hundred rowers. The whole company were greatly ſurpriſed, as we may well imagine, at ſuch an extraordinary accident, and many of the mariners threw themſelves into the ſea to find out the cauſe of it ; when they diſcovered a fiſh about half a foot in length, which ſeemed to be of the ſnail kind, faſtened to the keel of the royal galley. This is the fiſh, to which the Greeks have given the name of echeneis, and the Latins that of remora. It was brought to Caius, who, inſtead of acknowledging his folly, in pretending to be equal in power to the gods, foamed with rage, upon his reflecting that ſo ſmall a creature had thus bid defiance to ſo mighty a prince, to the lord of the univerſe.

(45) Plin. l. xxxi. c. 1.

guilty of moſt enormous crimes, and condemned ſuch as were not charged with any: upon ſome of his favourites he heaped honours and riches, while he treated others, nobody knew why, with the utmoſt contempt: in ſhort, ſo changeable was his humour, ſo various and inconſiſtent was his conduct, that his moſt intimate friends were at a loſs what they ſhould do, what they ſhould ſay, to pleaſe him, ſeeing he was often affronted with what he had taken delight in a few hours before [z] (B).

THE following year, Caius entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having Cn. Sextius Saturninus for his collegue, but held it only to the ſeventh of January, when he reſigned the faſces to Quintus Pomponius Secundus. Rome had now for the ſpace of near four years groaned under the oppreſſions of the moſt cruel and inhuman tyrant, that had ever been inveſted with power; when at length a bloody doom overtook the author of ſo much blood-ſhed and ſlaughter. The conſpiracy, which for the preſent put an end to the public evils, was chiefly formed, carried on, and executed by Caſſius Chærea, tribune of a prætorian cohort, who had ſignalized himſelf in a very eminent manner, as we have already

A conſpiracy formed againſt him.

Caſſius Chærea at the head of the conſpiracy.

[z] Idem, p. 641.—644.

(B) This is entirely agreeable to what we read in Philo, who was well acquainted with Caius's ſtrange and variable humour. There was no depending, ſays that writer, upon the kindneſs and good-will he ſhewed you, however great and in appearance ſincere. When he had granted a favour, he ſoon repented and recalled it; nay his benefits were often the fore-runners of greater evils. Thus he frequently ſet at liberty ſuch as were confined for crimes real or ſuppoſed, and ſoon after ordered them to be dragged back to the place of their confinement, without any new guilt, telling them, to encreaſe their former miſeries, that now they were to expect no mercy. Many he condemned only to baniſhment, when they expected nothing but a cruel death; then, repenting of his clemency, he cauſed them to be executed in the place of their exile. His bounties he often revoked, obliging thoſe, who had received them, to refund them with uſury. Several of his chief favourites he reduced to beggary, that they might not be tempted to retire, and enjoy the wealth which they acquired. Thus the very favours he beſtowed were in the end attended with the ruin of thoſe who received them, and therefore no leſs dreaded than his reſentment (46).

(46) Philo legat. p. 1039.

already obſerved, in the beginning of Tiberius's reign when the legions in Germany revolted. As he was a man of no leſs probity than bravery, the hatred he bore Caius, on account of his cruelties and extortions, firſt inſpired him with the deſign of ridding the world of ſo great a plague. He was already reſolved to reſign his employment, and ſpend the remaining part of his life in retirement, when he received a commiſſion from Caius to gather the taxes; for no commodity eſcaped without paying ſome tax or other, and the emperor levied them not by the publicans, as was uſual, but by the centurions and tribunes of the prætorian cohorts, that they might reap the advantages thence accruing. In this commiſſion Chærea, who was naturally compaſſionate, acquitted himſelf more to the ſatisfaction of the oppreſſed people, than of the emperor, who thereupon reproached him with want of ſpirit; and conceiving an averſion to him, took pleaſure in expoſing him to the deriſions of the ſoldiery. For though he was a man of great courage and reſolution, yet, from his manner of ſpeaking and the tone of his voice, no one would have taken him, ſays Seneca [a], for a perſon of that extraordinary bravery, which he ſhewed on all occaſions, without betraying the leaſt concern in the greateſt dangers. Caius, now incenſed againſt him, laid hold of his outward appearance to reproach him with effeminacy and cowardice, and rally him as one more fit to converſe with women, than command men. When it was his turn to come for the parole, the emperor, by way of raillery, gave him always either ſome obſcene word, or the name of ſome famous proſtitute; inſomuch, that the ſoldiers could not forbear laughing when he brought them the parole, and often diverted themſelves with gueſſing what word Chærea would bring. But, as he was a man of too great ſpirit to put up ſuch groſs affronts, he reſolved to convince the emperor how undeſervedly he was taxed by him with effeminacy and want of courage. Having therefore determined to be revenged at all adventures on the tyrant, for thus attempting to blacken, with his unſeaſonable ſarcaſms, the reputation he had deſervedly acquired by his gallant behaviour, he imparted his deſign to ſome of his intimate friends, and only waited for a favourable opportunity of putting it in execution. In the mean time, a ſenator of great diſtinction, named Propedius, was accuſed by one Timidius of having uttered injurious ſpeeches againſt Caius. The only evidence produced produced againſt him was Quintilia, a celebrated comedian; but ſhe, when ſummoned to appear before the judges, declared, that ſhe had heard no ſuch ſpeeches. Hereupon, Timidius requiring that ſhe might be examined by torture, Caius ordered Chærea to ſee her immediately put upon the rack. Joſephus tells us, that the tyrant commonly charged Chærea with commiſſions of this nature, being perſuaded, that to avoid the imputation of faint-heartedneſs, that is, of good-nature, he would take care to execute them with extraordinary ſeverity [b]. But he was never ſo much at a loſs how to behave as on this occaſion; for Quintilia was privy to the conſpiracy; whence he was afraid ſhe might diſcover it upon the rack, if tortured without compaſſion; on the other hand, to ſhew any mercy to her, might coſt him his life. But Quintilia herſelf delivered him from his uneaſineſs; for meeting, as ſhe was led to the torture, one of the conſpirators, ſhe trod upon his foot, giving thereby to underſtand, that no torments ſhould extort from her a diſcovery of the plot. And truly ſhe bore the rack with unparallelled conſtancy, without ſuffering a ſingle word to eſcape her, in prejudice either of Propedius or the conſpirators, tho' ſhe was reduced to ſo deplorable a condition, that Caius himſelf, when ſhe was brought back to him, being moved with pity and admiring her reſolution, ordered her a ſum of money, and diſmiſſed Propedius untouched. As for Chærea, he was ſo affected with the conſtancy of Quintilia and the torments ſhe had ſuffered, of which he had himſelf been the miniſter, that he immediately imparted his deſign to Papinius and Clemens, the former a tribune, as he was himſelf, of one of the prætorian cohorts, and the latter the commander of the whole body, encouraging them to exert their bravery, and deliver Rome and the world from ſo bloody a tyrant, who employed them, not as the officers of his guards, but as his executioners. They both approved of the deſign; but Clemens, deſiring to be excuſed from bearing any ſhare in the execution of it, on account of his age, promiſed to aſſiſt them with his advice; and taking his leave, left them under no ſmall anxiety and apprehenſion of his betraying the ſecret (C). Chærea therefore, without loſs

What provoked him againſt Caius.

[a] Senec. ad Ser. c. 18.

The conſtancy of Quintilia.

He gains ſeveral perſons of diſtinction.

[b] Joſeph. l. xix. c. 1.

(C) Clemens ſeems to have had no ſhare in the execution of the deſign; ſince Mucianus, in conferring after his death the command

loſs of time, had recourſe to Cornelius Sabinus, tribune likewiſe of a prætorian cohort, whom he knew to be a man of great courage, a lover of liberty, and conſequently highly diſſatisfied with the adminiſtration of Caius. Sabinus had formed the ſame deſign, but had not yet made any one privy to it for fear of being diſcovered. He therefore readily joined Chærea, and with him went immediately to ſound Annius Minucianus, or, as others call him, Vinicianus, a ſenator of great diſtinction and merit, and mortally hated by Caius, who ſuſpected him ever ſince the conſpiracy of Lepidus, with whom Minucianus had lived in cloſe confidence. After the uſual ceremonies were over, Minucianus asked Chærea, What was the parole for that day? which he taking for a ſufficient declaration of his intention, Do you, ſaid he, without any further preamble, but give me the word liberty, and under your conduct I'll revenge my private injuries and the public calamities: do you but give me the word of command, and Rome ſhall no longer groan under the oppreſſions of an inſulting tyrant. At theſe words, which Chærea uttered with great vehemence and ardor, Minucianus embracing him, commended his reſolution, exhorted him to purſue his deſign, and promiſed to aſſiſt, to the utmoſt of his power, both with his ſword and counſel (D).

THE

mand of the prætorian cohorts upon his ſon Clemens Arretinus, told him, that his father had with honour and reputation diſcharged that office under Caius (47). And yet Dion Caſſius names amongſt the conſpirators, Calinus, one of Caius's freedmen, and the commander of the prætorian guards (48); and Suetonius tells us, that the conſpiracy was not executed without the concurrence of the moſt conſiderable amongſt the emperor's freedmen and of the officers of his guards, who joined the other conſpirators the more readily, becauſe they found themſelves ſuſpected and hated by Caius, ever ſince the conſpiracy of Lepidus (49). As for the emperor's freedmen, Joſephus aſſures us, that Calixtus, the moſt wealthy amongſt them, favoured the conſpiracy, being well appriſed, that he could by no other means eſcape the cruelty of Caius, and enjoy the immenſe wealth he had unjuſtly acquired (50).

(D) Joſephus tells us, that as Chærea was about this time entering the ſenate, no doubt to attend Caius, for he was no ſenator, he heard a voice, which ſeemed to come from ſome one in the croud, encouraging him to diſpatch what he deſigned, and aſſuring hi n

(37) Tacit. hiſt. l. iv. c. 68. (48) Dio, l. lix. p 662.
(49) Suet. c. 56. (50) Joſeph. ibid.

THE number of the conſpirators encreaſed daily, which retarded the execution of the deſign, ſome of them being over-cautious, leſt they ſhould miſcarry in an enterprize, on the ſucceſs of which depended their ſafety, and the welfare of their country. If the attempt, ſaid they, ſhould not ſucceed, we ſhall ſoon ſee every houſe in the city floating in blood. Not our lives only, but thoſe of our wives, children, relations, and acquaintance are at ſtake. We muſt expect no mercy from ſo cruel and inhuman a tyrant, who will take care to guard himſelf well for the future againſt any attempts of the like nature. Let us not therefore be overhaſty, but patiently wait for ſuch an opportunity, as may promiſe certain ſucceſs to our undertaking. Chærea did not reliſh this ſpeech; to him every opportunity ſeemed favourable. As he was not in the leaſt ſuſpected by Caius, he offered to diſpatch him, when he went up to the capitol to offer ſacrifices for his daughter, or when in his palace he aſſiſted at certain religious ceremonies, which he himſelf had inſtituted. He was for throwing him headlong from the top of the Julian baſilic, whence he uſed to ſcatter money among the populace; but the reſt of the conſpirators, thinking they could not uſe too much caution, did not judge any of theſe opportunities ſufficiently ſafe and proper for the execution of their deſign. However, they all agreed at laſt to make the attempt during the ſports, which were to be exhibited in honour of Auguſtus in the palace, on the twenty-firſt of January, and the three following days; for after theſe ſports, Caius was to leave Rome and to repair to Alexandria, probably to plunder the wealthy kingdom of Egypt, as he had done the other provinces of the empire (E). But notwithſtanding their agreement and the reſolution him, that heaven favoured his deſign. He was at firſt afraid, leſt ſome of his aſſociates had betrayed the ſecret; but afterwards concluded, that either one of his friends, or ſome divinity, puſhed him forward to the ſpeedy execution of his purpoſe (51).

His intrepidity and reſolution.

(E) It was perhaps at theſe ſports, that Caius, tranſported with rage againſt Jupiter, becauſe the noiſe of thunder prevented him from hearing the actors, threw out moſt dreadful blaſphemies againſt heaven, and impiouſly defied Jupiter himſelf, with theſe words; Diſpatch me, or I'll diſpatch you (75); for he fooliſhly perſuaded himſelf to be upon a level with, and equal in

(51) Idem ibid.

(75) Senec. de ira, l. i. c. 16.

tion they had all ſhewed at their laſt meeting, they were ſtill for puting off the attempt; but Chærea, having called them together on the third day of the ſports, exhorted them not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity, repreſented the dangers to which their irreſolution expoſed them, and, by a ſpeech full of noble and generous ſentiments, inſpired them with ſuch courage, that they unanimouſly agreed at all adventures to make the attempt the next day, when Chærea was by good luck to be upon guard, and conſequently to receive of the emperor, according to cuſtom, the parole with the ſword by his ſide [b] (F). Caius came that day, the twenty-fourth of January, more early than uſual, to the theatre, and appeared contrary to his cuſtom, gay, affable, and good humoured; inſomuch, that the ſpectators were greatly ſurpriſed at his obliging behaviour, and the complaiſance he ſhewed to all who approached him. After he had ſacrificed to Auguſtus, in whoſe honours the ſports were exhibited, he took his place, having his friends and favourites about him, and Chærea, with the other officers that day upon guard, at ſome diſtance behind him. When the ſports began, one Bathybius, who had been prætor, happening to ſit by a conſular of his acquaintance, named Cluvitus, for at theſe ſhews there was no diſtinction of places, in power to, the greateſt of the gods. This monſtrous impiety, ſays Seneca, probably animated the conſpirators with new courage.

A day fixed upon for putting Caius to death.

[b] Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1.

(F) Dion Caſſius tells us, that on the twenty-fourth of January, the day on which Caius was killed, an Egyptian, by name Apollones, was brought to him, having been ſent out of Egypt to Rome for pretending to foretel the emperor's death. Caius not being then at leiſure to examine him, ordered him to be kept under cloſe confinement till the ſports were over. But he being killed in the mean time, the Egyptian was after one day's confinement ſet at liberty (76). Suetonius mentions many prodigies, to warn the emperor of his approaching end; amongſt the others, he tells us, that Caius being admoniſhed by the oracle at Antium to be upon his guard againſt Caſſius, he immediately ſent aſſaſſines to murder Caſſius Longinus, at that time proconſul of Aſia, not remembering that Chærea was likewiſe named Caſſius (77).

(76) Dio, p. 663. (77) Suet. c. 57.

places, he aſked him ſoftly, Whether he had heard any news? None at all, anſwered Cluvitus: But I can tell you ſomething, replied Bathybius, to which you are perhaps a ſtranger; in the piece, which is to be acted to-day, will be repreſented the death of a tyrant. Cluvitus anſwered with a verſe out of Homer, which he whiſpered in his friend's ear; Silence, leſt ſome of the Greeks ſhould overhear us [c]. Hiſtorians obſerve, that this was the day, on which Philip, king of Macedon, was ſlain by Pauſanias, as he was entering the theatre to behold the ſame tragedy that was acted before Caius [d]. Another piece was to be exhibited in the night, repreſenting ſome fabulous accounts of the infernal regions [e]; for Caius, who took great delight in ſuch repreſentations, declared, that as this was the laſt day, the ſports ſhould continue all night, with a deſign, as was believed, to appear on the ſtage himſelf, and there diſplay his ſkill and addreſs in dancing, in which he took great pride (G) [f]. About noon, when the emperor uſed to withdraw

[c] Idem ibid. [d] Idem ibid. & Suet. c. 57. [e] Suet. ibid. [f] Dio, p. 663.

(G) He was, ſays Suetonius, an excellent fencer, dancer, and charioteer; he ſometimes danced on the ſtage, and frequently before his friends in the palace. One night, while he was in that humour, he ſent for three grave conſulars, cauſed them to be awaked out of their ſleep, and by his guards hurried away to his palace; where, while they were waiting in a great hall, and trembling in apprehenſion of immediate death, they ſuddenly heard a great noiſe of muſical inſtruments, and at the ſame time, ſaw the emperor come leaping out in a long robe, to diſplay before them his ſkill and addreſs in dancing. When he was tired, he withdrew, and ſent the three conſulars word, that they might, when they pleaſed, return home. He took ſuch pleaſure in ſeeing Mneſter, the famous mimic, dance, that he puniſhed, with great ſeverity, ſuch as gave him the leaſt diſturbance: a Roman knight making ſome noiſe while he was dancing, the emperor immediately ſent him word by a centurion to depart that inſtant for Oſtia and there wait for a letter, which he ſhould ſoon ſend after him for Ptolemy king of Mauritania. The knight obeyed, croſſed over to Africa, and preſented the letter to Ptolemy, who could not forbear laughing in reading it; for it contained only the following words; To the bearer do neither good nor evil (78).

(78) Idem, c. 54.

draw for a ſhort time to bathe and refreſh himſelf with ſome nouriſhment, Chærea ſtole out with a deſign to fall upon him, as he paſſed from the theatre to his apartment. But Caius, contrary to his cuſtom, ſhewed no inclination to leave the ſports, telling thoſe who ſat by him, that ſince it was the laſt day of the ſhews he had a mind not to bathe till they were over. At the ſame time, he called for ſome refreſhment, which he ſhared with thoſe who were about him, amongſt the reſt with Pomponius Secundus, then conſul, who ſat at his feet and often kiſſed them. Minucianus, who was next to him, and had ſeen Chærea go out, roſe up with a deſign to go out and acquaint the tribune with the emperor's reſolution. But Caius taking hold of his robe, Sit ſtill, my friend, ſaid he, in a very obliging manner; you ſhall go out with me. Minucianus, as it were, out of reſpect, ſat down again, but ſoon after roſe up and went out; neither did Caius offer to detain him, thinking he went away upon ſome neceſſary occaſion, and would ſoon return. He found Chærea waiting in the entry, which led to the theatre, and acquainted him with the emperor's reſolution. Hereupon the reſolute tribune thought it adviſable to fall upon him in the theatre, rather than let ſlip the preſent opportunity, and offered to go in immediately and ſtab him in his ſeat. Minucianus, and ſuch of the conſpirators as were with him, for ſome of them were in the theatre, expecting the ſignal, approved of Chærea's bold propoſal, who was thereupon entering the theatre, when word was brought him, that the emperor, at the perſuaſion of Ampronas, and ſome others who were privy to the conſpiracy, had changed his mind, and was coming out. The conſpirators immediately drew together, and, under pretence of clearing the way for the emperor, removed ſuch as they imagined would lend him any aſſiſtance. Caius at length came out, his uncle Claudius and M. Vinicius, who had married his ſiſter Julia, walking before him, with ſome perſons of great diſtinction. When he entered the palace, inſtead of going ſtrait to his apartment, as he uſually did, and following his officers and attendants, he turned unexpectedly into a gallery, which led to a private apartment, to ſee there certain youths, who had been ſent him out of Aſia, to act and dance upon the ſtage, and were juſt then arrived. He was ſo pleaſed with them, that he would have immediately returned with them to the theatre, being impatient to ſee them perform, had not the chief of them complained, that he was cold, and begged leave to warm himſelf firſt [f]. While he was entertaining himſelf with the Aſiatic youths, Chærea came for the parole, and Caius gave him one, as uſual, reflecting on his effeminacy and want of courage. Chærea returned him a ſmart anſwer; and at the ſame time drew his ſword, diſcharged a great blow at him, and wounded him in the neck. Though the wound did not prove mortal, yet we cannot give credit to thoſe, who would make us believe, that Chærea did not, as he might, diſpatch him at one blow, leſt he ſhould be too ſoon put out of pain [g]. Caius, ſtruck with amazement at the boldneſs of the tribune, had not preſence of mind enough to call for aſſiſtance; however, he attempted to fly; but Cornelius Sabinus, having puſhed him down upon his knees, Chærea with another blow broke his jawbone; then the reſt of the conſpirators ruſhing in diſpatched him with thirty wounds, he for ſome time crying out, I am ſtill alive; and the conſpirators, Repeat, repeat the blow; which was the ſignal agreed on. We are told, that Aquila was the perſon who gave him the wound that put an end to his life. Some of the conſpirators took delight in mangling his body even after his death; nay, they are ſaid to have carried their rage to ſuch an height, as to cut off and eat pieces of his fleſh [h] (H).

Caius aſſaſſinated. Year after the flood 2040. Of Chriſt 40. Of Rome 789.

SUCH was the end of Caius Cæſar Caligula, the fourth emperor of Rome, a prince ſo monſtrouſly wicked, that nature, ſays Seneca, ſeemed to have brought him forth, to ſhew what miſchief could be effected by the greateſt vices, ſupported by the greateſt authority [i]. His death happened on the twenty-fourth of January; ſo that he reigned about three [f] Joſeph. ibid. Suet. d. 58. Dio, p. 663. [g] Vide Joſeph. ibid. [h] Dio, p. 663. [i] Senec. de ira.

(H) Some writers, quoted by Suetonius (79), ſay, that while he was ſpeaking with the Aſiatic youths, Chærea came behind him, and gave him a mortal wound on the head, ſaying, Mind this; after which Cornelius Sabinus ran him through the body. Others, cited by the ſame writer, tell us, that Sabinus coming for the parole, and Caligula giving him the word Jupiter, Chærea cried out, Be ſure to remember it: hereupon Caius turning about, Chærea cut off his jaw at one blow, and ſtruck him to the ground. The other conſpirators then ruſhed in, and diſpatched him (80).

(79) Idem, c. 58. (80) Idem ibid.

three years, nine months, and twenty eight days, according to thoſe who fix the death of Tiberius on the twenty-ſixth of March; or three years ten months, and eight days, if we ſuppoſe him, as ſome do, to have begun his reign on the ſixteenth day of the ſaid month. He had lived according to Suetonius [i], twenty-nine years; according to others, twenty-eight years, four months, and twenty-four days [k]. Of the confuſion and diſorders attending his death we ſhall ſpeak in the following reign. His body remained in the place where he had been aſſaſſinated, till the night was far ſpent, when it was privately conveyed to the Lamian gardens, where, being half burnt upon a pile erected in haſte, it was, without any ſolemnity, or even ceremonies, committed to the earth. This laſt duty was paid him, according to the Roman writers, by his wife Cæſonia; but, according to Joſephus, by king Agrippa, who, mindful of the obligations he owed him, cauſed his body to be conveyed away, leſt it ſhould be inſulted by the incenſed populace. Some time after his ſiſters, being returned from baniſhment, took it up again, burnt it to aſhes, and ſolemnly interred it. Suetonius affirms as a thing not to be doubted of, that thoſe who had the care of the above-mentioned gardens were frightened with dreadful apparitions, ſo long as the body remained there; and that in the appartment where he was murdered, a frightful noiſe was heard every night, till it was burnt down to the ground [l]. Chærea, to extirpate the whole race of the tyrant, ſent the night after his death a centurion, or rather a tribune, by name Julius Lupus, to diſpatch his wife Cæſonia, and with her his only daughter, an infant; the tribune ſtabbed without mercy the mother, and taking the innocent child out of the cradle, daſhed her brains out againſt a wall [m]. The ſenate, even after Claudius was raiſed to the empire, were for declaring Caius infamous. This Claudius, who was his uncle, would not allow, but nevertheleſs ordered all his ſtatues to be pulled down and broken, diſannulled moſt of his acts, and gave his aſſent to a decree of the ſenate, commanding his money to be melted down, that both his name and features might be unknown to future ages [n].

His body privately conveyed away, and buried.

The birth, education, &c. of Claudius.

As we have hitherto had no opportunity to ſpeak of Claudius, who ſucceeded his nephew, but had led a retired life til till he was raiſed to the empire, it may not be improper to premiſe to the hiſtory of his reign a ſuccinct account of his birth and education, of his good and evil qualities, and alſo of his wives, children, and freedmen, whom we ſhall have frequently occaſion to bring upon the ſtage. Claudius was born at Lions on the firſt of Auguſt, Iulus Antonius and Fabius Africanus being conſuls, ſo that this year he was in the fiftieth of his age [o]. He was named Tiberius Claudius Nero Druſus Germanicus [p]. Upon his acceſſion to the empire, he aſſumed the names of Cæſar and Auguſtus, as did likewiſe all his ſucceſſors; by which means the name of Cæſar, which was peculiar to the Julian family, became a title of dignity, and was given to the preſumptive heirs of the empire; whereas that of Auguſtus was a mark of the ſovereign power. As for the name of Julius, it was quite laid aſide, and never after aſſumed by any of the emperors [q]. Claudius was, by his mother Antonia, the grandſon of Marc Antony and Octavia, ſiſter to Auguſtus, and by his father Druſus who died in Germany, the grandſon of Livia Auguſta, and conſequently nephew to Tiberius, brother to Germanicus and uncle to Caius. However, no one imagined he would ever have attained to the ſovereign power, till the very day he was inveſted with it; all men being rather deſtined to the empire, to uſe the expreſſion of Tacitus, than he, for whom fortune, or rather providence, reſerved it in the dark [r]. For being very ſickly during the whole time of his childhood and minority, he was thereby ſo weakened both in his body and mind, that he was looked upon as incapable of any public employment, and long after he was of age kept under a governor, of whom he complained in a book, which he publiſhed, as of a barbarous and unmannerly perſon, who had been formerly a groom, and was ſet over him on purpoſe to plague and chaſtiſe him upon every trivial occaſion. His mother Antonia uſed to call him an human monſter, juſt begun by nature, but never finiſhed; and when ſhe upbraided any one with dulneſs and ſtupidity, her common expreſſion was, You are as ſtupid as my ſon Claudius: his grandmother Livia could not bear the ſight of him: his nephew Caligula, when he had butchered many of his kindred, ſaved him purely for a laughing-ſtock; he was held in the ſame contempt by

[i] Suet. c. 59. [k] Clem. ſtrom. l. i. p. 539. Eutrop. in vi Claud [l] Suet. c. 59. [m] Idem ibid. Dio, p. 663. Joſeph ibid, c. 2. [n] Joſeph. ibid. Dio. p. 667.

Deſpiſed by all his relations.

[o] Suet. in Claud. c. 2. Goltz. p. 140. [p] Suet. ibid. Dio, p. 665. [q] Vide [r] Tacit. annal. l. iii. c. 18.

by his ſiſter Livilla, by Auguſtus, and all his family (I): the

(I) Suetonius, to ſhew us what opinion Auguſtus entertained of Claudius, produces ſeveral of his letters to Livia concerning him: I have, ſays he, in one, my dear Livia, adviſed with Tiberius according to your deſire, about what is to be done with your nephew Tiberius, that is, Claudius, at the ſolemnity of Mars. We are both of opinion, that we muſt reſolve without further delay, what courſe to take with him; if his weakneſs be not very remarkable, we ought, without all doubt, to advance him by the ſame ſteps and degrees by which his brother was raiſed. But if we find any weakneſs or incapacity in his body or mind, we muſt not give occaſion to the world to mock and deride both him and us: it is now time to deliberate and conclude, whether he is capable of public employments or not. I think it would not be amiſs to charge him, at the approaching ſolemnity of Mars, with the care of entertaining the prieſts, upon condition, that he ſuffers himſelf to be directed by the ſon of Silanus his kinſman, who will inſtruct him, and prevent his doing any thing notoriouſly ridiculous. But I am utterly againſt his ſeeing the Circenſian games, from ſo conſpicuous a place as the pulvinar, becauſe he will be there expoſed to the eyes of the whole theatre. Neither would I have him to attend his brother on the feriæ Latinæ to mount Albanus; and as to the government of the city, during his brother's abſence, I do not think him at all qualified for ſuch an employment. Thus my dear Livia, I have declared my opinion, which is, that we defer no longer, but come to a final reſolution, whether we are to raiſe him or no. This part of my letter you may ſhew, if you pleaſe to Antonia. In another he writes thus: During your abſence, I ſhall conſtantly invite young Tiberius to my table, that he may not ſup with his Sulpitius and Athenodorus: I wiſh the poor child would propoſe to himſelf the example of ſome well-bred perſon, and imitate him in his geſture, habit, and mien; for though he is not much eſteemed by men of penetration, yet he is not without ſome noble ſentiments. And in a third; may I die, my dear Livia, ſays he, if I am not amazed how your nephew Tiberius could give me ſo full ſatisfaction in his declamation; it is ſurpriſing, that a perſon who talks ſo ill, ſhould write and declaim ſo well. Auguſtus, well appriſed of the weakneſs of his underſtanding, honoured him with no other dignity but that of augur, and in his laſt will mentioned him only amongſt his third heirs who were no-ways related to him, and left him but a legacy of eight hundred ſeſterces. His uncle Tiberius honoured him with the conſular ornaments, but never allowed him to diſcharge the office of conſul; and when the young prince importuned him for ſome real preferment, he wrote him word, that he had ſent him forty pieces of gold againſt the Saturnalia, or feaſts of Saturn, for play-the kindeſt word Auguſtus gave him was that of Miſellus, poor wretch f. Being thus deſpiſed and utterly neglected by his own relations, he became the jeſt of the court (K), and was treated even by the freedmen of his uncle and nephew with the greateſt diſreſpect imaginable (L). He was not only play-money, and to lay out, as he pleaſed, in the Sigillaria, which was a kind of fair after the Saturnalia, laſting ſeven days, and ſo called from the little images and puppets, in Latin Sigilla, which were then ſold. Upon this anſwer, Claudius, laying aſide all hopes of riſing to any conſiderable employment in the ſtate, betook himſelf to a retired life, ſpending his time with perſons much below his rank, either in the gardens he had in the ſuburbs, or at his country-houſe in Campania, where he gave himſelf entirely up to gaming and drinking, diverſions ſuitable o the low company he kept. However, the ſenate in conſideration of his high birth, paſſed a decree, enacting, that he ſhould be added, above the limited number, to the college of the prieſts of Auguſtus, into which none had ever before been admitted but by lot; that a houſe belonging to him, which had been burnt down to the ground by accidental fire, ſhould be rebuilt at the public charge; and that he ſhould have a vote in the ſenate, and deliver his opinion amongſt the conſulars. But this decree did not take place, Tiberius alledging againſt his voting in the ſenate the weakneſs of his underſtanding, and promiſing to make good at his private expence the loſſes he had ſuſtained by fire. Nevertheleſs, Tiberius in his laſt will named him amongſt his heirs, and left him a legacy of about two millions of ſeſterces (81).

f Suet. c. 2, & 3.

(K) Suetonius tells us, that if he happened to come to table, when the other gueſts had taken their places, no one ſhewed him the leaſt civility, but diverted themſelves with ſeeing him running about the table to find out a place; if he refreſhed himſelf, as he uſually did after meals, with a ſhort repoſe, they took pleaſure in throwing the ſtones of olives and dates at him; ſometimes, they awakened him with the blow of a rod, or whip; and ſometimes, while he was aſleep, they put his ſandals upon his hands, that, when he waked, he might rub his face with them (82).

(L) He was, as Dion Caſſius obſerves, ſo notoriouſly neglected, that notwithſtanding the prerogative of his birth, he did not riſe

(81) Idem c. 2.—7. Dio, p. 665. (82) Suet. c. 8.

His timoruſneſs.

deſtitute of parts, but moreover extremely timorous; inſomuch, that there was no accident ſo trivial, no man, woman, ſlave, or child, ſo contemptible, as not to frighten him, and when frightened, he was altogether incapable of reaſoning. This timorouſneſs was owing to his education; for he was brought up amongſt women and freedmen, and obliged from his infancy to depend entirely upon them, and ſubmit to their will and pleaſure, without having any paſſions, or even diſcernment of his own [t]. He gave out after he came to the throne, that in the reigns of Tiberius and Caius he had counterfeited folly to eſcape their cruelty; but his conduct too plainly ſhewed, that it was not aſſumed but real [u]. Suetonius taxes him with being naturally cruel [w], while others aſcribe to his wives and freedmen the many executions of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of his reign. Though he had many great faults, yet when compared with Tiberius or Caius, he did not paſs for a bad emperor [x]. From his childhood he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the liberal ſciences, and gave frequently public teſtimonies of his proficiency in them [z]. He arrived at no ſmall perfection in oratory, and his diſcourſe was not without elegance, when it was the reſult of ſtudy. He was well ſkilled both in the Latin and Greek tongues, wrote ſeveral books (M), and added three letters to the antient alphabet riſe above the rank of a knight, till the age of forty-ſix years, when his nephew Caius created him ſenator, in order to honour him with the conſulate (83). Nevertheleſs to this contempt and neglect was owing the power he acquired; for Caius would never have ſpared him, had he imagined him capable of aſpiring at it (84). Beſides, the baſe treatment he met with moved both the people and ſoldiery to compaſſion, and procured him their affections (85).

His learning.

[t] Dio, ibid. [u] Suet. c. 38. [w] Idem c. 34. [x] Dio, l. lx. p. 665. Aur. Vict. c. 4. [z] Suet c. 3. [a] Tacit. annal. l. xiii. c. 3.

(M) At the perſuaſion of Livy the celebrated hiſtorian, and with the aſſiſtance of Sulpicius Flavius, Livy dying before he began his work, he wrote in forty-three books the hiſtory of Rome from alphabet (N), which however, continued in uſe no longer than his reign [b]. Seneca commends his works, and ſpeaks of from the death of Cæſar the dictator to his own time. He is ſaid to have wrote with great liberty, and to have been on that account often rebuked by his mother Antonia and his grandmother Livia. He publiſhed alſo ſeven volumes of his own life, which were wrote with more elegance than judgment (86), and a defence of Cicero againſt the writings of Gallus, which, in the opinion of Suetonius (87), was a learned performance. His hiſtory he recited in public, ſubmitting it to the judgment of his auditors. He had a particular value for the Greek tongue, ſpoke it fluently, and wrote in that language the hiſtory of the Tyrrhenians in twenty books, and that of the Carthaginians in eight. To make theſe hiſtories the more famous, he added a new ſchool to the old one at Alexandria, calling it by his own name, and ordering his two Greek hiſtories to be read in both ſchools (88).

(83) Dio, p. 644. (84) Idem, p. 658. (85) Aurel. Vict. c. 3.

[b] Senec. c. 41.

(N) Tacitus Quintilian, and Varro agree, that Claudius added three letters to the Latin alphabet, two of which are well known, viz. the Æolic digamma, and the antiſigma; the former was an F inverſed, thus Ⅎ, and founded like the V; as terminaⅎit ampliaⅎitque, and DiⅎDi Auguſti, &c. The Antiſigma ſerved inſtead of the Greek Ψ, or inſtead of P S. and was wrote thus, ↄ. The ſigma of the antient Greeks reſembled our C; whence Claudius, to his new letter, conſiſting of two ſigmas, having their backs turned to each other, thus, ↄc, gave the name of antiſigma. As to the third letter, we are quite in the dark. Some take it to have been the diphthong ai, which is found in moſt inſcriptions of Claudius's time, thus Antoniai, Diⅎai, &c. But it is manifeſt, that this Diphthong was in uſe long before his reign. Others from a corrupt paſſage in Velius Longus, conclude it to have been we know not what letter, invented to ſoften the harſh ſound of the letter R. There are not wanting ſome who pretend the letter X to have been firſt contrived by Claudius; but Iſidorus plainly ſhews, that it was invented and uſed in the reign of Auguſtus (89). The Greek Φ had, as Quintilian obſerves, a different ſound from that of the Latin PH; whence ſome conjecture the third letter invented by Claudius to have anſwered the Greek φ, which is not altogether void of probability. But on this ſubject nothing has been, or can be, offered, except what is merely conjectural. Claudius

 publiſhed

(86) Suet. c. 41. (87) Idem, ibid. (88) Idem, c. 42.
(89) Vide Iſidor. de orig.

His perſon. of him as an encourager of learning [c]. As to his perſon, he was tall and well-ſhaped; but had ſomething very diſagreeable in his mien, ſomething very unbecoming in his action, which, together with his low voice and inarticulate pronunciation, is the chief ſubject of Seneca's railleries [d]. Theſe defects as well as his ſtammering and the trembling of his head, Dion Caſſius takes to be the effect of the infirmities, to which he was ſubject in his childhood and youth [e].

His wives and children. HIS wife, when he came to the empire, was Valeria Meſſalina, his couſin, whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention. He had already by her a daughter, named Octavia, who was afterwards married to Nero. Not many days after his acceſſion to the empire, his wife Meſſalina was delivered of a ſon, named firſt Claudius Tiberius Germanicus, and afterwards Britannicus Cæſar [f]. By his ſecond wife, Ælia Petina, whom he divorced, he had a daughter called Antonia, whom he married firſt to Pompeius Magnus, and afterwards to Fauſtus Sylla, both deſcended from illuſtrious anceſtors. His firſt wife, Plautia Urgulanilla, brought him Druſus, and a daughter called Claudia. Druſus loſt his life at Pompeii before he was fourteen, being choaked by an apple, which ſtuck in his throat, while, in play, he was throwing it up into the air, and catching it in his mouth. As for Claudia, though ſhe was born five months before he divorced her mother, yet he would not acknowledge her for his daughter; but ſuſpecting her to be the child of one of his freedmen, called Boter, he cauſed her to be ſtript naked, and to be laid, after the divorce, before her mother's door [g].

His freedmen. MESSALINA, and Agrippina, whom he married after her death, bore an abſolute ſway over Cladius, who acted under publiſhed a book, when he was yet a private perſon, on the neceſſity of admitting theſe letters, and the uſe of them: when he was advanced to the empire, he obliged all to uſe them; but after his death they were diſuſed and quite laid aſide, though in the times of Suetonius and Tacitus they were ſtill to be ſeen in ſeveral records and journals, and in the tables of braſs, on which were publiſhed the decrees of the people (90).

[c] Senec. lud. in Claud. p. 665. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Dio, c. 60. [f] Suet. c. 27. Dio, p. 548. [g] Suet. ibid.

(90) Suet. c. 41. Tacit. annal. l. xi. c. 14.

under them more like a slave than a prince [h], disposing of honours, governments, employments, armies, &c. as they and his freedmen, whose power he raised as high as his own, thought fit to direct him. Amongst the latter his chief favourites were Possides the eunuch, Felix, Harpocras, Polybius, and above all Narcissus and Pallas (O). To these we may add, Callistus, or, as others call him, Calixtus, a man

[h] Suet. c. 29.

(O)Suetonius tells us, that Possides was rewarded by Claudius in his British triumph, and amongst the other brave officers presented with a spear; but whether the eunuch deserved that mark of distinction, we find no where recorded. Felix was brother to Pallas, Claudius's reigning favourite, and the most powerful person in the whole empire. He is by most writers named Claudius Felix, but by Tacitus, Antonius Felix, because he was first the slave of Antonia, the mother of Claudius, and afterwards of Claudius himself, whose name he likewise took upon his being manumitted. He was in high favour with Claudius, and by him raised to the first posts of the army, and afterwards to the government of Judæa, Galilee, Samaria, and Perea, that is, of the country beyond the Jordan (91). Suetonius observes, that from a slave he became so great and considerable, that he was the husband of three several queens, or rather princesses of royal blood. One of these was Drusilla, the daughter of king Agrippa, whom by means of a magician, named Simon, he persuaded to abandon her husband Azizus, king of Emesus, and marry him (92). In marrying Felix, she renounced, according to Josephus, the Jewish religion, which Azizus had embraced out of complaisance to her. S. Luke, nevertheless calls her a Jew (93). Felix married another Drusilla, grand-daughter to Anthony and Cleopatra, and daughter to Juba, king of Mauritania (94). Who was the third princess we find no where recorded. To Harpocras, another of his favourite freedmen, he granted the privilege of being carried in a litter and of exhibiting plays, which was contrary to the decree passed in Tiberius's reign, and by us mentioned there. Polybius was a man of learning, and had assisted Claudius in his studies, who thereupon heaped extraordinary honours upon him, allowing him often to walk between the two consuls (95). Of Narcissus and Pallas we shall speak anon.

(91) Suet. c. 28. Joseph. antiq. l. ii. c. 5. (92) Idem ibid. (93) Act. c. xxiv. v. 24. (94) Idem ibid. (95) Suet. ibid.

man of great craft and addreſs (P). He was privy to the conſpiracy againſt Caius, as we have related above, and gained the favour of Claudius, by perſuading him, that he had been charged by Caius to poiſon him; but had under various pretences, put off from day to day the execution of his orders [i]. Calixtus's office was to receive the requeſts, which were preſented to the emperor; Narciſſus was his ſecretary, and Pallas had the whole management of the finances. Theſe three divided the ſovereign power amongſt them [k]. Each of them was, according to Pliny [l], richer than Craſſus had ever been; nay, they poſſeſſed

[i] Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1. [k] Zonar. l. v. Suet. ibid.
[l] Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 10.

(P) Calliſtus had been ſlave to a private citizen, who ſold him to Caius, but was afterwards obliged, as Seneca obſerves (96), to purchaſe his favour at a much higher price than that, at which he had ſold him; nay, he was often ſeen waiting at his door, and courting even his porters, that he might be allowed to enter with the reſt, and attend the levee of one, whom he had formerly kept in chains. Scribonius Largus, a celebrated phyſician of thoſe times, inſcribed to him a work, wherein he ſtyles him Caius Julius Calliſtus (97). Suetonius, in ſpeaking of the freedmen of Claudius, makes no mention of Calliſtus, who, it is certain, bore a great ſway in that reign; but names one Harpocras, who is ſcarce taken notice of by any other writer. This has prompted ſome to believe, that Harpocras and Calliſtus were one and the ſame perſon. But we can hardly perſuade ourſelves, that Calliſtus was alſo named Harpocras, ſince Scribonius Largus, names him only C. Julius Calliſtus. Beſides, Seneca ſpeaks in one place of Calliſtus (98), and in another of Harpocras (99); and tells us, that the latter was executed by Claudius's orders. Had this been the end of ſo famous and celebrated a perſon as Calliſtus, Tacitus and Suetonius would not, we conceive, have failed to mention it. Suetonius perhaps makes no mention of Calliſtus in ſpeaking of Claudius's freedmen, becauſe he was not, properly ſpeaking, one of his, but of Caius's freedmen, by whom he was firſt manumitted, and afterwards employed in quality of ſecretary (100). He was alive in the eighth year of Claudius's reign, and died ſoon after (1).

(96) Senec. epiſt. 47. (97) Tacit. annal. l. 11. (98) Senec. epiſt. 47. (99) Idem lud. in Claud. (100) Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 6. (1) Tacit. annal. l. 11. c. 27.

ſeſſed greater wealth than the emperor himſelf, who was thereupon told, as he complained one day of his poverty, that he would be rich enough, if he could but prevail upon his freedmen to take him for their partner [m]. Having premiſed thus much in general concerning Claudius and thoſe who governed under him, we ſhall now reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

The alarm which the death of Caius occaſioned in Rome.

THE unexpected news of Caius's death, which was brought while the people were intent upon the ſhews, and in a trice ſpread all over the city, occaſioned a general uproar. Upon the firſt alarm the deceaſed emperor's littermen haſtened with their poles to his reſcue, and were immediately followed by his German guards, named the Celtic band, who, finding Caius lying dead on the ground and his body mangled, in the manner we have related, vented their rage on all they met, without examining whether they were privy to the conſpiracy or not; and in this confuſion were killed L. Aſprenas, who had been conſul three years before, Norbanus, deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, Anteius, a ſenator of great diſtinction, and ſeveral others, who came merely out of curioſity to know whether the report was true or no. As for Chærea he retired, before the emperor's death was publicly known, to the houſe of Germanicus, which was contiguous to the palace, and there with the chief of the conſpirators lay concealed, till the Germans, by whom Caius was extremely beloved on account of his prodigality, had vented their firſt fury. The people, ſuſpecting Caius had cauſed the report of his death to be ſpread abroad, on purpoſe to diſcover their ſentiments, continued in the theatre, without taking any notice of what was rumoured about. But they were greatly alarmed, when word was brought them, that the emperor's guards had ſurrounded the theatre, and were ready to enter it ſword in hand, to ſacrifice the whole multitude to the manes of their maſſacred general. And this indeed they deſigned in the firſt tranſports of their rage; but a public herald appearing unexpectedly in the theatre, clad in deep mourning, after having proclaimed the emperor's death, commanded the people quietly to retire to their reſpective houſes, and the ſoldiery to withdraw to their quarters without raiſing any further diſturbance. They both obeyed, which was more than was expected, with great readineſs,

Several perſons of diſtinction killed.

[m] Suet. ibid.

readineſs, ſo that the tumult was ſoon appeaſed, and tranquillity reſtored to the city. Then the conſuls, Q. Pomponius Secundus and Cn. Sentius Saturninus, having, at th head of the city-guards who were under their command ſeized on the forum and the capitol, aſſembled the ſenate in order to deliberate with them about the moſt proper mea-ſures in ſo critical a conjuncture. While they were aſſembled, both the populace and ſoldiery, whom Caius had gained with the immenſe ſums he diſtributed amongſt them, and the magnificent ſhews he exhibited almoſt every day, cried aloud for vengeance; which ſo terrified the ſenate, that they were ready to paſs a decree, enacting, that the conſpirators ſhould be forthwith apprehended and executed, as traitors and enemies to their country, when Valerius Aſiaticus, a ſenator of great quality and reputation, riſing up, ſpoke with great vehemence againſt the meaſures they were entering upon, commended the zeal of the brave patriots who had delivered their country from ſo cruel a tyrant, publicly wiſhed he had had the glory of diſpatching him with his own hand, and exhorted the fathers to deſpiſe the clamours of the multitude. Hereupon they took courage, and by an edict, which they cauſed to be read to the people, commanded them to return to their ſeveral employments, and the ſoldiery to their camp. Then the con-ſpirators appeared publicly, and owned the fact; and Sen-tius Saturninus, one of the conſuls, having in a ſpeech, which he uttered with great zeal and ardor, diſplayed the benefits of liberty and miſeries of tyranny, encouraged the fathers to reſume their antient authority, and to begin the exerciſe of that power to which they alone had a juſt claim, by conferring ſuch honours and rewards on Chærea, as the eminent ſervice he had rendered the public well deſerved. The ſenators, animated with his ſpeech, agreed to reſtore Rome to her antient liberty, and utterly to extinguiſh the name of the Cæſars. They ſpent all that day and the following night, in deliberating about the meaſures for bringing about ſo great a change, without kindling a civil war within the very walls of the city, but parted, after long and warm debates, without agreeing upon any. When the ſenate roſe, Chærea, whom they had appointed commander of the city-guards, went to the conſuls for the parole, who gave him the word "liberty." No ſuch honour had been paid to the conſuls ever ſince the eſtabliſhment of the monarchy [n].

The conſuls ſeize the capitol.

The ſenate reſolves to reſtore Rome to her antient liberty.

[n] Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 1, & 2. Suet. in Calig. c. 59. Dio l. lx. p. 664.

CLAUDIUS.

NERO.

GALBA.

OTHO.

P. Simms Sc.lpt

Vol. V.

ver against Pag. 490

The ſoldiery find Claudius

In the mean time, the ſoldiers in the camp took ſuch meaſures as utterly defeated thoſe of the ſenate. Claudius, who had been with Caius a few minutes before he was murdered, and was retired to a room in the palace called Hermaum, upon the firſt alarm of his death, ſtole away in a great fright, and hid himſelf behind the hangings in a dark corner of the palace, whence he heard the noiſe of the ſoldiery, and ſaw ſome of the German guards paſs cloſe by him with the head of Aſprenas, which they carried, as it were, in triumph. This ſight encreaſed his fright to ſuch a degree, that he continued motionleſs in the ſame place, ſcarce daring to breathe through fear of being diſcovered, till a common ſoldier, called by ſome Gratus, by others Epirius, but probably Epirius Gratus, running about the palace in queſt of plunder, diſcovered his feet, and dragged him out of his hiding-place. Claudius, not doubting but the ſoldier deſigned to murder him, threw himſelf at his feet, and with many tears begged for mercy, which Gratus, finding who he was, not only granted, but ſaluted him emperor, and carried him to his comrades, who, at his inſtigation, honoured him with the ſame title. They then put him into a chair, and, as his ſervants were fled, carried him upon their ſhoulders by turns to the camp, the people, who imagined they were carrying him to execution, bemoaning his misfortune; for he had hitherto done nothing that could deſerve any man's hatred. He was well received in the camp; but, as he was naturally timorous, he paſſed the night in no ſmall apprehenſion [o]. He was inclined not to accept the empire; but king Agrippa, who had juſt interred the body of Caius, arriving in the camp, and hearing the army deſigned to raiſe Claudius to the ſovereign power, went immediately to him, encouraged him to lay hold of the preſent opportunity, and, leaving him in that reſolution, returned home. On the other hand, the ſoldiery, being well appriſed, that the ſtate could not long ſubſiſt without an emperor, and reflecting that it would prove far more advantageous for them to give than to receive one, the very next day, the twenty-fifth of January, took an oath of allegiance to Claudius, who thereupon promiſed them fifteen great ſeſterces a man [p]. He was the firſt emperor, as Suetonius obſerves, who gave money to the ſoldiers upon his acceſſion to the empire; but his example was followed [o] Suet. in Claud. c. 10.

[p] Joſeph. ibid.

followed by moſt of his ſucceſſors [q]. The people, who had expreſſed great joy upon the hopes of recovering once more their antient privileges, no ſooner heard that Claudius was declared emperor by the army, than they changed their mind, approved with loud ſhouts what had been done in the camp, and openly declared, that they had rather obey one prince, than many tyrants. The ſenate, however, perſiſted in their former reſolution of aſſerting the public liberty, and were even for making war upon Claudius; but afterwards growing cooler on account of the differences that aroſe amongſt them, and not being able to come to an agreement, they ſent for king Agrippa to adviſe with him. The king obeyed the ſummons with great readineſs, and appearing in the ſenate, dreſſed and perfumed, as if he had not been out of his houſe that day, he aſked what was become of Claudius, as if he ſuſpected him to have been murdered together with his nephew. Hereupon the ſenate related to him what had paſſed, to which he pretended to be an utter ſtranger, and at the ſame time aſked his advice (R). The traitor proteſted, that he was ready to ſacrifice his life to the glory of the ſenate and to the public liberty; but at the ſame time ſtarting innumerable difficulties and exaggerating the dangers and evils of a civil war, he craftily endeavoured to deter them, as ſolicitous about their ſafety, from having recourſe to arms. He told them, that in his opinion they were no-ways in a condition to make head againſt the prætorian guards; and that he therefore adviſed them, rather to ſend a deputation to Claudius, begging him not to accept of the empire. This embaſſy he offered to take upon himſelf; the ſenate returned

The people join the ſoldiery.

The ſenate adviſes with king Agrippa

A deputation ſent to Claudius.

[q] Suet. ibid.

(R) Joſephus tells us in his hiſtory of the Jewiſh war, that king Agrippa was at the ſame time ſent for both by the ſenate and by Claudius, and that he choſe to go firſt to Claudius, who ſent him in his name to the ſenate (2). This is not to be eaſily reconciled with what he writes in his antiquities, viz. that Agrippa being ſent for by the ſenate, immediately obeyed the ſummons, but pretended an entire ignorance of what had paſſed either in the palace or camp, relating to Claudius. We have followed him in his antiquities, which he wrote the laſt.

(2) Joſeph. bell. l. ii. c. 28.

eturned him thanks for his zeal, accepted his offer, and iſpatched him the ſame day to the camp with two tribunes f the people, Veranius and Bruchus. The tribunes con-ured him to ſubmit to the authority of the ſenate and people, ut him in mind of the evils and calamities which the re-ublic had ſuffered under the former tyrants, aſſured him, that he ſenate had reſolved at all events to attempt the recovery of their antient privileges, earneſtly entreated him ſeriouſly to reflect on the calamities attending a civil war, and the unhappy end of Caius, &c. The ſpeech of the tribunes made a deep impreſſion on the mind of Claudius, who was naturally timorous; but Agrippa in a private audience encouraged him to lay hold of the preſent opportunity, acquainted him with the fears, perplexity, and irreſolution of the ſenate, and exhorted him to aſſume forthwith the imperial power, and return an anſwer to the deputies becoming an emperor. Claudius followed the advice of Agrippa, which occaſioned no ſmall confuſion in the city, the ſenate declaring, that they were determined rather to riſque a civil war, than ſubmit to the will of one man. This was in effect declaring war, and accordingly Claudius, being acquainted with their reſolution, began to put himſelf in a condition to repel force with force. In the mean time, the people, ſurrounding the place where the ſenate was aſſembled, demanded with threats an emperor, declaring aloud, that they would never acknowledge the authority of the ſenate. This frightened the fathers to ſuch a degree, that they immediately ſeparated; but the conſuls ſummoned them to meet again the next morning before break of day. Only a ſmall number of them obeyed the ſummons, ſcarce an hundred perſons, the reſt being either retired into the country, or keeping cloſe in their houſes, through fear of being inſulted by the populace. While thoſe who met were deliberating how to thwart the deſigns of Claudius, the city guards, the only troops that obeyed the ſenate, joining the populace, began to cry aloud, that they would have an emperor; that the ſenate might chuſe whom they pleaſed; but that they were reſolved to yield obedience to none but an emperor. This put an end to the deliberations of the ſenate; all thoughts of liberty were laid aſide, and Claudius, with the uſual ceremonies, declared emperor (S). After this declaration the ſenators haſtened

The ſenate betrayed by Agrippa.

The people demand an emperor.

And are joined by the city guards.

(S) The ſenate, being well appriſed, that all their efforts towards the recovery of their liberty muſt, in the preſent diſpoſi-

tion

haſtened to the camp, each of them ſtriving to be the foremoſt in paying their court to the new prince. The ſoldiery received them with inſults, wounded ſome of them, and would have killed the conſul Pomponius Secundus, who had been the moſt ſanguine of all in the cauſe of liberty, had they not been reſtrained by Claudius, who received him with the greateſt tokens of reſpect, and placed him next to himſelf[r].

Claudius declared emperor.

And now Claudius, being declared and acknowledged emperor, left the camp, accompanied by the ſenate and prætorian guards, and entering the city in a kind of triumph, [r] Joſeph. ibid. Dio, p. 666. Suet. c. 10.

tion of the people and ſoldiery, neceſſarily prove ineffectual, reſolved at firſt to name an emperor themſelves, and not accept one from the ſoldiery. Accordingly, ſeveral perſons were propoſed, all better qualified than Claudius for that high ſtation. Joſephus names the three following ſenators, all men of extraordinary parts, and equal to the ſovereignty; viz. Annius Minucianus or Vicinianus, Valerius Aſiaticus, who had been both privy to the conſpiracy againſt Caius, and Camillus Scribonianus, who revolted the following year. Minucianus had moſt votes; but the conſuls, dreading the conſequences of a civil war, which they thought unavoidable, if they named any but Claudius to the ſovereign power, put off, under various pretences, the final deciſion of ſuch an important affair. In the mean time, the gladiators, on whom the ſenate chiefly relied, and the city guards went over, in crouds to Claudius; ſo that Minucianus and the others gave over ſoliciting for a dignity, which they were well appriſed they could not long enjoy. Chærea did all that lay in his power to put a ſtop to the deſertion of the ſoldiery, but to no purpoſe; for while he was encouraging the few who remained, to exert themſelves in the defence of their liberties, inſtead of liſtening to him, they took up their ſtandards, and marching ſword in hand out of the city, joined their comrades in the camp of the prætorian guards. The ſenate, ſeeing themſelves thus abandoned by all their forces, were at length forced to join the people and ſoldiery, and declare Claudius emperor; which they did accordingly, decreeing him at the ſame time all the titles annexed to the imperial dignity. However, Chærea and Sabinus continued proteſting, that they would rather fall by their own hands, than ſubmit to Claudius (3).

(3 Joſeph. antiq. c. 3. Dio, p. 665.

umph, offered a ſolemn ſacrifice in the capitol by way of thankſgiving to the gods, who had thus raiſed him to the empire; and then withdrew to the palace, where he immediately ſummoned a council of his friends to deliberate with them about his conduct, with reſpect to thoſe who had murdered Caius: in his heart he approved of the action; but as he thought it nearly concerned all princes, that the death of one ſhould not paſs unrevenged, with the advice of his friends, he cauſed the brave Chærea (T), Lupus, who had put to death Cæſonia with her daughter, and a few more to be condemned and executed; but pardoned the reſt, and amongſt them Cornelius Sabinus, though he had acted a chief part in the murder of Caius; but the brave tribune, grieved at the death of his friend Chærea and ſcorning to out-live him, laid violent hands on himſelf [s]. After this the emperor cauſed an act of oblivion to be paſſed with reſpect to all that had been tranſacted in the ſenate, from the death of Caius to the time of his acceſſion to the empire, and obſerved it ſo ſtrictly, that he even raiſed thoſe to the firſt employments who had been the moſt ſanguine in the cauſe of liberty. The ſenate immediately decreed him all the honours which they had conferred on other emperors; but he modeſtly declined the greater part of them, and cauſed a decree to be paſſed in the ſenate, forbidding any one to pay him divine worſhip, or ſtyle him a god. Having, a few days after he was declared emperor, married

Chærea and ſome of the conſpirators put to death.

Inſtances of Claudius's modeſty, equity, &c.

[s] Joſeph & Dio, ibid.

(T) Chærea died with the conſtancy of a true hero; but Lupus betrayed a great deal of fear, notwithſtanding the great example he had before his eyes. As he was pulling off his garments at the place of execution, he complained of cold; which unſeaſonable complaint Chærea turning into ridicule, told him, that cold had never yet done harm to a wolf, alluding to his name Lupus, which in the Latin tongue ſignifies a wolf (4). They were both beheaded, and the Roman people, a few days after their execution, offering the uſual ſacrifices in the month of February, in honour of their deceaſed friends, did not on that occaſion forget the brave Chærea, acknowledging their obligations to him, for having delivered the republic from ſo deſtructive a tyrant (5).

(4) Idem. ibid. (5) Dio, p. 666.

married his daughter Antonia to Cn. Pompeius, he would not ſuffer the people to make any public rejoicings on that occaſion, nor even on his own birth-day, or on the anniverſary of his acceſſion to the empire [t]. He no ſooner began to exerciſe the authority with which he was inveſted, than he ſuppreſſed the law of majeſty, which under the two preceding emperors had proved ſo fatal to Rome. At the ſame time, he called home all the exiles; eaſed the people of the tributes with which Caius had loaded them; forbad ſuch as had any relations of their own, however diſtant, to name him among their heirs; reſtored the eſtates, which had been unjuſtly ſeized by Tiberius and Caius, to the owners or their heirs: ordered all the ſtatues, which Caius had cauſed to be brought to Rome from Greece and other countries to be carried back, and reſtored to the cities whence they had been taken, &c. With theſe and innumerable other inſtances of his clemency, juſtice and good-nature, he won the hearts of the people to ſuch a degree, that upon a groundleſs report of his being aſſaſſinated, they raiſed dreadful diſturbances in the city, calling the ſoldiers traitors, the ſenate parricides, and loading with horrible curſes and imprecations all whom they ſuſpected to have been any way acceſſory to his death. The tumult continued till the magiſtrates aſſured the people from the roſtra, that Claudius was only gone to Oſtia, whence he would return in a ſhort time [u]. But the zeal, which the people ſhewed on this and ſeveral other occaſions for his ſafety, was not ſufficient to cure his natural timorouſneſs. His friends could not prevail upon him, during the firſt month of his reign, to appear once in the ſenate, becauſe Cæſar the dictator had been murdered there. He cauſed all, whom he admitted to his preſence, to be firſt narrowly ſearched, leſt they ſhould have ſome weapon concealed under their garments. It was a long time before he could be perſuaded to excuſe women, and even children, from being ſearched in a very rude and unbecoming manner. At public entertainments he was conſtantly ſurrounded by his guards, whom he alſo obliged to attend him at table, diſtruſting the domeſtics even of his moſt intimate friends. He never failed to viſit in perſon ſuch of the ſenators as were indiſpoſed, but always ſent his guards before to ſearch every corner of the houſe [w]. However, theſe unneceſſary and ridiculous precautions cautions did not render him so contemptible in the eyes of the multitude, as the weakness and want of judgment, which he betrayed in the administration of justice. He was no ways qualified for that office; but nevertheless could not be prevented from hearing and deciding the most intricate causes, which served only to expose him to public derision, and often to insults, which he bore with incredible patience. Suetonius tells us, that a Greek, pleading one day before him, not only reproached him with ignorance, but called him to his face an "old fool"; and that a Roman knight, thinking himself wronged by him, had the boldness to throw his pen-knife at him, which wounded him in the cheek [x]. We are not told, that he ever resented those gross affronts; which sufficiently shews the weakness of his understanding(U). Renders himself contemptible.

Is beloved by the people.

His timorouſneſs.

[t] Dio, p. 667. [u] Suet. c. 12. Dio, p. 669. [w] Suet. c. 35.

In the first year of his reign, he enlarged the kingdom of Agrippa, who had greatly contributed to his advancement, with the addition of Judæa and Samaria, which had been formerly possessed by his grandfather Herod the Great. To his brother Herod he gave the principality of Chalcis at the foot of mount Libanus, and granted to both the privilege of entering the senate, allowing Agrippa to appear there with consular, and Herod with prætorial, ornaments [y]. He also restored Mithridates the Iberian to his kingdom, Mithridates the Cilician to the kingdom of Bosphorus, and Antiochus to that of Comagene, who had been all unjustly deprived of their dominions by Caius [z]. Soon after his accession to the empire, he recalled his two nieces, Agrippina and Julia, from the island of Pontia, to which they had been confined by their brother Caius; but his wife Messalina, who Restores several princes to their dominions.

[x] Idem, c. 15. [y] Joseph. antiq. l. i. c. 4. Dio, p. 670.
[z] Joseph. & Dio, ibid.

(U) When news of Caligula's death reached Gaul, several persons of distinction in that province solicited Servius Sulpicius Galba, who commanded on the Rhine, to lay hold of that opportunity, and seize the sovereignty for himself. The legions too offered to stand by him, thinking they had as good a right to dispose of the empire as the prætorian guards. But Galba rejected their offers with indignation, which so pleased Claudius, that he received him into the number of his intimate friends, and ever after shewed a particular affection for him (6).

(6) Suet. in Galb. c. 7.

who governed him with an abſolute way, jealous of the power which Julia aſſumed, prevailed upon him to ſend her back this very year to the place of her former baniſhment, under pretence that ſhe was guilty of adultery and ſeveral other crimes, which by the envious Meſſalina were laid to her charge, but never proved. The celebrated Seneca had his ſhare in the misfortunes of the unhappy princeſs, being after his quæſtorſhip baniſhed to the iſland of Corſica, upon a bare, and, as is commonly believed, altogether groundleſs, ſuſpicion of a criminal converſation with her [a]. This year, the Romans gained ſome advantages over the Mauritanians, who had taken arms to revenge the death of Ptolemy their king, barbarouſly aſſaſſinated by Caius's orders [b]. About the ſame time, Sulpicius Galba overcame the Catti, and P. Gabinius Secundus the Marſi, two German nations. Gabinius after his victory had the good luck to diſcover and bring back with him to Rome one of the eagles, which the Germans had taken upon the defeat of Varus. For theſe victories Claudius took the triumphal ornaments and the title of emperor. Gabinius defeated likewiſe the Chauci, another German nation, and was allowed by Claudius, on account of his gallant behaviour on that occaſion, to aſſume the ſurname of Chaucius [c].

Seneca baniſhed.

The following year, Claudius entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having for his collegue C. Largus, but held it only for two months: to whom he reſigned the faſces we are no-where told; Largus continued conſul to the end of the year. The emperor, when he firſt aſſembled the ſenate in quality of conſul, obliged all the ſenators to bind themſelves by a ſolemn oath to obſerve all the laws of Auguſtus; took the ſame oath himſelf; but would not allow any of the magiſtrates or ſenators to lay themſelves under any obligation with reſpect to his own laws [d]. This year the Mauritanians were defeated anew by Suetonius Paulinus, who extended his conqueſts to the river Nigris, which ſeparates Africa from Æthiopia. Cn. Hoſidius Geta, ſucceeding Paulinus in the command of the Roman troops in Africa, gave Salabes, the Mauritanian general, two great overthrows, which obliged the whole country to ſubmit to the yoke. Claudius divided the kingdom of Mauritania into two provinces, viz. the Cæſariana and the Tingitana, the former being ſo called from Mauritania reduced and divided into two provinces.

[a] Tacit. annal. l. 11. c. 8. Dio, p. 670. [b] Dio, ibid. [c] Suet. c. 24. [d] Dio, p. 671.

from Cæſar, a name now common to all the emperors, and the latter from Tingis, now Tangier, the metropolis of that province. Both theſe provinces were, by the appointment of Claudius, governed by Roman knights [e] (W). This year Claudius cauſed a law to be paſſed, commanding, that thoſe who were named by the ſenate to the government of provinces, ſhould depart from Rome before the beginning of April [f]; but the year following he allowed them to ſtay in Rome, till the middle of that month. At the ſame time, he publiſhed an edict, forbidding thoſe, whom he ſhould charge with the government of provinces, to return him thanks, as was cuſtomary in the ſenate, ſince they owed no obligations to him, but he on the contrary was greatly indebted to them, for eaſing him of part of his burden [g]. The great famine, which raged this year at Rome, prompted Claudius to undertake the forming of a large and convenient haven

Claudius makes a harbour at the mouth of the Tiber.

[e] Dio, ibid. Plin. l. v. c. 1. [f] Dio, l. lx. p. 672.
[g] Idem, ibid.

(W) Dion Caſſius tells us, that Geta purſued the Mauritanians beyond mount Atlas; and that while he was in thoſe dry and ſandy countries in great diſtreſs for want of water, a magician, who lived there, taught him certain charms, which, he ſaid, were frequently practiſed by the inhabitants with wonderful ſucceſs, when they wanted water. Geta gave no great credit to the magician; but being prompted, partly by curioſity, partly by the diſtreſs he was in, to make uſe of the charms which the Mauritanian had taught him, he was greatly ſurpriſed to ſee all on a ſudden the ſky overcaſt, and a great quantity of water fall from heaven. The barbarians, concluding from thence, that the gods favoured the Romans, ſent deputies to treat with, and ſubmitted to, Geta, upon his own terms. Thus Dion Caſſius (7). We read in Pliny, that Claudius ſent a colony to Tingis, which city he named Julia Traducta (8). But we are inclined to believe, that this colony was ſent to Tingis by Julius Cæſar, ſince it is mentioned by Strabo (9), who died before the reign of Claudius. Voſſius takes Pliny to have been miſtaken in giving to Tingis in Africa the name of Julia Traducta, which, in his opinion, was peculiar to the city of Tingis in Spain, built in the time of Julius Cæſar, and peopled with inhabitants from Tingis in Africa (10).

(7) Dio, l. lx. p. 671. (8) Plin. l. v. c. 1. (9) Strab. l. iii. p. 140. (10) Voſſ. in hiſt. p. 179.

haven at the mouth of the Tiber, which great work he happily completed, though Cæſar the dictator, if ſome miſtake is not crept into Suetonius, had many years before attempted it in vain [h]. It was an undertaking, ſays Dion Caſſius, worthy of the grandeur of the Roman empire; but the ſucceſſors of Claudius were not able to maintain it, ſo that ſoon after his death it was choaked up with ſand and became quite uſeleſs [i] (X). At the ſame time, Claudius undertook the draining of the lake Fucinus, in the country of the Marſi, and the conveying of its waters, by a deep canal, into the Tiber, or rather the Liris; in which work he employed thirty thouſand men for eleven years together, but to no effect, as we ſhall ſee in the tenth year of his reign.

This year, Meſſalina and Claudius's freedmen began to abuſe the prince's weakneſs and the too great power he allowed them, to the deſtruction of ſuch of the nobility as gave them umbrage, or any ways incurred their diſpleaſure. The firſt who fell by their treachery was Appius Silanus, a perſon of great diſtinction and known integrity. He married to his firſt wife Æmilia Lepida, grand-daughter to Julia the daughter of Auguſtus, and had by her L. Junius Silanus, to whom Claudius had betrothed his daughter Octavia. Upon the death of Æmilia Lepida, which happened this year, Claudius, who held him in the number of his moſt intimate friends, perſuaded him to marry Domitia Lepida, mother to his own wife Meſſalina. But to his great misfortune the empreſs, whoſe lewdneſs knew no bounds, fell in love with him herſelf, and was not aſhamed to diſcloſe to him her paſſion. Silanus rejected with the utmoſt indignation her inceſtuous ſolicitations, which provoked her to ſuch a degree, that [h] Suet. c. 20. Dio, p. 672. [i] Idem ibid.

Lewdneſs of Meſſalina

(X) Suetonius calls it the port of Oſtia, though it lay on the other ſide of the Tiber over-againſt Oſtia at a place ſtill called by the inhabitants "il porto, the haven." The ſame writer tells us, that at the entrance of the harbour was ſunk the veſſel, in which the great obeliſk we ſpoke of in the preceding reign, was brought out of Egypt, as a foundation for the piles, upon which was raiſed a high tower, according to the model of the Pharos of Alexandria (11).

(11) Suet. c. 20.

that ſhe reſolved upon his ruin, and compaſſed it with the concurrence of the freedman Narciſſus in the following manner. Narciſſus ruſhed into Claudius's chamber one morning by break of day as in a great fright, and told the emperor, who was ſtill in bed, that he had dreamt Silanus deſigned to murder him that very day. Meſſalina, as had been agreed on beforehand, pretending to hear the freedman's account with ſurpriſe and amazement, aſſured the emperor, that ſhe had been for ſeveral nights together frightened with the ſame dream. In the mean time, Silanus, who had been told the day before that he was to wait upon the emperor at that hour, accidenly came in; which ſo terrified Claudius, of all men the moſt timorous, that, without any further enquiries, he commanded him to be immediately ſeized and executed. The ſame day he acquainted the ſenate with what had paſſed, and was not aſhamed publicly to return thanks to his freedman for watching over his ſafety, even in his ſleep [k] (Y). The death of Silanus alarmed the Death of Silanus.

[k] Suet. c. 37. Dio, p. 674. Tacit. annal. xi. c. 37.

(Y) Suetonius tells us, that a perſon, who had a ſuit at law depending before Claudius, in the ſame manner rid himſelf of his adverſary, telling him he had dreamt the night before, that he was aſſaſſinated; and afterwards, when his adverſary appeared, whiſpering him in the ear, that he was the aſſaſſin. This was enough for Claudius to have him immediately apprehended and executed, as if he had been convicted. The poor unmanly wretch was at the leaſt apprehenſion of danger eaſily put upon the moſt cruel and ſanguinary precautions, fear getting the better of his reaſon and temper, which had naturally no bias to cruelty. When returned to himſelf, he often teſtified great grief and concern for the executions which he had commanded in a ſudden fright, without knowing what he did or ſaid: nay, we are told, that he frequently enquired what was become of thoſe very perſons who had been executed by his orders; that he ſometimes ſent to invite them to dine with him the very next day, and was under the utmoſt concern, when informed of their death, proteſting with tears in his eyes, that he had given no ſuch orders (12). Thus was his whole life governed by fears, and his fears by his wives and freedmen: hence many bloody executions, according to the degree of his own timorouſneſs, or of their ambition, revenge, and avarice.

(12) Suet. c. 37, 39.

nobility, who thinking their lives and eſtates precarious under a weak prince, entirely governed by his wife and freedmen, reſolved by his death to put an end to their reign, and deliver themſelves from the dangers that threatened. Annius Vinicianus, or, as Joſephus calls him, Minucianus, who had acted a chief part in the murder of Caius, and after his death had been by the ſenate judged equal to the empire, was at the head of the conſpiracy, and drew into it Furius Camillus Scribonianus, governor of Dalmatia, who had been conſul ten years before, and with him a great number of knights and ſenators. Camillus, who was at the head of a powerful army, openly declared his deſign, and by aſſuring the troops under his command that he had nothing in view but to reſtore Rome to her antient liberty, perſuaded them to take an oath of allegiance to him; and at the ſame time, as he was well acquainted with Claudius's timorous temper, he wrote a letter to him filled with reproaches, and threatening him with a cruel death, if he did not forthwith reſign the empire, and, betaking himſelf to a private and retired life, ſave him the trouble and charge of making war upon him. The coward was ſo terrified with this letter, that he aſſembled, in the utmoſt conſternation, his friends, to deliberate with them, whether or no he ſhould reſign the ſovereign power to Camillus? But he was ſoon delivered from his fears; for Camillus's ſoldiers, not being able, by ſome ſtrange accident, to remove their enſigns, when they were ordered to march out and meet their new emperor, began upon that omen to repent of their revolt, and being perſuaded that the gods diſapproved of it, fell upon their officers, and cut moſt of them in pieces. Camillus himſelf found means to eſcape to the iſland of Iſſa on the coaſt of Dalmatia, where he was ſtabbed in the arms of his wife Junia by a common ſoldier, named Vologinius, after he had bore the name of emperor for five days [1]. Upon his death, moſt of the conſpirators, and among the reſt Vinicianus, laid violent hands on themſelves; ſome were ſeized and executed, and ſome by purchaſing with large ſums the favour of Meſſalina and the emperor's freedmen, never were, though notoriouſly guilty, enquired after, while many innocent knights and ſenators were, under colour of being concerned in the conſpiracy, ſtript of their eſtates by the rapacious Camillus revolts, and writes a threatening letter to Claudius.

Is abandoned by his men.

And murdered.

[1] Suet. c. 13. Dio, p. 674. Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 16. Tacit. hiſt. l. ii. c. 75.

rapacious Meſſalina and Narciſſus, and either ſent into baniſhment, or executed without mercy. Dion Caſſius tells us, that one of Camillus's freedmen, by name Goleſos, being apprehended and brought before the ſenate, ſpoke there with great courage and freedom. Whereupon Narciſſus, who was preſent among the emperor's attendants and ſtood behind him, making up to the freedman, aſked him, What would you have done, if your maſter had got poſſeſſion of the empire? I ſhould have kept behind him, ſaid he, and, mindful of my condition, not preſumed to ſpeak in his preſence [m]. The courage and reſolution of Arria is celebrated by moſt of the antient writers. She was wife to Cæcina Pætus, a conſular man, who, having joined Camillus, was ſeized in Dalmatia, and ſent to be tried at Rome. Arria being by the mercileſs ſoldiers denied the ſatisfaction of attending her huſband in the ſame veſſel, followed him in another, and arriving at Rome, there publicly reproached Junia, the wife of Camillus, with want of courage and conjugal affection, in living after ſhe had ſeen her huſband inhumanly murdered in her arms. Her friends, concluding from thence, that ſhe was reſolved not to outlive her huſband, watched her day and night; but ſhe, to convince them that all their precautions were to no effect, beat her head againſt the wall with ſuch violence, that her friends, for ſome time, believed her dead. However, ſhe recovered; but finding ſhe could not, with all her intereſt, for ſhe was in great favour with Meſſalina, ſave her huſband, and that he had not the courage to fall by his own hand, ſhe took a dagger, plunged it into her own breaſt, and pulling it out again, preſented it to her husband, ſaying, "Non dolet"; I don't feel it [n]. Martial makes her ſay, I don't feel my wound, but ſhall feel yours [o] (Z). Otho, father to the emperor

The conſtancy, firmneſs, and death of Arria.

[m] Dio, p. 685. [n] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 16. [o] Mart. l. i. epig. 14.

(Z) This action of Arria is mightily cried up by the antients, eſpecially by Pliny the younger: but nevertheleſs, that judicious writer thinks his heroine far more commendable for the conſtancy and reſolution ſhe ſhewed in diſſembling the extreme grief ſhe felt on the death of one of her children, that her huſband who was dangerouſly ill and tenderly loved the child, might not be acquainted with his misfortune, till he was perfectly recovered. The emperor of that name, being appointed to ſucceed Camillus in the command of the troops in Dalmatia, had the courage to cauſe the heads of thoſe ſoldiers, who had any hand in the murder of their officers, to be cut off in his preſence; nay in the midſt of the camp, though he well knew, that Claudius had approved of what they had done, and even advanced ſome of them to conſiderable poſts in the army. This conduct diſpleaſed the emperor; but Otho ſoon regained his favour, by diſcovering a conſpiracy formed againſt him by a Roman knight, who was apprehended, convicted, and thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, by the conſuls and tribunes of the people [p].

conſtancy

THE following year, Claudius was the third time conſul, having for his collegue L. Vitellius, the ſecond time conſul. Claudius held that dignity, according to Suetonius [q], only two months; but, according to Dion Caſſius, to the beginning of July [r], when both he and his collegue reſigned the faſces to Decimus Haterius Agrippa and C. Sulpicius Galba, as we learn from an antient inſcription [s]. This year, Claudius deprived the Lycians of their liberty, to put a ſtop to the differences that reigned amongſt them, and to puniſh them for having in a tumult put ſome Roman citizens to death [t]. Their country was added to the province of Pamphylia [u] (A). In Rome, Meſſalina, abuſing the abſolute ſway conſtancy and intrepidity ſhe ſhewed at her death proceeded probably from vanity and a certain fondneſs for fame, ſays Pliny; but her manly behaviour in the height of her grief was the effect of the moſt refined virtue, ſince ſhe could not be prompted to it by any proſpect of fame or glory (13).

[p] Suet. in Oth, c. 1. Dio, l. lx. p. 675. [q] Suet. c. 14. [r] Dio, p. 679. [s] Vide Onuph. in Faſt. p. 189. [t] Suet. c. 25. [u] Dio, p. 676.

(A) The Lycians on this occaſion ſent a deputation to Claudius, at the head of which was one of their country, who enjoyed the rights of a Roman citizen; but Claudius, finding he did not underſtand the Latin tongue, cauſed his name to be razed out of the roll of citizens: he treated in the ſame manner many others, whom he judged unworthy of the Roman name (14). He forbad under ſway ſhe had over her weak huſband, perſuaded him by her malicious inſinuations firſt to put to death his niece Julia, the daughter of Germanicus, whom he had baniſhed the year before to the iſland of Pontia, and afterwards Julia, the daughter of Druſus and grand-daughter of Tiberius: ſhe was likewiſe niece to Claudius, being the daughter of his ſiſter Livilla. They were both condemned and executed, ſays Suetonius, without being allowed to defend themſelves, though no-body could prove the charge that was brought againſt them [w]. However, the latter Julia well deſerved on another ſcore the doom that overtook her; for ſhe was chiefly inſtrumental, as we have related above, in the ruin of her huſband Nero the ſon of Germanicus. When Claudius quitted his conſulſhip, the ſenate decreed him triumphal ornaments, which put him upon undertaking ſome enterpriſe that might intitle him to a real triumph. The theatre he choſe for his warlike exploits was Britain, at that time haraſſed with civil wars. Some Britons of diſtinction having abandoned their own country, to avoid the fury of the factions that raged there, and taken refuge in Gaul, their countrymen complained, not without threats, of the Romans for entertaining them, and inſiſted upon their being ſent under ſevere penalties ſuch as were not free of the city to aſſume the name of any family in Rome; and even condemned ſome perſons to death, and cauſed them to be publicly executed, for no other crime, but becauſe they had falſely paſſed themſelves upon the world for Roman citizens. But notwithſtanding this rigor, he granted the freedom of the city to an infinite number of perſons of all nations, who had wherewithal to purchaſe it of Meſſalina or his freedmen. It was at firſt ſold at a very high rate, but became afterwards ſo common, that it was purchaſed, as was then ſaid by way of raillery, for a broken glaſs (15). Hence Seneca wrote in the invectives he publiſhed againſt Claudius, that if he had lived longer, he would have made all the Greeks, Gauls, and Spaniards free of Rome (16). This to Seneca ſeemed very abſurd; but was afterwards practiſed by other emperors, and, in the opinion of St. Auſtin, very wiſely (17).

(13) Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 16. (14) Dio, ibid.

The two Julias put to death.

Claudius deſigns to ſubdue Britain.

[w] Suet. c. 29.

(15) Dio, Suet. ibid. (16) Senec. lud. in Claud. p. 476 (17) Aug. civ. Dei, l. v. c. 17.

ſent back. This ſerved as a pretence to make war upon them, one of the fugitives, by name Bericus, perſuading the emperor by many arguments to attempt the conqueſt of that great iſland, which no Roman had ever dared to invade ſince the time of Cæſar the dictator. At his inſtigation, Claudius diſpatched orders to Plautius, who had ſucceeded Gabinius in the command of the troops in Lower Germany, to convey, without delay, all his forces over into Britain. This order was not reliſhed by the ſoldiery, who, in a mutiny declared, That they would not make war out of the compaſs of the world. Hereupon Claudius ſent his freedman Narciſſus to appeaſe the mutiny, and encourage the diſheartened legions to obey their general. Narciſſus, upon his arrival, aſcended the tribunal, and thence began to harangue the legions, who, provoked at the audaciouſneſs of the ſlave, abuſed him with moſt opprobrious language, bidding him quit the camp, and return to the maſquerades and plays at Rome; for they were determined, without his harangues, to follow their general. Accordingly, they immediately began their march to the ſea-ſide; and embarquing on the veſſels, which Plautius had with incredible expedition got ready for that purpoſe, landed in Britain, before the inhabitants had any notice of their deſign, whom therefore they eaſily defeated in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, and advanced as far as the Thames. But Plautius, not thinking it ſafe to penetrate farther into the country, wrote to Claudius, purſuant to his inſtructions, acquainting him with the progreſs he had already made, and the dangers he apprehended from a farther purſuit of his conqueſts. Upon the receipt of this letter, the emperor, who had drawn together a good number of legions, and kept them in readineſs to march to the aſſiſtance of his lieutenant in Britain, left Rome, and embarquing at Oſtia, ſailed to Marſeilles (B); thence he

(B) Claudius, before he ſet out from Rome, committed the government of the city, and the command of the troops left there, to Lucius Vitellius the father of the emperor of that name, and this year the emperor's collegue in the conſulſhip. He was a man of parts and valour; but, as we have obſerved already, a moſt infamous and ſlaviſh flatterer of perſons in power. Being appointed, we may ſay, regent in the abſence of Claudius, he diſcharged his truſt with great credit and integrity. Suetonius tells us, that Claudius put off his departure from Rome for a few days

he marched by land to Gesſoriacum, now, as is commonly believed, Boulogne [x], and from that place set sail for Britain, where he landed without oppoſition; and joining Plautius, whom he found encamped on the banks of the Thames, which he paſſed, defeated the enemy, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, among the reſt of Camalodunum, now Maldon in Eſſex, according to Cambden, where ſtood the palace of Cynobelinus, one of the Britiſh kings. In this expedition Veſpaſian diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner; for partly under Plautius, partly under Claudius himſelf, he fought thirty pitched battles, ſubdued two powerful nations, took twenty ſtrong towns and upwards, and reduced the iſland Vectis, or the iſland of Wight [y]. Claudius, having diſarmed the Britons who had ſubmitted, appointed Plautius governor of the conquered provinces, and, charging him to purſue his conqueſts, returned in great haſte to Rome, which, however, he did not enter till the next year; but the ſenate decreed both to him and his ſon the ſurname of Britannicus (C).

Is followed by Claudius.

His conqueſts there.

THE

[x] Vide Bucher, de Belg. p. 147.

[y] Suet. in Veſp. c. 4. & in Claud. c. 27. Dio, p. 679. Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 4.

days upon a ſlight indiſpoſition, which ſeized Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor; ſo highly was he favoured and beloved by Claudius after the diſcovery of the above-mentioned conſpiracy. Claudius in his paſſage from Oſtia to Marſeilles was twice in danger of being ſhipwrecked, which induced him to purſue his journey from Marſeilles to Boulogne by land (18).

(C) Claudius ſet out from Rome on his Britiſh expedition about the beginning of July, and returned to the city in the beginning of January (19). He ſtaid in Britain a few days, ſays Suetonius (20); ſixteen days, ſays Dion Caſſius (21). On his return he embarqued on the Po, and, entering by one of the mouths of that river the Adriatic ſea, landed at Oſtia (22). Suetonius tells us in one place, that he left the iſland without fighting one battle, nay without bloodſhed (23); and in another (24), that Veſpaſian, partly under Plautius, partly under Claudius himſelf, fought thirty battles. The latter is agreeable to what we read in Dion Caſſius, whom we have followed. Eutropius (25) and

(18) Suet. c. 17. (19) Dio, p. 680. (20) Suet. ibid. (21) Dio, ibid. (22) Plin. l. iii. c. 16. (23) Suet. ibid. (24) Idem, in vit. Veſpaſ. c. 4. (25) Eutrop. in vita Claud.

THE following year, L. Quinctius Criſpinus being the ſecond time conſul with M. Statilius Taurus, Claudius was His triumph received at Rome with a moſt magnificent triumph (D); and the ſenate, to encourage the emperor and his lieutenants to purſue their conqueſts, decreed, that all the treaties made by them ſhould have the ſame force, as if made by the ſenate and people of Rome [a]. Claudius after his triumph reſtored to the ſenate the provinces of Achaia and Macedon, which thenceforth began to be governed again by proconſuls [b]. He likewiſe honoured M. Juleus Cottius, prince of the Alps called Cottiæ, with the title of king, and enlarged his barren territories [c]; but deprived the Rhodians of their liberty for crucifying ſome Roman citizens [d], which however, he reſtored to them nine years after, that is, in the fifty third year of the chriſtian æra [e].

THE next conſuls were M. Vinicius, whom Claudius named to that dignity, though he had cauſed his wife Julia the daughter of Germanicus to be put to death, and T. Statilius Taurus Corvinus. As the city was filled with ſtatues, Some wiſe ordinances of Claudius. Claudius enacted a law, forbidding any new ſtatues to be erected within the walls of Rome, without the conſent of the ſenate, and at the ſame time ordered a great many alreac

[a] Dio, p. 680. [b] Suet. c. 25. [c] Dio, p. 68
[d] Suet. c. 25. [e] Idem ibid.

and S. Jerom (26) fix to this year the conqueſt of the iſland Orcades. But Tacitus writes, that they were not ſubdued by, or known, to the Romans, till the reign of Veſpaſian (27). They were not perhaps ſubdued, but they were certainly known this very year to the Romans, ſince Pomponius Mela mentions them in his deſcription of the world, which he wrote while Claudius was waging war in Britain (28).

(D) That the ſhew might be more glorious by the concourſe of people, he not only gave leave to the governors of provinces to be preſent at it, but permitted ſeveral baniſhed perſons to return home on purpoſe to behold it. In the ſolemnity his wife Meſſalina, magnificently adorned, followed him at ſome diſtance in a ſtately chariot. He mounted the ſteps of the capitol on his knees, being ſupported by his two ſons-in-law. Among the ſpoils of the enemy, he placed a naval crown on the top of his palace hard by the civic crown, in token of his victory over the ſea (29).

(26) Hier. in Chron. (27) Tacit. in vit. Agr. c. 10.
(28) Mela, l. iii. c. 6. & Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 25. (29)
Suet. c. 27.

ready raiſed to be taken away [d]. He puniſhed with great ſeverity ſome governors of provinces, who had oppreſſed the people they were ſet over, and enacted ſeveral wholeſome laws for bringing ſuch to juſtice as ſhould for the future be guilty of the ſame fault; ordering all governors to return to Rome, as ſoon as the time of their command was expired, to anſwer there the complaints that might be brought againſt them. The prerogative of granting leave to ſenators to travel out of Italy, which Auguſtus had lodged in the ſenate, he claimed himſelf, and obliged the ſenate to yield it to him by a decree [e]. This year, on the firſt day of Auguſt about an hour after mid-day, happened an eclipſe of the ſun. The emperor, as this was his birth-day, took care to give notice of it to the people before-hand, that they might not be ſurpriſed at that phænomenon, or draw bad omens from it [f].

In the following conſulate of Valerius Aſiaticus and M. Junius Silanus, died M. Vinicius, brother-in-law to Claudius, being poiſoned by Meſſalina. He was a man of a quiet temper and lived retired, concerning himſelf only in the affairs of his family; but, to his misfortune, the lewd Meſſalina conceived a violent paſſion for him, and poiſoned him, becauſe he could not by any ſolicitations be prevailed upon to injure Claudius [g]. Aſinius Gallus, the ſon of Agrippina Tiberius's firſt wife, conſpired this year againſt the emperor, with a deſign to ſeize the ſovereign power for himſelf; but the conſpiracy being diſcovered, Claudius only condemned him to baniſhment, as a perſon from whom he had nothing to apprehend, ſince he was of a very low ſtature, ill-ſhaped, of a very deformed countenance, and ſo inconſiderate, that he had aſpired to the ſovereignty, though quite deſtitute both of friends and money, upon the bare ſuppoſition, that he ſhould be immediately acknowledged by all on account of his noble deſcent. This generous behaviour in Claudius was highly commended by perſons of all ranks; and no leſs pleaſing to the people was the decree, which he got paſſed in the ſenate, forbidding freedmen to appear in judgment againſt their patrons, and impowering their maſters to deprive them of their liberty, and bring them back to the chain, when they proved ungrateful, Vinicius' poiſoned by Meſſalina.

Claudius's clemency.

[d] Dio, ibid. [e] Suet. c. 23. Dio, p. 682. [f] Dio, p. 682. [g] Dio, p. 683.

grateful, or gave them any juſt motive of complaint [h] (E).

Claudius cenſor.

The next year, Claudius was conſul the fourth time with Vitellius, the third time conſul; but after two months reſigned that dignity, and took upon him the office of cenſor, chuſing for his collegue Lucius Vitellius already conſul, who, as we have often obſerved, had a wonderful talent for flattery (F). In the diſcharge of this important office, Claudius performed ſome things highly commendable, but in others gave ſuch inſtances of his weakneſs and want of underſtanding, as expoſed him to public deriſion. He publiſhed abou

[h] Dio, p. 684. Suet. c. 25.

(E) S. Jerom tells us (30), that Thrace, which had hitherto been governed by kings, was this year, the fifth of Claudius and forty-ſeventh of the Chriſtian æra, reduced to a Roman province. Euſebius likewiſe writes, that Rhemetalces, king of Thrace, being killed by his own wife, Claudius conquered that country. But of this memorable event no mention is made by the Greek or Latin writers, whoſe works have reached our times.

(F) He left no ſtone unturned, ſays Suetonius, to work himſelf into the favour of Claudius: obſerving him entirely addicted to his wife Meſſalina and his freedmen, he begged of the former as the greateſt favour ſhe could beſtow upon him, that ſhe would grant him the honour of pulling off her ſhoes. Meſſalina, well pleaſed to ſee a man of his quality and parts proud of that office, granted him his requeſt; and Vitellius, the firſt time he diſcharged his honourable employment, carried away one of her ſhoes, and wore it conſtantly in his boſom, not being aſhamed to pull it out in public and often kiſs it. The golden images of Pallas and Narciſſus, the emperor's reigning freedman, he worſhipped amongſt his houſhold gods. When Claudius entertained the people with the ſecular games, ſo called, becauſe they were exhibited but once in a century, his compliment to him was, "Sæpe facias;" May you many times exhibit theſe ſports. Not only Claudius, who was a weak prince, but his wives and freedmen, were ſo taken with the groſs and fulſom flattery of this fawning ſlave, that they not only raiſed him to the firſt employments in the empire, but likewiſe his two ſons, whom he had the ſatisfaction to ſee conſuls in the ſame year, the one ſucceeding the other (31). His elder ſon was afterwards raiſed to the empire.

(30) Hier. in chron. (31) Suet. in vit. c. 2.

above twenty edicts in one day, moſt of them quite trifling and ridiculous; by one of them, for inſtance, he warned the ſenate and people to take care that their wine-veſſels were well pitched, ſince there was that year great plenty of grapes; by another he acquainted them, that the juice of the yew-tree was the beſt remedy of all againſt the ſting of a viper. When he came to enquire into the manners of the Roman knights, he diſmiſſed a young man moſt notoriouſly vicious, without any puniſhment, becauſe his father gave him a good character, telling him, You have a cenſor at home. Another, infamous for debauching both married and unmarried women, he only admoniſhed, either to live chaſte, or to be lewd more warily; for why muſt I know, ſaid he, with what women you keep company [i]. This year was remarkable for the deaths of ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction, whom Claudius, at the inſtigation of Meſſalina, cauſed to be executed. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who had married Antonia, the emperor's eldeſt daughter, fell the firſt. He was of an illuſtrious family, but not deſcended from Pompey the Great, being the ſon of Craſſus Frugi, who likewiſe bore the ſurname of Great. His credit with the prince, his great nobility, and extraordinary parts, by giving umbrage to Meſſalina, occaſioned his ruin. He was condemned and had his head cut off by a ſoldier ſent to him for that purpoſe, without ſo much as knowing that he was accuſed [k]: ſo great and abſolute was the ſway, which Meſſalina had obtained over her weak, timorous, and credulous huſband. At the ſame time, Craſſus, the father of Pompeius, and his mother Scribonia were by the order of Claudius put to death, though the former entirely reſembled him, being to uſe the expreſſion of Seneca, as great a monſter as himſelf, and therefore no leſs qualified to be emperor [l]. Several other perſons of this antient and illuſtrious family were at the ſame time ſacrificed to the jealouſy of Meſſalina and the fears of Claudius [m]. Upon the death of Pompeius, the emperor married his daughter Antonia to Cornelius Sylla Fauſtus [n], brother to Meſſalina, if Zonaras is to be credited [o], who had a ſon by her, upon whoſe birth Claudius would not ſuffer any public demonſtrations of joy. Many knights and ſenators of rank were after the death of Pompeius accuſed of conſpiring

Expoſes his unfitneſs in the diſcharge of that office.

Cn. Pompeius Magnus put to death.

[i] Suet. c. 16. [k] Suet. c. 29. Dio, p. 679. Senec. l. 4. in Claud. [l] Senec. ibid. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Suet. c. 27. [o] Zonar. p. 184.

ſpiring againſt the prince, ſome of whom Claudius pardoned, that is ſuch as he did not fear; but Valerius Aſiaticus (G) was proſecuted without mercy for no other crime, but becauſe he poſſeſſed, and had embelliſhed, with extraordinary magnificence, the fine gardens of Lucullus, which Meſſalina coveted. He was charged with a deſign of withdrawing into Gaul, to ſtir up his countrymen to a revolt; for he was a native of Vienne in that province, and ſupported there by numerous and powerful families, all his own relations. He was accuſed by Soſibius preceptor to Britannicus (H), who eaſily prevailed upon the weak and timorous Valerius Aſiaticus accuſed.

(G) Valerius Aſiaticus was a native of Vienne in Gaul, and very powerful in that province on account of his wealth and numerous dependents. He had been one of Caius's moſt intimate friends; but that prince having firſt debauched his wife, and afterwards bragged of it in public aſſembly in his preſence, the brave Gaul, who had too much ſpirit to put up ſuch an affront, reſolved to be revenged on the outrageous tyrant; and accordingly with great readineſs entered into the conſpiracy, nay became, according to Tacitus, the principal director in the plot; though he had no ſhare as we are told by Joſephus and Dion Caſſius, in the execution of it. When the ſenate, after the aſſaſſination, were for puniſhing the conſpirators, Valerius riſing up commended the action, owned himſelf privy to it, and publicly wiſhed he had had the glory of diſpatching the tyrant with his own hand. The ſenators, animated by his firmneſs and reſolution, took courage; granted impunity to the conſpirators, and were even for decreeing them rewards (32). Valerius had been conſul, the year before, the ſecond time, having been once honoured with that dignity in the preceding reign.

(H) This is probably the Soſibius, whoſe writings are quoted by Arnobius, Clemens of Alexandria, and Suidas. He was inſtructed by Meſſalina to warn Claudius under the maſk of zeal, that great wealth in the hands of private men proved always dangerous to princes; that Valerius was, on account of his immenſe riches and powerful alliances in Gaul, capable of diſputing the empire with him; that he was not only highly eſteemed by his countrymen the Gauls, but in mighty favour with the Roman people; that it was already a prevailing rumour through all the provinces, that he deſigned to put himſelf at the head of the armies, &c. (33). Theſe malicious and groundleſs inſinuations were ſufficient to put the timorous Claudius upon the moſt cruel and bloody precautions.

(32) Tacit. annal. l. xi. c. 1. Dio, l. lix. p. 663. (33) Tacit. ibid.

timorous prince to ſecure his life and empire, by the deſtruction of his pretended enemy and rival. Criſpinus, commander of the prætorian guards, was immediately diſpatched with a body of ſoldiers to ſeize him at Baiæ; which he did accordingly, and hurried him to Rome in chains. He was tried, not in the ſenate, but in the emperor's chamber, in the preſence of Meſſalina. However, he pleaded his cauſe with ſuch eloquence and energy, that he forced tears both from Claudius and Meſſalina herſelf. But the empreſs, fearing pity and tenderneſs ſhould get the better of her other paſſions, left the room, and in going out, whiſpered L. Vitellius in the ear not to let the accuſed eſcape [p]. As Valerius declared that he had never before ſeen any of the witneſſes, who were produced againſt him, Soſibius at laſt brought in one, who, he ſaid was well acquainted with him. He had before-hand informed his evidence, that Valerius was bald; and therefore, upon his entering the room, he deſired him in the firſt place to tell them which was Valerius Aſiaticus: I have been long acquainted with him, and that is he, ſaid the witneſs, pointing at another bald perſon, who happened to be preſent. This convinced Claudius, that Aſiaticus was free from all guilt; but while he was deliberating about clearing him, the treacherous Vitellius, throwing himſelf at his feet, and putting him in mind of the good ſervices of Aſiaticus to the common-wealth, of his attachment to Antonia, the prince's mother, of his gallant behaviour in the late Britiſh expedition, &c. begged him in the end with many tears to diſplay his mercy, by granting to ſo worthy and deſerving a citizen the free choice of his own death. Claudius, without further conſideration, complied with his requeſt; which was in effect condemning Aſiaticus, who thereupon opened his veins and bled to death [q] (I). Meſſalina, not ſatisfied with His trial.

He is condemned by the treachery of Vitellius.

[p] Tacit. ibid. [q] Idem, c. 2, 3.

(I) He behaved with great firmneſs and intrepidity both at his trial and after his condemnation; beſides the charge of treaſon, he was accuſed of winking at the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiery, of neglecting military diſcipline, of carrying on an adulterous amour with Poppæa, the mother of that Poppæa, who became ſo infamous in the reign of Nero, and laſtly with ſurrendering his perſon, like an harlot, to unnatural luſt. This laſt article Aſiaticus could not brook; but interrupting the accuſer, by name Suilius, a perſon, it ſeems, of ſome rank, Aſk thy with the ruin of Aſiaticus, ſuborned perſons, who urge Poppæa, with whom he was ſuppoſed to carry a crimin converſation, to lay violent hands on herſelf, to avoid th diſgrace of a ſhameful impriſonment, with which the threatened her. The emperor was ſo utterly unappriſ of her unhappy end, that her huſband Scipio being a fe days after at table with him, he aſked him why he can without his wife? Scipio anſwered, that ſhe was dead; b dared not mention the particulars of her death [r]. Afterwar two illuſtrious Roman knights, ſurnamed Petræ, were a cuſed and condemned, becauſe one of them had had a drea which was ſuppoſed to portend ſome misfortune, either Claudius or the empire (K).

Claudius ſupports the pleaders.

As the pleaders at this time exacted exorbitant fees fro their clients, and often of both parties, a complaint this grievance being begun by Caius Silius, conſul ele the whole ſenate concurred, and demanded, that t Cincian law might be revived, enjoining that no m ſhould, for pleading a cauſe, accept of any gift payment. The demand of the ſenate was with great veh mence promoted by Silius, and with equal ardor oppo thy own ſons, Suilius, ſaid he, they will ſatisfy thee that I a man. After his condemnation, he continued his uſual exerci walking, bathing, and even ſupping chearfully, telling his frie that it would have been more to his credit to have fallen the craft of Tiberius, or the fury of Caius, than thus periſh by the dark devices of a woman, and the treachery ſuch a baſe and proſtitute ſycophant as Vitellius. After ſup he viewed his funeral pile, and ordered it to be removed another place, leſt the heat and ſmoke ſhould hurt his trees, leſſen their cool ſhade. After this he opened his veins without traying the leaſt concern, and bled to death (34).

[r] Idem ibid.

(K) Some writers ſay, that he ſaw Claudius in a dream crow with a garland of the ears of corn, their beards downwa which was interpreted to foretel a public famine: others wrote, that the chaplet he ſaw was of vine branches with leaves, which he conſtrued to portend the death of the prin the cloſe of autumn. But whatever he dreamt, both he an brother were ſacrificed, partly for a dream, and partly fo commodating, as was pretended, Aſiaticus and Poppæa with uſe of their houſe for their private aſſignations.

(34) Idem c. 5.

by the pleaders (L). Claudius favoured the latter, and therefore

(L) Silius urged the examples of the antient orators who had required no other reward for pleading, but preſent applauſe and the praiſes of poſterity. By allowing orators to take fees, we put them upon the level with mechanics, ſaid he, and debaſe eloquence, of all accompliſhments the moſt glorious and honourable, to ſordid lucre: beſides, if eloquence once becomes venal, orators will upon the proſpect of greater gain, be tempted to betray thoſe whom they have undertaken to defend; they will promote enmities, accuſations, mutual hatred, quarrels, &c. as a ſure means of enriching themſelves: if no man finds his advantage in defending ſuits, there will be few ſuits to defend: as diſeaſes are the market of phyſicians, ſo will our quarrels and animoſities prove the revenue of the pleaders, who will therefore take care to inflame us againſt each other, and keep us always at variance. They might remember Caius Aſinius, M. Meſſala, and more lately Arruntius, and Eſerninus, who were raiſed to the higheſt dignities of the ſtate by an unblemiſhed life and an eloquence never expoſed to ſale. Thus ſpoke Silius. In anſwer to him, the pleaders owned, that fame was indeed the greateſt reward a man could wiſh for, but uncertain, and therefore not to be depended upon; that the practice of pleading was intended for the good of mankind, was a common refuge for all men, and prevented the powerful and mighty from oppreſſing thoſe who were not by themſelves in a condition to withſtand them; neither was eloquence acquired without pains and expence; ſince they who profeſſed it, neglected their domeſtic concerns to apply themſelves to the buſineſs of others. Many followed the profeſſion of war, many that of huſbandry, and by both profeſſions a livelihood was acquired; nay, nothing was purſued by any man, but with a view to the advantage it produced. As for Aſinius, Meſſala, &c. they were either enriched by the civil wars, or heirs of wealthy houſes; and therefore might well be above gain, and plead only for glory; but equally obvious where the examples of P. Clodius and Caius Curio, who never pleaded but for extravagant fees; as to themſelves, as the ſtudy of eloquence had proved very chargeable to them, they thought it but reaſonable that they ſhould reap ſome advantage from it. Theſe conſiderations appearing of no ſmall force to Claudius, the revival of the Cincian law was dropt (35). This law was enacted by M. Cincius, tribune of the people in the year of Rome 549, and revived by Auguſtus, who cauſed it to be confirmed by a decree of the ſenate (36).

(35) Tacit. ibid. c. 7. (36) Dio, l. liv.

and therefore the ſenate, inſtead of ſubjecting them, as they deſigned, to the penalties of the law againſt extortion, if they took any fee at all, or even preſent, for pleading, contented themſelves with ſettling their fees, which were not to excced two hundred and fifty crowns, and declaring thoſe who were not ſatisfied with that ſum, guilty of extortion [r]. The ſame year the Cheruſci, who inhabited the dutchy of Brunſwick, had recourſe to Claudius for a king, who ſent them Italicus, ſon to Tilavius the brother of the famous Arminius. Italicus was born at Rome, and brought up there after the Roman manner; which induced the Cheruſci, though they received him at firſt with great joy, to take arms againſt him, and drive him from the throne. He was afterwards reſtored by the Longobards, and, being ſupported by them, oppreſſed in a moſt tyrannical manner the Cheruſcan ſtate.

Wars in Germany.

At the ſame time, Sanguinius, governor of Lower Germany, being dead, the Chauci made incurſions into that province; but Cn. Domitius Corbulo, the greateſt commander of his age, who was ſent to ſucceed Sanguinius, obliged them to retire, purſued them into their own country, and would have forced them to ſubmit to the Roman yoke, had not Claudius, who feared Corbulo more than he did the Germans, put a ſtop to his conqueſts, and ordered him to lead back all the Roman forces over the Rhine. Corbulo obeyed without uttering more than that happy were the Roman commanders in former times. As he had taken great pains to reſtore the antient diſcipline amongſt the legions, whom he found utter ſtrangers to military toils, that they might not relapſe into the habit of idleneſs, he employed them in digging a canal three and twenty miles long between the Meuſe and the Rhine, to receive the high tides, and prevent inundations [s]. A modern writer takes this to be the canal known at preſent by the name of Fliet, which extends from the Sluys on the Meuſe to Leyden on the Rhine [t]. The emperor granted to Corbulo triumphal ornaments, though he would not allow him to proſecute the war. He was ſucceeded by Curtius Rufus, who, though of a mean extraction, arrived at the conſular dignity, commanded armies, and died

proconſul

[r] Idem, c. 5—8.

[s] Idem, c. 19, 20.

[t] Buch. de Belg. l. iv. c. 11.

proconſul of Africa [u] (M). Towards the end of the year, Aulus Plautius, returning from Britain, was received by Claudius with great remarks of diſtinction, and honoured with an ovation, the emperor himſelf attending him in that ceremony, and yielding to him the moſt honourable place [w]. P. Oſtorius Scapula ſucceeded Plautius in the government of Britain, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. About this time, a Roman knight, by name Cneius Novius, was diſcovered armed with a dagger, among thoſe who were paying their court to the prince. When put to the rack, he confeſſed his deſign of murdering the emperor; but, though cruelly tortured, would never diſcover his accomplices, nor even the motives, which had put him upon that attempt [x].

Plautius returns from Britain.

THE following year, Aulus Vitellius, who was afterwards emperor, and Lucius Vipſanius Poplicola being conſuls, Claudius in quality of cenſor created ſeveral new patrician families, [u] Tacit. c. 20. [w] Suet. c. 24. Dio, p. 685.

[x] Tacit. c. 23.

(M) He was, according to ſome writers, the ſon of a gladiator. When he grew to a man, he attended a Roman quæſtor into Africa, where while he was walking at Adrumetum, in the middle of the day, under a porch, a woman above human ſize appeared before him, and accoſted him with theſe words; Thou, Rufus, ſhalt one day govern this province with proconſular power. Animated with hopes from this preſage, he returned to Rome, where, by the liberality of his friends and his own qualifications, he gained the quæſtorſhip, and afterwards ſtanding for the office of prætor in competition with ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction, carried it by the intereſt of Tiberius, who gave him this encomium: "To me Curtius Rufus ſeems to be deſcended from himſelf." He was, ſays Tacitus, a ſervile flatterer to thoſe above him, but arrogant to his inferiors: he lived to a great age, arrived at the conſulate, obtained triumphal ornaments, was in the end proconſul of Africa, and dying there, fulfilled the preſage. This, according to ſome authors, is the Quintus Curtius, whoſe hiſtory of the exploits of Alexander the great has reached us. Voſſius indeed is of opinion, that this hiſtory was wrote in the reign of Veſpaſian, and not of Claudius; but the arguments, with which he ſupports his opinion, are of no force (37).

(37) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 28.

Gauls admitted into the ſenate.

lies, moſt of thoſe which had been raiſed to that dignity by Romulus, L. Brutus, Julius Cæſar, and Auguſtus, being extinct. He likewiſe ſupplied the vacancies in the ſenate, introducing into that body ſome Æduans, that is, natives of Autun in Gaul, and promoting a decree of the ſenate, qualifying ſuch of the Gauliſh nobility as were Roman citizens to be admitted to the ſenatorial dignity. Such ſenators as were of infamous characters he degraded; but proceeded therein with great tenderneſs, adviſing them to reſign their dignity, that their voluntary abdication might ſoften and hide the infamy of their expulſion. For theſe regulations, the conſul Vipſanius propoſed, That Claudius ſhould be ſtyled "The father of the ſenate;" but he modeſtly declined that title. He then numbered the citizens, who in that ſurvey amounted to ſix millions nine hundred thouſand [y]. This year Claudius was at length acquainted with the diſorders of his wife Meſſalina. She was the daughter of Valerius Meſſala Barbatus the emperor's couſin, and of Domitia Lepida, the grand-daughter of M. Antony and Octavia, Auguſtus's ſiſter; ſo that ſhe was Auguſtus's great niece, as Claudius was his great nephew [z]. We have related ſeveral inſtances of her cruelty, which, however great, fell ſhort of her monſtrous lewdneſs. Her chief favourite was Caius Silius, the moſt comely young man in Rome, with whoſe graceful perſon ſhe was ſo inchanted, that ſhe obliged him to divorce his wife Silana, that ſhe might ingroſs him wholly to herſelf. Silius was not unappriſed of the blackneſs of his crime, and the doom which threatened him; but to withſtand Meſſalina was preſent deſtruction. He therefore complied with her vitious inclination, and the empreſs, far from purſuing her amours privately and by ſtealth, openly frequented his houſe with a numerous train, accompanied him inceſſantly abroad, loaded him with wealth and honours, &c. After ſome time, Silius, apprehenſive of the dangers that hung over him, and judging they were only to be averted by dangerous remedies, told the empreſs, without diſguiſe, that they were gone too far to wait for the prince's death; that deſperate attempts were the only ſecurity in glaring guilt that he had accomplices at hand, and was ready to marry her, and adopt Britannicus. This propoſal, bold beyond all example and almoſt all belief, Meſſalina applauded; and a few

[y] Idem, c. 25. [z] Senec. lud. in Claud. p. 478.

a few days after, the emperor being gone to Oſtia to aſſiſt at a ſacrifice, ſhe married Silius with all the uſual ſolemnities in the face of the ſenate, of the equeſtrian order, of the whole people and ſoldiery. Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dion Caſſius, who relate this memorable incident, being well appriſed how fabulous it would appear, that the emperor's wife ſhould in his life-time dare to eſpouſe another huſband in form, and celebrate with him in the face of the city the nuptial feaſts, declare, that how wonderful ſoever and incredible it may ſeem, they frame no fiction; but only recount what is unqueſtionably true, and what they had learnt from the living and written teſtimony of their fathers. Suetonius tells us, that Meſſalina induced Claudius himſelf to ſign the marriage-contract, as if it were only diſſembled to avert the calamities which certain prodigies portended to hang over his head [a]. Horror ſeized the prince's family, eſpecially thoſe who bore the chief ſway in it. It was no riddle whither ſuch a marriage tended, and they dreaded nothing ſo much as a revolution, which would put an end to their power. On the other hand, when they recollected the ſtupidity of Claudius, his blind attachment to his wife, and the many eminent perſons ſacrificed to her fury, their own apprehenſions deterred them from acquainting him with his public ignominy. Calliſtus and Pallas, the reigning favourites, were ſtill for diſſembling the empreſs's enormities, and frightening her by ſecret menaces from keeping company with her adulterer. Narciſſus thought the emperor ſhould by ſome means or other be immediately acquainted with the monſtrous conduct of his wife; and perſiſting in his opinion, he prevailed by gifts and promiſes upon Calpurnia and Cleopatra, two courteſans in high favour with Claudius, to undertake the diſcovery; which they did the more willingly, as by the fall of Meſſalina they apprehended, that their own authority would be thoroughly eſtabliſhed. Calpurnia therefore, while the emperor was ſtill at Oſtia, upon the firſt occaſion of her being with him in private, falling at his feet, cried out, Meſſalina has married Silius; and at the ſame time aſked Cleopatra, who purpoſely attended to atteſt it, whether ſhe had not found it to be true? Cleopatra confirming it, Claudius, ſtruck with amazement, ordered Narciſſus to be called, who, begging pardon for having concealed from him the diſorders of his wife, told him that he was in a ſtate of divorce; that it was what all men knew; that the nuptials had been celebrated in the face of the city, and that Meſſalina's new huſband, if he made not diſpatch, would be ſovereign of Rome. He then ſent for his moſt truſty friends, particularly for Turrannius, who was charged with the care of providing the city with corn, and next for Luſius Geta, commander of the prætorian guards, and enquired of them. As they avouched it, all who were about Claudius, inſiſted upon his proceeding without delay to the camp, and, by ſecuring the prætorian cohorts, conſult his preſervation before his revenge. Claudius was ſo confounded and diſmayed, that he often aſked whether he was ſtill emperor? whether Silius was yet a private man? In the mean time, Meſſalina was indulging herſelf, without the leaſt apprehenſion, in all manner of diverſions, not imagining, that any one would dare to diſcloſe her diſorders to the emperor, over whom ſhe had ſo mighty a ſway. As it was then in the middle of autumn, ſhe exhibited in her houſe a repreſentation of the vintage, in which her new huſband Silius perſonated Bacchus, being attended by a choir of mock-prieſts and prieſteſſes, among whom was Meſſalina herſelf with a thyrſus in her hand, and her hair looſe and flowing. But in the midſt of their jollity and revels, meſſengers unexpectedly arrived with tidings, that Claudius was appriſed of all, and approached bent upon ſudden vengeance. Hereupon, the company immediately diſperſed in the utmoſt conſternation; Meſſalina betook herſelf to the gardens of Lucullus; and Silius, who was then prætor and conſul elect, to diſſemble his fear, reſumed the offices of the forum. Meſſalina, finding no other reſource, reſolved to quit her retirement, and boldly to meet her huſband, not doubting but ſhe ſhould be able to avert the ſtorm, if ſhe only obtained to be heard. But in the firſt place, ſhe ordered her ſon Britannicus and her daughter Octavia, to go forth, and embracing their father, to implore his mercy for his injured wife: ſhe beſought Vibidia, the oldeſt veſtal, of whom Claudius entertained an high opinion, to do the ſame. She herſelf paſſed through the city on foot, attended only by three perſons, no one ſhewing the leaſt compaſſion for her in her diſgrace. When ſhe was without the walls, not being able to purſue her journey on foot, and finding no other convenience, ſhe was glad to be taken up by a gardener, in his dung-cart, in which, quite forſaken by all her train, ſhe took the road to Their ſecurity.

Meſſalina openly marries Silius.

[a] Suet. c. 29.

She endeavours to appeaſe Claudius.

to Oſtia. The emperor was not yet recovered from his fright, but was ſtill inceſſantly aſking, whether Silius was yet acknowledged emperor: he likewiſe betrayed no ſmall diſtruſt of Geta, commander of his guards; of which Narciſſus, who entertained the ſame diſtruſt, being appriſed, he ſuggeſted to the emperor, that there was no other expedient to preſerve him, than the transferring of the command of his guards upon one of his freedmen for that day only, and offered to undertake it himſelf. Claudius came readily into his propoſal, and Narciſſus, now commander of the prætorian cohorts, took his place as ſuch in the emperor's coach, in order to prevent L. Vitellius and P. Largus Cæcina, who were in the ſame coach, from interceding in favour of Meſſalina. Upon the road, Claudius ſometimes broke out into bitter invectives againſt Meſſalina; at other times ſhewed compaſſion for her and their common children. Vitellius uttered nothing, but O heinous! O the iniquity! which words might be interpreted equally againſt Meſſalina and her accuſers. Narciſſus urged him to ſpeak plain; but gained nothing: Vitellius ſtill anſwered indirectly, and in terms that might be differently conſtrued; and his example was followed by Largus Cæcina. As they drew near the city, Meſſalina unexpectedly appeared in the road, crying aloud with many tears to Claudius, that he would hear the mother of Octavia and Britannicus. Narciſſus no ſooner ſaw her, than to drown her cries, he began to exclaim and ſtorm with great noiſe againſt the impudent and bold conduct of Silius, and the abominations of Meſſalina. At the ſame time, to divert the prince from ſeeing her, he delivered to him a writing, containing a detail of her proſtitutions. As the emperor was entering Rome, ſome attempted to preſent to him his children by her; but Narciſſus ordered them to be conveyed away: he could not, however, remove Vibidia, who inſiſted with great vehemence, that the emperor's wife might not be condemned without being heard; ſo that Narciſſus was obliged to aſſure her, that Meſſalina ſhould be heard, and ſhould have full opportunity of clearing herſelf. He then adviſed the veſtal to withdraw, and attend the ſacred functions of her office. As for Claudius, he kept the whole time a wonderful ſilence, and Vitellius pretended to be amazed; ſo that Narciſſus controuled all things. By his command the houſe of the adulterer was opened, and the emperor carried thither. As he entered the porch, Narciſſus ſhewed him the ſtatue of Silius

The conduct of Narciſſus.

Meſſalina meets the emperor.

He is incenſed againſt her by Narciſſus.

Silius the father ſtanding there, though the ſenate had by a decree ordered it to be broken; for he had been arraigned under Tiberius of treaſon, as we have related in his reign: in the houſe he ſhewed him the rich furniture of the imperial palace, the monuments of his wife's proſtitution and his own diſgrace. Having thus worked him up to threats and fury, he led him without delay to the camp, where by Narciſſus's direction he made a ſhort ſpeech to the ſoldiery, who with a general clamour demanded that the criminals might be immediately executed. Hereupon Silius and ſeveral others, whom Narciſſus had cauſed to be arreſted, were brought before the imperial tribunal; and being convicted as accomplices of Meſſalina's proſtitutions, were all dragged to execution. Silius, without offering any thing in his defence, only begged they would diſpatch him ſoon.

Silius and her other adulterers executed.

Mneſter, the player, who had been likewiſe one of Meſſalina's gallants, created ſome heſitation. He tore off his garments, and deſired the emperor to behold the marks of the ſtripes he had endured, before he could be brought to comply with Meſſalina's impure ſolicitations; he reminded him at the ſame time of his own commands, obliging him to gratify Meſſalina without reſerve (N), adding, that others

(N) Meſſalina finding ſhe could neither by threats nor promiſes induce Mneſter to comply with her impure ſollicitations, had at length recourſe to ſtripes, and cauſed him to be inhumanly ſcourged; but to no effect, Mneſter dreading to incur the diſpleaſure of the emperor, which he apprehended would ſooner, or later, prove fatal to him, if he granted Meſſalina her requeſt; for her abominations were now ſo public, that he imagined Claudius could not be much longer unappriſed of them. Hereupon the lewd proſtitute, bent upon ſatisfying at all events the paſſion ſhe had conceived for the player; What if the emperor himſelf, ſaid ſhe, ſhould command you to gratify me in what I require? I ſhould, without heſitation, replied Mneſter, obey the emperor's commands. Meſſalina flew to the emperor, and complained to him of the player, who, ſhe ſaid, had unmannerly refuſed her a ſmall favour. Claudius immediately ſent for Mneſter, reprimanded him with great ſeverity, and commanded him to gratify his wife without reſerve. He obeyed, and now alledges this command as a powerful motive to induce Claudius to grant him his life (38). But Narciſſus urging, that his crime was of ſuch enormous malignity, that it availed not how he had committed it, he was executed upon the ſpot.

(38) Dio, l. lx.

thers had been tempted to offend by great preſents, or mighty promiſes; but his offence was owing only to compulſion. Theſe conſiderations biaſſed Claudius to mercy; but his freedmen diſſuading him from ſaving a player after ſo many illuſtrious ſacrifices, Mneſter was condemned and executed with Traulus Montanus, a young knight of extraordinary modeſty and comelineſs, whom Meſſalina had forced to paſs only one night with her, and afterwards caſt off, her paſſion being, as Tacitus obſerves, with equal wantonneſs inflamed and ſurfeited [a].

Claudius ſeems to relent.

When theſe executions were over, Claudius returned to the palace, where he paſſed the beſt part of the night in feaſting and revelling with his freedmen. Being warm with wine, for he uſually drank very plentifully, he ordered one of his attendants to go and acquaint the unhappy woman, for theſe terms he is ſaid to have uſed, that ſhe ſhould attend the next day and plead her cauſe. She was then in the gardens of Lucullus, whither ſhe had retired, finding ſhe could have no acceſs to Claudius, and was there buſy in compoſing a memorial, which ſhe deſigned to preſent to the prince, not without hopes of moving him to compaſſion. But Narciſſus, alarmed at the meſſage he ſent her and obſerving that his reſentment viſibly abated, and his uſual affliction began to return, ran haſtily forth, and directed the tribunes and centurions then upon duty to diſpatch Meſſalina; for ſuch was the emperor's expreſs command. With them he ſent one Evodus a freedman, in whom he could confide, charging him to ſee his orders ſtrictly fulfilled; for he apprehended, and indeed not without reaſon, ſince Claudius began to relent, that the doom which he had prepared for Meſſalina, would, if ſhe lived to the next day, rebound upon his own head. Evodus flew in a moment to the gardens, where he found her lying upon the ground, and her mother Lepida ſitting by her. He immediately acquainted her with her doom, and at the ſame time abuſed her with all the brutal invectives of a ſlave. Her mother encouraged her not to wait the blow of the executioner; but, ſince ſhe could not prolong her life, to die with renown. Hereupon, laying hold of a dagger, ſhe aimed, with a trembling hand, firſt at her throat, and then at her breaſt; but had not courage and reſolution enough enough for such an attempt. The tribune therefore, who stood before her, without ever opening his mouth, observing her timidity and irresolution, delivered her from her anxiety and fears, by running her through with his sword. Thus just vengeance overtook her at last, in the very gardens for which she had sacrificed, as we have related above, the brave Valerius Asiaticus. She was of all women recorded in history, if not the most lewd, the most amazingly bold in pursuit of her lewdness [b]. Claudius was still at table, when word was brought him, that Messalina was dead; but without any particulars, whether she had suffered by her own, or by the executioner's, hand. Neither did he make any enquiries, but, calling for a bowl of wine, continued the banquet with his usual gaiety, without betraying either then, or in the following days, any symptoms of hatred, joy, anger, sorrow, or any other human passion or affection, tho' he beheld the enemies of his wife triumphing over her death, and his children bewailing with many tears the violent end of their mother [c]. Nay, Suetonius assures us, that, as he was a few days after supping with some of his friends, he asked, why his wife Messalina came not to supper? Many other instances of the like almost incredible forgetfulness, or rather stupidity, are related by the same writer and by Dion Cassius [d].

Narciſſus haſtens her execution.

[a] Tacit. c 30——36. Dio, p. 674. Suet. c. 29. Senec. lud. in Claud.

Her death.

The stupidity of Claudius.

Upon the death of Messalina, Claudius publicly declared, that since he had been so unfortunate in his marriages, he would live a single life for the future: nay, he gave every Roman leave to put him to death, if he continued not in that resolution. But, notwithstanding these protestations, he soon changed his mind, and, not remembering what he had said, declared his intention of marrying. Hereupon great strife and emulation arose among the imperial freedmen, which of them should chuse a wife for one, who had been ever governed by his wives. Callistus proposed to him Lollia Paulina, daughter of M. Lollius, a consular. Pallas recommended Julia Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus; and Narcissus employed all his interest in behalf of Ælia Petina, whom he had divorced before upon a slight trivial occasion. Claudius himself was now bent upon one, then upon another, and always led by his last adviser. Being thus undetermined and perplexed, he at length called together gether his counſellors, ordering them to declare and defend in his preſence their different opinions (O). Claudius heard them all with great attention; but was moſt affected with the arguments of Pallas, enforced by the careſſes and allurements of Agrippina, who, under colour of conſanguinity, was aſſiduous in her viſits to her uncle. This princeſs ſo famous in hiſtory for her ambition and misfortunes, was the daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina the elder, whoſe courage and chaſtity we have often had occaſion to celebrate. Tiberius married her, in the fourteenth year of his reign, to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom ſhe had a ſon named L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who ſucceeded Claudius, and is known by the name of Nero. Upon the death of her huſband, ſhe abandoned herſelf to all manner of lewdneſs, and was on the point of being puniſhed by her brother Caligula. Claudius recalled her when ſhe married to her ſecond huſband Criſpus Paſſienus, one of an illuſtrious family, and ſoon after murdered him, to enjoy the rich inheritance to which he had named her in his will. She was in high favour with Claudius, even in Meſſalina's time; and therefore would have been ſacrificed, as well as her ſiſter Julia, to her jealouſy, had not the empreſs been diverted from

Claudius declares his intention to marry again.

[b] Tacit. c. 37. Dio, p. 674. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Suet. ibid.

And prefers his niece Agrippina to all others,

(O) Narciſſus alledged in favour of Ælia Petina the emperor's former marriage with her, and their common daughter, for by her he had Antonia; and that, by recalling one who had already been his wife, he would introduce no innovation into his family, but a wife, who would not exerciſe the hatred of a ſtep-mother towards Britannicus and Octavia, ſince they were ſo nearly allied to her own children. Calliſtus urged, that to recall her after ſo long a divorce and diſlike, would be the very means to heighten her indignation and pride; that Lollia was a much more eligible match, for having no iſſue of her own, ſhe was void of every motive of emulation to his, and conſequently would uſe her ſtep-children with the tenderneſs of a real mother. Pallas recommended Agrippina from the following conſiderations; that with her ſhe would bring the grandſon of Germanicus, and was herſelf worthy of imperial fortune, noble in her deſcent, of tried fruitfulneſs, and in the prime of her age; that by this match would be prevented her carrying into another houſe the illuſtrious blood of the Cæſars (39).

(39) Tacit. c. 2.

from it, by other purſuits [e]. Claudius no ſooner ſhewed himſelf inclined to marry his niece, but ſhe began, as if already married, to exerciſe the power and authority of a wife. Her firſt purpoſe was, to concert a match between her ſon Domitius and Octavia, the emperor's daughter; but Octavia had ſome time ſince been by her father bethrothed to Lucius Silanus, a youth of great quality, and no leſs beloved and eſteemed by Claudius. However, as the weak prince had no judgment, nor choice, nor averſion or affection, but ſuch as were inſpired by others, Vitellius, foreſeeing in whoſe hands the ſovereignty was haſtening, in order to purchaſe the favour of Agrippina, began to deviſe crimes againſt Silanus. That young nobleman had a ſiſter, by name Junia Silana, a lady of extraordinary beauty, and no leſs gaiety; and hence Vitellius, then cenſor, took the accuſation, wreſting to a charge of inceſt the mutual affection of brother and ſiſter; an affection no ways inceſtuous, but ſomewhat too free and unguarded; for while Junia was by others ſtyled Venus on account of her beauty, Silanus choſe, we know not why, to call her Juno, who was both ſiſter and wife to Jupiter. This the infamous ſycophant Vitellius laid hold of; and having firſt prejudiced the undiſcerning emperor againſt the innocent youth, quite unappriſed of any plots againſt him, he ſoon after, in quality of cenſor, degraded him from the rank of a ſenator, tho' the ſenate had been already reviewed, and the number of ſenators fixed a good while before; nay he obliged him by an edict to renounce his prætorſhip though it was of courſe to expire the next day, conferring it for that day upon Eprius Marcellus. Silanus being thus marked with infamy, Claudius broke off the match between him and Octavia [f].

Lucius Silanus diſgraced.

The next conſuls were C. Pompeius Longinus Gallus and Q. Veranius Nepos. Tho' Claudius and Agrippina lived publicly together, yet they durſt not celebrate their nuptials, there being no inſtance among the Romans of a marriage between an uncle and a niece; but that ſcruple was removed by Vitellius, who having firſt prevailed, without much trouble, upon Claudius to promiſe, that he would ſubmit to the authority of the ſenate and the unanimous voice of the people, eaſily perſuaded both orders to approve of the marriage

The ſenate and people approve of Claudius's marriage with Agrippina.

[e] Suet. in Ner. c. 6, 7. Tacit. c. 12, 13. [f] Tacit. c. Dio, p. 677. Suet. c. 29.

riage; nay, some of the senators declared, that, if the emperor delayed longer, they would compel him. Claudius then yielded; but nevertheless did not celebrate the nuptials, till the senate passed a decree, declaring for ever marriages lawful between uncles and their brothers daughters. But notwithstanding this general law, no one followed the example of Claudius, except one Roman knight, by name Titus Alledius Severus, and he only, as was believed, to court the favour of Agrippina. This law was afterwards revoked by the emperor Nerva, as was that legitimating the inter-marriage of cousin-germans, long unknown to the Romans, by Theodosius the Great. The day after the decree of the senate was published, Claudius celebrated his nuptials with the usual solemnity: and on the same day Silanus slew himself, [illegible] choice or constraint, is uncertain. His sister J[illegible]nished Italy; and to her sentence Claudius added an ord[illegible] to the pontiffs, enjoining them to offer expiatory sacrifices in the grove of Diana; a source of mockery to all men, says Tacitus, that penalties and lustrations should be appointed for a pretended incest, while real incest was established by law [g]. From this time the city assumed a different face, all men tamely obeying a woman, who did not, like Messalina, render the Roman state subservient only to her wanton and lewd amours, but to her insatiable avarice, unbounded ambition, and unparallelled cruelty. She governed all, and the emperor himself, without controul; appeared with him in the senate; placed herself by him on the same tribunal in all public ceremonies; gave, together with him, audience to foreign princes and embassadors; and did not even abandon him in the courts of justice, which to the Romans was a sight altogether new [h].

Seneca recalled from exile.

To signalize the beginning, we may say, of her reign, with some plausible action, she prevailed upon Claudius, not only to recal from exile, but to honour with the prætorship, L. Annæus Seneca, a man by all greatly esteemed on account of his eloquence and accomplishments. But in this she had also her private views, which were the education of her son Domitius under such a master, and the use of his counsels in the pursuit of his ambitious designs; for she did not doubt, but Seneca would, out of gratitude, continue faithfully attached to her, and maintain, for all his philosophy, an [g] Idem, c. 8. Senec. lud. in Claud. Dio, p. 687.

[h] Tacit. c. 8.

an irreconcileable hatred to Claudius, by whom he had been baniſhed [k]; and truly his hatred appears but too plainly in his writings. Not long after, Agrippina, purſuing her ambitious deſigns, gained by vaſt promiſes Memmius Pollio, conſul elect, to move the ſenate, that they would unanimouſly beſeech Claudius to bethroth Octavia to Domitius. To this, which was a great ſtep towards the ſovereignty, the ſenate readily agreed; and Claudius, not appriſed of his aſpiring views, with the ſame readineſs conſented. Thus was Domitius, by the efforts and devices of his mother, raiſed almoſt to an equality with Britannicus. He was born on the fifteenth of December in the thirty-ſeventy year of the chriſtian æra; ſo that he was in the beginning of this, the forty-ninth, entered into the twelfth year of his age [l]. In the next place, Agrippina, no leſs implacable in her hatred, than ambitious in her views, being enraged at Lollia Paulina, for having aſpired to the emperor's bed, framed crimes againſt her, and ſuborned an accuſer, who charged her with conſulting the magicians and Chaldeans about the match. Claudius, without hearing her, repreſented her ſuppoſed guilt to the ſenate, and required, that her eſtate might be confiſcated, and ſhe baniſhed Italy [m]. But Agrippina, not ſatisfied with this puniſhment, ſent privately a tribune, with orders to cut off her head, and bring it to her. The tribune obeyed; and Agrippina is ſaid to have with her own hands opened the mouth of the deceaſed, that from her teeth, which had ſomething, we know not what, very ſingular, ſhe might be well aſſured it was her head [n] (P). Calpurnia, Octavia bethrothed to Domitius.

Lollia Paulina put to death.

[k] Tacit. ibid. [l] Suet. in Ner. c. 6. [m] Tacit. c. 22. [n] Dio, p. 686.

(P) Lollia Paulina was firſt married to Memmius Regulus, governor of Greece and Macedon, from whom ſhe was forced by Caligula, who took her to himſelf. She was grand-daughter to M. Lollius appointed by Auguſtus governor to Caius Cæſar, when he was ſent into the eaſt. Claudius, in repreſenting her pretended guilt to the ſenate, touched upon her noble deſcent, telling the ſenators, that by her mother ſhe was niece to Lucius Voluſius; that Cotta Meſſalinus was her great-uncle; that ſhe herſelf was once the wife of Memmius Regulus, &c. but of her marriage with Caligula he ſaid nothing. He added, that ſhe purſued pernicious deſigns, and muſt be deveſted of the means and opportunities of putting them in execution. Upon this her immenſe wealth was confiſcated, Calpurnia, another woman of great diſtinction, was likewiſe doomed to ruin, becauſe the prince had praiſed her beauty; but as this was from no paſſion for her perſon, but only in occaſional diſcourſe, her life was ſpared. This year to the ſenators of Narbonne Gaul was granted the ſame privilege with thoſe of Sicily, of viſiting their eſtates there, without aſking leave of the prince. The ſame year the countries of Iturea and Judæa were, upon the death of their kings, Sohemus and Agrippa, annexed to the government of Syria. About the end of the year, Claudius widened the circumference of Rome, incloſing, according to Onuphrius [o], mount Aventine. We are told, that ſuch only as had extended the limits of the empire, were, in virtue of an antient inſtitution, empowered to enlarge alſo the bounds of the city [p]. This power Claudius probably claimed, in regard of his having conquered part of Britain. As for the troubles which happened this year in the kingdoms of Parthia and Boſphorus, we refer our readers to the account we have given of them in our hiſtory of thoſe countries (Q). Rome enlarged.

THE following year, C. Antiſtius Vetus and M. Suilius Nervilianus being conſuls, the freed-man Pallas, who had conducted the late marriage of Agrippina, and was now engaged in a criminal correſpondence with her, and thence wholly addicted to her intereſt, perſuaded Claudius to adopt, in preference to his own ſon, Domitius for his eldeſt, becauſe he was three years older than Britannicus (R). From this confiſcated, and only about thirty-thouſand pounds of our money left her. Tacitus tells us, that the tribune diſpatched by Agrippina had orders to compel her to lay violent hands on herſelf (40).

[o] Onuph. in faſt. p. 101. [p] Tacit. c. 23.

(Q) Phlegon, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter, tells us, that this year, the ninth of Claudius's reign, a woman was delivered at Rome of an ape (41).

(R) Tacitus tells us, that it was obſerved by perſons ſkilled in antiquity, that never was any adoption made before this into the patrician family of the Claudii; which, from Attus Clauſus, called this time Domitius was named Nero Claudius Cæſar Druſus Germanicus (S). This adoption was applauded by the ſenate, and a decree paſſed confirming it, and conferring upon Agrippina the ſublime title of Auguſta.

(40) Idem, c. 22. (41) Phleg. de reb. memorabil. c. 22.

The hard treatment of Britannicus.

However, there was no Roman ſo void of compaſſion, as not to be affected with the hard lot of the unhappy Britannicus, called afterwards Appius Claudius, the firſt who ſettled at Rome, had ſubſiſted upon its own ſtock. Lipſius is not at all pleaſed with this obſervation; but urges againſt it the adoption of Germanicus. However, being prompted by his good nature to excuſe the miſtake, he acquaints us, that Tiberius, when he adopted Germanicus, was not himſelf of the Claudian, but of the Julian family; a poor quibble indeed, and altogether unworthy of ſo learned a critic! It is ſurpriſing, that a writer of ſuch penetration ſhould thus miſtake the meaning of Tacitus, tho' conveyed to him in the plaineſt terms. Some obſerved, ſays the hiſtorian, that never was any adoption made before this into the patrician family of the Claudii, &c. Could Lipſius poſſibly ſuppoſe Germanicus to have been adopted by Tiberius into the Claudian family? We cannot think him capable of entertaining a notion ſo notoriouſly abſurd, ſince Germanicus, Tiberius's own brother's ſon, was, as is manifeſt, by birth, and without any adoption, of the Claudian family. On the other hand, if he does not ſuppoſe him to have been adopted by Tiberius into the Claudian family, but only for his ſon, as he truly was, to what purpoſe can he alledge ſuch an adoption againſt thoſe who obſerved, to the glory of the Claudian family, that it had ſubſiſted upon its own ſtock, ſince its firſt ſettling at Rome, to the adoption of Domitius Ahenobarbus? Beſides, if Tiberius was himſelf no longer of the Claudian, but of the Julian, family, how could he adopt Germanicus into the former? That Tacitus meant not ſuch an adoption as that of Germanicus, but an adoption into the family, is evident both from the context in that writer, and from Suetonius, who tells us that Claudius, when he adopted young Domitius, publicly declared, that no one had ever before been adopted into the Claudian family (42). But "quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus."

(S) Suetonius tells us, that, when Domitius was born, Caligula being deſired by his ſiſter Agrippina to give the child what name he thought proper, the emperor, fixing his eyes upon Claudius, gave him, by way of raillery, his name; which Agrippina took much amiſs, Claudius being at that time the laughing-ſtock of the court; but now ſhe eſteems both herſelf and her ſon highly honoured with a name which ſhe then deſpiſed (43).

(42) Suet. in Claud. c. 39. (43) Suet. in Ner. c. 6.

nicus, whom Agrippina, under colour of tenderneſs for him, kept locked up in a nurſery, tho' now nine years old. By degrees ſhe removed from him his former attendants, and even cauſed ſome of them to be put to death; among the reſt his preceptor Soſibius, putting in their room perſons who were entirely at her devotion, ſhe would never allow him to appear abroad, or even to wait upon his father, giving out, that he was diſordered in his ſenſes, and troubled with the falling ſickneſs. Not long after the adoption of Nero, Britannicus having ſaluted him, as he was uſed to do before, by the name of Ahenobarbus, Nero reſented it to ſuch a degree, that he endeavoured to perſuade the emperor, that he was a ſuppoſititious child. This year Agrippina, to diſplay her power at Rome in foreign countries, procured a colony of veterans to be ſent to the capital of the Ubii, a town in which ſhe had been born, and which ſhe called by her own name Colonia Agrippinenſis. The city is now known by the name of Cologn [p]. About the ſame time the Catti, of whom we have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of Tiberius, made incurſions into the Roman territories; but were repulſed with great ſlaughter by Pomponius Secundus, commander of the legions in Upper Germany, who on that occaſion, releaſed from bondage ſome Romans who had continued in it ever ſince the maſſacre of Varus and his legions. His vigilance and gallant conduct ſeemed to the ſenate worthy of triumphal ornaments, which were decreed him accordingly; but he did not derive ſo much glory from them, as from his elegant poems, which are greatly cried up by the beſt judges of antiquity [q]. It was at this time too, that Vannius, whom Druſus the ſon of Tiberius had thirty years before created king of the Suevians, was driven out by the Hermundurians and Ligians. Claudius, tho' he had declined engaging in a quarrel among the barbarians, yet granted a ſafe refuge to the depoſed king, and lands in Pannonia both to him and his followers. Vangio and Sido, his own ſiſter's ſons, parted his kingdom between them, and ever continued faithful to the Romans [r].

Colonia Agrippinenſis.

THE following year, Claudius being the fifth time conſul

[p] Tacit. c. 26. Suet. in Ner. c. 7. Dio, p. 667. [q] Tacit. c. 28. [r] Idem. c. 29.

Nero takes the manly robe.

with Servius Cornelius Orfitus (T), Nero, though not yet fourteen, was preſented with the manly robe, which qualified him for honours and employments. At the ſame time, the ſenate, with the concurrence of Claudius, decreed, that in his twentieth year he might diſcharge the conſulſhip, and in the mean time, as conſul deſigned, be inveſted with proconſular authority out of Rome, and be ſtyled prince of the Roman youth. Claudius moreover beſtowed, in Nero's name, a largeſs upon the ſoldiery, and another upon the people; and to draw the eyes and affections of the people upon him, made him appear at the circenſian games, which were then ſolemnized, in a triumphal robe, the mark and ornament of the imperial ſtate, while Britannicus was carried about in his prætexta, the uſual habit of children. Some of the tribunes and centurions could not help pitying the unhappy youth; but they were all, under various pretences, ſoon removed from the palace; even ſuch of the young prince's freed-men, as were found inviolably attached to his perſon and intereſt, were partly diſcharged, and partly put to death, as if they had inſpired their patron with hatred and emulation againſt Nero, which might in the end flame out into war and public ruin. Upon their removal, Britannicus was committed to the government of others, choſen by his ſtep-mother. The next ſtep, which Agrippina took towards the accompliſhment of her great deſign was, the removing of Luſius Geta and Rufus Criſpinus from the command of the prætorian cohorts. She imagined them grateful to the memory of Meſſalina, and thence zealouſly devoted to her children. She therefore alledged to the emperor, that by the cabals and emulation of two commanders, the guards were

(T) Claudius held this his laſt conſulſhip ſix months (44). Onuphrius adds to his collegue's other names that of Scipio (45), and truly the Orfiti ſeem to have to have been of the family of the Scipios (46). C. Minucius or Minicius Fundanus, and C. Verbenius Severus, were ſubſtituted in the conſulſhip to Claudius and Orfitus (47). Veſpaſian, who was afterwards emperor, was conſul for the two laſt months of this year, as we read in Suetonius (48).

(44) Suet. c. 4. (45) Onuph. in faſt. (46) Grut. p. 1
(47) Onuph. ibid. (48) Suet. in Veſp. c. 4.

were rent into factions; whereas by the authority of one, they would be more eaſily kept to their duty. Hereupon Claudius without any further enquiry, transferred the command of the prætorian bands on Burrhus Afranius, whom ſhe recommended, an officer highly eſteemed by the ſoldiery, but well appriſed to whom he owed his preferment. And now Agrippina began to aſſume a more haughty deportment than ever; ſhe entered the capitol in a chariot, a diſtinction granted to none but prieſts. This, however, heightened the reverence of the people towards one, who was, without example, the daughter of a Cæſar, the mother of one, ſiſter to the late emperor, and wife to the preſent. But in the mean time, her chief companion, L. Vitellius, was by a ſenator named Junius Lupus, accuſed of high treaſon; and Claudius, ever timorous, would have hearkened to the charge, had not Agrippina, by menaces rather than entreaties, turned his reſentment againſt the accuſer, who was baniſhed, Vitellius deſiring no further puniſhment [s]. This year, a great famine raged in Rome, and the populace not confining their complaints to houſes and corners, gathered in tumultuous crouds round the prince, while he was publicly adminiſtering juſtice, and drove him to the extremity of the forum; inſomuch, that with the utmoſt difficulty he eſcaped their violence, his guards opening him a way through the outrageous multitude [t]. Suetonius tells us, that he was not only reviled with opprobrious language by the enraged populace, but ſo pelted with cruſts of bread, that he narrowly eſcaped being killed [u]. However, inſtead of reſenting ſuch baſe treatment, he took ſuch effectual care to have the city ſupplied with corn, that in leſs than fifteen days no one had occaſion to complain, that winter happening to prove exceeding mild and favourable. That the city might not again be reduced to ſuch diſtreſs, he gave all poſſible encouragement to merchants, granted ample privileges to ſuch as built trading veſſels, and took upon himſelf to make good all the loſſes they ſhould ſuffer.

Burrhus Afranius appointed commander of the prætorian guards.

A famine at Rome.

THIS year, the tenth of Claudius's reign, the proprætor, P. Oſtorius Scapula, landing in Britain (U), was obliged, ſoon Farther conqueſts in Britain.

[s] Idem, c. 42. [t] Idem, c 43. [u] Suet. c. 18.

(U) Aulus Plautius left Britain, and returned to Rome, according to Dion Caſſius, in the ſixth year of Claudius's reign: whereas ſoon after his arrival, though the ſeaſon was already far advanced, to take the field againſt the Britons, who broke into the territories of the friends and allies of Rome with ſo much the more violence and confidence, as they ſuppoſed that a new general, not yet acquainted with his army, would not in the beginning of winter dare to take the field and make head againſt them. But Oſtorius, who was an officer of great experience, being well appriſed, that by the firſt events of war confidence or conſternation was raiſed in an enemy, led forth ſuch cohorts as were next at hand, fell unexpectedly upon the unwary Britons with great ſlaughter, and purſued ſuch as were broken ſo cloſe as to prevent their rejoining. Then, as he could not depend upon a peace made by conſtraint, and therefore not ſincere, he deprived of their arms thoſe whom he ſuſpected, and by means of ſeveral forts on the Severn and the two Avons, one of which is alſo called the Nen, he endeavoured to reſtrain the enemy from making any farther inroads into the territories of the Roman allies. This the Iceni, that is, the inhabitants of the preſent counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon could not brook. They were a powerful people, and not weakened by any wars or invaſions; for they had of their own accord entered into an alliance with the Romans. Being therefore joined by the bordering nations, they ſoon raiſed a conſiderable army, and encamped in a place defended by a ditch, and narrow lanes not paſſable by the horſe. Oſtorius, though not yet joined by his legions, reſolved to attack them; and accordingly, having drawn up his auxiliaries and diſmounted his cavalry, he advanced in good order to attack the enemy's ruſtic fortifications. The ditch was ſoon forced, and the Britons put in diſorder, being hampered and entangled with their own incloſures. However, as they were cooped in on all ſides, and no way was left for them to eſcape, being as Oſtorius did not arrive in that iſland, as is evident from Tacitus, till three years after. Hence it is plain, that between Plautius and Oſtorius was another governor of this country, whom authors have not mentioned, probably becauſe he performed nothing worthy of notice.

The Iceni defeated.

[w] Suet. ibid.

being animated with deſpair, they performed many feats of bravery. In this battle M. Oſtorius, the ſon of the general, acquired the civic crown, by ſaving the life of a Roman citizen. The Iceni being thus overcome, and thoſe unſettled ſpirits, who had hitherto wavered between peace and war, calmed by their overthrow, Oſtorius, advanced into the country of the Cangi, probably the preſent counties of Shropſhire and Cheſhire, laying waſte their territories, and committing general ſpoil, till he approached the Iriſh ſea, when commotions begun among the Brigantes, the inhabitants of Lancaſhire, Yorkſhire, the biſhopric of Durham, and the counties of Cumberland and Weſtmorland, drew him back; for the Brigantes had ſubmitted to him before, probably by their deputies, after the overthrow of the Iceni; and the Roman general was determined to proſecute no new enterprize, till his former ones were completed and ſecure. The chief authors of the diſturbance were executed, and the reſt pardoned, which put a ſtop to any farther attempts of the Brigantes. But the Silures, the inhabitants of South-Wales, would hearken to no terms. Oſtorius therefore reſolved to lead his legions againſt them; but firſt conveyed a numerous colony of veterans to Camalodunum, in order to keep the conquered countries in awe, and inure the Roman allies to the laws and juriſdiction of Rome. To Cogidunus, a Britiſh king, and a great friend to the Romans, certain cities were given, to attach him ſtill more to their intereſt; for it was a cuſtom, as Tacitus obſerves *, practiſed in the earlieſt ages by the Roman people, to employ even kings as their inſtruments in eſtabliſhing bondage on nations. After theſe precautions, Oſtorius marched with all his forces againſt the Silures, a people reſolute and fierce by nature, and moreover confiding in the valour and conduct of Caractacus, whom many proſperous, and many doubtful ſucceſſes had rendered famous, and raiſed in renown above all the other Britiſh commanders. As he was better acquainted with the country than the Romans, but inferior to them in number of his troops, he wiſely removed the ſeat of the war into the territories of the Ordovices, now North-Wales. There he choſe a place, againſt which it was difficult to advance, and from which it was no leſs difficult to retire; every way incommodious

They ſubmit.

The Brigantes reduced.

A Roman colony ſettled at Camalodunum.

The Romans march againſt the Silures.

* Tacit. in vit. Agr. c. 4.

modious to the Romans, and every way favourable to his own men; for it was upon the ridges of exceeding ſteep mountains, the ſides of which, where approachable, he fortified with walls of ſtone; at the foot of the mountains flowed a river, dangerous to be forded, and the walls, which he had reared, were defended by numerous bodies of his braveſt men. The place, as Camden conjectures, had thence the name of Caer Caradoc, which is a ſteep hill on the weſt borders of Shropſhire, at the foot of which runs the river Clun: Caradoc in the Britiſh tongue is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Caractacus in Latin. Oſtorius having drawn hither all his forces, ſince the Britiſh commander was reſolved to put the whole to the deciſion of the ſword, began to advance in battle-array towards the enemy. At his approach the leaders of the ſeveral confederate nations, who had joined Caractacus, ran from rank to rank, animating their followers with repreſentations proper to diſpel fear, and rouſe in their breaſts a martial ardor. As for Caractacus, he flew through the whole army, proclaiming, wherever he paſſed, that from this day, from this battle, they muſt date their liberty completely recovered, or their ſlavery eternally eſtabliſhed: he put them in mind of the glorious feats of their anceſtors, who had driven out Cæſar the dictator, and by whoſe valour they yet lived free from tribute and the Roman axes, yet preſerved the perſons of their wives and children from diſhonour. His harangue was anſwered by loud ſhouts and acclamations, which were echoed and doubled by the neighbouring woods and mountains. In the end, every one bound himſelf by the moſt ſacred oath amongſt them, never to yield to force or wounds. The reſolute alacrity of the enemy ſtartled the Roman general, eſpecially when he diſcovered the river before him, the ramparts raiſed upon its banks, the ſteepneſs of the mountains filled with men hanging almoſt over their heads, and in ſhort the moſt diſmal and threatening ſcene of war he had ever beheld. But the ſoldiers preſſed for the attack, crying out, all difficulties are ſurmountable by courage. Oſtorius therefore, having carefully ſurveyed the ground, and tried where the river was fordable, and where not, ordered the trumpets to ſound, and his legionaries to advance. They gained without much difficulty the oppoſite bank; but as they approached the rampart, they were galled with inceſſant ſhowers of darts, which did great execution, till forming themſelves into a teſtudo, they demoliſhed the wall, which Caractacus oppoſes the Romans.

Engages Oſtorius the Roman general.

which covered the enemy, and encountered them, hand to hand, upon ground equal to both. Then the Britons, not able to ſtand the ſhock of the legions, betook themſelves to the ridges of the mountains, where they made a ſtand againſt the Romans, who purſued them; but as they covered themſelves with no armour, and only fought with diſcharges of arrows, the Romans cloſing with them, eaſily broke their ranks, put them to flight and gained a complete victory. The wife and daughter of Caractacus were taken priſoners, and his brothers ſurrendered at diſcretion. He himſelf had recourſe to the protection of Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes; but as all things conſpire againſt the unfortunate, he was by her delivered in bonds to the conquerors, according to Tacitus in the ninth, but by a more exact computation in the ſeventh, year, after the commencement of the war in Britain; ſo long had he ſuſtained it; and hence his renown, ſays Tacitus, had reached all the iſlands, ſpread over the neighbouring countries, and was celebrated even in Italy, and at Rome, where all longed to behold the brave commander, who had for ſo many years defied the arms, and baffled all the attempts of the Romans. He was immediately ſent to Claudius, who received him in a kind of triumph. As he drew near the city, the people were ſummoned, as to ſome ſolemn ſpectacle, to ſee the illuſtrious captive; as he paſſed by, the prætorian guards ſtood under arms in the field before their camp. Before the Britiſh king marched his ſervants and followers, carrying the gold chains and military ornaments, which he had taken in the wars with his neighbours; next his brothers, his wife, and daughters; and laſtly, himſelf expoſed to view. All but he appeared dejected, and deſcended to ſupplications unworthy of their rank and character. The king himſelf, without betraying the leaſt fear, or uttering a word that implored mercy, being brought before the emperor, who was ſeated on his tribunal, addreſſed him thus:

But is defeated.

And delivered up to the Romans by the queen of the Brigantes and ſent to Rome.

"If my moderation in proſperity and ſucceſs had been equal "to my quality and fortune, I ſhould have arrived in this city
"under another character, that of a friend, and not a cap"tive; nor would you have diſdained to receive into terms
"of alliance a prince, deſcended from illuſtrious anceſtors, and "ruling over ſo many nations. But different is my preſent
"lot, a lot, which reflects no leſs glory upon you, than diſ-
"grace and reproach upon me. I was lately maſter of "men and arms, horſes and treaſures; and where is the "wonder, that I was unwilling to loſe them, that I ſtrove to "retain them? Though you, Romans, aim at extending

His ſpeech to Claudius.

"your

" your dominion over all mankind, it does not thence fol" low, that all men will readily and voluntarily ſubmit to " the yoke. Had I immediately yielded, my misfortune
" would have been leſs remarkable, your conqueſt leſs re" nowned: even now, if I am to ſuffer death, the fame
" of my reſiſtance and your victory will die with me; but " if you preſerve my life, I ſhall be a living monument of " your clemency". Claudius, compaſſionating the misfor-tunes of ſo brave a man, and admiring the conſtancy with which he bore them, generouſly granted to him, to his wife his daughter, and brothers both their lives and liberty. Being releaſed from their chains, they firſt paid their duty and acknowledgment to the prince, and next to Agrippina, who was ſeated upon another tribunal cloſe to the emperor's [x]. We are told, that Caractacus being aſked, after he had viewed the city of Rome, which was then in the height of its beauty and grandeur, what he thought of that ſtately metropolis? returned the following judicious anſwer: I am amazed that men, who have ſuch magnificent habitations of their own, ſhould leave them, and come ſo far to bereave us Britons of our poor cottages [y]. In the ſenate many pompous encomiums were pronounced upon the taking of Caractacus, ſome of the ſenators extolling it as an event no leſs illuſtrious, than the taking of Syphax by P. Scipio, or of Perſes by Lucius Paulus. To Oſtorius, who continued in Britain, triumphal ornaments were decreed.

Who grants him his life and liberty.

THUS far the adminiſtration of Oſtorius had proved ſucceſsful; but now his fortune began to change; whether it was, that upon the captivity of Caractacus the Romans thought the war concluded, and thence grew leſs vigilant, or that the Britons enraged, rather than diſheartened, at the loſs of their king, ſtrove more vehemently to revenge it. However that be, the Silures fell by ſurpriſe upon the prefect of the camp and ſome legionary cohorts, whom Oſtorius had left to rear forts in their country; and would have cut them all in pieces, had they not received timely aſſiſtance from the neighbouring garriſons: as it was, the prefect himſelf, eight centurions, and a great number of the moſt reſolute ſoldiers were ſlain. Soon after they routed the Roman foragers and the troops ſent to ſupport them. Hereupon Oſtorius diſpatched to their relief ſome cohorts lightly armed; but they not not being able to put a ſtop to the flight, the legions were drawn out. Their arrival encouraged the fugitives; the fight was renewed, and the ſucceſs, after having been long doubtful, proved in the end favourable to the Romans; the enemy fled, but, as night approached, with ſmall loſs. Thenceforward ſcarce a day paſſed without ſome encounter or ſkirmiſh, ſometimes in the woods, ſometimes in the marſhes; at times by command of their officers, and often without their knowledge, as deſign or chance gave them an opportunity. What moſt exaſperated the Silures was, a ſaying of the Roman general current among them, that their name muſt be utterly extinguiſhed, as was that of the Sicambri, who had been partly cut off, and partly tranſplanted into Gaul. Being thus animated, they ſurpriſed and carried off two auxiliary cohorts, as they were without due circumſpection pillaging the country, to ſatiate the avarice of their commanders. The ſpoil and captives they diſtributed among the neighbouring nations, with a view to draw them too into the revolt. In the mean time Oſtorius, ſinking under the weight of his cares and anxieties, ended his days to the great joy of the enemy, that ſo renowned a commander had periſhed in the war[z]. Claudius was no ſooner appriſed of the death of his lieutenant, than he appointed Aulus Didius Gallus to ſucceed him, who, notwithſtanding his expeditious arrival, found affairs in a much worſe condition than they had been at the death of Oſtorius. For the Silures, finding the Romans deſtitute of a general, had attacked and defeated a legion commanded by Manlius Valens, a diſaſter magnified both by the enemy and the new general; by the enemy, to terrify and diſcourage him; by Didius, to gain the greater glory, if he put an end to the war, or to have the juſter excuſe, if it continued. In the mean time, the Silures made frequent and wide incurſions into the territories of the Roman allies, committing every where dreadful devaſtations, till Didius, taking the field, ſet upon them, repulſed them, and reſtrained them within more narrow bounds.

Some advantages gained by the Silures.

[x] Tacit. ibid. c. 36, 37. [y] Zonar. p. 86.

Oſtorius dies.

Other advantages gained by the Silures.

Next to Caractacus in merit and valour was Venutius, or Venuſius, one long faithful to the Romans, and protected by them, during his marriage with Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes. That princeſs was amply rewarded by the Romans, and in high favour with them, for having ſeized and and delivered up into their hands king Caractacus. Wherefore preſuming upon their protection, ſhe wantonly deſerted her huſband Venutius, and married his armour-bearer Vellocatus, on whom with her perſon ſhe conferred her crown. This action generally abhorred by the Britons, occaſioned great diſturbances in the ſtate, and kindled a civil war among the Brigantes. The queen, by craft and ſubtil ſtratagems, got the brother and other relations of Venutius into her power. But Venutius on the other hand, being ſupported by the Brigantes themſelves, who were offended at their queen's reproachful conduct and ſcorned to be governed by a woman, and receiving powerful ſuccours from the neighbouring nations, reduced the unfaithful princeſs to the utmoſt diſtreſs. She then had recourſe to her faſt friends the Romans, who immediately diſpatched ſome cohorts and ſquadrons to her aid. Hereupon a bloody battle enſued, which was long doubtful; but in the end proved ſucceſsful to the Romans, who reſcued the queen from impending danger. Venutius, however, maintained himſelf in the kingdom, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the Roman general. Many battles were fought with doubtful ſucceſs, and no great advantages gained on either ſide. At length Didius, who was ſtricken in years, and already ſatiated with a long train of honours, gave over all thoughts of reſtoring the queen, and contented himſelf with acting only defenſively, and reſtraining the enemy by his lieutenants. In this poſture continued affairs here till the ſeventh year of Nero's reign, Didius and his ſucceſſor Veranius thinking it ſufficient juſt to maintain what acquiſitions their predeceſſors had made, or only to raiſe ſome forts further in the iſland, and very few they were, purely for the name and reputation of having enlarged their government. Veranius indeed died in leſs than a year, and was ſucceeded by Suetonius Paulinus [a], whoſe feats in the iſland we ſhall relate in the reign of Nero, when the order of time will oblige us to reſume the detail, which it now cauſes us to interrupt.

[z] Tacit. c. 38, 39.

The queen of the Brigantes driven out in ſpite of the Romans.

THE following year, Fauſtus Sylla and Salvius Otho Titianus being conſuls, the ſenate paſſed a rigorous decree for expelling the aſtrologers out of Italy, which, however, was never put in execution. Another decree iſſued againſt women women of rank, who married ſlaves, ordaining, that ſhe, who thus debaſed herſelf without the conſent of the maſter of the ſlave, ſhould herſelf be reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery; but where he conſented, ſhe ſhould be held for a ſlave manumitted. Claudius declared in the ſenate, that Pallas was the deviſer of this ſcheme; whereupon Bareas Soranus, conſul elect, moved, that he might be rewarded with the ornaments of prætor, and a preſent of about an hundred thouſand pounds of our money. Cornelius Scipio added, that public thanks ſhould be returned him for deigning, though deſcended from the antient kings of Arcadia, to be reckoned among the emperor's miniſters, and poſtponing this his antient nobility to the ſervice of the ſtate. The haughty ſlave accepted the ornaments of the prætorſhip, and alſo the privilege of wearing a gold ring; but deſpiſed the preſent, and prevailed with Claudius to acquaint the ſenate in his name, that he was ſatisfied with the honours, and choſe to live ſtill in his antient poverty. Hereupon a decree paſſed, was engraven in braſs, and publicly hung up, in which a manumitted ſlave, lately redeemed from the infamy of whips and fetters, but now worth near ſeven millions, was extolled for obſerving the venerable parſimony of the primitive ages. This in truth was a compliment, as Pliny the younger obſerves [b], made to a ſlave by a body of ſlaves. Thus was dignity debaſed, infamy exalted, the awful authority of the ſenate proſtituted, and the ornaments of magiſtracy ignominiouſly defiled. It was not enough for the once great and venerable Roman ſenate to heap honours upon the emperor; they muſt likewiſe court, adore, and exalt his ſlaves and freedmen, creatures brought from the chain and oar, inſects naturally doomed to the vileſt offices of the kitchen, ſtable, and privies. This year Claudius finiſhed at an immenſe charge the aqueduct, which Caligula had begun fourteen years before, and conſecrated it, to uſe the expreſſion of the antient writers, on the firſt of Auguſt, his birth day. It was a work of extraordinary magnificence, as appears from its ſtately ruins, which are ſtill to be ſeen with an inſcription, in which Claudius is ſtyled emperor the twenty-ſeventh time. Four hundred and ſixty perſons were appointed to keep it in repair, and large ſalaries aſſigned them out of the public treaſury. The ſame year the great canal being finiſhed, which was deſigned for the draining

A decree againſt women who marired ſlaves.

[a] Tacit. ibid. c. 40. vit. Agr. c. 14. Hiſt. l. iii. c. 45.

The ornaments of the prætorſhip decreed to Pallas.

The debaſement of the ſenate.

[b] Plin. l. viii. ep. 6.

ing of the lake Fucinus, and had kept thirty thouſand men conſtantly employed for eleven years together, being at length finiſhed, before the waters were let out, Claudius exhibited a naval fight, in which nineteen thouſand condemned criminals engaged on board an hundred large gallies, repreſenting the Sicilian and Rhodian fleets. The lake was ſurrounded with an incloſure of huge rafts to obſtruct all means of flight or eſcape. Upon the rafts ſtood the emperor's guards; the lake was covered with gallies; the ſhore, the adjacent hills, the tops of the mountains, were crouded with a mighty multitude; many from the neighbouring towns, others from Rome itſelf, either from a paſſion to behold the ſpectacle, or in compliment to the prince: the whole repreſented a vaſt theatre, and that greater numbers of ſpectators might be the better accommodated, a mountain between the lake and the river Liris was levelled. The emperor preſided in a coat of mail, and with him Agrippina in a mantle of cloath of gold. When the two fleets were drawn up and ready to engage, a Triton of ſilver, ſpringing by an ingenious contrivance out of the midſt of the lake, ſounded the charge, and the combat began, which though between malefactors, was fought with all the courage and gallantry of brave ſoldiers; ſo that after a moſt obſtinate conteſt, after many wounds and much blood, Claudius granted ſuch of them as remained, their lives, and redeemed them from ſlaughter (W). When the ſhew was over, the earth between the lake and the canal was removed; but the canal was found not to be ſunk ſufficiently low to receive the water in the centre of the lake. Its bed therefore was dug deeper; and when this work was ended, which happened this year, to draw the multitude once more

A combat exhibited on the lake Fucinus.

(W) Suetonius tells us, that the combatants, when upon the point of engaging, cried out to Claudius, Farewel, good emperor; we, who are going to die, ſalute you: the emperor returned the compliment, bidding them farewel too; which words they conſtrued as if he had excuſed them from the combat and therefore refuſed to engage, ſtanding ſtill, till Claudius, tranſported with rage, leapt down from his ſeat, and running in a most unbecoming manner about the banks of the lake, threatened to deſtroy them with fire and ſword, if they did not immediately engage (48).

(48) Suet. c. 21.

more together, a shew of gladiators was exhibited upon bridges laid over it. After the shew, the emperor made a great banquet just at the fall from the lake; but the water, breaking out unexpectedly with incredible violence, bore down with it whatever was near it, shook the ground to a great distance, and by its impetuosity and roaring, terrified and dismayed Claudius, his guests, and the spectators, who all betook themselves to flight, and narrowly escaped being carried away with the stream. Agrippina, taking advantage of the emperor's fright, charged Narcissus, the director of the work, with avarice, as if he had not laid out, but imbezzled the vast treasures allotted for it: on the other hand, Narcissus did not spare Agrippina, but reproached her with aspiring and boundless views [c]. Dion Cassius writes, that Narcissus let out the waters on purpose to cover another fault, which the desire of saving for his own use the immense sums allowed him for the work, prompted him to commit [d]; but what fault that was, he does not tell us: we only learn from Tacitus, that when the water was discharged, the negligence of the workmen and the insufficiency of the work manifestly appeared. Suetonius seems to insinuate, that Claudius accomplished this vast undertaking, and drained the lake. Pliny likewise reckons the draining of the lake Fucinus amongst the most remarkable works of Claudius; but it was neglected, says he, thro' envy, by his successor Nero. On the other hand, Dion Cassius calls the immense sums, laid out on this stupendous work, useless expences; and Seneca writes, that the lake Fucinus was in his time still full, though the workmen had in Claudius's time with immense labour finished the canal, which if Suetonius is to be credited, they hewed through a rocky mountain for three miles together [f]. Spartianus says, that Adrian drained this lake [g]. However, it is still to be seen in the Farther Abruzzo, and is known by the name of the lake of Celano. Towards the end of the year the Bithynians sent deputies to Rome to accuse Junius Cilo, their governor, of extortion. He had indeed oppressed them in a most cruel and barbarous manner; but the emperor, when they were admitted to his presence, not well understanding what they said, desired Narcissus, when they

A combat of gladiators on the canal.

The undertaking unsuccessful.

The weakness of the prince abused by his freedmen.

[c] Tacit. c. 57. Suet. c. 21, 32. Val. p. 678. [d] Dio, in excerp. l. xxxvi. c. 15. [e] Tacit. ibid. [f] Suet. c. 29. Plin. [g] Spart. in Adr. p. 11.

they withdrew, to acquaint him with the end of their embaſſy. They are come, anſwered frankly Narciſſus, to return you thanks for your kindneſs, in appointing over them a man of ſuch integrity, moderation, and diſintereſtedneſs, as Cilo. Hereupon, Claudius relying entirely upon the faith of his freedman, commanded, that Cilo, ſince he had given ſuch ſatisfaction, ſhould be continued in his government two years longer, during which time he completed the ruin of that unhappy people [h]. A remarkable inſtance this of the prince's weakneſs, and the impudent boldneſs of his freedmen!

THE following conſuls were Decimus Junius Silanus Torquatus, and Q. Haterius Antoninus, during whoſe adminiſtration, Nero, who had entered the ſixteenth year of his age on the fifteenth of December, married Octavia the daughter of Claudius, to whom he had been contracted three years before. Soon after, to acquire the glory of eloquence, he undertook the cauſe of the Ilians, and obtained for them, as the anceſtors of the Romans, an entire immunity from all taxes and tributes whatſoever. He likewiſe made an oration in favour of the Rhodians, and prevailed with Claudius to reſtore them to their antient liberty, which had been often taken from them, and often re-eſtabliſhed. A third oration he pronounced in favour of the inhabitants of Bononia, a Roman colony, which had been utterly conſumed by fire; and they were at his ſuit relieved with a large bounty [i]. The two firſt orations he uttered in Greek, and the third in Latin. At the ſame time the inhabitants of Apamea, Byzantium, and Coos, having recourſe to the young prince, obtained by his mediation ſignal favours; the Coans a general immunity from impoſitions (X), and the inhabitants of Apamea and Byzantium, a diſcharge Nero marries Octavia.

Several favours granted at his ſuit.

[h] Dio, p. 687. [i] Tacit. c. 48. Suet. in Ner. c. 7.

(X) When Claudius propoſed in the ſenate a general immunity from all manner of taxes and tributes in behalf of the Coans, he made a long deſcant upon their antiquity; how the Argives, or at leaſt Ceus the father of Latona, firſt cultivated this iſland; how Æſculapius arrived thither ſoon after, and with him the art of medicine, an art which had long flouriſhed among his deſcendents, whoſe names he rehearſed, and marked the ſever-

diſcharge from all tribute for the ſpace of five years, the latter having ſuffered much by the late wars of Thrace and Boſphorus, of which we have ſpoken in the hiſtories of thoſe kingdoms, and the former by an earthquake [m]. All this was done thro' the policy of Agrippina, to gain for her ſon the reputation of a compaſſionate and humane prince. On the contrary, ſhe puſhed Claudius upon all the moſt deteſted meaſures of cruelty. As ſhe was deſirous of poſſeſſing the fine gardens of Statilius Taurus, a ſenator of great diſtinction, who had been proconſul of Africa, ſhe ſuborned Tarquitius Priſcus, formerly his lieutenant, to charge him with having conſulted the magicians concerning the term of the emperor's life. Taurus, finding Agrippina bent upon his deſtruction, laid violent hands on himſelf. The ſenate were to ſuch a degree grieved for the loſs of ſo worthy a citizen, and provoked againſt the accuſer, that exerting themſelves on this occaſion, they expelled him the ſenate in ſpite of the protection and intrigues of Agrippina [n]. Suetonius pretends, that Taurus, entering into a conſpiracy with Gallus Aſinius, corrupted ſeveral of the emperor's freedmen and domeſtics with a deſign to make an inſurrection [o], whereas Tacitus, whom we have followed, tells us, he was proſecuted merely on account of his fine gardens, which upon his death Agrippina ſeized, as Meſſalina had done thoſe of Valerius Aſiaticus. Claudius had often declared, that the ſame force ſhould be allowed to the deciſions of his procurators, or receivers, as to his own; and now to ſhew that this was no declaration at random, he cauſed it veral ages, in which they lived. He added, that Xenophon, his own phyſician, was deſcended from the ſame family; and that at his requeſt an entire diſcharge for ever from all tributes ought to be granted to his countrymen, that they might attend only the cultivation of an iſland ſacred to that deity. Tacitus obſerves, that he might have alledged many good offices of theirs towards the Roman people, nay, and victories gained by their aid; but had not judgment enough to colour under ſome public conſideration his perſonal partiality to his phyſician (49). We ſhall ſoon ſee what return Xenophon made him for his kindneſs.

Statilius Taurus accuſed lays violent hands on himſelf.

[m] Tacit. c. 58. [n] Idem, c. 59. [o] Suet. c. 13.

(49) Tacit. c. 61.

Claudius equals the power of his freedmen to his own.

it to be confirmed and eſtabliſhed by a decree of the ſenate. Theſe receivers of the emperors were their ſtewards, or perſons entruſted with their domeſtic concerns, and were for the moſt part franchiſed ſlaves; and nevertheleſs to ſuch ſons of earth the weak prince, entirely controuled by them, was not aſhamed to aſſert by a ſolemn decree of the ſenate, a power equal to his own, and to that of the laws. At the ſame time he conferred univerſal juriſdiction upon the equeſtrian order, the ſame juriſdiction, for which ſo many ſeditions had been formerly raiſed, and ſo much blood ſhed. Auguſtus had ordained, that the knights, who governed Egypt, ſhould act judicially; ſoon after their juriſdiction was extended to other provinces; and even in Rome itſelf many things formerly determined by the prætors, were referred to the tribunal of the knights. Claudius now inveſted them with the ſame unbounded juriſdiction, which had been hitherto enjoyed by the ſenatorial order, and was looked upon by them as their peculiar prerogative [P].

Anunlimited juriſdiction granted to the knights.

The following year, M. Aſinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being conſuls, a change of affairs was portended, if the antients are to be credited, by many prodigies (Y). But Agrippina was not ſo much alarmed by them,

[P] Tacit. c. 50.

(Y) The enſigns of the ſoldiers and their tents were ſcorched with fire from heaven; a ſwarm of bees ſettled upon the ſummit of the capitol; children were born of different forms; a pig was farrowed with the talons of a hawk (50). A blazing ſtar appeared; the monument of the emperor's father Druſus was ſtruck and ſplit with lightning; the number of every order of magiſtrates was leſſened that year; for one of the queſtors, one of the ædiles, a tribune, a prætor, and a conſul, died within a few months. In his deſignation of conſuls he named none for that dignity beyond the month of October, in which he died, as if he had been appriſed of his approaching end. The laſt time he came to the ſenate, having with great earneſtneſs exhorted his natural and adopted ſon to live in unity and concord, he recommended them both to the care and protection of the fathers. The laſt time he adminiſtered juſtice in public, he is ſaid to have told the people from his tribunal, that his courſe was ended (51).

(50) Idem. c. 64. (51) Idem ibid. & Suet. c. 46.

them, as by a saying of Claudius, uttered heedlessly in his wine; That it was his fate to bear the iniquities of his wives for some time, and at last to punish them. About the same time, having condemned a woman for adultery, he answered one of his freedmen, who applauded the justice of his sentence, It is my lot to be unfortunate in my marriages, and to punish adulteries; which plainly shewed, that he was not unapprised of the intrigues and amours of his wife. He likewise betrayed evident tokens of his repenting his marriage with Agrippina, and the adoption of Nero; for his son Britannicus presenting himself to him, he embraced him with more than ordinary kindness, bidding him grow up, for he would give him an account of his whole conduct; adding in Greek, It is love that prompts me; he declared at the same time his intention of giving him soon the manly robe, That the people of Rome, said he, may have at last a true Cæsar [q]. As the emperor let no word drop, which was not immediately carried to Agrippina, she resolved to be before-hand with him; but first to destroy by his means Domitia Lepida, who gave her no small umbrage. She was daughter to Antonia the younger, great niece to Augustus, cousin-german to Agrippina the elder, and sister to Cneius Domitius, the present Agrippina's former husband; so that she accounted herself no ways inferior to Agrippina in nobility, to whom she was equal in beauty, age, and wealth. They were, according to Tacitus, both prostitutes in their persons, infamous in their manners, violent in their tempers, and no less rivals in vices, than in the lustre of their families and the advantages of their fortunes. But their chief contention and struggle was, which of them, the aunt, or the mother, should acquire the sway over Nero. Lepida endeavoured to gain him with caresses and presents, while the imperious Agrippina treated him with severity and threats, like one, who was desirous indeed to raise him to the sovereignty, but seemed determined not to allow him to exercise his sovereign authority over her. To get rid of her troublesome rival, she accused Lepida of having sought by charms and imprecations to destroy the emperor's wife, and of disturbing the public peace of Italy by neglecting to restrain the tumultuous bands of her slaves in Calabria. For these imputations she was by the servile senate doomed to die, and executed in spite of the opposition and interest of

Is apprised of the wickedness of Agrippina.

Domitia Lepida accused and condemned.

[q] Idem, c. 64. Suet. c. 43.

Narciſſus, who grew daily more and more diſtruſtful of Agrippina, and therefore ſtrove to ſave Lepida [r]. We are told by Suetonius, that Nero himſelf was obliged by his mother to appear as a witneſs againſt his aunt, though he had a particular kindneſs and value for her [s]. In the mean time Claudius, being taken ill, for the recovery of his health, had recourſe to the ſoft air and wholſome waters of Sinueſſa; and this occaſion was greedily ſeized by Agrippina long ſince bent upon his deſtruction, and for that purpoſe well furniſhed with wicked agents. She thought it would be ſafeſt to procure his death by poiſon; but ſhe was at a loſs what ſort to uſe; if it were powerful and ſudden in its operation, her crime might thence be betrayed; if ſlow and conſuming by degrees, there was danger, that Claudius, when his end approached, might ſuſpect her, and thence annul the adoption of Nero. At length ſhe adjudged a ſubtile poiſon the beſt, ſuch as would diſorder his ſenſes, and not ſuddenly put an end to his life. An experienced artiſt in ſuch preparations was choſen, by name Locuſta, a woman who had been lately condemned for poiſoning. By her the poiſon was prepared, and Halotus, an eunuch and the emperor's taſter (Z), was charged to adminiſter it; which he did accordingly in a diſh of muſhrooms, of which Claudius was a great lover. But whether it was from his natural ſtupidity, or becauſe he was drunk, he did not ſeem to feel the virulence of the doſe; at the ſame time a looſeneſs ſeemed to relieve him, and to defeat the operation

Claudius is taken ill.

[r] Idem, c. 65. [s] Suet. in Ner. c. 7.

(Z) The office of taſter, utterly unknown in the times of the republic, was probably eſtabliſhed by Auguſtus, as we conjecture from the following epitaph ſtill to be ſeen at Rome: Cenio. Cæli. Herodian. Præguſtator. Divi. Auguſti. Idem. Poſtea. Villicus. In. Hortis. Salluſtianis. Deceſſit. Nonis. Auguſtus. M. Cocceio Nerva. C. Vibio. Rufino. Coſſ. Tiberius too had his taſter, as appears from the following inſcription: Ti. Claudius. Flamma. Clauſus. Ti. Aug. Præguſtator. Their example was, no doubt, followed by all the other emperors. This cuſtom obtained among the Perſians, as we read in Xenophon (52), and of them in all likelihood the Roman emperors borrowed it.

(52) Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. i.

operation and force of the poiſon. Agrippina therefore, terribly diſmayed, as one who knew that her own life lay at ſtake, had recourſe to Xenophon, the emperor's phyſician, who, being already engaged in her wicked deſigns, under pretence of aſſiſting Claudius in his efforts to vomit, thruſt down his throat a feather dipt in moſt potent poiſon, which ſoon put an end to his life [t] (A). Thus died the emperor Caius Tiberius Claudius Nero, on the thirteenth of October, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years, eight months, and twenty days, reckoning from the day of Caius's death [u]. He was a weak prince, almoſt a changeling; had no diſcernment or paſſions of his own, but was entirely governed by his freedmen. However, Tacitus ſeems to allow him a ſhare of ſenſe at intervals. Suetonius reproaches him with cruelty, and tells us, that thirty-five ſenators, and above three hundred Roman knights, were by his orders put to death. But it is certain, that the prince himſelf was altogether a ſtranger to moſt of theſe executions; for a centurion bringing him one day word, that, purſuant to his orders, he had executed

Is poiſoned by the contrivance of Agrippina.

His character.

[t] Tacit. c. 69. Dio, p. 688. [u] Idem ibid. Dio, p 689.

(A) Tacitus tells us, that all the particulars of Claudius's death were ſoon after ſo thoroughly known, that the writers of thoſe times were able to relate the moſt minute circumſtances of this black deed. But Suetonius writes, that though it is agreed on all hands, that he died by poiſon, yet authors are not unanimous either as to the place where, or the perſon by whom, it was given. Some, ſays that writer, tell us, that the eunuch Halotus, his taſter, poiſoned him, while he was banquetting among the prieſts in the capitol. Others will have it, that in a feaſt at his own houſe Agrippina, knowing that he was a great lover of muſhrooms, preſented him with one that was poiſoned. Neither are the other circumſtances of his death better known, continues the ſame writer; ſome relate, that he expired ſoon after he had taken the poiſon, others, that he continued all night in great agony, and died about break of day. Some affirm, that he fell aſleep as ſoon as he had taken the doſe, and was afterwards relieved with vomiting, whereupon the doſe was doubled, &c. We have followed Tacitus, who ſeems to have been better acquainted with the circumſtances of Claudius's death than any other writer, ſince he relates them without the leaſt doubt or heſitation, as publicly known in his time.

ſuch a conſular, the emperor, with no ſmall ſurpriſe, anſwered, that he had given no ſuch order; but one of his freedmen ſaying, that the officer had done well in revenging of his own accord injuries offered to the perſon of the emperor, he acquieſced, and without further enquiry approved of the execution [w]. Seneca in the bitter ſatyr he wrote againſt him ſays, among other things, that he no more ſcrupled the killing of a man, than the killing of a fly [x]. But his hatred to Claudius, by whom he had been baniſhed to the iſland of Corſica, and kept there for the ſpace of eight years, prompted him to charge the prince with thoſe crimes, which other writers, free from paſſion and prejudice, lay at the door of his wives and freed-men. He had, according to Tacitus, Dion Caſſius, and Suetonius, many good qualities, was an utter enemy to all pride and oſtentation, a ſtranger to revenge, free from the imputation of avarice, a great lover of juſtice, and when he acted of himſelf, and was not by fear bereft of his ſenſes, inclined to mercy and compaſſion. But Seneca paints him as a monſter, in whom centered all vices, without allowing him one ſingle virtue, one good quality; whence it is but too manifeſt, that his paſſion got the better of his philoſophy.

Agrippina perſonates great ſorrow.

WHILE Claudius lay dead in his apartment, the ſenate, the conſuls, and pontiffs, were offering vows for his recovery, nay, reſtoratives were ſtill applied, and every thing elſe performed, as if they were not without hopes of his recovery, till matters were diſpoſed for ſecuring the empire to Nero. With this view Agrippina, as ſoon as the prince expired, perſonating inconſolable grief, and pretending to ſeek on all hands ſome allay to her ſorrow, claſped Britannicus faſt in her arms, ſtyled him the true image of his father, and by various devices kept him in the chamber, and likewiſe his two ſiſters, Octavia and Antonia. At the ſame time, ſhe poſted guards in all the avenues, ſhut up all the paſſages, and from time to time gave out, that the prince was recovering. At laſt, when ſhe had taken all poſſible precautions to prevent any diſturbance, at noon the gates of the palace were unexpectedly thrown open, and Nero, accompanied by Burrhus, captain of the prætorian guards, walked forth to the cohort which was then upon duty.

[w] Suet. c. 23. [x] Senec. lud. in Claud. p. 478.

duty. There, by the command of Burrhus, he was received with ſhouts of joy, and inſtantly put into a litter. Some indeed heſitated, frequently looking and aſking, where was Britannicus? but, as he was detained in the chamber of the deceaſed emperor, and no one appeared to propoſe him, they preſently joined the others, and embraced the choice which was offered them. Thus Nero was carried to the camp, where, after a ſpeech ſuitable to the exigency and the promiſe of a largeſs equal to that of the late prince, he was ſaluted emperor. The declaration of the ſoldiers was followed and confirmed by the decrees of the ſenate, which were, without reluctancy, accepted by the people, both at Rome and in the provinces. To Claudius was decreed a ſolemn and pompous funeral, the ſame as had been ordained for Auguſtus, Agrippina emulating the magnificence of her great-grand-mother Livia Auguſta. His laſt will, however, though atteſted by the hands and ſeals of all the magiſtrates, was not read in public, leſt his preferring there the ſon of his wife to his own ſon might be reſented by the people [y].

Procures Nero to be declared emperor.

NERO had ſcarce been ſaluted emperor, when the imperious and revengful Agrippina made what haſte ſhe could to diſpatch Narciſſus, who had ſpoken reproachfully of her, and betrayed no ſmall affection for Britannicus. She cauſed him to be immediately arreſted, and dragged to priſon, where he was, through fear of a more ignominious and cruel death, conſtrained to lay violent hands on himſelf, ſore againſt the will of Nero. He is ſaid to have been at once profuſe and rapacious, to have ſurpaſſed in wealth Croeſus, the kings of Perſia, and Claudius himſelf, and at the ſame time to have excelled all the prodigals of his age. As he bore an abſolute ſway under Claudius, his friendſhip was courted by foreign kings, cities, and provinces, all ſtriving who ſhould make him the moſt magnificent preſents. We have ſeen in the courſe of Claudius's reign, by how many crimes he deſerved the doom that overtook him at laſt. But after all, he was faithful to his maſter, preſerved his life with great care, and was ready, as Tacitus informs us, to lay down his own for his ſervice [z]. Agrippina would never have attempted to poiſon Claudius, if Dion Caſſius is to be credited [a], had ſhe not firſt removed Narciſſus, by Narciſſus ſacrificed to the revenge and jealouſy of Agrippina.

[y] Tacit. c. 69, Suet. c. 44. [z] Tacit. c. 65. [a] Dio, p. 688.

perſuading him to try the baths of Campania for the recovery of his health. Before he laid violent hands on himſelf, he conſigned to the flames ſeveral letters and ſecret papers againſt Agrippina, which, as the prince's ſecretary, he had in his cuſtody, that her accuſers might not be expoſed to the fury of a woman, whoſe tempeſtuous ſpirit, to uſe his expreſſion, and violent luſt of dominion, if not reſtrained, would ſoon drown Rome in blood [b]. Zonaras tells us, upon what authority we know not, that Narciſſus put an end to his life upon the tomb of Meſſalina [c]. About the ſame time, another victim, far more illuſtrious, was ſacrificed, and indeed unknown to Nero, by the deadly fraud of Agrippina. This was Junius Silanus, proconſul of Aſia, a man of great wealth and equal quality, but of a quiet diſpoſition, and ſo little inclined to raiſe any diſturbances in the ſtate, that he had, during the late reigns, ſpent his life in ſlothful indolence, and even in ſcorn; inſomuch, that Caligula uſed to call him the golden ſheep. However, as upon the death of Claudius, it was whiſpered among the populace, that as Nero was ſcarce out of his childhood, and had by iniquity acquired the empire, ſuch a man as Silanus ought to be preferred to him, one of ripe years, of an unblemiſhed character, and, what was then highly eſteemed, deſcended from the Cæſars; for he too was the great-grand-ſon of Auguſtus; this was enough for Agrippina to diſpatch him; and accordingly ſhe ſent orders, without her ſon's conſent or knowledge, to P. Celer, a Roman knight, and to Helius a freedman, both the emperor's receivers in Aſia, to murder Silanus. Her orders were obeyed, and poiſon was given him at a banquet by the two aſſaſſins, ſo openly, as if they were neither aſhamed nor afraid to own the murder. A torrent of ſlaughter would have followed, had not Afranius Burrhus and Annæus Seneca prevented it. Theſe were the young prince's governors, who was now only in the ſeventeenth year of his age. Though partners in power, yet, by a rare inſtance, they lived free from all jealouſy and emulation, and were of equal weight and authority, though different in their accompliſhments. Burrhus was his inſtructor in the military art, and Seneca in the precepts of eloquence. In theſe different offices they aſſiſted and ſupported each other, the eaſier to manage be-

And Junius Silanus.

Burrhus and Seneca the young prince's governors.

twee

[b] Idem, ibid. [c] Zonar. p. 187.

tween them the dangerous age of the prince, neither of them having any thing in view, any thing at heart, but the ſervice of their illuſtrious pupil and the welfare of the public. They had both one conſtant ſtruggle to maintain againſt the turbulent ſpirit of Agrippina, who, tranſported with the luſt of ruling without controul and ſupported by Pallas, was for ſacrificing, even before the obſequies of her huſband were performed, to her rage and jealouſy, all thoſe who gave her the leaſt umbrage. But Burrhus and Seneca, unanimouſly exerting their authority, reſtrained her blind rage, and kept her within bounds. Nero indeed, heaped all kinds of honours upon her, and to the tribune, who came to attend him, the firſt day of his government, for the word, he gave that of optima mater, excellent mother: the ſenate too, the firſt time they aſſembled, decreed her two lictors, and ſeveral other marks of diſtinction; but the emperor's governors, bearing a greater ſway than ſhe over his youthful mind, prevented her from committing ſuch exceſſes, as ſhe had been guilty of during the late reign [d].

They reſtrain the fury of Agrippina.

NERO's firſt care after his acceſſion to the empire was, to perform, with all poſſible pomp and magnificence, the obſequies of the deceaſed emperor: he pronounced himſelf his funeral oration, in which he diſplayed the antiquity of his lineage, the many conſulſhips, the many triumphs of his anceſtors; he likewiſe touched upon his perſonal accompliſhments, eſpecially his eloquence, and thorough knowledge of the Greek tongue; all which was heard with attention and pleaſure. But when he began to cry up the wiſdom, foreſight, and providence of Claudius, the whole audience broke into a loud laughter; though the ſpeech was of Seneca's compoſing, and diſcovered much accuracy and elegance; for he had, ſays Tacitus, a fine genius and a ſtyle well adapted to the taſte of that time. On this occaſion it was obſerved, that Nero was the firſt Roman emperor who ſtood in need of another man's eloquence; Cæſar the dictator ſtood in rank with the moſt diſtinguiſhed orators, and none of his ſucceſſors wanted eloquence, addreſs, and energy in ſpeaking. But Nero, having from his early childhood applied himſelf to graving, painting, ſinging, and managing ing of chariots, was obliged to employ the pen of Seneca, when-ever he had occaſion to ſpeak in public, or even to write letters concerning affairs of any importance. Seneca had one under him, named Beryllus, who is ſtyled by Joſephus [e], Nero's preceptor, but was only his Greek ſecretary.

Claudius's funeral praiſes.

[d] Tacit. annal. 13, c. 1, 2. Suet. c. 8. Dio, l. lxi. p. 690.

When the obſequies were over, the young prince repaired to the ſenate, where, after an introduction, in which he acknowledged himſelf indebted for the empire to the authority of the ſenate and the concurrence of the ſoldiery, he declared in what manner he deſigned to govern; that he claimed not the judgment and deciſion of affairs; that the whole power and authority ſhould not be confined to a few perſons, but every magiſtrate ſhould have their peculiar juriſdiction; that nothing ſhould be ſaleable within his walls, nor any acceſs there to informers; that between his family and the republic a juſt diſtinction ſhould ever be be maintained; that the ſenate ſhould preſerve their antient juriſdiction; that Italy and the provinces belonging to the people ſhould apply only to the conſuls, and by them procure acceſs to the fathers; that to himſelf he reſerved what was eſpecially committed to his care, the direction of the armies: he concluded with aſſuring them, that he deſigned to govern his people according to the model of the deified of Auguſtus. The ſenate ordered this ſpeech, which was likewiſe compoſed by Seneca, to be engraved on a plate of ſilver, and to be annually read in the ſenate by the new conſuls [f]. At the ſame time, they accumulated all kinds of honours upon him, which he accepted, without refuſing any, except that of father of his country, in conſideration of his youth [g], which, however, he aſſumed before the ſecond year of his reign expired, as appears from ſome antient medals [h]. He ſeemed at firſt inclined to perform the mighty promiſes, he had made to the ſenate; for this year he gave innumerable inſtances of clemency, moderation, and good-nature: to the people he diſtributed four hundred ſeſterces a man; to ſuch of the ſenators as were deſcended from illuſtrious families, but reduced to poverty, he allowed annual ſalaries, to ſome five hundred thouſand ſeſterces, beſides a certain quantity of corn, which he likewiſe allowed monthly to his guards: many many impoſitions he utterly ſuppreſſed, and retrenched others to a fourth: he redreſſed ſeveral diſorders; reſtrained the profuſe luxury of feaſts and banquets, which had obtained during the late reign, Claudius himſelf being greatly addicted to feaſting; with the approbation of the ſenate he publiſhed an edict, forbidding the ſelling of any thing boiled in public houſes, except pulſe and greens; he ſuppreſſed a kind of ſports, in which certain perſons, running up and down the city, pretended to have by cuſtom a right of robbing, as it were in jeſt, all they met, and carrying off whatever they could ſeize [i]. The ſenate likewiſe depending upon the prince's declaration began to exerciſe their antient juriſdiction, and made various regulations; among the reſt the two following; that no orator or pleader ſhould receive any fee, payment, or preſent, for defending a cauſe; and that thoſe, who were deſigned quæſtors, ſhould be no longer obliged to exhibit public ſhews of gladiators. All this was oppoſed by Agrippina as annulling the acts of Claudius; but Nero preferred the counſels of Burrhus, and Seneca to thoſe of his mother, and the fathers prevailed. However, out of reſpect to her, he cauſed her late huſband Claudius to be ranked among the gods, with all the ſolemnity and pomp of prieſts, altars, and ſacrifices: which gave occaſion to the pleaſantry of Gallio the brother of Seneca, who, hearing of the deification of Claudius, could not help ſaying, that he had been drawn up to heaven with a hook, as the criminals were dragged thro' the Tiber [k]. Towards the end of this year, Nero beſtowed the Leſſer Armenia on Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod, king of Chalcis; to Sohemus he gave, with the enſigns of royalty and title of king, the country of Sophene, lying between Armenia, Meſopotamia, and Comagene, and added ſome towns of Galilée to the territories which Claudius had given to Agrippa, the ſon of Agrippa, king of Judæa [l]. Before the year expired embaſſadors arrived from Armenia, to plead before Nero a cauſe of their nation; and while the emperor was hearing them, ſeated on the imperial throne, Agrippina appeared all on a ſudden, and was advancing to ſit in joint judgment with the prince. The whole aſſembly was ſtruck with amazement; but no one daring to reſtrain her, Seneca ſuggeſted to him, to deſcend and meet his mother; and thus, under diſguiſe of filial reverence, Claudius deified.

[e] Joſeph. antiq. l. xx. c. 7. Dio, p. 650. [f] Tacit. c. 3. Suet. c. 10. [g] Suet. c. 8. [h] Vide Goltz. p. 44.

The unbounded ambition of Agrippina.

[i] Suet. c. 16. Joſeph. ibid. l. xx. c. 5.

[k] Dio, p. 688.

[l] Tacit. c. 5.

verence, that public disgrace was prevented; for the Romans thought it highly ignominious, that foreign nations should believe them to be governed by a woman *. The audience was put off to another day, when Seneca and Burrhus took effectual care to prevent her disturbing it. As her son was but a youth and wholly indebted to her for the sovereignty, she claimed an equal share in it with him, and therefore pretended to answer foreign embassadors jointly with him, to write letters to princes and kings, to dispatch orders to the governors of provinces and commanders of armies; to preside among the Roman eagles, and in short, to be called and acknowledged a partner in the empire, which her ancestors had acquired, and she had conferred on her son. She always accompanied him in the same litter, was attended by the same guards, and at first prevailed on the young prince to assemble the senate in the palace, that, posted by a door behind a curtain, she might over-hear the debates without being seen [m]. Seneca and Burrhus, well apprised what dreadful disorders she would raise, if she once got the ascendant over the prince, left no stone unturned to lessen her power; and their attempts were not without success, as we shall find anon. The same year, Nero applied to the senate for a statue to his father, and for the consular ornaments to Asconius Labeo, who had been his tutor. The senate not only complied with his request, but at the same time decreed statues to himself of solid silver and gold, which he absolutely refused, and checked those who proposed them. The senate likewise decreed, that the year should for the future begin on December, the month in which Nero was born; but notwithstanding the ordinance of the senate, he preserved the antient custom of beginning the year with the first of January. Neither would he admit a criminal prosecution against Carinas Celer, a senator, upon the accusation of a slave; nor against Julius Densus, a Roman knight, who was charged with his devotion to Britannicus, as a great crime [n].

Nero's modesty.

Nero's first consulship.

THE following year, Nero, who was by a decree of the senate, to exercise the consulship in the twentieth year of his age, tho' he was now but in his eighteenth, took possession of that dignity, agreeable to the custom of other emperor emperors, who never failed to aſſume the faſces the year after their acceſſion to the empire. He choſe for his colleague L. Antiſtius Vetus; but would not ſuffer him to ſwear, as was uſual, upon his acts, an action mightily cried up by the fathers, with a deſign to animate his youthful mind to the purſuit of glory reſulting from things of greater moment. At the ſame time he gave a ſignal inſtance of his mercy towards Plautius Lateranus, whom formerly degraded from the order of ſenator for adultery with Meſſalina, he now reſtored to his antient rank. Tacitus obſerves, that he made great profeſſions of clemency in the frequent ſpeeches, which Seneca, the compoſer, uttered in public by his mouth, either to manifeſt what good counſels he gave him, or to diſplay his own wit [o]. After two months he reſigned the faſces; but to whom we are no-where told. This year, Nero firſt began to ſlight the authority of his mother, which was no-ways diſpleaſing to Seneca and Burrhus, who dreaded her violent ſpirit, and expected to ſee the calamities of the late reign renewed, if ſhe came to bear the chief ſway in the adminiſtration. The young prince conceived a violent paſſion for a franchiſed ſlave, by name Acte, and at the ſame time aſſumed as confidents in his amour, Otho and Claudius Senecio; the firſt of a conſular family, the ſame who arrived afterwards at the empire, and the other the ſon of one of the emperor's freedmen. They were both youths of graceful perſons, but utterly abandoned to all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery, and on that ſcore admitted by Nero to an entire intimacy. Seneca and Burrhus were ſoon informed of their pupil's intrigue; but upon mature deliberation thought it adviſeable not to thwart him in his amour, ſince with a woman of low condition, to the injury of no man, the prince ſatisfied his youthful inclinations; whereas, if he were reſtrained from that gallantry, there was room to dread that he would outrageouſly inſult women of the greateſt diſtinction; for he had already conceived an utter averſion to his wife Octavia, however illuſtrious in her birth, however celebrated for her virtue. Thus reaſoned Burrhus and Seneca, men, without all doubt, of great penetration, experience, and diſcernment [p]. But Dion Caſſius aſcribes to their unſeaſonable condeſcenſion and indulgence the many horrible exceſſes, which will render the name of Nero execrable to the lateſt poſterity.

* Tacit. ibid. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Idem, c. 11.

Begins to ſlight the authority of his mother.

He is indulged by his governors in his paſſion for Acte.

Crimes,

[o] Idem ibid. [p] Tacit. c. 12.

Crimes, ſays that judicious writer, are linked together, and a paſſion when once let looſe, is ſcarce ever again reſtrained within due bounds. The prince's governors meant well; but the prince, finding they did not check the firſt ſallies of his paſſion, took by degrees greater liberties, and at length, impatient of all controul, gave a looſe to his irregular appetites. Thus Dion Caſſius [r]. But, however that be, Agrippina could not diſſemble the irregular conduct of her ſon, not from any motive of virtue, as will ſoon appear, but becauſe ſhe dreaded the extravagant power of a concubine. She left no ſtone unturned to check his growing paſſion; ſhe filled the city with the angry invectives of an incenſed woman, complained, fretted, and ſtormed, that a manumitted ſlave was become her rival, a hand-maid her daughter-in-law. But the fouler her reproaches were, the more they fired his paſſion; ſo that, being at length overcome by its force, he ſhook off all reſpect to his mother, and threw himſelf, without reſerve, into the arms of Seneca, with whom he knew Annæus Serenus (B) lived in cloſe confidence, one who had hitherto cloaked the prince's paſſion for Acte, by pretending to be in love with her himſelf, and had openly preſented her in his own name whatever Nero in ſecret beſtowed upon her. Agrippina was no ſooner appriſed of this, than ſhe changed her arts and addreſs, attempting to regain the confidence of her ſon by ſoft and alluring ſpeeches; ſhe even offered him her own chamber, that there, and, if he pleaſed, within her own arms, he might more privily indulge his paſſion, a paſſion pardonable in one of his youthful years and ſovereign fortune. She even acknowledged her unſeaſonable ſeverity, and made him a tender of all her wealth, which was no much

But checked by his mother.

Who endeavours afterwards to humour him.

[r] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 681.

(B) He was commander of the city guards, and generally eſteemed, notwithſtanding his thus cloaking Nero's paſſion for Acte. To him Seneca inſcribed his book de tranquillitate, and was to ſuch a degree grieved for the loſs of ſo dear and worthy a friend, as he himſelf owns in one of his letters (38), that he deſerved to be ranked among thoſe who had ſuffered themſelves to be overcome by an unmanly grief.

(38) Senec. epiſt. 63.

much ſhort of the imperial treaſures. Thus from being over-ſtrict in checking her ſon, ſhe became all at once beyond all meaſure ſubmiſſive and fawning. This ſudden change deceived not Nero; and his intimate friends, dreading it, beſought him to be upon his guard againſt the ſnares of an implacable and deceitful woman [s].

It happened about this time, that as Nero was ſurveying the rich ornaments, in which the emperors wives and mothers uſed to appear on ſolemn days, he choſe out the moſt pompous and ſtately, and ſent them as preſents to his mother. This the young prince did to convince her, that though he would not be controuled by her, yet he bore her no rancour or ill-will; but Agrippina, tranſported with rage, uttered bitter complaints againſt her ſon, who, ſhe ſaid, by ſending her ſuch trifles, did divide with her what he had wholly received from her. Theſe words, as ſlanderers and tale-bearers are never wanting in courts, were immediately carried to Nero with aggravations, who thereupon provoked with Pallas, by whom chiefly Agrippina was upheld in her ambitious deſigns, diſmiſſed him from his employment, the management of the finances, which he had received from Claudius, and in which he had acted more like the ſovereign director of the empire, than a miniſter. We are told, that as he left the palace, attended by a great throng of followers, Nero ſaid not unpleaſantly, Pallas is going to abdicate the ſovereignty. The emperor, however, aſſured him upon his word, that he ſhould not be queſtioned for his paſt behaviour, and that as to his accounts, the public ſhould have no more demands upon him, than he upon the public. Thus Pallas forfeited his power, but preſerved immenſe wealth, amounting to ſeven millions of our money, to the hour of his death, which happened in the eighth year of Nero's reign, as we ſhall relate in its proper place. The diſgrace of Pallas provoked Agrippina to ſuch a degree, that, not able to refrain her rage, ſhe abandoned herſelf to it without controul, uttering dreadful threats and curſes even in the emperor's hearing. Britannicus, ſaid ſhe, is now grown up, the true and worthy ſon of Claudius; he is now fit to aſſume the empire of his father, an empire, which one, who is a ſon only by adoption, holds to the prejudice of the lawful heir, and exerts his ill-acquired power chiefly by abuſing and inſulting his mother: ſhe threatened

A new motive of miſunderſtanding between Nero and Agrippina.

Pallas diſmiſſed.

His diſgrace highly reſented by Agrippina.

[s] Tacit. c. 13.

threatened to lay open to the world all her infamous practices, all the ſteps ſhe had taken to ſecure the empire to the ungrateful monſter her ſon, the ſurreptitious adoption, her own guilt in poiſoning her huſband, the crying calamities ſhe had brought upon her own family, the unhappy houſe of Germanicus, &c. She added, that only one comfort by the providence of the gods remained to her, that her ſtep-ſon was yet alive; with him ſhe would repair to the camp, and there leave it to the deciſion of the ſoldiery, whether the prating pedagogue Seneca and the maimed Burrhus, or the ſon of the deified Claudius and the daughter of the renowned Germanicus, ſhould have the ſovereign rule of mankind. At the ſame time, ſhe ſhook her fiſt at the emperor himſelf, toſſed her hands, uttered all manner of reproaches, curſes, imprecations; devoted the monſter, as ſhe called her ſon, and his governors to the infernal furies, invoked the manes of her huſband Claudius, of the Silani, and many others, whom ſhe had murdered to no purpoſe. This alarmed Nero, and as Britannicus the next day ended the fourteenth year of his age, when he was to take the manly robe, the emperor began ſeriouſly to reflect with himſelf, now on the violent temper of his mother, then upon the promiſing genius of the youth, of which he had given in the late feaſts of Saturn a glaring proof, and gained by it the favour and eſteem of all. Beſides many other innocent diverſions practiſed on that occaſion by the Roman youth of the like age and condition, it was an ancient cuſtom among them to chuſe a king, whoſe commands, what ever they were, the whole company was bound to obey. The king was choſen by lot, and in the palace, where the emperor, who was himſelf but a youth, Britannicus, and other children of the firſt quality, diverted themſelves with this paſtime; the lot fell upon Nero, who thereupon gave to all the reſt different commands, yet ſuch as expoſed them to no ridicule; but that to Britannicus was to ſtand up in the middle of the company, and then ſing a ſong. He hoped the boy, unaccuſtomed as he was to company, and quite ignorant how to behave himſelf in public, would become an object of laughter. But Britannicus, to the great ſurpriſe of all, with a becoming modeſty, and undiſturbed addreſs, though the eyes of the whole court were upon him, raiſed his voice, and ſung a few verſes importing that he was bereft of his natural inheritance, and unjuſtly deprived of the authority to which he was born.

Nero endeavours to expoſe Britannicus to ridicule.

The modeſt and comely aſpect of the youth, the deep concern which he betrayed in every note, and the reflections which all, who were preſent, made within themſelves, drew ſighs and tears from the whole company. Nero, ſtruck with the addreſs of the youth, but more with the verſes he ſung, immediately withdrew, as did all the reſt in ſilence, to give free vent to their grief in private, and let their tears flow unreſtrained. From that time, Nero conceived an irreconcileable hatred to the innocent youth, and being now alarmed at the threats of his mother, he reſolved to rid himſelf of one, whom he no longer looked upon as a brother, but as a competitor. But not daring openly to command the execution of a perſon of his rank, whom he could reproach with no crime, he ordered poiſon to be privately prepared, employing as his agent Julius Pollio, tribune of a prætorian cohort, in whoſe cuſtody was kept under condemnation for poiſoning the famous Locuſta, who had adminiſtered poiſon to Claudius. As for thoſe who were about the perſon of Britannicus, Agrippina had long ſince taken care, that they ſhould be ſuch as had no ſenſe of honour or honeſty. The doſe was therefore haſtily prepared by Locuſta, and adminiſtered to the young prince by the hands of his governors; but whether it was not powerful enough in itſelf, or, to prevent a diſcovery by its ſudden operation, it had been qualified, it was without effect, being voided by a loſeneſs. Hereupon Nero threatened the tribune with immediate death, and would have ordered Locuſta to be executed, purſuant to her former ſentence, for preferring her own ſafety to the ſecurity of the prince, had ſhe not undertaken to prepare a doſe, which ſhe engaged, ſhould diſpatch him as ſuddenly as a dagger. Accordingly the deadly potion, compounded of ſeveral poiſons, all of experienced energy and quickneſs, was prepared in a chamber next to the emperor's and in his preſence. The opportunity to give it him was taken while he was dining with the emperor; but at a ſeparate table, and more ſparingly ſerved, as it was the manner of the children of the reigning family, who were never admitted to the emperor's table, but took their meals apart with other young noblemen, not in a lying, but ſitting, poſture. Whatever the princes of the imperial family eat or drank, was firſt tried by a ſpecial officer of theirs, a taſter. To the end therefore, that neither this cuſtom might be omitted, nor the iniquity be diſcovered, by the death of both, the matter was thus concerted. To Britannicus drink was preſented without poiſon, and tried by the taſter, but ſcalding hot, and for that reaſon returned. It was then tempered with cold water, into which poiſon had been poured before-hand, of ſuch force and quickneſs in its operation, that Britannicus had ſcarce drunk it when he fell to the ground, bereft at once of ſpeech and life. Fear and trembling ſeized his companions; ſome inſtantly made off, but others, who comprehended the myſtery, remained with their eyes fixed ſtedfaſtly upon Nero, who with the air of one utterly ignorant, declared, that it was only an uſual fit of the falling ſickneſs, to which Britannicus had been ſubject from his early childhood, and that by degrees his ſight and underſtanding would return. Agrippina and the young prince's ſiſter Octavia were both preſent, but ſtrove to conceal their grief and ſurpriſe; wherein Octavia indeed topped her part, having learnt, however raw in years, art fully to diſſemble every ſymptom of grief and tenderneſs and every other affection of her ſoul. But Agrippina, ſenſible that her laſt refuge was ſnatched from her, could not help betraying manifeſt tokens of dread and conſternation. However, with diſguiſed looks, ſhe endeavoured to ſmother her concern; ſo that after a ſhort ſilence the gaiety of the entertainment was reſumed [t]. Suetonius tells us, that Titus afterwards emperor, being among the other young noblemen at table with Britannicus, when he drank the baneful potion, taſted it, but recovered after a lingering and dangerous illneſs [u]. This is no-ways conſiſtent, as every reader muſt perceive, with the detail, which Tacitus, of all the antient writers the moſt accurate, gives us of that remarkable incident.

Reſolves upon his deſtruction.

Britannicus poiſoned.

His funeral

Upon one and the ſame day were ſeen the untimely fate of Britannicus and his funeral pile, to which the corſe was conveyed in the evening, all things belonging to his funeral having been prepared before-hand. His remains were repoſited in the field of Mars without any pomp, ſolemnity, or even a funeral oration; though he was the laſt branch of the Claudian family, which had ſubſiſted in great ſplendor, and upon its own ſtock, without adoptions, ever ſince the time of Romulus, that is, for the ſpace of eight hundred and three years. During the funeral a violent and tempeſtuſhow-

[t] Idem, c. 16, 17. [u] Suet. in Tit. c. 2.

ſhower of rain fell, which the populace looked upon as a declaration of the wrath of the gods for ſuch a crying iniquity, while others, reflecting on the eternal diſſenſions of rival brothers, and the unſociable genius of ſovereignty, called it a pardonable crime [w]. Nero by an edict juſtified the haſty diſpatch of the obſequies, complained, that in Britannicus he had loſt the ſupport of a brother, and exhorted the fathers to cheriſh with the greater tenderneſs a prince, who alone ſurvived of a family, born to ſuſtain the ſovereign power. He then diſtributed the poſſeſſions of Britannicus, his palaces in Rome, his manors and villas throughout Italy, like ſpoils taken in war, among the chief perſons of his court, to purchaſe by ſuch donations their approbation, or at leaſt their ſilence. Tacitus tells us, that ſome were ſeverely cenſured for ſharing in theſe diſtributions, notwithſtanding the ſeverity and uprightneſs they profeſſed. He means, no doubt, Burrhus and Seneca; but endeavours to excuſe them, by adding, that they were perhaps conſtrained to accept the preſents by the authority of the emperor, who, being ſtung with the guilt of his own conſcience, hoped, that his crimes would be overlooked, if by largeſſes he could engage, as it were, in the ſame guilt, perſons of ſuch credit and reputation. In this diſtribution Nero did not forget his mother, but could by no liberalities calm her tempeſtuous ſpirit. She careſſed Octavia, the deceaſed prince's ſiſter and the emperor's wife; held frequently ſecret cabals with her confidents, and was on all hands amaſſing treaſure, as if ſhe had ſome great deſign to ſupport with it: ſhe paid great court to the tribunes and centurions, and received in the moſt obliging manner ſuch of the nobility as came to wait upon her. Theſe meaſures were known to Nero, who thereupon withdrew the prætorian guards, which attended her, as conſort of the late emperor and mother to this, and alſo the band of Germans, which, as a farther honour, had been added to the former: at the ſame time, he commanded her to quit the palace, and retire to the houſe, which had belonged to her grandmother Antonia. He repaired thither now and then to viſit her, but always ſurrounded with a croud of officers, and withdrew after a ſhort compliment. Agrippina was immediately deſerted in her new habitation; the throng of courtiers, who daily frequented her levee while ſhe lived in the palace, inſtantly vaniſhed;

Nero's hypocriſy.

Agrippina driven out of the palace.

[w] Tacit, c. 17.

vaniſhed; no one appeared to comfort her in her diſgrace, no one to viſit her, except a ſmall number of ladies, and theſe not from any friendſhip or affection, to which inſects, who frequent courts, are commonly no leſs ſtrangers than to virtue and honeſty, but to watch all the words and actions of the diſgraced princeſs, and carry them with the uſual aggravations of tale-bearers to the emperor. Among theſe was Julia Silana, whom Caius Silius had divorced, as we have related above, to marry Meſſalina. She was no leſs infamous for her lewdneſs than renowned on account of her high birth and extraordinary beauty; had been long dear to Agrippina, and had for a conſiderable while lived with her in great intimacy; but being afterwards diſguſted with her for diverting Sextius Africanus, a noble youth, from marrying her, ſhe reſolved now to make Agrippina pay dear for the wrong done her. With this view ſhe inſtructed two of her own creatures, Iturius and Calviſius, to accuſe her, as if ſhe deſigned to marry Rubellius Plautus, great-grandſon to Auguſtus, with a view to raiſe diſturbances in the ſtate. This was by Iturius and Calviſius imparted to Atimetus, the freedman of Domitia, Nero's aunt, and by him to Paris, the celebrated player, who was alſo Domitia's freedman. Paris haſtened to the emperor, laid before him a minute detail of the pretended conſpiracy, and ſo terrified him, that without any further enquiries, he reſolved not only to put his mother and Plautus to death, but to remove Burrhus, the captain of his guards, as one who owed his promotion to Agrippina. Some authors write, that a commiſſion was already diſpatched to Cæcina Thuſcus, intruſting him with the command of the prætorian bands; but that Burrhus retained his dignity by the intereſt and mediation of Seneca: others write, that no jealouſy was entertained of that officer's fidelity. However that be, Nero could not be diverted from the cruel purpoſe of killing his mother, till Burrhus took upon him to ſee her executed, in caſe ſhe were convicted of the crimes laid to her charge; but every one, he ſaid, ought to be heard before condemnation, and much more a mother. Early next morning, Burrhus and Seneca, attended by ſome of the emperor's freedmen to watch their diſcourſe, went to wait on Agrippina, and notify to her the charge brought againſt her, and give her the names of her accuſers. She received them with great haughtineſs, and when her crimes were explained to her, defended herſelf with her wonted fierceneſs, but at the ſame time with ſuch

She is accuſed unjuſtly.

Burrhus intercedes for her.

energy

energy, that Seneca and Burrhus, fully convinced of her innocence, not only declared her free from all guilt, but at her requeſt prevailed with the emperor to grant her an interview, during which ſhe took not the leaſt notice of the crimes laid to her charge, as if her innocence were ſufficiently known, nor of the obligations he owed her, leſt ſhe ſhould ſeem to reproach him with ingratitude; but confidently demanded, that vengeance ſhould be taken of her accuſers and ſuitable rewards conferred on her friends, and obtained both. Among her friends Fenius Rufus was honoured with the charge of ſupplying the city with corn; to Aruntius Stella was given the direction of certain public ſhews; to Caius Balbilius was aſſigned the government of Egypt, and that of Syria to Publius Anteius, who was nevertheleſs under various pretences detained at Rome. Of her accuſers, Silana, Calviſius, and Iturius were ſent into exile; againſt Atimetus ſentence of death was pronounced and executed; but Paris, the emperor's inſeparable companion in his debauchees, was diſmiſſed without any puniſhment [x]. This year Pallas and Burrhus were charged with a deſign of raiſing to the empire Cornelius Sylla, who had married Antonia, the late emperor's daughter; but the charge appearing evidently forged, they were both declared innocent. The arrogance of Pallas, however innocent, gave on this occaſion no ſmall offence; for the accuſer naming to him ſome of his freedmen, whom he pretended to have been his accomplices, the franchiſed ſlave had the impudence to anſwer, that he never condeſcended to ſpeak to any of his domeſtics, but conſtantly ſignified his pleaſure to them by a nod, a motion of his hand, or, if his commands conſiſted of many particulars, in writing, that they might thus learn to keep their diſtance. Burrhus, though accuſed, ſat and voted with the other judges, by whom the accuſer Petus was condemned to baniſhment. Towards the cloſe of the year, the emperor cauſed the cohort to be removed, which uſed to attend, as a guard, at the public ſports, to exhibit thereby a plauſible appearance of popular liberty, and alſo to prevent the ſoldiery from tainting their diſcipline with the licentiouſneſs of the theatre [y]. Such was Nero, during the firſt year of his reign, when he gloried in not having ſhed one drop of blood, as we learn from the books of clemency, which Seneca inſcribed to him ſome time after he had entered the nineteenth year of his age, that is, about the fifty-fifth of the Chriſtian æra. The chief aim of that excellent writer throughout the whole work is to imprint deeply in the mind of his pupil, that a general and extenſive beneficence is the genuine characteriſtic of a good prince; that thoſe who are entruſted with the ſovereign power, are not only bound to protect the innocent and guiltleſs, but often extend their mercy and good nature to thoſe who may ſeem unworthy of their favour and protection. This he inſinuates to have hitherto been practiſed by Nero, and relates a celebrated ſaying of the young prince, who being deſired by Burrhus to ſign a warrant for the execution of two public robbers, put it off from time to time; but Burrhus preſſing him to diſpatch that affair, he at laſt ſet his hand to the warrant with the utmoſt reluctance, which he expreſſed with the following words mightily extolled by Seneca: Oh had I never learnt to write [z]!

She is found innocent, and returns into favour.

The arrogance of Pallas.

[x] Tacit. c. 29—22. [y] Idem, c. 22—24.

A ſignal inſtance of Nero's clemency.

The following year, Quintus Voluſius Saturninus and P. Cornelius Scipio being conſuls, Nero began to induge with more liberty his youthful inclinations, his debauched companions, eſpecially Otho and Senecio, of whom we have ſpoken above, inceſſantly repeating in his ears, that he was no longer a child, to be awed by a Burrhus or a Seneca; that they ought to tremble before him, as their ſovereign, and not he before them, as his tutors and maſters, &c. A youth are more ſuſceptible of bad than good counſels, the young prince in ſpite of the wholeſome advice of his governors, abandoned himſelf to unſeaſonable revellings, and filled Rome with innumerable diſorders. For, unmindful of his rank and diſguiſed in the habit of a ſlave, he ſcoured in the night the ſtreets, the public inns, and the ſtews, followed by his debauched companions, who ſeized as a lawful prey whatever they found expoſed to ſale, and aſſaulted whomſoever they met. In theſe frolics he often ran great dangers, and once was ſo wounded in the face, that he ever afterwards bore the ſcar, no one imagining it was the emperor who thus roamed and rioted about the ſtreets. But when that came to be known, his name was falſly aſſumed as a cloak by others, who in ſeparate gangs practiſed the ſame exceſſes; ſo that ſuch combuſtions happened almoſt every night in the city, as if it had been ſtormed by an enemy.

Nero abandons himſelf to revelling and debauchery.

[z] Senec. de clem. l. ii. c. 1. Suet. c. 10.

enemy. The prince having one night offered ſome affront to a woman of diſtinction, as ſhe was returning home in the dark, her huſband, by name Julius Montanus, a ſenator, who attended her, not only repulſed the aggreſſor, but handled him ſo roughly, that he was for ſeveral days obliged to keep his room: Suetonius ſays, he was almoſt killed. However, he diſſembled this treatment ſo long as it remained unknown to whom it had been offered; but Montanus having at laſt diſcovered it was the emperor, and thereupon implored by a letter his forgiveneſs, Nero thinking he reproached him by owning he knew him, obliged him by threats and menaces to lay violent hands on himſelf. Thenceforth the emperor became more cautious, and was conſtantly attended in his nocturnal rambles by a party of his guards, and a numerous train of gladiators, following him at ſome diſtance, who, however, were ordered not to interpoſe, till the princes's party was quite overcome. He likewiſe took great delight in ſtirring up and inflaming the different factions in the play-houſe, that favoured particular players; and when they were engaged, as it were, in battle, it was a great diverſion to him to throw ſtones and pieces of broken benches among them, with which he once dangerouſly wounded a prætor in the head. Theſe tumults rent the whole city into parties and factions, ſome favouring one player, and ſome another; inſomuch that, greater and more dangerous commotions being apprehended, no other remedy was found, but that of driving the players out of Italy, and recalling the ſoldiers to guard the theatre at the celebration of the public ſhews [a]. Under the ſame conſuls, Vipſanius Lenas was accuſed of extortion in his government of Sardinia, and condemned to baniſhment: Ceſtius Proculus, charged with the ſame crime, was acquitted: Clodius Quirinalis, commander of the fleet which rode at Ravenna, being convicted of ſeveral acts of cruelty, prevented by poiſon his impending condemnation: Caninius Rebilus, one of the ableſt civilians and richeſt citizens in Rome, redeemed himſelf from the uneaſineſs of an old age broken with infirmities, by opening his veins, which was thought the more ſurpriſing, as he had ever been infamous for his effeminacy and laſciviouſneſs. The ſame year, died Lucius Voluſius Saturninus, in the ninety-third year of his age, a man of great great integrity, wealth, and intereſt, and nevertheleſs, what to Tacitus ſeems a kind of prodigy, never obnoxious to, or diſturbed by, any of the bloody emperors under whom he lived [b]. He was father to Quintus Voluſius, this year's conſul, who was born to him in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age: he was governor of Rome when he died [c].

Players driven out of Italy.

[a] Tacit. c. 25. Suet. c. 26. Dio, in excerpt, Val. p. 685.

Several inſtances of Nero's generoſity, good-nature, &c.

THE next conſuls were Nero, the ſecond time, and L. Calpurnius Piſo, who, after ſix months, reſigned the faſces to Ducennius Geminius and Pompeius Paulinus. This year Nero remitted the duty upon the ſale of ſlaves, diſtributed to the populace a largeſs of four hundred ſmall ſeſterces a man, and iſſued an edict, forbidding all governors of provinces to exhibit any public ſhews, being well appriſed, that ſuch acts of munificence were only deſigned to ſtop the mouths of the people, who in the end bore the whole charge; ſo that the liberality of the governors and their avarice concurred equally to undo them. He likewiſe conſented, with great readineſs, to a decree of the ſenate, enacting, that if any one was killed by his ſlaves, thoſe who had been manumitted, if they ſtill continued under the ſame roof, ſhould be executed with his other ſlaves. Lucius Varius, who had been conſul, but formerly degraded for extortion, he reſtored to his rank; and referred Pomponia Græcina, a lady of great diſtinction, but accuſed of having embraced a foreign ſuperſtition, ſays Tacitus, meaning probably the chriſtian religion, purſuant to the antient cuſtom, to the inquiſition of her huſband. She was married to Aulus Plautius, the ſame who, by his conqueſts in Britain in the reign of Claudius, had deſerved an ovation. Plautius aſſembled his relations, took together with them cognizance of the behaviour and reputation of his wife, and declared her innocent. P. Celer, was accuſed of many crimes by the province of Aſia; but as he had diſpatched by poiſon the proconſul Silanus, as we have related above, that crime covered all his other enormities; ſo that Nero, aſhamed to diſcharge him and unwilling to condemn him, lengthened out the proceſs till he died of old age. Eprius Marcellus was accuſed by the Lycians of extortion; but abſolved, though evidently guilty; nay, ſo powerful a faction was formed in his favour, that ſome of his accuſers were puniſhed with exile, as if they had conſpired the ruin of an innocent man.

The

[b] Tacit. c. 30. [c] Plin. l. vii. c. 8.

The Cilicians had better ſucceſs in the proſecution of Coſſutianus Capito, who, for his extortions, was condemned to baniſhment [c].

THE following year, Nero entered upon his third conſulſhip; but held it only four months. His collegue was Valerius Meſſala, to whom, as he was of an illuſtrious family but by misfortunes reduced to poverty, Nero generouſly preſented a yearly penſion of five hundred great ſeſterces. At the ſame time he aſſigned annual appointments to other ſenators, who did not deſerve them, having waſted their paternal wealth in voluptuouſneſs and riotous living. This year Publius Suilius, an abandoned accuſer, who had made a great figure during the reign of Claudius, and with his venal eloquence procured the ruin of many illuſtrious citizens, was arraigned of various crimes. He was charged with the death of Poppæa Sabina, of Julia the daughter of Druſus, Valerius Aſiaticus, of Lucius Saturninus, of Cornelius Lupus, and of whole bands of Roman knights condemned at his inſtigation; in ſhort, all the cruelties committed in the late reign were imputed to Suilius. In his defence he urged, that he had engaged in none of theſe accuſations of his own accord, but purely in obedience to the prince. But Nero checked this plea, by declaring, that from the memoirs of Claudius it evidently appeared, that no accuſation whatſoever had been undertaken by his orders. The accuſed then pleaded the commands of Meſſalina: but this too was reckoned a weak defence; for why, it was ſaid, had no other advocate but Suilius been ſingled out to accompliſh the bloody purpoſes of that proſtitute? Seneca ſeems to have been the chief and moſt ſanguine promoter of this proſecution; for againſt him chiefly Suilius inveighed, reproaching him with contaminating the beds of princeſſes, meaning Julia, Germanicus's daughter; with hunting after inheritances, and catching the rich and childleſs as it were, in his net; with his exhauſting all Italy and the provinces by his exceſſive uſury; with amaſſing, by what precept of wiſdom, by what principles of philoſophy, he ſaid, he knew not, a treaſure of more than ſeven millions, in the ſhort ſpace of four years. Theſe reproaches, ſays Tacitus, did not a little taint the reputation and character of his antagoniſt Seneca. Suilius, however, was condemned, and baniſhed

Relieves poor ſenators.

P. Suilius accuſed.

His invectives againſt Seneca.

[c] Tacit. c. 32—34.

niſhed to the Balearic iſlands on the coaſt of Spain. In hatred to him his ſon Nerulinus was alſo arraigned; but Nero interpoſed, alledging that public vengeance was ſufficiently ſatiated by the doom of the father [d]. This year was firſt kindled Nero's paſſion for the celebrated Poppæa Sabina; a paſſion which proved the ſource of heavy calamities to the Roman ſtate. She was the daughter of another Poppæa Sabina, put to death by Meſſalina's orders, as we have related above, and Titus Ollius, a ſenator. As Poppæus Sabinus, her mother's father, had ſhone in the republic, borne the conſular dignity, and been honoured with triumphal ornaments, ſhe borrowed his name, and called herſelf Poppæa Sabina; for to her own father the friendſhip of Sejanus had proved fatal, before he had attained to any dignity. She poſſeſſed every ornament becoming her ſex, except that of virtue; in beauty ſhe excelled all the women of her time; her wit, engaging addreſs, and ſprightly converſation charmed all who converſed with her. But her lewdneſs knew no bounds, nor was ſhe controuled in the purſuit of it by the awe of fame. Between huſband and adulterer ſhe made no diſtinction, ſays Tacitus, but was ever ready to gratify her own inclinations, without regarding any ties, however binding. Hence, tho' ſhe was married to Rufus Criſpinus, a Roman knight, and by him had a ſon, ſhe was not aſhamed to leave him, and live publicly with Otho, a gay youth and the emperor's reigning favourite. This commerce of adultery was ſoon followed by their marriage, Criſpinus readily conſenting to a divorce. Otho, now her huſband, was continually extolling to Nero the beauty and charms of his wife, being prompted thereunto either by the indiſcreet warmth of a lover, or by a deſire of kindling in the young princes's breaſt the like paſſion, and procuring, from their common enjoyment of the ſame woman, an additional ſupport to his preſent authority. Nero's paſſion was eaſily inflamed; he deſired to ſee Poppæa, an interview was appointed, and the emperor, in his firſt converſation with her, was ſo taken with her ſoft arts, with her addreſs and careſſes, that he carried her to the palace and there detained her. But the artful Poppæa, after a night or two, when ſhe had worked up the prince's affection to the higheſt pitch, changed her former behaviour into haughtineſs, importuning the emperor to let her return to her huſband, whom of all men ſhe thought the moſt deſerving, the moſt worthy of her affection. Here-

Poppæa Sabina her character.

She captivates Nero.

upon

[d] Idem, c. 42, 43.

upon Otho was immediately forbidden the palace, debarred of all intercourſe, and even acceſs to the emperor, and ſoon after, to prevent his having any communication with Poppæa, preferred to the government of Luſitania; a government which he adminiſtered for the ſpace of ten years with eminent uprightneſs and honour, having acquired no leſs reputation in authority, by his gravity and regular conduct, than he had deſerved infamy in a private ſtation, by a moſt voluptuous and diſſolute life • (C). Thus Nero enjoyed Poppæa without a rival, and was for ſome time entirely governed by pernicious and deſtructive councils, as we ſhall relate anon. This year Cornelius Sylla, who had married Antonia the daughter of Claudius, being falſly accuſed of forming a conſpiracy againſt the emperor, was baniſhed his country, as if he had been a traitor fully convicted, and confined

Otho ſent into Luſitania.

• Tacit. c. 45, 46. Suet. in Oth. c. 3. Joſeph. antiq. l. xx. c. 7.

(C) Suetonius tells us, that Nero, conceiving a paſſion for Poppæa, took her from her huſband, and ſent her to Otho, who, receiving her into his houſe under colour of marriage, was ſo taken with her charms, that he pretended to ingroſs her wholly to himſelf, and not only refuſed to admit ſuch as were ſent to her from Nero, but once ſhut out the emperor himſelf, tho' he earneſtly entreated him to deliver her up to him, and added menaces to his entreaties. Upon this Nero, to deliver himſelf from ſo troubleſome a rival, preferred him to the government of Luſitania, now Portugal, fearing that a more ſevere puniſhment might diſcover the whole intrigue; yet ſo far it was known, that the following lampoon was made and diſperſed;

Cur Otho mentito ſit, quæritis, exul honore?
Uxoris mœchus cæperat eſſe ſuæ.

That is, Why was Otho baniſhed under colour of an honourable preferment? Becauſe he became the adulterer of his own wife. Plutarch, in the life of Galba, tells us, that Nero would not have been ſatisfied with ſo ſlight a puniſhment, had not Seneca, who had a great friendſhip for Otho, prevailed upon the emperor to condemn him only to an honourable exile, which would put him in full poſſeſſion of his miſtreſs (39).

(39) Plut. in Galb.

confined within the walls of Marſeilles (D). The ſame year, as the people complained loudly of the arbitrary exactions of the publicans, Nero was for entirely ſuppreſſing all taxes and duties, thinking that the greateſt bounty he could beſtow upon mankind; but the ſenate, after many high encomiums on the greatneſs of his ſoul, reſtrained him, by remonſtrating, that the ſuppreſſion of all taxes muſt neceſſarily be attended with a diſſolution of the empire. The prince therefore contented himſelf with ordaining by an edict, that all the regulations relating to the revenues, which till then had been kept ſecret, ſhould be hung up in public, to the end every one might know the preciſe ſum he was to contribute; that the publicans ſhould exact no claims for above a year backward; that all cauſes againſt them ſhould be immediately heard and determined by the prætor at Rome, and in the provinces by the proprætors and proconſuls for the time being, with other the like entirely equitable injunctions, which, however, grew ſoon obſolete, tho' the ſuppreſſion of the quadrageſima or fortieth penny, and of the quinquageſima or fiftieth, as alſo of ſome other impoſitions, continued in force at leaſt till the reign of Adrian. At the ſame time, to encourage the tranſportation of grain from the tranſmarine provinces, it was ordained, that no duty ſhould be paid for the ſame [f].

Nero deſigns to ſuppreſs all taxes.

Iſſues ſeveral equitable regulations.

In

[f] Tacit, c. 51, 52. Suet. c. 10.

(D) Sylla was accuſed by one Graptus, Nero's freedman, an old, ſubtle, and wicked courtier, well practiſed, ever ſince the reign of Tiberius, in the dark devices of the emperors. He, upon this occaſion, forged the following plot. The Milvian bridge was then the ſcene of nocturnal revellings; and thither Nero frequently reſorted, that he might there the more licentiouſly riot without the city. Graptus therefore pretended, that a plot was laid for him, as he ſhould return from thence by the Flaminian way; but he had, by the providence of the gods eſcaped it in coming home through the gardens of Salluſt; and that Sylla was at the head of this conſpiracy. The only foundation of all this was, that certain debauched youths had in ſport filled with groundleſs fears ſome of the emperor's attendants, as they were repairing back to the palace. But Sylla was, by his marriage with Antonia, Claudius's daughter, nearly allied to the family of the Cæſars; and Nero miſtook his natural heavineſs and indolence, which rendered him unequal to any attempt of treaſon for deep artifice and diſſimulation; and hence his ruin (40).

(40) Tacit. ibid.

In Germany, affairs having continued in a ſtate of tranquillity till this time, the commanders of the Roman armies, having no enemy to contend with, kept their troops employed in various works. Paulinus Pompeius, who commanded in Lower Germany, perfected a dam, which Druſus had begun threeſcore and three years before, to reſtrain the overflowing of the Rhine. A modern writer places it in the neighbourhood of Duerſtede or Wick above Utrecht [g]. Lucius Vetus, who commanded in Upper Germany, undertook a work truly great, ſtupendous, and worthy of the Roman grandeur, which was to dig a canal of communication between the Sône and the Moſelle, that the armies from Italy, ſailing by ſea into the Rhone, and then into the Sône, might fall through this canal into the Moſelle, thence through the Rhine into the ocean; ſo that a communication might be opened between the Mediterranean and the ſaid ſea. But Ælius Gracilis, governor of Belgic Gaul, through which the Moſelle flowed, jealous of the glory which Vetus would have acquired by ſo great and uſeful an undertaking, warned him not to bring his troops into another man's province, and at the ſame time threatened him with the diſpleaſure of the emperor, who would be alarmed at ſuch an enterprize, imagining it undertaken with a private view to court the affections of the Gauls. Thus was that glorious project dropped [h]. Theſe things ſeem to have happened in the firſt year of Nero's reign; for our hiſtorian relates in this place the tranſactions of ſeveral years. Afterwards, that is, according to Onuphrius, in the third year of the ſame prince's reign, Paulinus being ſucceeded by Dubius Avitus, and Vetus by T. Curulius Mancias, the Friſians, under the conduct of Verritus and Malarigis, poſſeſſed themſelves of certain lands, which, being void of inhabitants, had been applied to the uſe of the Roman ſoldiers, who were wont to ſend their horſes and cattle to graze there. They had already founded their dwellings and ſown their fields, when Avitus threatened to drive them from thence, unleſs they firſt obtained from the emperor a grant of thoſe territories. Hereupon the two chiefs proceeded to Rome, where, while they waited for acceſs to Nero, among the ſeveral ſights which were uſually exhibited to ſtrangers, they were conducted to Pompey's theatre, to aſſiſt at a public ſhew. There, while they were gazing round round them, ſurveying with aſtoniſhment the multitudes of people, and informing themſelves which were the Roman knights, where ſat the ſenators, &c. They ſpied certain perſons in a foreign dreſs ſitting among the latter, and aſked who they were? This is a diſtinction, anſwered the interpreter, conferred by the Roman people on the embaſſadors of ſuch nations, as have ſignalized their bravery in war and fidelity towards us. If ſo replyed the two chiefs, we claim a right to ſit there too; for amongſt men there is not a nation, which in fidelity and feats of arms ſurpaſſes the Germans; and thus leaving their ſeats, they placed themſelves amongſt the ſenators; a proceeding highly applauded by the numerous aſſembly, as the effect of an honeſt emulation. Nero honoured them both with the rights of Roman citizens; but commanded them to abandon their new poſſeſſions: which their countrymen refuſing to do, Avitus, by a ſudden irruption, put many of them to the ſword, and forced the reſt to comply with the emperor's orders[t].

The ſtate of affairs on the Rhine.

The Friſians poſſeſs themſelves of lands belonging to the Romans.

[g] Buch. de Belg. l. v. c. 5. [h] Tacit. c. 53.

Are driven from thence by Avitus.

Some time after, the Anſibarii, being driven out of their own country by the Chauci, took poſſeſſion of the ſame lands, being ſupported by the neighbouring nations, who pitied their forlorn condition, and led by a man of great renown and of known fidelity towards the Romans, his name Boiocalus. He alledged to Avitus, in behalf of himſelf and his people, that upon the revolt of the Cheruſci, when Varus and his legions were ſlaughtered, he had been thrown into bonds by Arminius; that he had afterwards ſerved under Tiberius, then under Germanicus, and, to the merit of forty years ſervice, was ready to add that of ſubmitting his people to the empire of Rome. He remonſtrated, that the territory in diſpute was large and lay waſte; that he might allow to an unhappy people, driven from their own habitations, ſettlements in it, and at the ſame time retain wide tracts for the horſes and cattle of the Roman ſoldiers to graze and range in; that it was inconſiſtent with humanity to famiſh men in order to feed their beaſts, and with religion to devote to diſmal deſerts and ſolitude any part of the earth, which was by the gods appropriated to the children of men; that ſuch parts of it as none poſſeſſed, were free and common to all. Then lifting up his eyes to the ſun and the other celeſtial luminaries, he aſked them, how they could bear to behold a deſolate ſoil? and would they not more juſtly let looſe the ſea to ſwallow up uſurpers who thus engroſſed the earth? Avitus, provoked at this language, made no other reply, than that the weakeſt muſt ſubmit to the more powerful; and that ſince the gods, to whom they appealed, had left the ſovereign judgment to the Romans, other judges than themſelves they would ſuffer none. This anſwer he gave in public; but to Boiocalus in private he offered lands, as an acknowledgment of his long attachment to the Romans. But this offer the brave German looked upon as a price propoſed for betraying his people, and rejected it with indignation, adding, "A place to live in we may want, but a place to die in we cannot." Thus they parted with mutual animoſity. The Anſibarii invited into a confederacy the bordering nations; but Curtilius Mancias, who commanded in Upper Germany, paſſing the Rhine at the head of his legions, threatened them with deſolation and ſlaughter, if they lent any aſſiſtance to the enemies of Rome. On the other hand, they were awed by Avitus, who likewiſe appeared with his legions on the banks of the Rhine; ſo that the unhappy Anſibarii, deſerted by all, had recourſe to the Uſipetes, the Tubantes, the Catti, and the Cheruſci, begging leave to ſettle in their territories; but being every-where driven out as enemies and intruders, in theſe long and various wanderings the people periſhed [k]. This year, the Juhones, a people in alliance with Rome, who are ſuppoſed to have inhabited the countries of Naſſau and Iſemburg, were afflicted with the ſudden eruption of a ſubterraneous fire, which conſumed their farms, towns, and dwellings, and was advancing with great fury to the walls of Cologn, when certain boors, after having in vain attempted to extinguiſh it with the throwing of water and other uſual expedients, tranſported with rage, vented their wrath by attacking it at a diſtance with vollies of ſtones. This, to their great ſurprize, allayed its fury; which no ſooner began to abate, than they proceeded to a cloſer attack with clubs and blows, as in an encounter with an enemy, and at length, which was ſtill more ſurpriſing, they quite got the better of the devouring conflagration, by throwing their garments upon it [l]. This year, Domitius Corbulo, the greateſt general of his age, completed the reduction of Armenia, by driving from thence Tiridates, brother to Vologeſes king of the Parthians, and making himſelf maſter of Artaxata, the

The Anſibarii poſſeſs themſelves of the ſame lands.

[t] Idem. c. 54.

But are utterly exterminated.

Armenia reduced by Corbulo.

[k] Idem, c. 57. [l] Idem ibid. Buragh. numiſ. p. 92.

the moſt important place of the whole kingdom. Of the glorious exploits of this brave officer, we have given a diſtinct account in our hiſtory of Armenia; and therefore, not to treſpaſs upon the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we ſhall only add here, that for the ſucceſs which had attended Corbulo's arms, Nero was proclaimed emperor, and by a decree of the ſenate days of public thankſgiving were appointed, with ſtatues of victory to the prince, triumphal arches, and perpetuity of the conſulſhip. It was moreover decreed, that the day when the city of Artaxata was taken, the day when the news arrived at Rome, and the day which produced that decree, ſhould all be for ever kept as feſtivals. This motion was oppoſed by Caius Caſſius, who argued, that were every inſtance of public proſperity to be attended with public thankſgiving, the whole year would not afford days enough for days of devotion; a juſt diſtribution ought therefore to be made between days of devotion and days of buſineſs, that the worſhip of the gods might not interfere with the occupations of men [m].

HITHERTO Nero's adminiſtration was univerſally applauded, and is generally cried up by hiſtorians: nay, Trajan, an excellent prince, is ſaid to have propoſed to himſelf the five firſt years of Nero's reign as the moſt accompliſhed model of an equitable government [n]. This, if true, muſt no doubt, be underſtood under ſeveral reſtrictions. But however that be, this year, the ſixth of his reign, when Caius Vipſanius Apronianus and Caius Fonteius Capito were conſuls, produced an inſtance of the blackeſt and moſt unnatural iniquity recorded in hiſtory, that of a mother murdered by a ſon, who was indebted to her not only for his life, but for the empire, and that very power, which by an apoſtaſy from nature, he impiouſly employed againſt her. This horrid attempt, which will render the name of Nero execrable to the lateſt poſterity, we ſhall relate, as it has been tranſmitted to us by the moſt unexceptionable hiſtorians of antiquity. Agrippina had, after the late groundleſs charge brought againſt her, in ſome degree regained the emperor's favour, and continued to bear no ſmall ſway at court, till Poppæa was introduced there. That ambitious proſtitute aimed at nothing leſs than ſolemnly marrying the emperor; but as ſhe could never hope to ſee Octavia divorced nor herſelf honoured with imperial wedlock during the life of Agrippi [m] Tacit. c. 34. [n] Aur. Vict. in epit.

Agrippina, ſhe made it her whole ſtudy to inflame Nero againſt her, ſometimes jeering him by the ſarcaſtical name of pupil, one blindly ſubject to the capricious humour of a woman, and ſo far from being ſuffered to ſway the empire, that he was not allowed that liberty, which every private Roman enjoyed as his birth-right. As for herſelf, ſhe deſired to be reſtored to the conjugal embraces of Otho, that ſhe might in any corner of the earth rather hear of the emperor's abaſement and reproach, than ſtay to behold it. She added atrocious calumnies againſt Agrippina, as if ſhe deſigned to attempt upon his life; and threatened to abandon him, that ſhe might not be with him expoſed to the dangers that ſurrounded him. Her complaints and expoſtulations, enforced with ſighs, tears, and all the ſoft artifices, which the deceitful adultreſs poſſeſſed in an eminent degree, pierced the ſoul of Nero, and in behalf of Agrippina no one interpoſed, all at court being overjoyed to ſee her authority cruſhed, and no one imagining the ſon would ever be hardened to ſuch a pitch of iniquity, as inhumanly to ſpill the blood of his mother [o].

Poppæa inflames Nero againſt his mother.

In the mean time, Agrippina, well appriſed of the views and artifices of Poppæa, left nothing unattempted, which thirſt of power could ſuggeſt to retain her wonted dominion. Authors, who lived in thoſe times, and to whoſe authority Tacitus pays great deference, tell us, that the luſt of ruling tranſported her to ſuch extravagant and almoſt incredible lengths, that while Nero was well heated with wine and banqueting, ſhe accoſted him gayly attired; and, without any regard to fame or modeſty, prompted him, we relate it with horror! to a crime no leſs repugnant to nature, than that which he ſoon after committed. Seneca, who was preſent, obſerving the prince, while he was thus drunk, inclined to yield to the ſolicitations of his mother, for an antidote againſt the enticements of one woman, had recourſe to another, and introduced Acte. By this means the unnatural abomination was prevented; but the reputation of Seneca ſomewhat tarniſhed, who might, by ſome other expedient more worthy of a philoſopher, have diverted the prince from ſo monſtrous an impurity. Fabius Ruſticus, a writer of thoſe times, aſcribes this unheard-of paſſion, not to Agrippina, but to Nero, and adds, that he was reſcued from

By what impious means Agrippina ſtrove to retain her power.

[o] Tacit. l. xiv. c. 1. Dio, l. lxviii.

from ſo great an infamy by Acte. But in the detail we have given, all other authors agree, and it was moreover confirmed in Tacitus's time by the teſtimony of popular fame. Be that as it will, Nero dreading the infamy, which the bare ſuſpicion of ſuch a deteſtable iniquity would reflect on his character, and being told, that the ſoldiery would never bear the rule of a prince thus contaminated, began thenceforth to avoid all private conferences with his mother; which gave Poppæa a favourable opportunity of inflaming him more and more againſt her, till at length ſhe worked him to a reſolution of delivering himſelf by a parricide from one, who, ſhe ſaid, was his dread and his torment. He was now therefore only in ſuſpenſe about the means of diſpatching her, whether by poiſon, by the ſword, or by any other effectual method. That of poiſon was preferred at firſt; but to adminiſter it was thought difficult; for if it were done at the prince's table, her death would never be believed ſudden and accidental, ſince in the like manner Britannicus had already periſhed. To apply to her own domeſtics appeared dangerous. As ſhe was a woman long acquainted with frauds and blood, ſhe was upon her guard againſt all ſnares, and armed by counter-poiſons againſt the operation of poiſon. How to diſpatch her with the ſword and cover the execution, no one could contrive. It was feared too, that none could be found ſufficiently hardened for the execution of ſuch iniquitous orders. In this perplexity, Anicetus proffered his ſervice and his dexterity. He was a franchiſed ſlave, had been tutor to Nero in his infancy; but was now commander of the fleet which rode at Miſenum. As he was an implacable enemy to Agrippina, and Agrippina to him, he undertook to contrive a veſſel ſo, that, by a ſudden and artificial burſting in the open ſea, it ſhould overwhelm and drown her, without the leaſt warning or apprehenſion. If ſhe were thus diſpatched by ſhipwreck, no one, he ſaid, could aſcribe her death to the malice and contrivance of men. Nero was pleaſed with this device the more, becauſe he had a favourable opportunity to put it in execution, as he was then celebrating at Baiæ the ſolemn feſtival of Minerva called Quinquatrus, which began on the nineteenth of March, and laſted five days. In order to entice his mother thither, he pretended a deſire to be reconciled to her, declaring, that children ought to bear with the humours of their parents; and that, for himſelf, it behoved him to forget all paſt provocations, and be ſincere reconci

Nero reſolves to deſtroy her.

Is in ſuſpenſe about the means.

He pretends kindneſs for her.

reconciled to a tender mother, whoſe gift was the power and empire which he ſwayed. A general rumour of this pretended diſpoſition was immediately ſpread abroad, reached Agrippina, and found credit with her, women being naturally prone to believe what feeds their wiſhes, and promiſes matter of joy. At the ſame time, he wrote a letter to her, filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of filial affection and duty, inviting her to paſs the feſtival with him at Baiæ. Agrippina, not ſuſpecting any treachery, tho' well practiſed in the dark devices of the court, deferred no longer her departure; but embarking at Antium, where ſhe then was, ſailed to Bauli (E), an imperial villa between the cape of Miſenum and the gulf of Baiæ. Thither Nero haſtened to receive her, met her upon the ſhore, preſented her his hand, embraced her and conducted her to the caſtle. Not far from the ſhore, amongſt ſeveral other veſſels belonging the emperor and the noblemen of his court, rode that which had been contrived by Anicetus, more pompous and gaudy than the reſt, as if Nero by that diſtinction intended freſh honour to his mother. But ſhe having had ſome intimation of the plot, tho' doubtful whether ſhe ſhould believe it or not, when invited on board, declared ſhe choſe to go to Baiæ by land; and accordingly was carried thither in a ſedan. Upon her arrival, the behaviour of Nero, obliging beyond expreſſion and free from all manner of affectation, allayed her fears; for Nero, during His prodigious falſhood and ſhew of filial tenderneſs.

(E) This villa belonged firſt to Hortenſius the celebrated orator, and afterwards to Antonia, the wife of Druſus (41). At this time it was poſſeſſed by the emperor, and long after by Symmachus, who deſcribes it, and gives the etymology of its name in the following verſes:

Huc deus Alcides ſtabulanda armenta coegit
Eruta Geryonis de lare tergemini.
Inde recens ætas corrupta Bauli Baulos
Nuncupat; occulto nominis indicio.
Ab Divo ad proceres dominos fortuna cucurrit;
Fama loci obſcuros ne pateretur heros.
Hanc celebravit opum felix Hortenſius aulam;
Contra Arpinatem qui ſtetit eloquio.

(41) Plin. l. ix. c. 55.

ing her ſtay there, treated her with the utmoſt magnificence, yielded to her at table the moſt honourable place, entertained her with great variety of diverſions, granted her all the favours ſhe aſked in behalf of herſelf or her friends, and, in converſing with her, broke ſometimes out into ſallies of youthful gaiety, diſcourſing at other times with a compoſed and grave air of weighty affairs, as if he repoſed in her an entire confidence and ſought her counſel. Having with theſe inſnaring careſſes, and hollow fondneſs, removed all her ſuſpicions, he drew out the laſt banquet till the night was far ſpent; and in the mean time gave private orders to the commander of one of his galleys, to run foul of that which had conveyed Agrippina to Bauli and diſable it, that ſhe might be obliged to embark in the fatal veſſel. When the banquet was over, Nero acquainted her with the misfortune which had happened to her own veſſel, begged her to accept of the other, and ordered the admiral himſelf, Anicetus, to attend her to Antium. The emperor attended her in perſon to the ſhore, and at parting hung upon her neck, kiſſing her eyes, kiſſing her boſom with ſuch tenderneſs, that he left it uncertain, as our hiſtorian obſerves, whether he meant by that paſſionate behaviour to cloak his horrid deſign, or whether his ſpirit, however fierce and ſavage, could not withſtand the more powerful efforts of nature, at the laſt ſight of a mother juſt going to periſh [p].

The ſea proved ſmooth and calm, the night clear, and the ſtars ſhone in full luſtre, as if all this, ſays our hiſtorian, had been concerted by the providence of the gods, that ſo black a murder might not remain undiſcovered, by being aſcribed to the malignity of winds and waves. Agrippina, when ſhe embarked, was attended only by two perſons, Creperejus Gallus, who ſtood in the ſteerage, and a lady named Aceronia Polla, who lay at her feet, and was entertaining her with the pleaſing diſcourſe of the remorſe of her ſon and his ſincere reconciliation, when all on a ſudden upon a ſignal given, the deck over that quarter was looſened; and being purpoſely loaded with a great quantity of lead, ſunk violently down and cruſhed Creperejus to death. Agrippina and Aceronia were defended by the poſts of the bed where they lay, which happened to be too ſtrong to yield yield to the weight; neither did the veſſel open as had been concerted, ſuch of the mariners as had not been intruſted with the plot, obſtructing the meaſures of thoſe who were. The latter, finding this expedient defeated, ſtrove to bear the veſſel down on one ſide, and to ſink her; but the other mariners, not privy to the deſign, at the ſame time ſtruggling to preſerve her, by ballancing the contrary way, ſhe was not at once ſwallowed up, but ſunk by degrees; ſo that Agrippina and Aceronia fell ſoftly into the ſea. The latter ſcreaming out, for the more ſpeedy relief, that ſhe was Agrippina, and paſſionately calling upon the mariners to ſuccour the prince's mother, was by them purſued with their poles and oars, and ſo ſlain. Agrippina never opened her mouth, and being therefore leſs known, eſcaped, with one wound only on her ſhoulder; and, what with ſwimming, what with the timely aſſiſtance of ſome fiſher-boats which rowed out to ſuccour her, reached the lake Lucrinus, and was thence conveyed to her own villa. There reflecting upon the danger which ſhe had eſcaped, the fate of Aceronia, miſtaken for herſelf and deſignedly ſlain, the manner in which the veſſel, under the ſhelter of the ſhore, not toſſed by winds, nor ſtriking upon rocks, had yielded in its upper part and been purpoſely overſet, ſhe concluded, that for this very end ſhe had been enticed by the fradulent letters of her ſon, and for this treated by him with ſuch extraordinary marks of honour. However, ſhe thought it adviſeable to diſſemble the whole, and however well appriſed of theſe black devices, to act as if ſhe ſaw them not. With this view ſhe diſpatched Agerinus her freed-man, to acquaint the emperor with the danger ſhe had eſcaped by the providence of the gods and his imperial fortune, and to entreat him, that, however alarmed at the misfortune which had threatened his mother, he would poſtpone the trouble of viſiting her; for what ſhe only ſtood in need of at preſent was reſt. In the mean time, diſguiſing her fear and counterfeiting perfect ſecurity, ſhe cauſed her wound to be dreſſed; and calling for the laſt will of Aceronia, ordered all her effects to be regiſtered and ſealed up [q].

[p] Tacit. c. 4. Suet. c. 34. Dio. l. lxi. p. 695.

Agrippina deſignedly ſhipwrecked.

She eſcapes.

And diſſembles her apprehenſions.

As to Nero, he had paſſed the night in great uneaſineſs and anxiety, attending the ſucceſs of his deſign; and while he was hourly expecting expreſſes to appriſe him, that the parricide was executed, tidings arrived, that his mother had eſcaped, only with a ſlight wound. At this he was ſtruck with terror and diſmay, not doubting, but her fierce ſpirit, bent upon haſty revenge, would either arm the ſlaves, ſtir up the rage of the ſoldiery againſt him, or recur with a tragical repreſentation of the whole plot to the ſenate and people. Thus terrified and diſmayed, he immediately ſent for Burrhus and Seneca, who perhaps had not before, ſays Tacitus, been acquainted with the conſpiracy. To them he notified his diſappointment, and told them, that in the preſent emergency, he had no reſource, no protection, no one to adviſe with, but them. They both kept long ſilence, either becauſe they thought it was in vain to diſſuade him from a deſign on which they ſaw him bent, or becauſe they believed matters already puſhed ſo far, that unleſs Agrippina ſoon periſhed, Nero certainly muſt. At length Seneca, who uſed always to ſpeak the firſt, looked at Burrhus, as if he aſked him, whether orders for the diſpatching of Agrippina might not be truſted to the ſoldiery under his command? Burrhus underſtood him, and anſwered, that the prætorian guards were ſo zealouſly attached to the name of the Cæſars, ſo fond of the family and memory of Germanicus, that they would never engage in any cruel or bloody attempt againſt their deſcendents. He added, that Anicetus ought to accompliſh what he had begun. Anicetus undertook without heſitation to acquit himſelf of his engagement; and Nero crying out, that Anicetus preſented him that day with the empire, urged him to uſe diſpatch, taking with him whom he pleaſed to aſſiſt him. In the mean time, Agerinus arriving from Agrippina, with the news of her diſaſter and eſcape, was immediately admitted to the emperor, by whoſe orders, as he was delivering his meſſage, a dagger was dropped between his legs; and then, as if he had been ſent to murder the prince, he was immediately loaded with irons, and dragged to priſon. This fable was forged to ſupport another; for Nero intended to give out, that his deſtruction had been concerted by his mother, and that ſhe, upon the diſcovery of her treaſon, had put an end to her own life, to avoid the puniſhment ſhe deſerved [h].

[q] Tacit, c. 5. Dio, p. 695.

Nero's fears upon the eſcape of his mother.

Anicetus undertakes to finiſh the murder.

In the mean time, the danger which threatened Agrippina at ſea, and was looked upon as the effect of chance, flying abroad, the people from all quarters flocked to the ſho

Zeal of the populace upon diſcovering her danger.

[h] Tacit. c. 6. Dio. p. 695. Suet. ibid.

ſhore to aſſiſt her; ſome crouded into barques and ſkiffs; others entered the ſea, and waded as deep as their height would permit; nay, ſome ſtretched out their arms, as it were to catch and receive her: ſo that the whole coaſt reſounded with lamentations for her misfortune, vows for her deliverance, and the indiſtinct clamour of a multitude, ſolicitous about her ſafety. When they underſtood, that ſhe was out of danger, they all haſtened to congratulate her upon her eſcape. But, in the mean time, Anicetus arriving with an armed band of mariners, they all diſperſed; and the franchiſed ſlave, having beſet the villa with a guard, burſt open the gates, ſecured ſuch of her ſlaves as offered to ſtop him, and advanced to the very door of her chamber, which he found guarded by a ſmall number of her friends, who, at the ſight of ſo many armed men, betook themſelves to flight, and left her with one maid only, who lay in the room with her. She was already very anxious and uneaſy, that no ſoul had yet arrived from her ſon, nor had even Agerinus returned, when ſhe heard a ſudden noiſe and tumult at the door of her chamber; which ſo terrified her maid, that ſtarting up, ſhe too was about to depart; which Agrippina perceiving, Thou likewiſe, ſaid ſhe, art going to abandon me: and that moment Anicetus, having forced open the door, entered her chamber, accompanied by Herculeus, captain of a galley, and Oloaritus, a centurion of the navy. The princeſs, tho' well appriſed of their deſign, yet addreſſing them with great intrepidity, "If you are come, ſaid ſhe, from the emperor, to be informed of my health, I can acquaint him that I am well refreſhed and recovered; if upon any bloody deſign, I will never believe you commiſſioned by my ſon; my ſon cannot command a parricide." But the aſſaſſins, without returning her any anſwer, placed themſelves round her bed; for in her chamber was a ſmall light, and Herculeus the firſt diſcharged a blow upon her head with a great club. Oloaritus the centurion inſtantly drew his ſword to diſpatch her; but ſhe, notwithſtanding the blow ſhe had received, ſtarting up, preſented her belly, crying with a loud voice, "Strike me here; this carried and brought forth ſuch a monſter as Nero." In uttering theſe words, ſhe was pierced with a multitude of wounds, and expired [i]. In theſe particulars all authors agree; ſome add, that Nero afterwards ſurveyed

Her houſe beſet with armed men.

Her murder.

[i] Tacit. c. 7, 8. Dio, p. 696. Suet. c. 34.

the naked body of his mangled mother, viewed her limbs, and extolled their ſymmetry and beauty; but this is denied by others, and ſeems inconſiſtent with the concern which he afterwards ſhewed. That very night her corſe was burnt without any pomp or ſolemnity, being carried to the pile upon no other bed than that which ſhe lay upon at her meals. Her bones were interred by her domeſtics, who, after the death of Nero, raiſed her a vulgar tomb upon the road to cape Miſenum, adjoining to a villa which formerly belonged to Cæſar the dictator. Mneſter, one of her freed-men, as ſoon as her funeral pile was lighted, run himſelf thro' with a ſword, whether from grief and affection for her, or from dread of ſome terrible doom, which he apprehended hanging over his head, was never known. Thus died the celebrated Agrippina, daughter to Germanicus, grand-daughter to Agrippa, and great grand-daughter to Auguſtus, ſiſter to one emperor, wife to another, and mother to a third. This doom ſhe had deſerved by a long train of crying iniquities, long before it overtook her; nay, we are told, that ſhe was warned of it many years before by the Chaldeans, who being conſulted by her concerning the fortune of Nero, and anſwering, that he would certainly reign and kill his mother; "Let him kill me, ſaid ſhe, ſo he do but reign" [k].

Her end foretold long before

The ſcene of this horrible iniquity being over, the emperor began to reflect within himſelf on the enormity of his guilt; a mother inhumanly murdered, to whom he owed his life and empire! With this thought he paſſed the reſt of the night in dreadful agonies, now dumb, motionleſs, with his eyes fixed, then ſtarting up amazed and trembling. Thus wild and ghaſtly, he waited the return of day, which, he apprehended, would bring upon him ſome dreadful and final doom. Burrhus was the firſt who afforded him ſome comfort in the midſt of theſe horrors, by perſuading the tribunes and centurions under his command to congratulate the prince upon his thus happily eſcaping the enormous treaſon deviſed by his mother. Their example was followed, firſt by the emperor's friends, and next by the neighbouring communities of Campania, who teſtified their joy by ſacrifices to the gods, and embaſſies to the prince. Nero himſelf, by a quite oppoſite diſſimulation, pretended to be inconſolably grieved for the death of his mother, anſwering thoſe wh

Nero's agonies upon her death.

He affects ſorrow.

[k] Tacit. c. 9. Dio, Suet. ibid.

who ſtrove to comfort him, that he hated a life, which upon ſuch terms had been ſaved. However, as the face and aſpect of places cannot change like the countenances of men, the ſight of that coaſt and thoſe ſhores, where the parricide had been perpetrated, filled him with continual horrors; beſides, there were ſome, who imagined they heard horrid ſhrieks and wailings from Agrippina's tomb, and a mournful ſound of trumpets from the neighbouring clifts and hills. Nero therefore flying from ſuch tragical places, which inceſſantly reproached him with the crying greatneſs and enormity of his crime, withdrew to Naples, whence he ſent letters to the ſenate, acquainting them, that Agerinus, a freedman of Agrippina, had been ſent by her to aſſaſſinate him; but had been timely apprehended, and that ſhe had thereupon laid violent hands on herſelf, with the ſame guilty conſcience which had prompted her to attempt upon the life of her ſon. To this he added a detail of her crimes traced a long way back; he even aſcribed to her all the vile meaſures and black iniquities of the reign of Claudius, and concluded, that her death ought to be looked upon as a public bleſſing, and aſcribed to the auſpicious fortune of the Roman ſtate. This letter was compoſed by Seneca, who thereupon was ſeverely cenſured, and indeed not undeſervedly, by all men of honour and virtue. No one believed the pretended conſpiracy; but nevertheleſs the ſenators, with wonderful heat and competition, ſtrove to ſurpaſs one another in decreeing new honours to Nero on this occaſion. The following ſolemnities were therefore ordained, that at all the altars public devotions ſhould be obſerved; that the feaſt of Minerva, during which the conſpiracy was detected, ſhould be celebrated with anniverſary plays for ever; that the ſtatue of that goddeſs in gold ſhould be placed in the ſenate-houſe, and cloſe by it that of the emperor; and laſtly, that the anniverſary of Agrippina ſhould be inſerted in the number of unlucky days. Thraſea Pætus, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the courſe of this reign, walked out of the ſenate as ſoon as the emperor's letter was read, chuſing rather to provoke the vengeance of Nero, than give his aſſent to ſuch ſervile, flattering, and iniquitous decrees; but there was not a man in the ſenate, who had ſo much honour and integrity as to follow his example. And now Nero, to heighten the public hatred towards his mother and blacken her memory,

He charges her with many crimes.

The flattery of the ſenate.

Endeavours to blacken her memory.

as if ſhe had checked his natural inclination to mercy, reſtored to their native country and eſtates ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who had been formerly by her doomed to exile. He likewiſe pardoned Iturius and Calviſius, of whom we have ſpoken above, and ſuffered the body of Lollia Paulina, who had ended her courſe at Tarentum, to be brought home, and repoſited in the tomb of her illuſtrious anceſtors. Notwithſtanding theſe acts of clemency, the emperor could not prevail upon himſelf to return to Rome, dreading to appear, after his parricide, before the ſenate and people. But the abandoned profligates of his court, and no court upon earth, ſays Tacitus, ever abounded with more, aſſured him, that the very name of Agrippina was generally abhorred; inſomuch that, by her death, he had ſecured for ever the affections both of the people and ſenate. Hereupon he proceeded to Rome, where he was received with a more forward and officious zeal, than even his flattering courtiers had promiſed him. The ſeveral tribes in diſtinct bodies came forth to meet him, and likewiſe the ſenate in their robes, with mighty crouds of women and children, ranged into ſeparate claſſes according to their ſex and age. Where-ever he paſſed, plays and ſhews were exhibited with all the pomp and parade of a ſolemn triumph. Elated with pride upon ſuch a reception, he repaired, like a triumphant victor to the capitol, and there paid his vows and oblations [l]. But all theſe tokens of joy and approbation could not ſmother the reproaches of his own conſcience; the horrors of his guilt never forſook him; he owned, that the furies purſued him with ſtripes, and rage, and burning torches; his dread was ſometimes ſo great, that every joint of him trembled; he applied to the magicians, and endeavoured by one of their ſacrifices, to call up the ghoſt of his mother, and entreat her to forgive him; nay, ſome time after, when he travelled into Greece, tho' he was mighty deſirous of aſſiſting at the Eleuſine ceremonies, yet his heart failed him, and he withdrew as ſoon as he heard the crier commanding, with a loud voice, all impious and profane perſons to depart [m].

He is received at Rome with extraordinary flattery.

As no one would take upon him to give the emperor wholſome advice; but, on the contrary, all conſpired to deceive him with ſervile flattery, and to commend even moſt enormous exceſſes, he abandoned himſelf without controul to all his extravagant paſſions. He was chiefly fond of two diverſions, both highly unbecoming his rank and ſtation, viz. of driving a chariot and ſinging to the harp in a theatrical habit. Seneca and Burrhus had thought it adviſeable to indulge him from the beginning in the former, in order to divert him from the latter, which they thought a more ſhameful and unmanly employment. Thus a piece of ground in the Vatican was incloſed with a wall, that he might exert his dexterity in driving, without being expoſed to the view of a promiſcuous croud of ſpectators; but now he was deſirous of being publicly ſeen, and even invited to the ſight the populace, who failed not to magnify him with encomiums and loud acclamations. As the emperor imagined, that by bringing many others under the ſame infamy he ſhould leſſen his own, he introduced, as actors, into the theatre, ſeveral noble Romans, deſcended from illuſtrious families, but decayed and through indigence become venal. He likewiſe engaged with great rewards ſeveral Roman knights to undertake the acting of parts in public repreſentations. However, that he might not yet debaſe himſelf in the common theatre, he inſtituted a ſort of plays called juvenales, which were exhibited in private houſes or gardens, perſons of the firſt quality, nay, many who had borne the chief offices in the ſtate, acting in them, and degrading themſelves to imitate the port and buffoonry of the Greek and Roman mimics, even in their moſt obſcene geſticulations. The contagion even reached ladies of the greateſt diſtinction, who, in imitation of the prince and his court, had their aſſemblies, and repreſentations too in a grove planted by Auguſtus, where booths were built, and in them ſold whatever incited to ſenſuality and wantonneſs. Thus was even the outward appearance of virtue baniſhed the city, and all manner of avowed lewdneſs, depravity, and diſſoluteneſs introduced in its room, men and women being engaged in a contention to outvie each other in glaring vices and ſcenes of impurity. At length Nero could forbear no longer, but took the harp, and mounted the public ſtage, trying the ſtrings with much attention and care, and ſtudying his part. About him ſtood his companions and a cohort of the guards, with many tribunes and centurions, and Burrhus their commander, ſad on this infamous occaſion, but praiſing Nero while he grieved for him. At this time, he inrolled a body of Roman

[l] Tacit. c. 11——13. Dio, l. lxi. p. 796. [m] Sueton. c. 34.

He diverts himſelf with chariot-driving.

He engages ſeveral noble Romans to debaſe themſelves upon the ſtage.

Roman knights, intitled the knights of Auguſtus, young men diſtinguiſhed by the bloom of their years and ſtrength of body, but all profeſſed profligates. As the emperor ſpent whole days and nights in ſinging and playing upon the harp, the whole buſineſs of theſe knights was to commend his perſon and voice, to extol the beauty of both by names and epithets peculiar to the gods, and to ſing his airs about the ſtreets [n].

THE next year, Nero entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having Coſſus Cornelius Lentulus for his collegue, and held that dignity for ſix months. This year he inſtituted, for the improvement of wit and genius, conteſts of eloquence and poetry, with other games to be exhibited every fifth year; whence they were ſtyled quinquennial games. On this occaſion the players and pantomimes, who had often cauſed great animoſities, were recalled and reſtored to the ſtage. During theſe ſports a comet appeared, which, according to the perſuaſion of the vulgar, always portended a change of princes; hence, as if Nero had been already depoſed, it became the topic of general enquiry, who ſhould be choſen to ſucceed him, and the name of Rubellius Plautus was on this occaſion in every one's mouth. He was, by his mother Julia the daughter of Druſus, deſcended from the family of the Cæſars, and had acquired great reputation by the integrity of his life, and a ſtrict adherence, notwithſtanding the general corruption, to the venerable inſtitutions and ſevere manners of the primitive Romans. At the ſame time, as Nero was ſitting at an entertainment at a place called Sublaqueum, on the banks of the Simbruine lake, a flaſh of lightning darted upon the repaſt, ſcattered the diſhes, overturned the table, and while the emperor was drinking, ſtruck the cup out of his hand. As this happened in the neighbourhood of Tibur, whence Plautus was originally ſprung by his father's ſide, the people believed, that he was appointed and marked out by the gods to ſucceed Nero. All this alarmed Nero, who thereupon wrote to Plautus, that he would do well to conſult the peace and tranquillity of Rome, by withdrawing to his poſſeſſions in Aſia, where he might enjoy the bloom of his life free from intrigues of faction, fraught with ambiguity and danger. Upon this warning, Plautus, who had long ſince buried himſelf in retirement, ſhunning an

A comet appears.

Nero alarmed.

He adviſes Rubellius Plautus to retire to Aſia.

[n] Tacit. c 15.

nd dreading power, left Rome, and, with Antiſtia his vife and a few friends, haſtened to Aſia. This year, Ne- o appointed Tigranes (F) king of Armenia, which the rave Corbulo had reduced, and beſtowed upon him a body f guards, viz. a thouſand legionaries, three cohorts of con- federates, and two wings of horſe, to ſupport him in main- taining him in his new realm. Corbulo, having thus com- pleted the reduction of Armenia, left that country, and withdrew into Syria, a province aſſigned him upon the death of Numidius Quadratus the late governor °. In the cloſe of the year, Vibius Secundus, a Roman knight, was, upon the accuſation of the Moors, condemned for extortion and expelled Italy.

THE following year, Cæſonius Pætus and Petronius Turpilianus being conſuls, the Romans ſuffered a dreadful ſlaughter in Britain. A. Didius, who ſucceded Oſtorius, as we have related above, did no more than juſt main- tain what his predeceſſors had conquered. His ſucceſſor Veranius, having only in ſome incurſions ravaged the ter- ritories of the Silures, was prevented by death from any further proſecution of the war. He was highly eſteemed in his life-time for the ſeverity of his manners; but in his laſt-will he betrayed a ſervile ambition and court to power: for after many expreſſions of flattery beſtowed up- on Nero, he added, that to his obedience he would have ſubjected all Britain, had he lived but two years longer. He

The ſtate of affairs in Bri- tain.

° Idem, c. 26.

(F) Tigranes was grand-ſon, or rather great grand-ſon to Ar- chelaus, formerly king of Cappadocia; for he was the grand- ſon of Alexander, who was put to death by his own father Herod king of Judæa, and of Glaphyra, the daughter of Ar- chelaus. His father was likewiſe named Alexander. He was nephew to another Tigranes, likewiſe king of Armenia, who was put to death under Tiberius, in the twenty-ſecond year of that prince's reign, and thirty-ſixth of the chriſtian æra (42). Tacitus tells us, that as this prince had paſſed many years at Rome in the quality of an hoſtage, his ſpirit was miſerably debaſed, even to a degree of abjectneſs and ſervitude (43).

(42) Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. (43) Tacit. annal. l. xiv. c. 26.

Suetonius Paulinus ſent into Britain.

He was ſucceeded by Suetonius Paulinus, Corbulo's competitor in the ſcience of war, and univerſally eſteemed in all reſpects equal to that great commander. Paulinus therefore, hoping to reap as much renown from the entire reduction of Britain, as Corbulo had done from that of Armenia, bent his mind upon that enterprize, tho' Nero had then, as we are told, ſome thoughts of withdrawing the Roman forces and abandoning the iſland. During the firſt two years of his government, the Roman general commanded with no leſs ſucceſs than he had done formerly in Africa, ſubdued freſh nations, reduced with indefatigable pains ſeveral caſtles, and eſtabliſhed garriſons to keep in awe the countries which he had brought under ſubjection. Truſting to theſe garriſons, he left the country behind him expoſed to the enemy, and went to attack the iſland Mona, now Angleſey, which ſupplied the revolters with ſuccours, and was a common place of retreat to the fugitives. He built a great number of boats with broad and flat bottoms, the eaſier to approach a ſhore full of ſhallows. Upon theſe the foot were wafted over, and the horſe followed, partly by fording, partly by ſwimming. On the oppoſite ſhore ſtood numerous bodies of men well armed, and amongſt them appeared troops of women, running, like furies, to and fro, diſmally clad in funeral apparel, with their hair flying about their ſhoulders, and torches in their hands. Round them were ſeen their prieſts the Druids, uttering, with their hands lifted up to heaven dreadful imprecations, and invoking vengeance. The amazing novelty of the ſcene ſtruck the Roman ſoldiers with diſmay; they ſtood motionleſs with their bodies expoſed, like ſo many marks, to the darts of the enemy till encouraged by the repeated exhortations of the general to ſhake off the ſcandalous terror inſpired by a band of raving women and fanatic prieſts, they advanced the enſigns, put to the rout the diſorderly rabble, and drove them into the fires they had kindled. The iſland being thus eaſily reduced, a garriſon was eſtabliſhed to bridle the vanquiſhed, and the groves, dedicated to their bloody ſuperſtitions cut down; for in them they ſacrificed the captives taken in war, and conſulted their entrails, in order to diſcover the will of the gods [p].

He reduces the iſland of Angleſey.

WHI

[p] Idem, c. 29. & vit. Agr. c. 14.

WHILE Suetonius was thus employed, tidings were brought him of the ſudden revolt of the province, the occaſion of which is thus related by Tacitus, who lived near thoſe times: Praſutagus, the late king of the Icenians, a prince renowned for his opulence and grandeur, had by his laſt will left the emperor joint heir with his own two daughters, hoping by that ſignal inſtance of loyalty to ſecure his kingdom and family from all injury and violence. But this ſcheme produced a quite contrary effect; for, under colour of taking poſſeſſion of the emperor's new inheritance, the kingdom became a prey to the centurions; the deceaſed prince's houſe was plundered by rapacious officers; his wife Boadicia, or Boudicea, ignominiouſly violated with ſtripes; his daughters, diſhonoured; all the principal Icenians ſtripped of their hereditary poſſeſſions, and the relations of the late king kept in bonds and treated like ſlaves. Enraged by thoſe indignities and dreading oppreſſions ſtill more ſevere, they took advantage of the abſence of Paulinus, and began to deliberate about ſhaking off the yoke, which they could no longer bear. In their private aſſemblies they ſtrove to inflame one another, by recounting their ſeveral grievances, exaggerating the miſeries of bondage, and heightening the injuries they muſt expect, when reduced to a province. "Our patience, ſaid they, avails us "nothing, further than to encourage our tyrants to lay "heavier burdens upon a people, who thus tamely bear any. "To ſuch height is our oppreſſion grown, that nothing "whatever is exempt from their avarice, nothing from their "luſt. They ſeize our houſes, inſult our wives, force a-"way our children, and oblige our youth to liſt; and to "all this we tamely ſubmit, tho' it be in our power to re-"deem ourſelves from ſuch contumelious tyranny; for what "a ſmall force would all the ſoldiers arrived in the iſland ap-"pear, would the Britons but compute their own numbers? "It was from this conſideration that Germany threw off the "yoke, tho' defended only by a river, and not, like this, by "the ocean. Our country, our wives, our parents and chil-"dren, animate us to take arms, and behave like men; "whereas our oppreſſors are only prompted by their for-"did avarice and brutal ſenſuality. Let us but imitate the "bravery of our forefathers, and not be diſmayed with the "iſſue of an encounter or two, and we ſhall ſee theſe robbers "withdraw from the iſland, as their deified Julius did for-"merly." With theſe and the like ſpeeches, they eaſily prevailed upon the Trinobantes, and ſeveral other nations,

The occaſion of the revolt of the Britons.

Their grievances.

to

to join their forces, and attempt the recovery of their antient liberty, as the only means to redeem themſelves from the oppreſſions they groaned under; for the Britons, even in thoſe days, chearfully complied, as Tacitus obſerves, with the impoſition of taxes and all duties enjoined by their governors, provided they received no illegal treatment. This they could not brook, nor did the Romans, ſays the ſame hiſtorian, any further ſubdue them, than to bring them to obey juſt laws: they abhorred unjuſt encroachments, and would never ſubmit to be ſlaves [q]. The Trinobantes were moreover animated to take arms by their implacable hatred towards the veterans lately planted in the colony of Camalodunum, who, encroaching upon the inhabitants, thruſt them out of their houſes, ſpoiled them of their hereditary lands, and, adding ſcorn to oppreſſion, treated them with the vile titles of captives and ſlaves. Another alarming grievance was a temple built and dedicated to the late emperor Claudius, which was a great eye-ſore to them, and looked upon by all as a badge and bulwark of eternal ſlavery. Beſides, the prieſts appointed to miniſter in the temple, under the cloak of religion, devoured the whole ſubſtance of the inhabitants, and reduced the moſt wealthy amongſt them to beggary. Neither did it appear an arduous undertaking to deſtroy a colony no-wiſe ſecured by fortifications; for the Romans, not yet well acquainted with the temper of the Britons, had conſulted only their accommodation and pleaſure. To theſe grievances Dion Caſſius adds, that Catus Decianus, the imperial procurator, exerciſed a tyranny no leſs cruel over their ſubſtance and fortunes, than the governor did over their bodies and lives: and that Seneca, having with fair promiſes inveigled the Britons to borrow vaſt ſums of him, telling them, that for repayment they ſhould take their own time, all on a ſudden demanded both principal and intereſt, which iniquitous demand reduced the injured Britons to deſpair [r]. Thus provoked by the heavieſt ſufferings, and invited by the opportunity of the abſence of Paulinus, the Iceni ans and Trinobantes, the former inhabiting the preſent counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, and the latter thoſe of Eſſex and Middleſex, and all thoſe who hated ſervitude unanimouſly unanimously took arms under the conduct of Boudicea, a princess of royal descent. Tacitus tells us, that the ensuing troubles were foretold some time before by several signs and prodigies. At Camalodunum the statue of Victory fell down of itself, with her face towards the enemy; certain women, transported with prophetical fury, terrified the people with denunciations of impending calamities; in the place, where the colony assembled for the business of the public, was heard a tumultuous noise and the accent of strangers; the theatre echoed with dismal howlings; in the river Thames dreadful appearances were seen; the ocean appeared all dyed with blood; and at the departure of the tide, shapes of human bodies were left imprinted on the strand. The veterans in the colony, alarmed at these omens, sent to Catus Decianus, procurator of the province, for succours, Suetonius being then at a great distance; but he could spare them only two hundred men, and those not completely armed; and in the colony itself was but an handful of soldiers. The veterans indeed, were for securing themselves by a ditch and palisade against any sudden assault, and removing out of the colony their women and old men; but were diverted from these and all other measures tending to their safety by some Britons, in whose fidelity they reposed too much confidence. So that while they were utterly unprepared, and as void of circumspection as if full peace had reigned, the Britons, to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, flew unanimously to arms, assailed on every side the soldiers dispersed in the forts, and having stormed and sacked the several garrisons, fell upon the colony itself, as the seat and centre of public servitude, took it at the first assault, and after two days siege the temple, whither the Romans were retired in body. The colony, with the temple, they razed, and put every Roman to the sword. After this, upon intelligence that Petilius Cerealis, commander of the ninth legion, was advancing to relieve his friends, they hastened to meet him, routed his legion, and cut the infantry, all to a man, in pieces; but Cerealis escaped with the horse to the camp, and there defended himself in his intrenchments. Catus Decianus, the procurator, who had by his rapacious avarice driven the province into despair, and was universally hated, upon the first notice of the revolt, fled, like a coward, over into Gaul [s].

[q] Tacit. annal. c. 31. & vit. Agr. c. 15, 16. [r] Dion. l. lxii. p. 701.

They rise under the conduct of queen Boudicea.

Great slaughter of the Romans.

[s] Tacit. c. 32, 33.

Suetonius marches againſt them.

SUETONIUS, upon the firſt notice of the revolt, left the iſland of Angleſey, and with undaunted bravery marched through the heart of the enemy's country quite to London, a city, not honoured indeed with the title of colony, but full of Roman inhabitants, and even then highly famed for the vaſt conflux of traders, and plenty of all commodities and proviſions. Here he deſigned at firſt to ſettle his head quarters, and make this place the ſeat and centre of the war: but afterwards reflecting on the ſmall number of his men, he reſolved to abandon it, and retire to ſome more advantageous poſt. This reſolution threw the inhabitants into the utmoſt conſternation; but Suetonius, hoping by the loſs of one town to ſave the whole province, was not, by the tears and wailing of multitudes emploring his protection, diverted from ordering the ſignal for departure to be given, taking with him all thoſe who were able or willing to accompany him. He was no ſooner gone, than the enemy made themſelves maſters of the place, and maſſacred, without diſtinction of ſex or age, all who had ſtaid behind. The like ſlaughter befel the municipal or free city of Verulamium, now St. Albans, and ſeveral other towns, in which ſeventy thouſand ſouls periſhed, all Romans, or the confederates of Rome. For the provoked Britons gave no quarter, and neither took, nor ſold, nor exchanged priſoners, nor obſerved any other law of war, but killed, burnt, or crucified all who had the misfortune to fall into their hands, being more inflamed with a deſire of revenge, than of victory or booty. In ſhort, no kind of cruelty was omitted, with which rage and victory could poſſibly inſpire the hearts of an injured people. Suetonius, having in the mean time, drawn together an army of about ten thouſand men, viz. the fourteenth legion, with the veterans of the twentieth, and auxiliaries from the various garriſons, reſolved without further delay to put the whole, as he was diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, to the iſſue of a battle. With this view he choſe a place acceſſible only by a narrow vale, and defended behind by a wood, being well appriſed that the enemy would attack him only in front, and that in the open vale no ſtratagems or ambuſhes were to be dreaded. He drew up the legionaries in thick ranks, placing round them the light-armed ſoldiers, and the cavalry on each wing. The Britiſh army, which was drawn up in great ſeparate bands, ſome of foot, ſome of horſe, appeared an immenſe multitude. They amounted, according to Dio,

He abandons London, which is taken and plundered.

Suetonius reſolves to give the Britons battle.

Dion Caſſius, to 230,000 men, and, according to Tacitus, exhibited the greateſt multitude, that till then had been ſeen in arms, and withal, ſo confident of victory, that they had brought their wives with them to be ſpectators of it from their waggons, which they had placed round the borders of the field. Boudicea, who had chiefly ſtirred up the Britons to this war, was carried about in a chariot with her two daughters ſitting before her. As ſhe traverſed the field from nation to nation, ſhe declared to all, that though it was uſual for the Britons to war under the conduct of a woman, yet upon this occaſion ſhe aſſumed not the authority of one deſcended from ſuch illuſtrious anceſtors, but appeared upon the ſame foot with one of the vulgar, ſeeking vengeance, not for the loſs of her kingdom, but for the extirpation of public liberty, for the ſtripes inflicted upon her perſon, and the brutiſh affronts offered to her virgin daughters, ſince the Romans were arrived at ſuch a pitch of unbridled violence, that no age nor ſex could eſcape their fury and contamination: ſhe enlarged on the evils of tyranny and ſervitude, and concluded, that in the impending battle the Britons muſt either remain utterly victorious, or utterly periſh; that to do one of theſe was the firm purpoſe of her, who was a woman; for the men, they might, if they pleaſed, ſtill live, and be doomed to ſlavery. Suetonius, though he confided in the bravery of his men, yet he failed not to join to it exhortations mixed with entreaties, that they would deſpiſe the ſavage clamours of the barbarians with all their impotent menaces, keep their ranks, and after having diſcharged their darts, cloſe in with the enemy, and purſue the ſlaughter with their ſpears and ſwords, without any thought of the ſpoil, as well knowing, that after victory all muſt fall to their ſhare. The general's ſpeech was followed with ſuch ardor in his men, long inured to all the arts and events of battles, that Suetonius, not doubting of the iſſue, gave the ſignal for the onſet. The legion kept their ground immoveable, ſheltering themſelves within the ſtreights of the place, till the enemy, advancing within arrow-ſhot, had ſpent all their darts: upon this advantage they ruſhed out upon them all at once in the form of a wedge, and being ſupported by the cavalry and auxiliaries, overthrew all who ſtood next to them: hereupon the reſt turned their backs and fled, but found it difficult to eſcape, the incloſure, made by their own carriages, obſtructing their retreat. The Romans gave Boudicea's ſpeech to her army.

no quarter, but put all to the ſword, not ſparing even the lives of women, nay they pierced with their darts the very beaſts of burden, which helped to ſwell the mighty heaps of the dead: for we are told, that of the Britons were ſlain near eighty thouſand; whereas the Romans loſt only four hundred men. Boudicea, reſolved not to outlive that fatal day, is ſaid by ſome to have ended her life by poiſon; but others write, that ſhe died a few days after the battle of a natural death. Poenius Poſthumius, prefect of the camp to the ſecond legion, upon tidings of the exploits and ſucceſs of the fourteenth and twentieth legions, ſtruck with remorſe for having defrauded his own of equal honour, and diſobeyed, contrary to the laws of military duty, the orders of his general, ran himſelf through with his ſword [t]. Dion Caſſius differs from Tacitus, whom we have followed in his account of this battle; for he tells us, that the victory continued long doubtful, that the Britons, though only a diſorderly rabble, led on by a woman, ſtood their ground againſt the embattled legions with great intrepidity, and would have tried the fortune of a ſecond battle, had they not in the mean time been diſheartened by the unexpected death of Boudicea [u]. The Roman army, after a general review, kept the field under tents, to put an end to the war. Their forces were moveover encreaſed by Nero, who ordered two thouſand legionaries, eight cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thouſand horſe, to paſs from Germany over into Britain. By their arrival the ninth legion was recruited, and thereupon the auxiliaries ſent into different parts to deſtroy with fire and ſword ſuch nations as continued in arms, or appeared ſuſpicious. But nothing afflicted the unhappy Britons ſo much as famine; for all their hands being employed in the war, they had utterly neglected to cultivate and ſow the ground, reckoning upon the ſtores and proviſions of the Romans as their own. However, they continued ſtill in arms, and became daily more backward in their inclinations to peace from the behaviour of Julius Claſſicianus, who ſucceeding Catus Decianus as procurator of the province, and being at variance with Suetonius, obſtructed the public good to gratify his private pique, giving out, that a new governor would be ſent who, free from the arrogance of a conqueror, and unacquainted with the preceding conduct of the enemy, would treat ſuch as ſubmitted with more gentleneſs and mercy. And truly Suetonius, as Tacitus obſerves, though in other reſpects a ſignal commander, yet treated ſuch as ſurrendered themſelves in a very imperious manner, as one who likewiſe avenged his private injuries. At the ſame time, Claſſicianus wrote to Rome, that there would be no end of war and bloodſhed, unleſs Suetonius was removed, aſcribing all the diſaſters to his ill conduct, and the happy ſucceſs to the auſpicious fortune of the republic. Hereupon Polycletus, one of the emperor's freedmen, was diſpatched to inſpect the ſtate of Britain. Nero, conceiving great hopes, that by the authority of his domeſtic, not only a reconciliation would be brought about between the governor and procurator, but the minds of the diſcontented Britons would be calmed and inclined to peace. Polycletus was not backward to aſſume the employment, but immediately ſet out with ſuch an immenſe train, that he was a burden, as Tacitus tells us, even to the wealthy nations of Italy and Gaul, through which he paſſed: thence he croſſed the channel, and travelled in Britain with ſuch awful ſtate and attendance, as ſtruck even the Roman ſoldiers, accuſtomed to the grandeur of Rome, with amazement. But to the Britons, among whom reigned popular liberty, he proved an object of deriſion; as they were utter ſtrangers to the power of the imperial freedmen, they were amazed, that a victorious general and army, who had fought ſuch battles, ſhould obey a manumiſed ſlave; his authority was therefore of no weight with men, who, being brought up in the noble principles of liberty, ſcorned to pay any deference or reſpect to ſuch ſons of earth, however diſtinguiſhed and exalted by the favours of a court. Hereupon Polycletus, finding the Britons were not to be dazled with outward appearances, returned to Rome, where he repreſented to the emperor the tranſactions and conduct of Suetonius in ſo favourable a light, that he was continued in the government. However, having ſome time after loſt a few gallies on the ſhore with the men who rowed them, as if this accident had been a proof, that the war ſtill continued, he was ordered to reſign the goverment to Petronius Turpilianus, who had juſt ended his conſulſhip. As this new governor neither provoked the Britons by any act of hoſtility, nor was provoked by them, he beſtowed on this cowardly inaction the ſpecious name of peace. This tranquillity continued till the time of Veſpaſian, the governors, who ſucceeded Turpilianus, following his example, and carefully avoiding to give any juſt cauſe of complaint to the Britons; nay, they did not even attempt to recover the iſland of Angleſey, which about this time ſhook off the yoke [w]. We ſhall reſume the detail of the Britiſh affairs in the hiſtory of the above-mentioned emperor's reign, when we ſhall ſee the Britons enter the liſts with noble armies ſent againſt them from Gaul and Italy, and conducted by generals of great renown.

The Britons defeated with great ſlaughter.

The Britons, though afflicted with famine, continue in arms.

[t] Tacit. c. 36, 37. Dio, p. 701. [u] Dio, ibid.

Polycletus ſent into Britain.

Suetonius recalled.

Several perſons condemned at Rome, for forging a will.

During theſe tranſactions in Britain, ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction at Rome were either degraded or baniſhed for forging a will. Among theſe was Antonius Primus, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of Veſpaſian, and Aſinius Marcellus, deſcended of an illuſtrious family, being the great grand-ſon of the celebrated Aſinius Pollio, and himſelf without any other blemiſh in his conduct and manners, ſave that he believed poverty to be the greateſt of evils. The illuſtrious memory of his anceſtors, and the entreaties of the emperor, procured him an exemption from the puniſhment due to his crime. With the others privy to theſe deteſtable practices was condemned and interdicted Italy one Valerius Ponticus, a pleader or lawyer, for endeavouring to ſave the criminals by the quibbles of the law; and it was decreed, that whoever ſhould take a fee for ſuch vile employment, ſhould ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as one publicly condemned for calumny.

The governor of Rome murdered by one of his ſlaves.

Not long after the death of Pedanius Secundus, governor of Rome, murdered by a ſlave of his own, occaſioned no ſmall diſturbances in the city. According to the antient laws of Rome, all the ſlaves, who lived under the ſame roof, were to be involved in the ſame penalty with the criminal; but ſuch was on this occaſion the uproar of the populace, zealous to ſave ſo many innocent lives, that it proceeded even to ſedition. The ſenate too was rent into parties, ſome rejecting with great warmth ſuch exceſſive rigour, while others voted againſt any innovation. After a long and warm debate, it was carried that, without compaſſion for the number of ſlaves, for the age of ſome, for the ſex of others, for the undoubted innocence of moſt, they ſhould be all condemned to death and executed executed. As they were no fewer than four hundred, the populace flocked tumultuouſly together to prevent the execution of ſo many innocent perſons. But Nero reprimanded them by an edict, and with lines of ſoldiers ſecured the way thro' which they were led to the place of execution. Cingonius Varro moved, that the freedmen too, who abode under the ſame roof ſhould be for ever expelled Italy; but Nero oppoſed that motion, urging that ſince the rigour of the antient cuſtom had not been ſoftened by mercy, it ought not to be heightened by cruelty[x].

[w] Tacit. c. 38, 39, & vit. Agr. 16, 17. Suet. c. 18. Dio p. 707.

All his ſlaves are executed.

The following year, P. Marius and L. Aſinius were conſuls; but reſigned the faſces, according to Onuphrius, Goltzius, and others, in the month of July, to Trebellius Maximus and Seneca. A decree in the digeſts, dated the 25th of Auguſt, ſeems to favour this opinion. However, ſome writers, and among the reſt Auſonius, maintain, that Seneca never attained the dignity of conſul. During the adminiſtration of theſe conſuls, the prætor Antiſtius, having compoſed a poem full of contumelious invectives againſt the prince, and read it to a numerous aſſembly at a banquet in the houſe of Oſtorius Scapula, was arraigned upon the law of majeſty by Coſſutianus Capito, a law, which after long diſuſe was upon this occaſion firſt revived. Oſtorius declared before the ſenate, when he was called upon to give his evidence, that he knew nothing of the imputed crime; but the contrary teſtimony of the other witneſſes being credited, Julius Marullus, conſul elect, voted, that the accuſed ſhould be deveſted of his prætorſhip and put to death. But Thraſea Pætus, after high encomiums upon Nero, and many bitter invectives againſt Antiſtius, argued, that ſince under ſuch an excellent prince the ſenate was in its deciſions influenced by no biaſs or compulſion, and halters and executioners were long ſince baniſhed, the only puniſhment they could inflict, without bringing themſelves under the imputation of cruelty, and the times under that of infamy, was, to confiſcate the eſtate of the criminal, and confine him to a ſolitary iſland. The generous freedom of Thraſea, animated the other ſenators, ſo that they all went readily into his motion, except a ſmall number of abandoned flatterers, among whom was the famous ſycophant Vitellius. The conſuls, however, before they gave the laſt ſanction to the decree, thought it adviſeable to acquaint the emperor with their unanimity, Antiſtius writes a ſatyr againſt Nero.

The generous freedom of Thraſea Petus.

[x] Tacit. c. 42—44.

who after having long ſtruggled between ſhame and reſentment, at laſt anſwered, that ſince Antiſtius had, without any provocation, uttered ſo many black invectives againſt the prince, it was the duty of the ſenate to decree a puniſhment ſuitable to the crime. However, as he would certainly have oppoſed any rigorous ſentence, ſo he would now by no means defeat their mercy; they might therefore determine as they thought beſt, nay, from him they had full leave to diſcharge the criminal. From this anſwer it plainly appeared, that the emperor was piqued; but, notwithſtanding his diſpleaſure, neither Thraſea, nor the others departed from the meaſures which they had approved. At the ſame time Fabricius Veiento was expelled Italy for writing a ſatyr againſt the ſenate, and making traffick of the prince's favour by ſelling the great offices of the ſtate. His writings being doomed to the flames, were, as Tacitus obſerves, univerſally ſought and read, while it was difficult to find them, and dangerous to keep them; but when every one was free to poſſeſs and peruſe them, they ſunk into contempt and oblivion [y]. This year died, to the unſpeakable grief of all good men, the celebrated Burrhus, one of the chief friends and ſupporters of the public; but whether by poiſon or a diſeaſe, is not certainly known: the latter was imagined, becauſe a ſwelling in his throat gradually encreaſed, till by a total ſtoppage of reſpiration he died ſuffocated. Suetonius [z] and Dion Caſſius [a] tell us, that Nero, having promiſed him a remedy againſt his diſtemper, ſent him a venomous medicine. This, ſays Tacitus, was aſſerted by many; and it was likewiſe a common report, that Burrhus, being well appriſed of it, when the prince came to viſit him, turned his face another way, and to his repeated enquiries about his health, returned no other anſwer than this, I am well. The loſs of ſo great and worthy a man was long regretted in Rome, as well from the memory of his own virtues, as from the different character of his joint ſucceſſors; for Nero appointed two captains of the prætorian guards, Fenius Rufus and Soſonius Tigellinus. The former was a man of great integrity, but indolent, and an utter enemy to all trouble; the other infamous for lewdneſs, cruelty, avarice and all the moſt flagrant iniquities; but in high favour with Nero

Antiſtius is only baniſhed

The death of Burrhus.

The character of Tigellinus.

y Idem, c. 48.—50. z Suet. c. 35. a Dio, l. 1 p. 706.

Nero, and by him aſſumed into power from a fellowſhip in all his ſecret debauches and revels [b].

AND now, one of the champions of virtue being removed, the many wicked and evil connſellors, who abounded in the emperors court, attacked the other, viz. Seneca, with many criminal imputations; namely, that he had already accumulated wealth far above the condition of a citizen, and was inſatiably accumulating more; that ſuch was the magnificence of his gardens, ſuch the ſplendor of his ſeats, that in theſe inſtances of grandeur he excelled even the emperor; that he was labouring to attach to his own perſon the veneration of the Roman people; that he diſparaged his ſkill in managing horſes, turned his voice into mockery whenever he ſung, and to himſelf alone arrogated the praiſe and perfection of eloquence: they added, that Nero was no longer a child, and therefore ought now to begin to reign, to diſmiſs his pedagogue, and to be governed by more famous tutors, his glorious anceſtors. Seneca was not unappriſed of the efforts of his enemies, and therefore finding the emperor had withdrawn his uſual affability, and ſhewed himſelf daily more and more reſerved towards him, he begged an audience; and having obtained it, he beſought the emperor to give him leave to retire, and apply himſelf wholly to the cultivation of his mind and the ſtudy of philoſophy, entreating him at the ſame time to accept of his immenſe wealth, his ſtately ſeats and gardens, his ample poſſeſſions, &c. which were too great rewards for the ſmall ſervice he had rendered him, and adminiſtered freſh fuel to the raging envy of his enemies. Nero replied that he ſtill ſtood in great need of the wiſe rules, wholeſome counſels, and uſeful precepts, with which he had cheriſhed his infancy and youth, and therefore could not by any means grant him his requeſt.

Several charges brought againſt Seneca.

He begs leave to retire.

" As to your gardens, ſeats, and wealth, ſaid he, there " are many favourites, no-wiſe equal to you in worthy ac- " compliſhments, diſtinguiſhed with larger poſſeſſions. I " bluſh to quote freedmen, who are eſteemed more wealthy " than you; and am aſhamed, that one who is dear to " me above all others, does not yet ſurpaſs all others in " fortune. If you forſake your prince, and to him ſur- " render your wealth, the treaſure returned will be aſcribed, " not to your moderation, but to my rapaciouſneſs, and " your retreat, to the dread of my cruelty. But ſuppoſe " this Nero's deceitful ſpeech to him.

[b] Tacit. c. 52.

" this diſintereſtedneſs of yours, this contempt of riches, be " generally applauded, yet ſurely it will reflect no honour
" upon a wiſe man to ſeek glory from a proceeding, which
" muſt unavoidably bring infamy upon his friend." To theſe words he added kiſſes and embraces, ſwearing ſeveral times in a moſt ſolemn manner, that he would rather periſh himſelf a thouſand times, than ſuffer him to be any ways injured. Seneca returned him thanks for his kindneſs and generoſity; but nevertheleſs altered his former conduct, received few viſits at home, avoided any train of attendance abroad, and appeared ſeldom in public, as if he were confined to his houſe by ill health, or the ſtudy of philoſophy. The retreat of Seneca doubled the authority of Tigellinus, who diving curiouſly into the ſecret fears of the prince, and finding, that he chiefly dreaded Plautus and Sylla, the one removed lately into the eaſt, the other into Gaul, perſuaded him to put them both to death, hoping to bear a ſtill greater ſway with the emperor, by thus ſeeming to conſult his defence and ſecurity. Sylla was diſpatched while he was at table, without any apprehenſion of danger, by aſſaſſins, who in ſix days arrived expreſs at Marſeilles, to which city he had been confined. When his head was preſented to Nero, its untimely hoarineſs is ſaid to have moved him to unbecoming jeſts and deriſion. The ſentence awarded againſt Plautus was not ſo ſucceſsfully concealed. Lucius Antiſtius, his father-in-law, receiving private notice of it, diſpatched to him a freedman of his own, who outſailing the fatal centurion, brought him from his maſter the following advice; that he ſhould be ſure to ſhun a cowardly death; that he had yet leiſure to eſcape, and could not fail of finding compaſſion from all worthy and generous men; that if he had once repulſed the ſixty ſoldiers, for ſo many were ſent to diſpatch him, he might then, while the tidings were tranſmitting to Nero, proſecute many ſchemes, and lay the foundation of a war; at leaſt he had nothing more deadful to ſuffer after a brave reſiſtance, than what he muſt ſuffer by a cowardly acquieſcence. But Plautus, not moved by theſe conſiderations choſe rather to die, than to preſerve his life by kindling a civil war (G); ſo that the aſſaſſins, finding him quite unpre-

He avoids the court.

Sylla put to death.

pared

(G) He was perhaps chiefly influenced, ſays Tacitus, by tenderneſs for his wife and children, whom he imagined the prin-

wou

pared for any reſiſtance, murdered him in the middle of the day before Pelago the eunuch, who was by Nero ſet over the centurion and his band. When the head of the ſlain was carried to Rome, and ſhewn to the emperor, I knew not before, ſaid he, by way of raillery, that Rubellius had ſo great a noſe. Then turning to the confidents of his debauches, What can prevent me now, cried he from inſtantly ſolemnizing my nuptials with Poppæa, a ſolemnity hitherto deferred through fear of ſuch men as this? Afterwards he wrote letters to the ſenate, in which he inveighed with great bitterneſs againſt Sylla and Plautius, but took no notice of their death. However, the ſenate, well appriſed of what had happened, decreed proceſſions, appointed thanks to be publicly returned to the gods, and degraded Sylla and Plautius from the dignity of ſenators. Nero, perceiving from the decree of the ſenate that his moſt flagrant iniquities paſſed for commendable actions, divorced Octavia without further delay, alledging that ſhe was barren (H), and married Poppæa, who, to prevent his ever being reconciled to his former wife, ſuborned one of Octavia's domeſtics to accuſe her of a criminal amour with a ſlave, named Eucerus, a native of Alexandria, and one who was famous for playing upon the flute. The maids of would treat with more mildneſs, were he not incenſed by any inſurrection or alarms. Some write, that the advices he received from his father-in-law were of a quite different nature, importing, that his life was in no danger. Others tell us, that two philoſopers, Ceranus a Greek and Muſonius a Tuſcan, encouraged him to wait for death with unſhaken intrepidity, ſince it would deliver him from a life ſubject to eternal anxieties and fears.

Plautius murdered.

Nero marries Poppæa.

(H) Octavia was, as Nero himſelf owned, an eaſy wife, modeſt in her conduct, of an unblemiſhed character, &c. but ſtill an eye-ſore to him from the affection which the people ſhewed her; hence he would have divorced her ſoon after the death of her father Claudius, had not Burrhus oppoſed his deſign, telling him freely, that if he parted with Octavia, he muſt likewiſe part with what ſhe had brought him, the empire (44). He ſeldom admitted her to his bed, anſwering his friends, who blamed him for thus neglecting a woman of her merit, that the jewels, ornaments, and title of empreſs were ſufficient for her. Suetonius tells us, that he often attempted to ſtrangle her (45).

(44) Dio, l. lxii. p. 706. (45) Suet. c. 35.

of Octavia were all examined upon the rack, and, though ſome, overcome by the exquiſite pain of the torture, favoured the forgery, yet moſt of them maintained, and with great firmneſs vindicated, the unſpotted character of their lady (I). However, ſhe was firſt removed from the palace, and afterwards baniſhed into Campania, where a guard of ſoldiers were placed over her. But as the populace openly complained of this cruel treatment, Nero, dreading the reſentment of the provoked multitude, recalled her ſoon after to the infinite ſatisfaction of the Roman people, who in tranſports of joy crouded to the temples with thankſgiving, overthrew the ſtatues of Poppæa, crowned with flowers thoſe of Octavia, and carrying her images, as it were, in triumph, placed them in the great forum and in the ſeveral temples. Hereupon Poppæa, fearing Nero might change his mind, and, to gratify the populace, recal Octavia to his bed, prevailed upon him, by a ſpeech artfully framed to produce both terror and wrath, to reſolve upon the ruin of the innocent Octavia. As the fiction of the unhappy princeſs's intrigue with Eucerus had been quite defeated by the teſtimony of her maids upon the rack, it was agreed to procure ſome one, who ſhould own himſelf guilty with her, and againſt whom might be alſo feigned a plauſible charge of meditating a revolution in the ſtate. Anicetus, who had murdered Agrippina, was judged a proper man for this vile purpoſe. To him therefore Nero addreſſed himſelf, and what by promiſes, what by menaces, induced him to acknowledge that he had maintained a criminal converſation with Octavia; which he had no ſooner done, than Nero iſſued an edict, declaring, that Octavia, in hopes of engaging the fleet in her conſpiracy, had corrupted Anicetus the admiral: and forgetting that he had juſt before accuſed her of barrenneſs, he added, that ſhe had concealed her ſecret luſts, and always defeated her pregnancy by abortion, and that theſe her crimes were by him fully detected. Hereupon the unfortunate princeſs was baniſhed to the iſland of Pandataria, and after a few days doomed to die. Thoſe who were charged with the execution of th

The affection of the people to Octavia.

She is baniſhed, and afterwards murdered.

(I) While Tigellinus was earneſtly preſſing Octavia's mai upon the rack to deliver themſelves from their torments, owning their lady's guilt, one of them, by name Pythias, turned him this anſwer, "Caſtiora ſunt muliebria Octaviæ, q os tuum."

this cruel and unjuſt ſentence, having tied her down with bonds, opened all the veins of her body; but as her blood was chilled through fear and iſſued ſlowly, they haſtened her doom, by ſtifling her in the ſteam of a boiling bath. After her death her head was cut off by a centurion, and carried to Rome, that Poppæa might have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing it, and diverting herſelf with ſo tragical a ſpectacle. Tacitus obſerves, that nothing ever filled the hearts of the people with more affecting compaſſion, than the cruel ſufferings and untimely end of this innocent princeſs, inhumanly maſſacred in the twenty ſecond year of her age, under the imputation of a crime more barbarous and piercing than death itſelf, without having ever taſted any ſhare of happineſs or delight. But the ſenate, at this time under the emperors, an aſſembly of mean-ſpirited wretches, entirely devoted to corruption and ſervitude, for this execution, as for ſome notable deliverance, pompouſly decreed gifts and oblations to the gods. Such was the debaſement of the once great and venerable Roman ſenate. Fear had ſtopped their mouths, or opened them only to the moſt ſcandalous ſtrains of flattery. Our hiſtorian obſerves here, to their eternal infamy, that as often as any cruel ſentence was pronounced by the prince, as often as murders or baniſhments were by him commanded, ſo often were acknowledgments and thankſgivings, by the authority of the ſenate, paid to the deities [c]. Octavia had been honoured, as appears from ſome medals [d], with the title of Auguſta. Nero killed himſelf ſix years after on the ſame day, if Suetonius is to be credited, on which Octavia was by his orders aſſaſſinated [e], that is, on the eleventh of June. Anicetus, as one convicted by his own confeſſion, was baniſhed into Sardinia, where he lived in great plenty, and died at length by courſe of nature. This year died Doryphorus, Pallas, and Romanus, all three imperial freed-men of great note, and believed to be poiſoned by Nero's orders; Doryphorus, becauſe he endeavoured to thwart the marriage with Poppæa; Pallas, becauſe he lived too long, and prevented the prince from enjoying his immenſe wealth; and Romanus, becauſe he brought a charge of treaſon againſt Seneca, which the accuſed retorted upon him [f]. Pallas dies.

THE

[c] Tacit. c. 60—63. [d] Spanh. p. 619. [e] Suet. c. 57. [f] Tacit. c. 65. Dio, l. lxii. p. 707. Suet. c. 35.

THE following year, when L. Virginius Rufus and C. Memmius Regulus were conſuls, the city of Pompeii, which took its name from Pompey the Great, was in a great meaſure overturned by an earthquake, which highly damaged many other cities of Campania. That province had been alarmed before by frequent ſhocks; but this, which happened on the fifth of February, was ſo dreadful, that great numbers of the inhabitants abandoned their native country, and ſettled elſewhere, through fear of being one day ſwallowed up by the earth, a misfortune, which fifteen years after, that is, in the firſt year of the reign of Titus and ſeventy-ninth of the chriſtian æra, befel thoſe who remained, and likewiſe the inhabitants of Herculanum or Herculaneum, as we ſhall relate in its proper place. This year Poppæa was delivered of a daughter, which filled Nero with unſpeakable joy: ſhe was honoured with the name of Auguſta, and upon Poppæa was conferred the ſame title. The ſenate had before made public vows for her happy delivery, and now many more were added, and the whole amply fulfilled; days for ſolemn proceſſions were appointed, a temple was decreed to Fecundity, golden images of the Fortunes at Antium, where the child was born, were ordered to be made and placed in the throne of Jupiter Capitolinus, &c. But ſhort-lived was the prince's joy; for within four months the infant died, which gave occaſion to new ſallies of flattery, ſince ſhe was placed among the gods, and divine worſhip with a prieſt, altars, and ſacrifices were voted to her. As for the emperor, as he had rejoyced, ſo he grieved beyond all meaſure [g]. To allay his grief, he exhibited various ſhews, among the reſt a combat of gladiators, in which four hundred ſenators, ſix hundred knights, and, what was a ſight altogether new, many ladies of great diſtinction entered the liſts, and infamouſly contaminated themſelves and families, to uſe the expreſſion of Tacitus, by appearing among the comman gladiators. In one of theſe ſhews a knight, of illuſtrious quality, rid full ſpeed down a ſteep deſcent upon an elephant; another perſonated Icarus but in attempting to fly, fell down ſo near the emperor that he was beſprinkled with his blood. A comedy was alſo acted, compoſed by Afranius, and entitled incendium, or the burning, in which a houſe richly furniſhed was ſet on fire, and permiſſion granted to the actors to rifle it. During theſe ſhews, he did not, like other emperors, ſcatter money among Poppæa is delivered of a daughter.

Senators, knights, and ladies enter the liſts among the gladiators.

[g] Tacit. annal. l. xv. c. 13. Suet. c. 35.

among the populace, but tickets for vaſt ſums, for fine houſes, gardens, and eſtates, which he faithfully conſigned to thoſe who produced the ſaid tickets. For he believed, as Suetonius obſerves, that all the pleaſure and advantage of riches conſiſted in profuſion and prodigality, reckoned thoſe ſordid and mean-ſpirited, who kept any accompt of their expences, and cried up ſuch as ſquandered away and conſumed their fortunes. Hence he never mentioned his uncle Caligula, but with the higheſt elogiums, becauſe in leſs than a year's time he had conſumed, beſides his ordinary revenues, the vaſt ſum (eighteen millions of our money), which Tiberius had left him [h]. Nero's prodigality.

In the next conſulſhip of Caius Lecanius Baſſus and M. Licinius Craſſus Frugi, Nero become every day more tranſported with a paſſion for ſinging and playing on the public ſtage, for he had hitherto exerted his ſkill only in aſſemblies called Juvenalia, which were reſtrained to particular houſes and gardens, and not daring to begin at Rome, reſolved to repair to Naples to make his firſt eſſay and appearance there, and from thence paſs over into Greece, and contend for the prize in muſic at the Olympic games. Accordingly, he ſet out from Rome, with his uſual attendance and equipage, that is, with a thouſand chariots, his horſes and mules all ſhod with ſilver, his grooms and muletiers clad in the richeſt cloth of Canuſium, and attended by a band of prætorian guards and a body of African horſe, moſt pompouſly attired. Soon after his arrival at Naples, he mounted the ſtage, and ſang for ſeveral days together to an immenſe multitude, all the rabble of Naples, and incredible numbers flocking from the neighbouring cities and colonies, to ſuch an extraordinary ſpectacle, an emperor ſinging on the public ſtage. In this exerciſe he paſſed his whole time at Naples, repairing to the theatre in the morning, and continuing there till night, allowing himſelf now and then a ſmall reſpite to take breath and refreſh himſelf, which he did publicly in the preſence of the multitude, telling them, that when he had waſhed his throat, he would entertain them with a finer air than any they had yet heard. We are told, that though the theatre was one day, while he was ſinging, ſhaken all on a ſudden with a violent earthquake, and in great danger of falling, yet he would not give over till he had ended his ſong. He ſings upon the ſtage of Naples.

When

[h] Suet. c. 11, & 30.

When he had done, he gave the numerous audience leave to retire; and the theatre, as ſoon as it was empty, fell to the ground. This accident Nero looked upon as a providential event, betokening the immediate protection of his guardian deities, and celebrated the benignity of the gods in ſongs of thankſgiving compoſed by himſelf. Being much delighted with the praiſes which ſome Alexandrians, lately arrived at Naples, beſtowed on his heavenly and auguſt voice, he ſent for more of them over in great haſte, and was ever after attended by ſome of them on the ſtage, richly attired with a ring of great value on their left hand. As they were for the moſt part youths, he appointed them governors to take care of their education, and allowed them an annual penſion of four hundred thouſand ſeſterces[i]. The emperor left Naples with a deſign to paſs over into Greece, and diſplay his abilities there. In his rout to the Adriatic he reſted a while at Beneventum, where by Vatinius was exhibited a pompous ſhow of gladiators. Vatinius was one of the moſt baneful monſters that haunted the court, originally bred in a cobler's ſtall, hideous and diſtorted in his perſon, at firſt taken to court as a buffoon, and afterwards by calumny, by lying accuſations againſt every worthy man, and a ſarcaſtical turn, raiſed to ſuch a height, that in wealth, and favour, and in power to do miſchief, he ſurpaſſed all the other miniſters of iniquity in Nero's court[k] (K). During the ſolemnity of theſe ſports, Nero forbore not acts of tyranny and blood, but forced Torquatus Silanus, the great grandſon of Auguſtus, to die for no other crime, but becauſe he lived with greater ſplendor and magnificence than became a private

He is entertained at Beneventum by Vatinius with a ſhew of gladiators.

[i] Suet. c. 20. Tacit. c. 34. [k] Idem ibid.

(K) Vatinius is mentioned by Martial and Juvenal as the contriver of certain cups with four long ſpouts, called by the Latins noſes:

Vilia ſutoris calicem monumenta Vatini Accipe, ſed naſus longior ille fuit;

ſays Martial: and Juvenal;

Tu Beneventani ſutoris nomen habentem Siccabis calicem naſorum quatuor, &c.

vate perſon, and therefore was ſuppoſed to aſpire at the ſovereign power. Torquatus opened the veins of both his arms and bled to death. After this Nero, for reaſons that were not known, put off his voyage to Greece and returned to Rome, with a deſign to ſhew himſelf to the provinces of the eaſt, eſpecially to Egypt, which project he declared by a public edict, and then went to pay his obligations for the ſucceſs of that journey to the ſeveral deities in the city. But as he entered the temple of Veſta, he was ſeized with a ſudden dread, which ſhook him in every joint, and is aſcribed by ſome writers to the awful aſpect of the goddeſs, by others to the remembrance of his enormous crimes, with which he was ſo eternally haunted, that he was never a moment free from pangs and agonies. Be that as it will, he dropped his project, giving out, that he could not prevail upon himſelf to deprive the Roman citizens for ſo long a time of the joyful ſight of their prince. This declaration was pleaſing to the populace, from their inclination to diverſions, which by his reſidence at Rome they enjoyed, and from the apprehenſion of ſcarcity of proviſions in his abſence [1].

Why he drops his deſign of going into Egypt.

Nero banquetted frequently in the public places and great ſquares, uſing the whole city as his own houſe. Theſe banquets were expenſive and magnificent almoſt beyond belief, and no leſs infamous for the monſtrous ſcenes of lewdneſs practiſed at them; for he was generally attended at ſuch entertainments, whether given by himſelf or his friends, by the moſt debauched and abandoned women of the whole city. Tacitus deſcribes here the feaſt prepared for him this year by Tigellinus, as a pattern of all the reſt. In the lake of Agrippa he built a large veſſel, which contained the banquet, and was towed by other veſſels embelliſhed with rich ornaments of gold and ivory, which were rowed by profeſſed catamites, ranged according to their different age and ſkill in their abominable profeſſion. The banquet conſiſted of great variety of wild fowl and wild beaſts from remote countries, and fiſh from the ocean. On the banks of the lake on one ſide ſtood brothels filled with ladies of great rank, and on the other common harlots, quite naked. When night came, the neighbouring groves and houſes reſounded with the joyful ſymphony

His banquets.

One prepared for him by Tigellinus.

[1] Idem, c. 37.

ſymphony of muſical inſtruments and ſongs, and appeared illuminated with an huge blaze of lights which turned night into day. It was a few days after this memorable banquet, that Nero, who had already ſurpaſſed all men, as Tacitus obſerves, in every kind of abomination, was prompted by his extravagant lewdneſs and folly to ſuch exceſſes, as would ſeem altogether incredible, were they not atteſted by hiſtorians, who lived near thoſe times, and whoſe veracity cannot be queſtioned. He attired himſelf in the habit of a woman, and as ſuch was publicly, with the uſual form and ſolemnity, married to a pathic of his contaminated crew, named Pythagoras. Not ſatisfied with ſuch monſtrous and unheard-of impiety and pollutions, as he was the wife of one pathic, ſo he became the huſband of another, named Sporus, whom he married with the ſame ſolemnity, kept in his palace, and carried about with him all over Italy and Greece in the ſame litter, and in the attire of an empreſs; on which occaſion it was ſaid, that the world would have been happy, had Nero's father had ſuch a wife[m]. His other abominable pollutions, unknown before to the moſt abandoned debauchees, we ſhall paſs over in ſilence, being well appriſed, that a detail of ſuch monſtrous obſcenities would prove no leſs ſhocking to our readers, than that which we read in Suetonius has proved ſhocking to us. We ſhall only obſerve out of that writer, that Nero was firmly perſuaded all men were as wicked as himſelf; and therefore freely forgave thoſe, who made an open profeſſion of obſcenity, all other crimes; but puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, as hypocrites and impoſtors, ſuch as ſeemed to be offended with the moſt unnatural impurities [n].

His abominations.

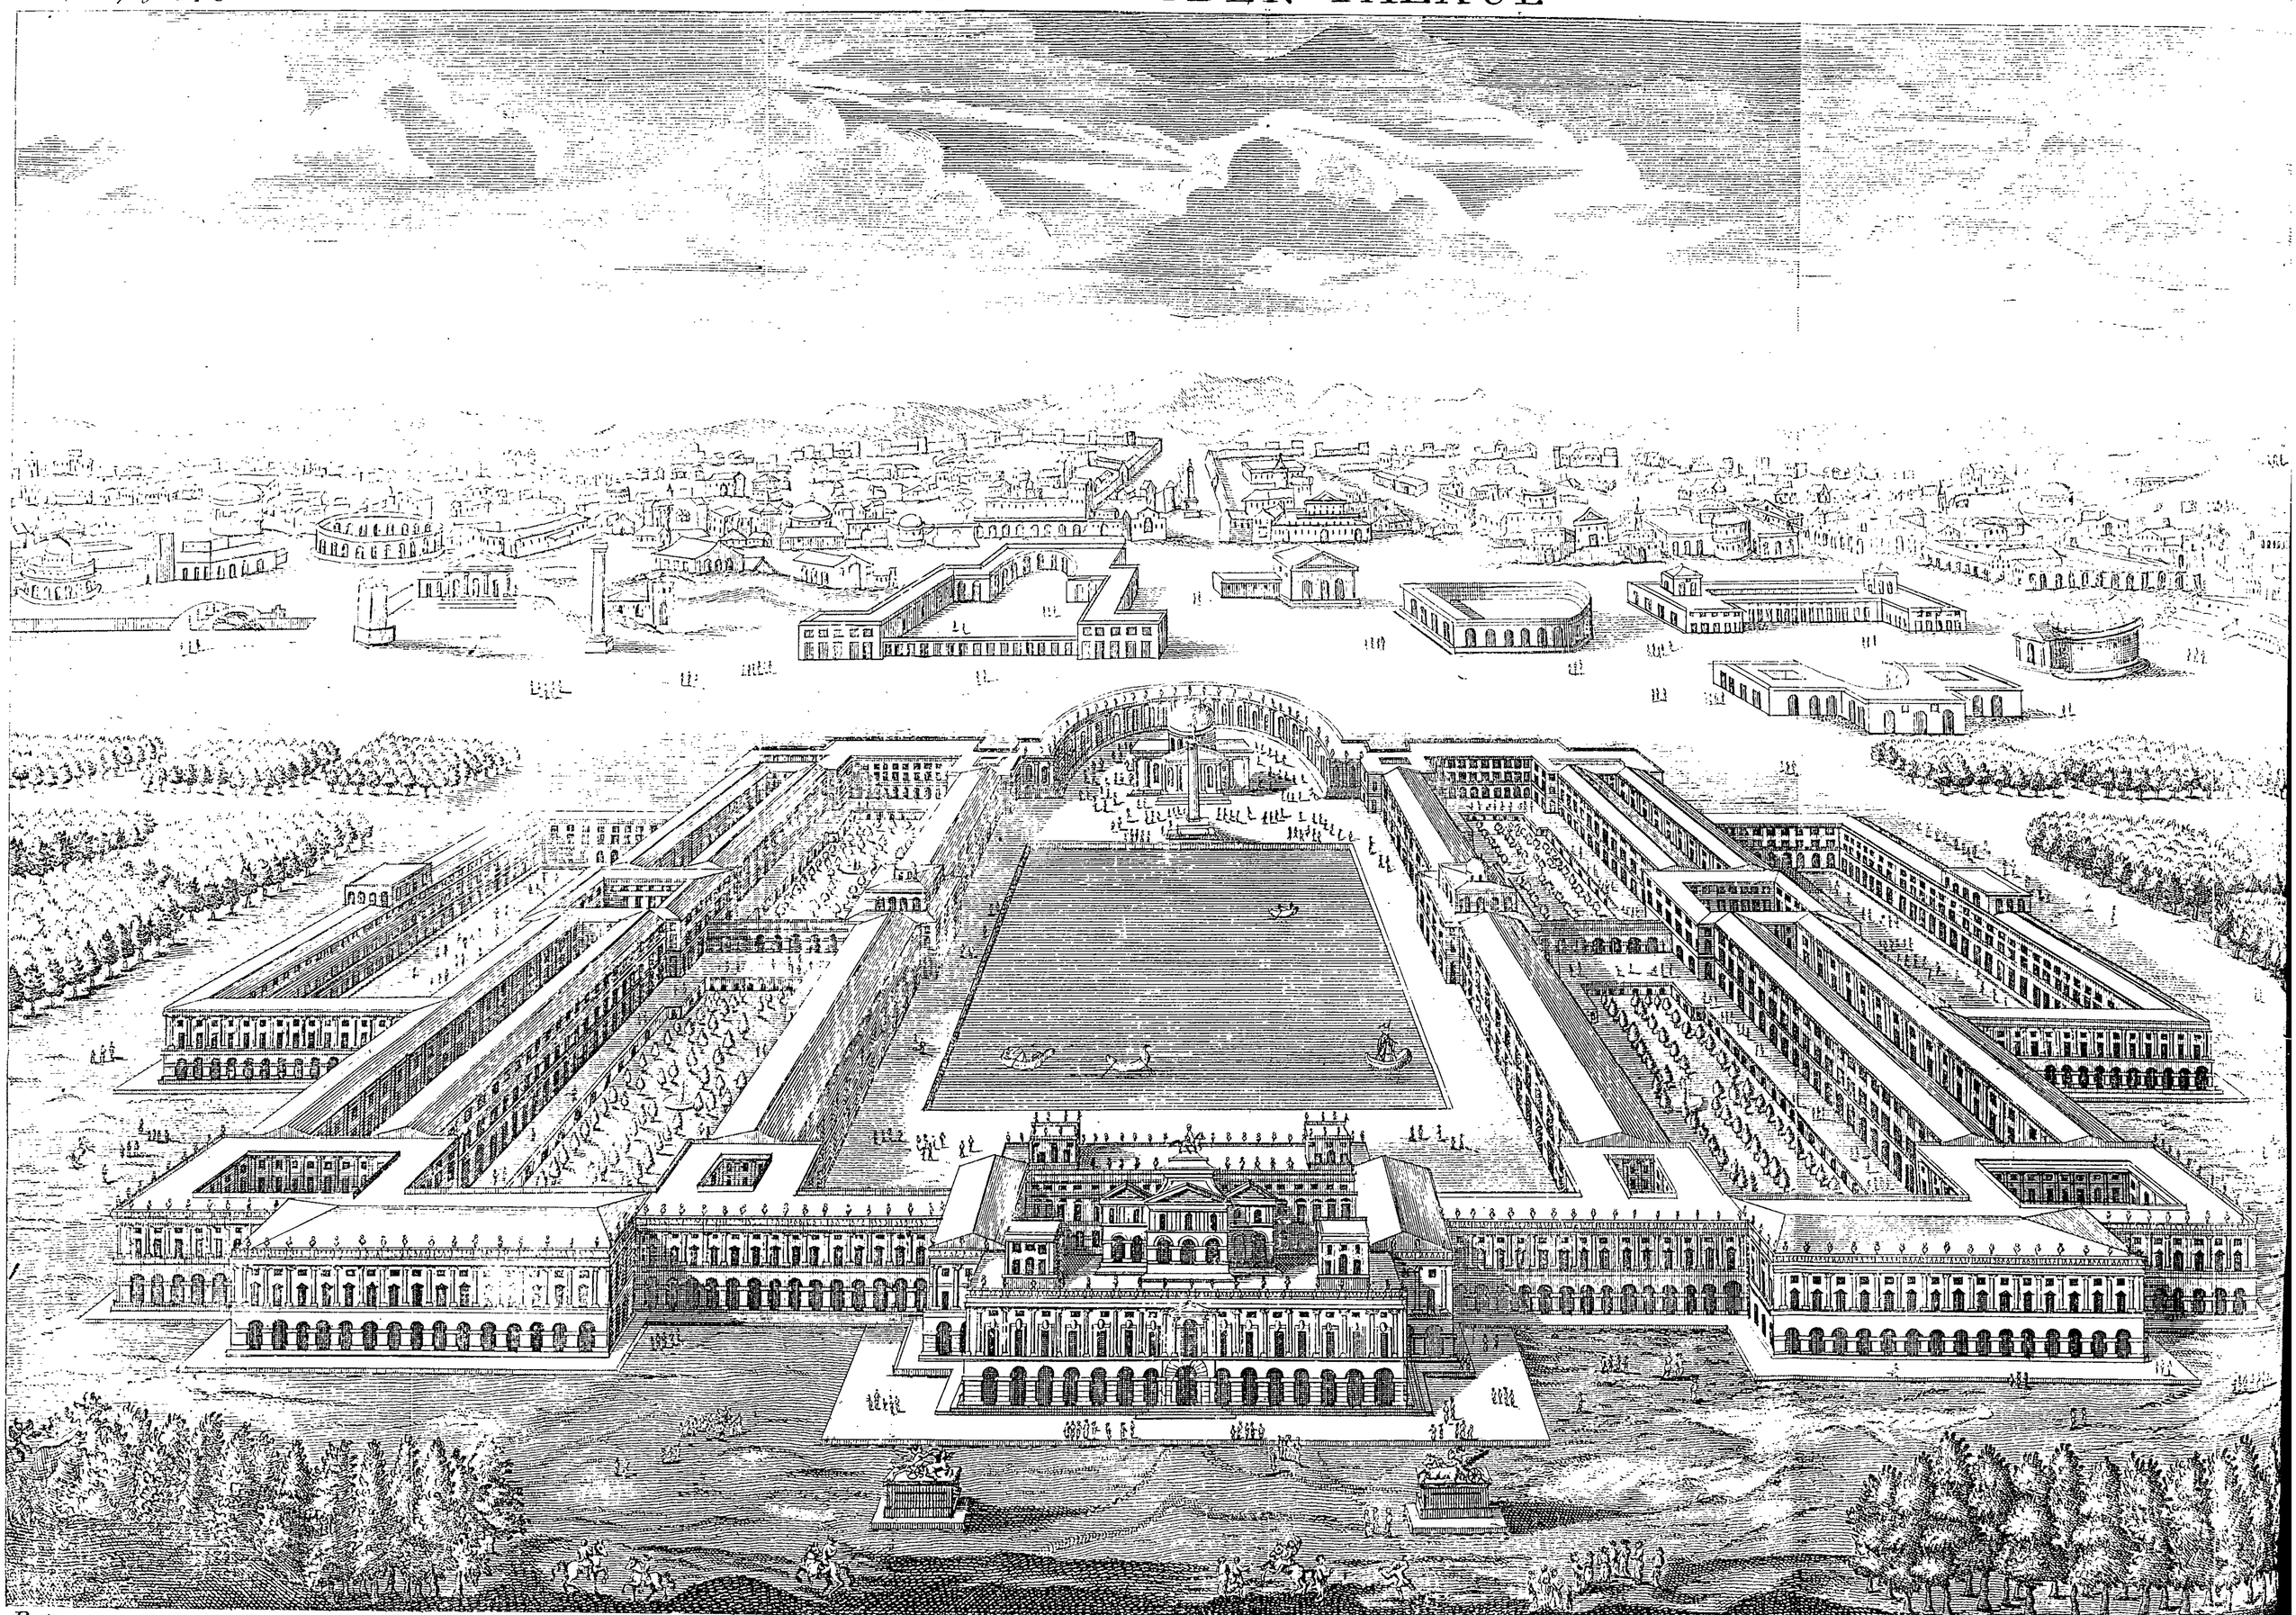
The burning of Rome.

THIS year, the eleventh of Nero's reign and ſixty-fourth of the Chriſtian æra, happened the famous burning of Rome; but whether by chance, or the contrivance of the prince, is not determined, both being aſſerted by authors. The fire began amongſt certain ſhops, in which were kept ſuch goods as were proper to feed it, and ſpread every way with ſuch amazing rapidity, that its ſhock was felt in diſtant ſtreets before any meaſures to ſtop it could be tried. Beſides an infinite number of common houſes, all the noble monuments of antiquity, all the ſta-

[m] Tacit. c. 37. Suet. c. 28. [n] Idem, c. 29.

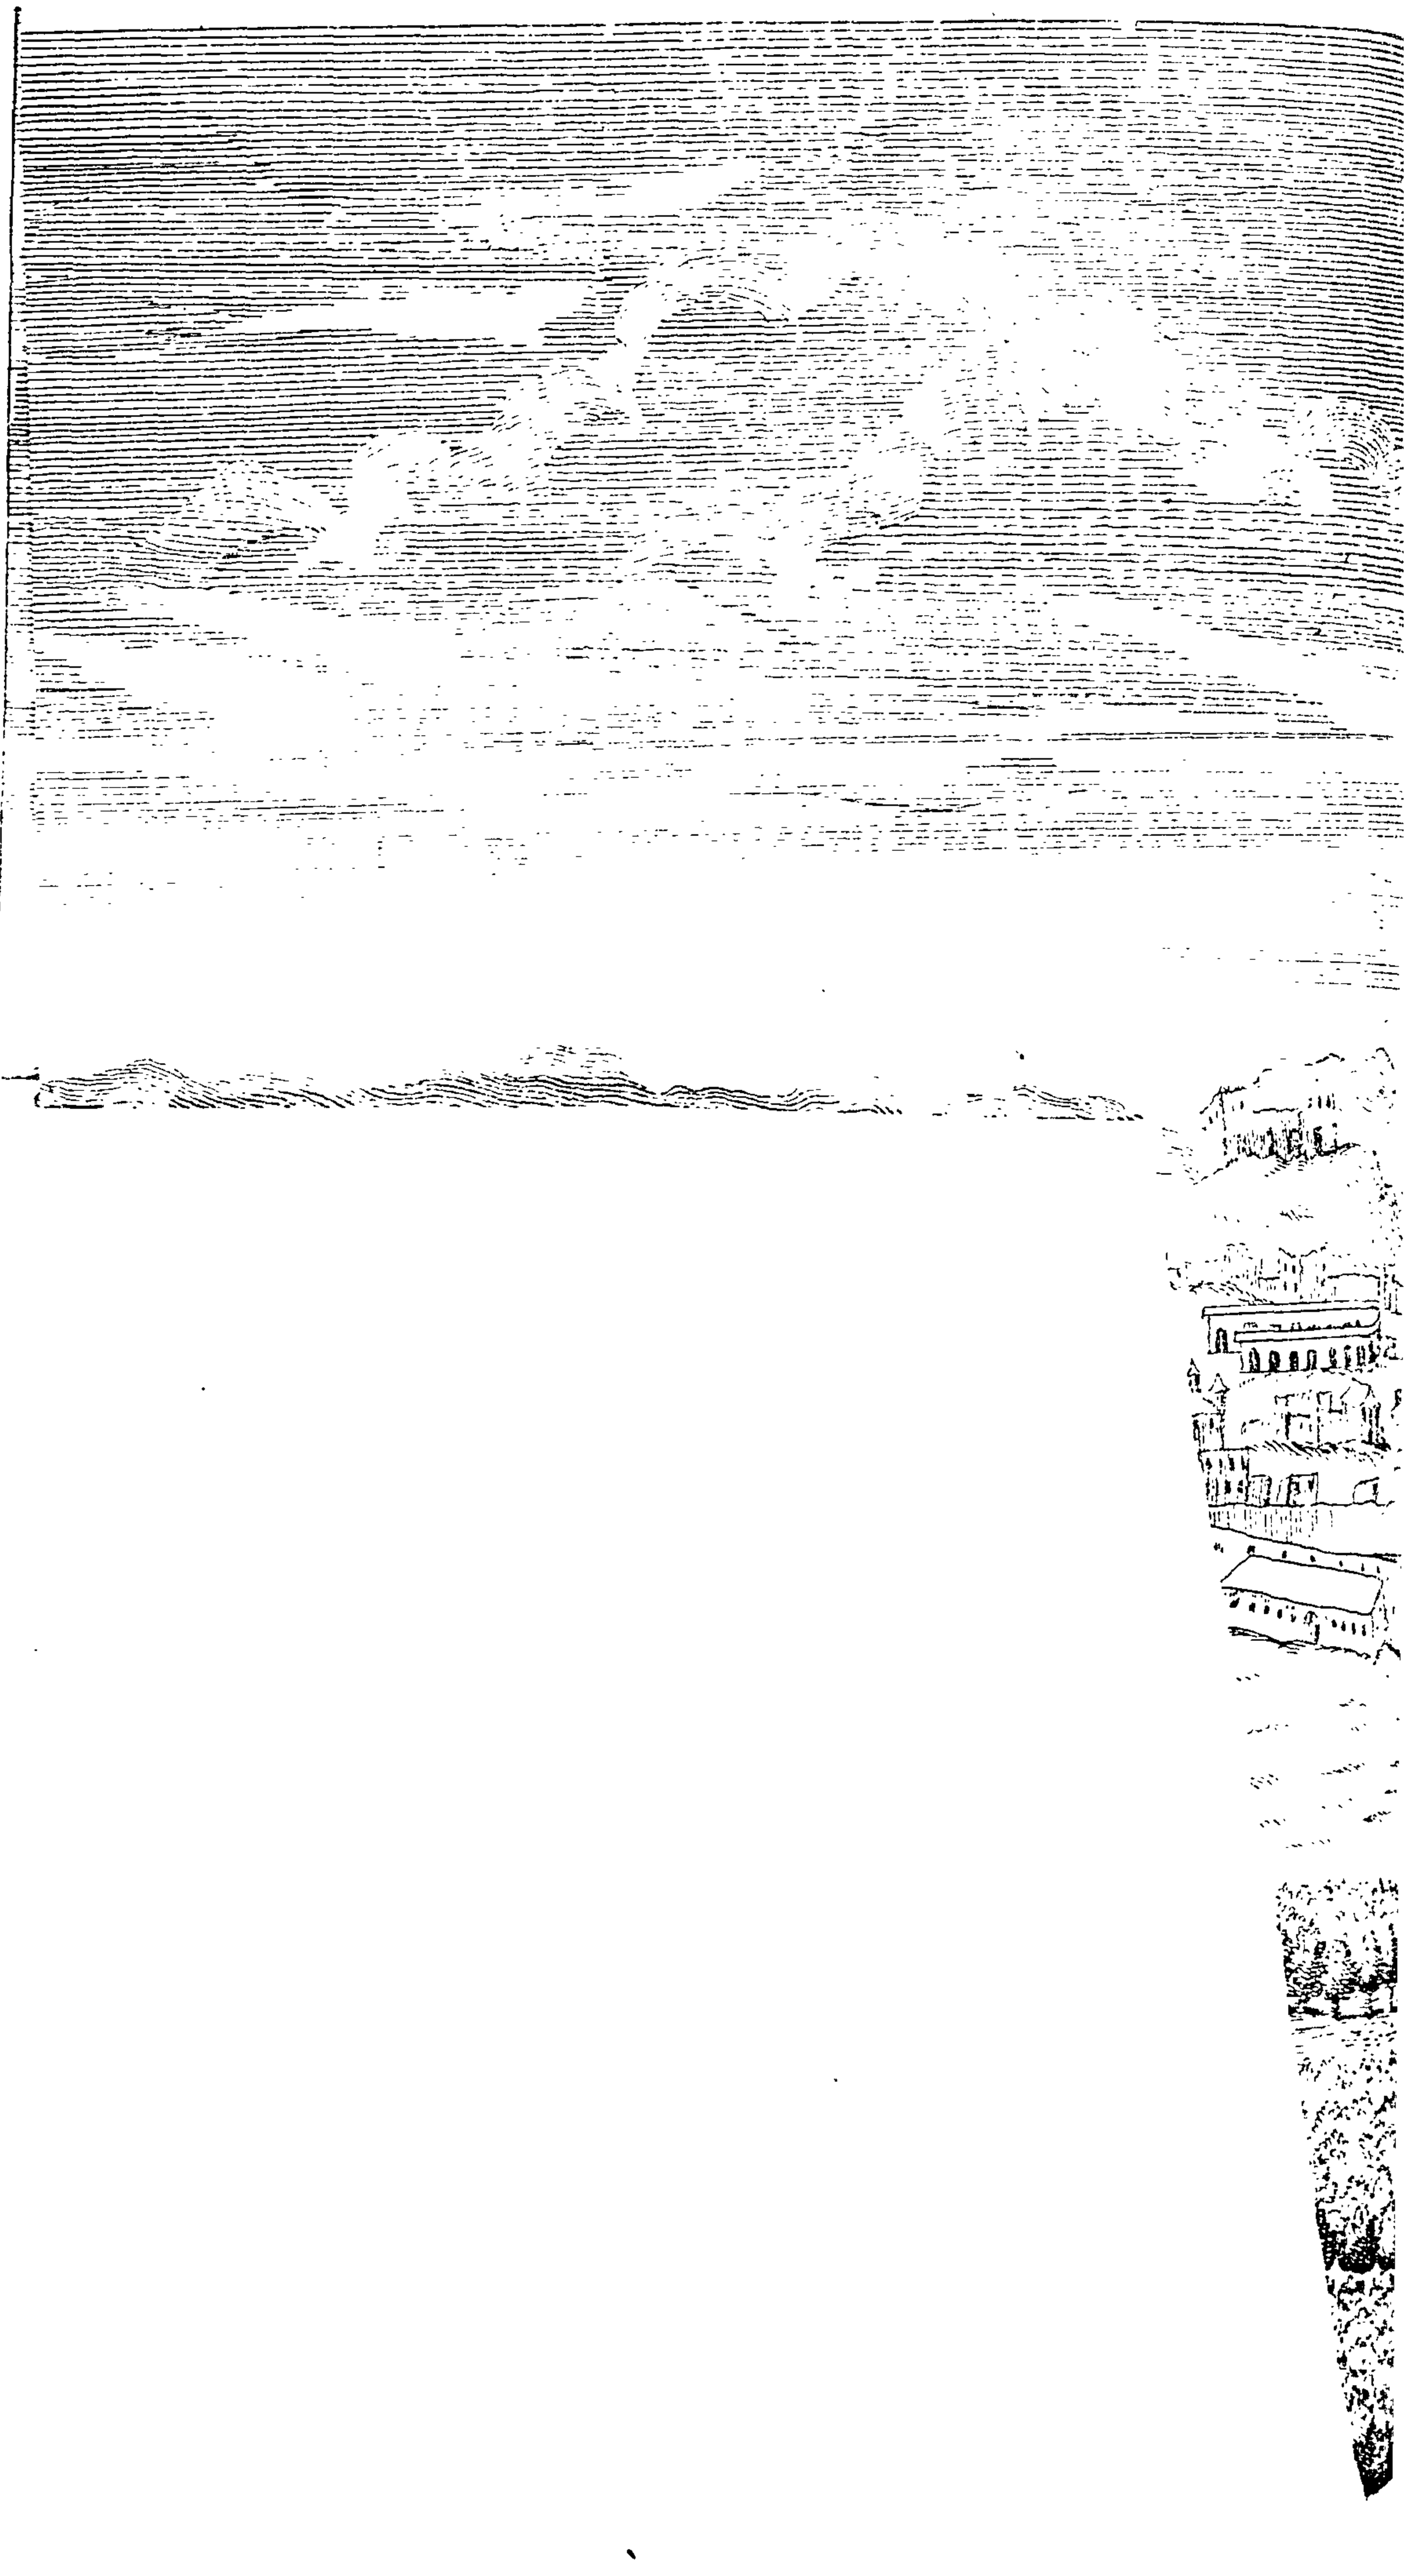
y palaces, temples, porticos, with goods, riches, furniture, nd merchandiſe to an immenſe value, were devoured by he flame, which raged firſt in the low regions of the city, nd then mounted to the higher, with ſuch terrible violence and impetuoſity, as to fruſtrate all relief. The ſhrieks of the women, the various efforts of ſome endeavouring to ſave the young and tender, of others attempting to aſſiſt the aged and infirm, and the hurry of ſuch as ſtrove only to provide for themſelves, occaſioned a mutual interruption and univerſal confuſion. Many, while they chiefly regarded the danger that purſued them behind, found themſelves ſuddenly involved in the flame before and on every ſide: if they eſcaped into the quarters adjoining, or into the parts quite remote, there too they met with the devouring flames. At laſt, not knowing whither to fly, nor where to ſeek ſanctuary, they abandoned the city, and repaired to the open fields. Some out of deſpair for the loſs of their whole ſubſtance, others through tenderneſs for their children and relations, whom they had not been able to ſnatch from the flames, ſuffered themſelves to periſh in them, though they had eaſy means to eſcape. No man durſt offer to ſtop the progreſs of the fire, there being many, who had no other buſineſs, but to prevent with repeated menaces all attempts of that nature; nay ſome were in the face of the public ſeen to throw lighted fire-brands into the houſes, loudly declaring, that they were authorized ſo to do; but whether this was only a device to plunder more freely, or in reality they had ſuch orders, was never certainly known. Nero, who was then at Antium, did not offer to return to the city, till he heard, that the flame was advancing to his palace, which after his arrival was, in ſpite of all oppoſition, burnt down to the ground, with all the houſes adjoining to it. However, Nero, affecting compaſſion for the multitude, thus vagabond and bereft of their dwellings, laid open the field of Mars, and all the great edifices erected there by Agrippa, and even his own gardens. He likewiſe cauſed tabernacles to be reared in haſte for the reception of the forlorn populace; from Oſtia too and the neighbouring cities, were brought by his orders all ſorts of furniture and neceſſaries, and the price of corn conſiderably leſſened. But theſe bounties, however generous and popular, were beſtowed in vain, becauſe a report was ſpread abroad, that, during the time of this general

The deſpair and miſerable condition of the inhabitants.



neral conflagration, he mounted his domeſtic ſtage, and ſang the deſtruction of Troy, comparing the preſent deſolation to the celebrated calamities of antiquity. At length on the ſixth day (M), the fury of the flames was ſtopt at the foot of mount Eſquiline, by levelling with the ground an infinite number of buildings, ſo that it found nothing to encounter, but the open fields and empty air. But ſcarce had the late alarm ceaſed, when the fire broke out anew with freſh rage; but in places more wide and ſpacious; whence fewer perſons were deſtroyed, but more temples overthrown and porticos appropriated to public diverſion. As this ſecond conflagration broke out in certain buildings belonging to Tigellinus, they were both generally aſcribed to Nero; and it was conjectured, that by deſtroying the old city, he aimed at the glory of building a new one, and calling it by his name. Of the fourteen quarters, into which Rome was divided, four remained entire, three were laid in aſhes, and in the ſeven others there remained only here and there a few houſes, miſerably ſhattered and half conſumed [p]. Such is the account which Tacitus gives us of this dreadful calamity. But Suetonius and Dion Caſſius are poſitive in their relations, that it was occaſioned by Nero. The former author writes, that occaſioned by Nero. The former author writes, that occaſioned happening in a private converſation with the emperor, to ſing in Greek, When I am dead let the world be burnt; nay, replied he, Let it be burnt while I am alive; and not long after being diſpleaſed with the old buildings of the city, with its narrow alleys, and irregular ſtreets, he cauſed it to be ſet on fire ſo publicly, that ſeveral of his officers were found

The fire extinguiſhed, but breaks out anew.



[p] Tacit. c. 38——40.

(M) Suetonius tells us, that it laſted ſix days and ſeven nights; wherein he diſagrees with an antient inſcription, ſtill to be ſeen near St. Peter's church in Rome, according to which it continued nine days. The words of the inſcription are; Ex Voto. Suſcepto. Quod. Diu. Erat Neglectum. Nec. Redditum. Incendio. Arcendorum. Cauſa. Quando. Urbs. Per. Novem. Dies. Arſit. Neronianis. Temporibus. Et. Hac. Lege. Dedicato. Eſt. Ne. Qui. Liceat. Intra. Hos. Terminos. Ædificium. Extruere. Suetonius's account cannot be reconciled with this inſcription; but that of Tacitus may; for he tells us, that the fire which was ſtopt on the ſixth day, broke out anew; ſo that the firſt conflagration may be ſaid to have laſted ſix days, and the ſecond three.

NERO'S GOLDEN PALACE

P. Fourdrinier Sculpt.

in the houſes of the great men with fire and flax in their hands, and nevertheleſs diſmiſſed becauſe they openly declared, that they had one to authorize them. There being certain ſtore-houſes near his palace, which ground he deſired to have, that with their walls of ſtone withſtood the violence of the flames, he cauſed them to be battered down by engines of war. Though in this barbarous conflagration, continues the ſame writer, the palaces of our antient commanders, adorned with hoſtile ſpoils, the temples formerly conſecrated by our kings, thoſe which the piety of our anceſtors raiſed in the Punic and Gauliſh wars, and in ſhort all the noble and ſtately monuments of antiquity, were conſumed by the devouring flames, yet Nero was ſo far from being touched with ſorrow or compaſſion, that he beheld the fire the whole time from the tower of Mecænas, and being highly pleaſed with the ſight, he chanted a poem on the deſtruction of Troy, in the ſame habit which he uſed when he ſung on the ſtage. He would not allow any one to attempt the ſtopping or extinguiſhing of the fire, promiſing to remove at his own charge the rubbiſh and dead bodies [q]. Among the many antient and ſtately edifices which the rage of the flames utterly conſumed, Tacitus reckons the temple dedicated by Servius Tullius to the moon; the temple and great altar conſecrated by Evander to Hercules, the chapel vowed by Romulus to Jupiter Stator, the court of Numa with the temple of Veſta, and in it the tutelar gods peculiar to the Romans. In the ſame fate were involved the ineſtimable treaſure acquired by ſo many victories, the wonderful works of the beſt painters and ſculptors of Greece, and what is ſtill more to be lamented, the antient writings of celebrated authors, till then preſerved perfectly entire. It was obſerved, that the fire began the ſame day on which the Gauls, having formerly taken the city, burnt it to the ground [r]. Upon the ruins of the demoliſhed city Nero founded a palace, which he called his golden houſe, though it was not ſo much admired on account of an immenſe profuſion of gold, precious ſtones, and other ineſtimable ornaments, as for its immenſe extent, containing ſpacious fields, vaſt wilderneſſes, artificial lakes, thick woods, gardens, orchards, vine-yards, hills, groves, &c. The entrance of this ſtately edifice was ſpacious enough to receive a coloſſus, repreſenting Nero,

Many noble buildings utterly conſumed.

Nero's golden palace.

[q] Suet. c. 38. [r] Tacit. c. 41.

an hundred and twenty foot high; the galleries conſiſted of three rows of tall pillars, each of them a full mile in length; the lakes were encompaſſed with magnificent buildings, in the manner of cities, and the woods ſtocked with all ſorts of wild beaſts. The houſe itſelf was tiled with gold, and the walls covered with the ſame metal, and richly adorned with precious ſtones and mother of pearl, which in thoſe days was valued above gold; the timber-work and ceilings of the rooms were inlaid with gold and ivory; the roof of one of the banquetting rooms reſembled the firmament both in its figure and motion, turning inceſſantly about night and day, and ſhowering all ſorts of ſweet waters. When this magnificent ſtructure was finiſhed, Nero approved of it only ſo far as to ſay, that at length he began to lodge like a man (N). Pliny tells us, that this palace extended quite round the city [s]. Nero, it ſeems, did not quite finiſh it; for the firſt order Otho ſigned was, as we read in Suetonius, for fifty millions of ſeſterces to be employed in perfecting the golden palace, which Nero had begun [t]. The projectors of this plan were Severus and Celer, two bold and enterprizing men, who ſoon after put the emperor upon

[s] Plin. l. xxxiii. c. 31. [t] Suet. c. 31. & in Oth. c. 7.

(N) Martial deſcribes the vaſt tract of ground on which this palace ſtood (46). Several lampoons were handed about on the ſame ſubject; among the reſt the following, which likewiſe reflected on the murder of his mother and his ſhameful paſſion for playing upon the harp:

Quis neget Æneæ natum de ſtripe Neronem?
Suſtulit hic matrem, ſuſtulit ille patrem.
Dum tendit cytharam noſter, dum cornua Parthus, Noſter erit Pæan, ille Hecatebeletes.
Roma domus fiet; Veios migrate, Quirites,
Si non & Veios occupat iſta domus.

But Nero, whether he really deſpiſed ſuch reflections, or willingly ſmothered his reſentment, never ſo much as enquired after the author of theſe ſatyrs; nay, ſome of them being diſcovered, he would not ſuffer the ſenate to puniſh them with any ſeverity.

(46) Mart. lib de ſpect, epig. 2.

upon a ſtill more expenſive and arduous undertaking, namely, that of cutting a canal, through hard rocks and ſteep mountains, from the lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber, an hundred and ſixty miles in length, and of ſuch breadth, that two galleys of five ranks of oars might eaſily paſs abreaſt. His view in this was to open a communication between Rome and Campania, free from the troubles and dangers of the ſea; for this very year a great number of veſſels laden with corn were ſhipwrecked at cape Miſenum, the pilots chuſing rather to venture out in a violent ſtorm, than not to arrive at the time they were expected by Nero [u]. For the perfecting of this great undertaking, the emperor ordered the priſoners from all parts to be tranſported into Italy, and ſuch as were convicted, whatever their crimes were, to be condemned only to his works. We are told, that to this bold and extravagant attempt he was likewiſe encouraged by a Roman knight, who aſſured him, that he could help him to the immenſe treaſures, which Queen Dido had carried along with her from Tyre, and buried in vaſt caves under-ground in Africa, whence they might without much trouble be recovered [w]. Nero, who undertook nothing with more ardor and readineſs, than what was deemed impoſſible, expended incredible ſums in this raſh undertaking, and exerted all his might to cut through the mountains adjoining to the lake Avernus; but not being able to remove by art the obſtacles of nature, he was in the end obliged to drop the enterpriſe [x]. Undertakes things impoſſible.

THE ground, which was not taken up by the foundations of Nero's own palace, he aſſigned for houſes, which were not placed, as after the burning of the city by the Gauls, at random and without order; but the ſtreets were laid out regularly, ſpacious and ſtrait; the edifices reſtrained to a certain height, perhaps of ſeventy foot, according to the plan of Auguſtus; the courts were widened, and to all the great houſes, which ſtood by themſelves and were called iſles, large porticos were added, which Nero engaged to raiſe at his own expence, and to deliver to each proprietor the ſquares about them clear from all rubbiſh. He likewiſe promiſed rewards according to every man's rank and ſubſtance, and fixed a day for the diſcharge of Rome rebuilt.

[u] Suet. ibid. Tacit. c. 46. [w] Suet. ibid. [x] Tacit. c. 42.

his promiſe, on condition, that againſt that day their ſeveral houſes and palaces were finiſhed. He moreover made the following wiſe regulations to obviate ſuch a dreadful calamity for the future, viz. that the new building ſhould be raiſed to a certain height without timber; that they ſhould be arched with ſtone from the quarries of Gabii and Alba, which were proof againſt fire; that over the common ſprings, which were diverted by private men for their own uſes, overſeers ſhould be placed to prevent that abuſe; that every citizen ſhould have ready in his houſe, ſome machine proper to extinguiſh fire; that no wall ſhould be common to two houſes, but every houſe be incloſed within its own peculiar walls, &c. Thus the city in a ſhort time roſe out of its aſhes with new luſtre, and more beautiful than ever. However, ſome believed, that the antient form was more conducing to health, the rays of the ſun being hardly felt, on account of the narrowneſs of the ſtreets and the height of the buildings, whereas now there was no ſhelter againſt the ſcorching heat [y]. We are told, that Nero deſigned to extend the walls to Oſtia, and to bring from thence, by a canal, the ſea into the city [z]. As Nero, notwithſtanding all his bounties, was ſtill univerſally believed to have been the author of the conflagration, in order to wipe off this aſperſion, he transferred the guilt upon the Chriſtians, who were already very numerous in the city, and raiſed the firſt general perſecution. We ſhall deliver, in our hiſtorian's own words, what he writes upon this ſubject, miſled, no doubt, by the accounts that were current among the Romans, and crediting, as he wanted an opportunity of being better informed, the calumnies, with which the enemies, of truth laboured to diſcredit ſuch as profeſſed it. Nero, ſays he, to ſuppreſs the prevailing rumour, that he was the author of the conflagration, transferred the guilt upon ſuppoſed criminals, ſubjecting to moſt exquiſite torments thoſe people, who for their enormous crimes were already univerſally abhorred, and known to the vulgar by the name of Chriſtians(O). The Precautions to prevent the like diſaſter.

Nero tranſfers upon the Chriſtians the guilt of burning the city.

Tacitus's account of them.

author

[y] Idem, c. . 43. [z] Suet. c. 16.

(O) Tacitus ſeems in this particular to confound the Chriſtians with the Jews; for ſpeaking of the latter in his hiſtory (28); They author of this name was Chriſt, who in the reign of Tiberius was executed under Pontius Pilate, procurator of Judæa. The peſtilent ſuperſtition was for a while ſuppreſſed; but it revived again, and ſpread, not only over Judæa, where this evil was firſt broached, but reached Rome, whither from every quarter of the earth is conſtantly flowing, whatever is hideous and abominable amongſt men, and is there readily embraced and practiſed. Firſt therefore were apprehended ſuch as openly owned themſelves to be of that ſect; then by them was diſcovered an immenſe multitude, and all were convicted, not of the crime of burning Rome, but of their hatred and enmity to mankind. Their death and torture was aggravated with cruel deriſion and ſport; for they were either covered with the ſkins of wild beaſts, and torn in pieces by devouring dogs, or faſtened to croſſes, or wrapt up in combuſtible garments, that when the day-light failed, they might, like torches, ſerve to diſpel the darkneſs of the night. For this tragical ſpectacle Nero lent his own gardens, and exhibited at the

(28) Tacit. hiſt. l. v.

They are immoveable, ſays he, in their adherence to one another, and prone to acts of compaſſion; but towards the whole human race beſides, they maintain a mortal and implacable hatred. With all others they refuſe to eat; with all others they refuſe to lodge; nay, though they are a people abandoned to ſenſuality, they avoid the embraces of all foreign women. This cenſure they deſerved in the time of Tacitus, as they ſtill do in ours, ſaving the laſt particular mentioned by our hiſtorian; for now they condeſcend to the embraces of foreign harlots. They had not common mercy towards the Gentiles and uncircumciſed; and being perſuaded, that the Almighty loved only their nation, they fancied that he abhorred, and therefore they abhorred, the whole human race beſides; ſo that it was ſaid of them by Tacitus too truly, adverſus omnes alios hoſtile odium. But ſurely the Chriſtians did not, at leaſt in Tacitus's time, deſerve this cenſure: an univerſal and unbounded charity is the main baſis and characteriſtic of our religion; and it is not probable, that the Chriſtians were then ſo degenerated as to diſgrace their profeſſion, by neglecting the moſt eſſential duty of it. They avoided indeed, the profane meetings of the Gentiles, their lewd revels, their ſhews and ſpectacles; and thence were thought, as Arnobius obſerves, by men not acquainted with their principles, to hate the Gentiles themſelves.

the ſame time the public diverſion of the circus, ſometimes driving a chariot in perſon, and ſometimes ſtanding as a ſpectator among the populace in the habit of a charioteer. Hence towards the miſerable ſufferers, however guilty and deſerving the moſt examplary puniſhment, compaſſion aroſe, ſeeing they were doomed to periſh, not with a view to the public good, but to gratify the cruelty of one man[i], Thus far Tacitus, who, 'tis manifeſt, was quite unacquainted with the ſacred myſteries and ſound morals of our religion. He was himſelf a man of ſtrict morality, and diſplays, throughout all his writings, a ſpirit truly virtuous and humane; no wonder therefore, if conſidering the Chriſtians as enemies to mankind, according to the prevailing notion, and their religion as a new ſect inconſiſtent with the laws of Rome, and threatening civil tumults, he painted them in ſuch ugly colours. But, after all, he does them the juſtice to vindicate them from the aſperſions of Nero, and expoſe the barbarous treatment they met with from that tyrant.

Nero betakes himſelf to all manner of rapine.

In the mean time, Nero having, with the immenſe ſums, he had expended in building his golden houſe, and embelliſhing the city, quite drained his exchequer, to ſupply his prodigality betook himſelf to all manner of rapine and extortion. Not Italy alone, but the provinces, the ſeveral confederate nations, and all thoſe cities, that had the title of free, were pillaged and laid waſte. In this general ſpoil were involved the temples of the gods, being ſtript of all their rich ornaments, of all the treaſures, which the Roman people in every age of their ſtate had conſecrated, either as monuments of triumphs celebrated, or vows fulfilled. Through Greece and Aſia the ſame ravages were committed, Acratus an imperial freedman, and Secundus Carinas, two prompt inſtruments, as Tacitus ſtyles them, to execute any iniquity, however black and flagrant, being ſent into thoſe provinces with a commiſſion to ſtrip every-where the temples of all their ornaments, gifts, oblations, &c. and convey them together with the ſtatues and images of the gods themſelves to Rome[k], where they were melted down, and turned into money[l]. Suetonius aſſures us, that from this time forward he never raiſed any man to an office, without tell ing him, You know what I want; let us make it our buſineſs, that no one may have any thing, which he can call his own [m]. Seneca, fearing theſe ſacrileges and iniquitous extortions might be imputed to him, begged leave to retire to a ſeat of his own, remote from Rome; but that being refuſed him, he confined himſelf to his chamber, pretending an indiſpoſition in his nerves. Some writers tell us, that one of his freed-men, named Cleonicus, had, by the command of Nero, prepared poiſon for him; but that he eſcaped it, either by the diſcovery made by the freed-man, or by his own caution; for being appriſed of the danger he was in, he led a moſt abſtemious life, ſatisfying his hunger with wild fruit from the woods, and quenching his thirſt with a draught from the common fountain [n]. Of this wonderful temperance and ſobriety, he ſpeaks himſelf in one of his letters: I banquet, ſays he, upon dry bread, and dine without a table [o]; my dinner is ſuch that after it I have no occaſion to waſh my hands: and elſewhere [p]; I ſleep little, and watch much; I abſtain from all wine, avoid bathing, and uſe no ointments, being perſuaded, that with reſpect to our bodies, of all ſmells, no ſmell is the beſt. In the cloſe of the year, the heads and mouths of the populace were filled with prodigies (P), ſaid to have happened, and always looked upon as the fore-runners of ſome dreadful calamity. A comet too appeared, an omen ever ſuppoſed to portend misfortunes threatening ſome ſovereign power. Nero was therefore under no ſmall apprehenſion; but an aſtrologer, by name Babilus, having acquainted him, that among monarchs it was uſual upon ſuch occaſions to avert thoſe omens from them

Plunders Italy and the provinces.

[i] Tacit. c. 44. [k] Idem, c. 45. [l] Suet. c. 32.

Seneca is refuſed leave to retire.

[m] Idem, ibid.
[n] Tacit. c. 45.
[o] Senec. ep. 84.
[p] Idem ep. 109.

(P) In the ſtreets and roads were found expoſed ſeveral monſters with double heads, ſome brutes, and ſome of the human ſpecies: ſome were alſo taken from the bellies of victims: in the territory of Placentia was brought forth a calf with its head growing upon its leg; a prodigy, which, according to the interpretation of the ſoothſayers, foreboded, that for human kind another head was preparing, that would not remain long concealed (29).

(29) Idem, c. 42.

themſelves by ſome extraordinary maſſacre, he reſolved utterly to exterminate the whole ſenatorial order, and commit the government of the provinces, and the command of the armies, to the knights and his freed-men.

Piſo's conſpiracy.

This bloody deſign he began to put in execution the following year, when A. Licinius Nerva Silanus, and M. Veſtinus Atticus were conſuls, a conſpiracy, which was then diſcovered, affording him a plauſible pretence for the mighty carnage. In this memorable conſpiracy were engaged, we may ſay, the whole nobility of Rome; ſenators, knights, ſoldiers, and even women, entering into it with great eagerneſs and competition, partly from their deteſtation of Nero, and partly from their zeal for Caius Piſo, who was at the head of it. He was allied to moſt of the illuſtrious families in Rome, and for his own virtues, or qualities, as Tacitus obſerves, that reſembled virtues, highly favoured by the populace; for he was a great orator, and employed his eloquence in the defence of his fellow-citizens; generous to his friends and acquaintance, and even to ſuch as were unknown to him, affable and complaiſant: he was of a tall ſtature, of a graceful countenance, and extremely popular in his language and addreſs; but ſo far from being ſtrict and auſtere in his life and manners, that he obſerved no reſtraint in his pleaſures, abandoning himſelf to all manner of debauchery and luxury, a conduct, ſays our hiſtorian, not diſapproved of by thoſe who deſigned to raiſe him to the empire; for they did not care that the ſupreme head of the empire ſhould be in his morals over ſevere. However, he was not the firſt author of the conſpiracy; nay, our hiſtorian tells us, that it was never known by whom the deſign was firſt concerted, though Subrius Flavius, tribune of a prætorian cohort, and Sulpicius Aſper, a centurion, ſeem to have been the moſt forward champions in it. Among the firſt who entered into it, our hiſtorian names Lucan, the celebrated poet, Plautius Lateranus, conſul elect, Flavius Scevinus, and Afranius Quinctilianus. Lucan was inſtigated by perſonal provocations, Nero, who was poſſeſſed with an ardent ambition of excelling in poetry, having from a ridiculous emulation forbid the publication of his poems: Lateranus, from whom the famous baſilic at Rome took its name, was piqued by no injury done to himſelf, but engaged in a plot from a ſincere affection to the republic. The other two had ſouls drowned in ſenſuality, and had till that time lived in ſloth and debauchery: what prompted

His character.

Many perſons of diſtinction concerned in it.

Scevinus

Scevinus to conſpire, we are not told; but Quinctilianus became an accomplice in order to be revenged on Nero, for having in a virulent ſatire publiſhed his ſcandalous and unnatural lewdneſs. Rome was ſurpriſed, that two men of ſuch characters ſhould engage in an enterpriſe ſo great and daring. Theſe we have mentioned drew ſoon into the combination Tullius Senecio, Cervarius Proculus, Vulcatus Araricus, Julius Tugurinus, Munatius Gratus, Antonius Natalis, and Martius Feſtus, all Roman knights. Out of the troops, beſides the two officers already mentioned, were aſſumed as accomplices, Granius Silvanus, Statius Proximus, both tribunes of the prætorian bands, Maximus Scaurus, Venetus Paulus, two centurions, and as their main ſtrength and dependence, Fenius Rufus, captain of the imperial guards, a man greatly eſteem'd by the people, and on that account hated both by his collegue Tigellinus and the emperor. The conſpirators were no ſooner aſſured, that Rufus had embraced their party, than they began more reſolutely to debate about the time and place of the intended aſſaſſination. Subrius Flavius undertook to aſſail Nero, while he was ſinging on the ſtage, or ſcouring the ſtreets in his drunken revels by night, unattended by his guards; but a too great anxiety to eſcape with impunity, ever unſeaſonable in great enterpriſes, reſtrained him [q].

Epicharis a freed-woman animates the conſpirators.

In the mean time, the conſpirators putting off from day to day the execution of their deſign, a woman, named Epicharis, took upon her to rouſe them. It was utterly unknown by what means ſhe came at all to be appriſed of the plot; for till that time ſhe had never ſhewn the leaſt regard to honour, virtue, or honeſty. When ſhe found that all her reproaches and exhortations were to no effect, impatient of their ſlowneſs, ſhe left Rome, and haſtened into Campania, where ſhe employed all her induſtry and ſkill to eſtrange from Nero the hearts of the chief officers of the fleet riding at Miſenum, and to engage them in the deſign, which they had frequent opportunities of executing, as the emperor took great delight in ſailing often along the coaſts of Miſenum and Puteoli. In that fleet, Volueſus Proculus, who had been employed by Nero to diſpatch his mother, had the command of a thouſand marines. But as he did not think himſelf thereby ſufficiently rewarded for ſo meritorious a murder, either from an old acquaintance with Epicharis, [q] Idem, c. 48—50.

Epicharis, or a friendſhip newly contracted, he related to her his ſignal ſervices to Nero, adding bitter complaints, that he had not been diſtinguiſhed with promotion equal to his deſerts. In anſwer to him, Epicharis urged all the crying cruelties, all the barbarous outrages committed by the tyrant, and at the ſame time acquainted him with the conſpiracy; but had the precaution to conceal from him the names of the conſpirators. The traitor was no ſooner let into the ſecret, than he flew to Rome, and betrayed the whole to Nero. But his diſcovery availed nothing; for when Epicharis was ſummoned and confronted with the informer, as his charge againſt her was ſupported by no witneſſes, ſhe denied it, pretending to be greatly amazed at the impudent boldneſs of the accuſer. However, ſhe was detained in priſon, Nero ſuſpecting that the charge was not falſe, though not proved to be true[r]. The conſpirators being, notwithſtanding the ſilence of Epicharis, apprehenſive of a diſcovery, came to a reſolution to haſten the intended murder, and choſe, as the moſt convenient place for the execution of their deſign, a villa at Baiæ belonging to Piſo, whither the emperor frequently reſorted to bathe and banquet, with a ſmall number of attendants. But in this Piſo would by no means concur, alledging the general abhorrence which muſt enſue, were the ſacred rights of hoſpitality violated, with the murder of a prince, however wicked. He thought it more adviſeable to diſpatch him at Rome, either in the deteſted houſe, which he had reared with the ſpoils of the unhappy city, or in the face of the public, ſince for the benefit of the public the deſign had been undertaken. Thus he reaſoned openly among the conſpirators; but in his heart he was influenced by ſecret jealouſy, fearing leaſt Lucius Silanus, a man of extraordinary accompliſhments, might, as he was then at Rome, upon the firſt news of Nero's death, ſeize the vacant ſovereignty for himſelf. He was likewiſe jealous of the conſul Veſtinus, not knowing but he might, as he was a man of great intrepidity, attempt the reſtoring of the antient government, or beſtow the empire upon ſome other, as a gift of his own. The conſpirators, moved by the reaſonings of Piſo, unanimouſly agreed to execute their deſign, not at Baiæ, but at Rome, on the anniverſary ſacred to Ceres, and always ſolemniſed with Circenſian games, at which Nero never failed failed to aſſiſt, giving free acceſs to all, during the gaiety of the ſports. The deſign was to be executed in the following manner: Lateranus, who was but in ſlender circumſtances, under pretence of imploring relief, was to fall at the prince's feet, and, while he apprehended no ſuch attempt, throw him down, and keep him fixed to the ground. Then the tribunes, centurions, and the other conſpirators, were, each according to his boldneſs, to ruſh in and diſpatch him. Scevinus earneſtly claimed the honour and ſatisfaction of giving the firſt blow; for having formerly taken a dagger out of a temple, he carried it conſtantly about him, as conſecrated to the execution of ſome mighty deſign. It was moreover agreed, that Piſo ſhould wait the event in the temple of Ceres, and be thence brought forth by Fenius, captain of the guards, and conducted to the camp (Q).

She is accuſed to Nero, but baffles her accuſer.

Piſo is jealous of Silanus and the conſul Veſtinus.

[r] Idem. c. 51, 52.

Scevinus claims the honour of giving the firſt blow.

The day before that, which was appointed for the execution of the deſign, Scevinus, upon his returning home from a long conference with Antonius Natalis, ſealed his will; then unſheathing the above-mentioned dagger, he complained it was blunt and ruſty, charging Milichus, one of his freed men, to have it ground and ſharpened at the point: next he ordered a repaſt, more ſumptuous and profuſe than ordinary, to be got ready; after which he preſented his favourite ſlaves with their liberty, and others with ſums of money: his countenance, in the midſt of an affected chearfulneſs, appeared clouded: in his diſcourſe he was continually running from one ſubject to another, without attending to any; whence all who were preſent, concluded, that his mind was fraught with ſome great deſign: at laſt he ordered the ſame Milichus to prepare bandages for wounds, and applications for ſtopping blood. The freedman, reflecting on theſe orders, and concluding with himſelf,

The conſpiracy how diſcovered.

(Q) Pliny tells us, that in order to attract the affections of the people, Antonia, daughter of the late emperor Claudius, was to accompany Piſo to the camp. But our hiſtorian thinks it incredible, that either Antonia ſhould contribute her name, and riſque her life, to promote a ſcheme, from which ſhe could reap no advantage, or that Piſo, who was univerſally known to be paſſionately fond of his wife, ſhould engage to marry another (30).

(30) Idem, c. 44.

ſelf, that a conſpiracy was undoubtedly carrying on, and his patron concerned in it, haſtened next morning by break of day to the gardens of Servilius, where Nero then was; and being refuſed admittance, declared that he came to diſcover matters of the utmoſt importance. Hereupon he was by the porters conducted to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's freed-men, and by him forthwith to the emperor himſelf, to whom he related all the circumſtances he had obſerved, ſhewed the dagger, and deſired the criminal to be immediately ſent for. Accordingly, Scevinus was by a band of ſoldiers haſtily ſeized and dragged before the emperor; but defended himſelf with a ſpirit ſo undaunted, and inveighed againſt the informer as a treacherous wretch, ſtill actuated by the baſe ſpirit of a ſlave, with ſuch firmneſs and intrepidity, that the informer had been baffled, had not his wife put him in mind, that Antonius Natalis had held a long conference with Scevinus, and that both lived in cloſe confidence with Caius Piſo. Natalis was therefore immediately ſent for, and both he and Scevinus examined apart concerning the particulars of that conference. As their anſwers varied, they were thrown into irons, and threatened with the rack, the ſight of which neither of them being able to bear, they diſcovered the whole order and progreſs of the conſpiracy. Natalis confeſſed the firſt, and declared how far Piſo was concerned in the plot, and named alſo Seneca; but whether he had acted as an inter-agent between him and Piſo, or whether Natalis impeached him only to purchaſe the favour of Nero, who was daily hunting after ſome ſpecious pretence to deſtroy him, is uncertain. Scevinus, underſtanding that by Natalis a confeſſion was made, and that no advantage could be reaped from his ſilence, yielded at length, and declared all the other accomplices. Of theſe Lucan, Quinctilianus, and Senecio, perſiſted long in denying the charge; but at length were decoyed by a promiſe of impunity; and then, to atone for their backwardneſs, they informed againſt their deareſt friends, Lucan againſt Attilia, his own mother, Quinctilianus againſt Glicius Gallus, and Senecio againſt Annius Pollio. In the mean time, Nero, recollecting that Epicharis was detained in priſon, and ſuppoſing, that the tender body of a woman could never endure the violence of the rack, commanded her to be rent and mangled with all ſorts of torments. But her firmneſs and magnanimity was proof againſt the fury of ſtripes, of fire, and of all the torments the executioners could could invent, though they exerted their utmoſt efforts in cruelty, leaſt they ſhould be at laſt ſcorned and baffled by a woman. She ſtill utterly denied every particular; and ſuch was the iſſue of the firſt day's torture. The next day, as ſhe was reconducted in a chair to ſuffer anew the ſame torments, for all her members were ſo rent and diſjointed, that ſhe could not ſupport herſelf, with the girdle, that bound her breaſts, ſhe framed a nooſe for her neck, and tying it to the top of the chair, hung upon it with all the weight of her body, and put an end to the poor remains of life. Thus a woman, who was once a ſlave, chearfully ſuffered the moſt exquiſite torments cruelty could invent, and death itſelf, to protect perſons, whom ſhe ſcarce knew, when men born free, when Roman knights and ſenators, without once feeling the torture, betrayed their deareſt friends, their neareſt relations. For Lucan, Senecio, and Quinctilianus were daily making new diſcoveries, and ſtill naming more accomplices; which ſo terrified Nero, that he not only doubled his guards, but poſted bands of ſoldiers upon the walls and all round the city, lined the ſea-coaſt and the banks of the Tiber with numerous detachments, ordered parties of foot and horſe to ſcour the fields night and day, to range in the public ſquares, in the neighbouring municipal towns, to enter the private houſes, &c. With the prætorian guards Germans were intermixt; for in them, as they were foreigners, the prince chiefly confided [s].

Several of the conſpirators ſeized.

The firmneſs and intrepity of Epicharis.

She hangs herſelf with her girdle.

Nero's great conſternation

And now the accuſed were dragged in whole droves, numbers after numbers, to Nero's tribunal, which was erected in his gardens, and lay together at the gates, expecting to be ſucceſſively admitted and examined. If upon their tryal it appeared, that they had ever been ſeen ſmiling with any of the conſpirators; that they had ever ſpoke with them, met them, however fortuitouſly, been common gueſts at the ſame table, or ſat together at ſome public ſhew; all this, or any part of it, was imputed as an unpardonable crime. The judges were Nero himſelf, Tigellinus, and his collegue Fenius Rufus, who, as he was not yet detected, proved more ſevere than the other two in examining his own aſſociates, in order to perſuade the prince, that he was an utter ſtranger to the plot. Nay, to him it was owing, that the deſign was not put in execution, even even during the examination of the conſpirators: for the brave tribune, Subrius Flavius, who attended and was not yet impeached or ſuſpected, having demanded by ſigns, whether he ſhould draw his ſword, and diſpatch the tyrant, was by contrary ſigns checked and forbid, when he had already graſped the hilt. When the conſpiracy was firſt diſcovered, there were ſome, who exhorted Piſo to proceed directly to the camp, or mount the roſtrum, and try the affections of the people and ſoldiery, ſince nothing worſe could befal him, though both the ſoldiery and people failed him, than he muſt already expect; nay, by loſing his life in ſo glorious an attempt, he would approve himſelf worthy of his anceſtors, and leave a glorious example to his poſterity; whereas, if he neglected the preſent opportunity, he would be ſoon ſeized, committed to bonds, and condemned to an ignominious death. But Piſo, rejecting the advice of his friends and aſſociates, the beſt that could be given him at the preſent juncture, retired, without making the leaſt attempt, to his own houſe, where upon the arrival of a band of ſoldiers to ſeize him, he opened the veins in both his arms, and bled to death. He left a will full of fulſome flattery towards Nero; and this out of tenderneſs to his wife Arria Galla, whom he had taken from Domitius Silius, a friend of his own, though ſhe was a woman of moſt vicious inclinations, and, ſave the beauty of her perſon, deſtitute of every recommendation. Next followed the death of Plautius Lateranus, conſul elect, inflicted with ſuch precipitation, that he was not allowed even to embrace his children; but inſtantly dragged to the place allotted for the execution of ſlaves, and there ſlaughtered by the hand of Statius the tribune. He died with exemplary firmneſs and intrepidity, uttered not a ſyllable relating to the conſpiracy; but with an undaunted ſpirit, anſwered Epaphroditus, the emperor's freedman and ſecretary, who aſked him ſome queſtions, If I were mean enough to make any diſcoveries, it would be to your maſter, not to you. He did not even upbraid the tribune appointed to cut off his head, tho' he too was concerned with him in the conſpiracy [t]. Arrian tells us, that the firſt blow having only wounded him, he ſhook his head a little, and then preſented his neck again to the executioner [u].

[s] Idem, c. 52—58.

Subrius Flavius offers to kill Nero, but is checked by the cowardly Fenius Rufus.

Piſo puts himſelf to death.

Plautius Lateranus dies with great intrepidity.

THE next illuſtrious perſon ſacrificed on this occaſion was Annæus Seneca, to the infinite joy of Nero, who had been long ſeeking his deſtruction. Natalis alone had named him, and con-

The particulars of Seneca's death.

[t] Tacit. c. 16. [u] Arrian. ex Epict. l. i. c. 1.

concerning him could only diſcover thus much, that he had been ſent by Piſo to viſit Seneca, then indiſpoſed, to complain in his name, that he was debarred acceſs to him, and to repreſent, that it would he better if they maintained their friendſhip by familiar converſation; that to this Seneca replied, that frequent interviews and converſations by themſelves were conducing to the ſervice of neither; but that upon the ſafety of Piſo his own welfare depended. Granius Silvanus, tribune of a prætorian cohort, was ſent to Seneca, with orders to aſk him, whether he owned the words of Natalis and his own anſwers? Seneca was returned that very day from Campania, and had ſtopped at a villa of his, four miles from Rome. Thither arrived the tribune in the evening; and having beſet the villa with his men, he entered the houſe, and acquainted Seneca with his commiſſion, while he ſat at table with Paulina his wife, and two friends. Seneca anſwered, That Natalis had in truth been ſent to him, and had complained in Piſo's name, that he was refuſed admitance; a complaint which he had anſwered by excuſing himſelf, on account of his bodily diſorder and his love of quiet. He denied to have ever declared, that his ſafety depended upon that of any private man, adding, that he was not at all addicted to flattery, as no man better knew than Nero. When this anſwer was by the tribune reported to the emperor, he aſked, whether Seneca ſeemed determined upon a voluntary death? I have not diſcovered, replied the tribune, either in his words or looks, the leaſt ſymptom of fear. Hereupon Nero commanded him to return directly, and acquaint him, that he muſt die. The tribune who was himſelf one of the conſpirators, took not the ſame way he came; but turning aſide, went firſt to Fenius, captain of the guards, and diſcloſing to him the emperor's orders, aſked, whether he ſhould obey them? The cowardly commander adviſed him to execute his commiſſion, and act in every reſpect as if he were an utter ſtranger to the plot. Thus Fenius and Silvanus, through a meanneſs and timidity hardly to be believed, contributed to multiply thoſe very cruelties, which they had conſpired to avenge. However, the tribune avoided ſeeing Seneca, and delivering in perſon the ſaid meſſage; but ſent in a centurion to appriſe him of his doom. Seneca heard the ſentence without betraying the leaſt diſmay or concern, and calmly called for his will; but that being denied him by the centurion, turning to his friends, he told them, that ſince he was prevented from gratefully acknowledging their favours, he bequeathed them that which alone was now left him, the pattern of his life. He repreſſed their tears, ſometimes with gentle reaſoning, ſometimes with ſharp rebukes, aſking them, Where were now all the documents of philoſophy? where the precepts of wiſdom ſo many years premeditated againſt impending calamities? for to whom, ſaid he, is unknown the bloody nature of Nero? After the butchering of his mother and brother, what remained, but to add to theirs the ſlaughter of his preceptor and inſtructor? After he had diſcourſed ſome time to the company in general, he embraced his wife; an affecting object! which ſomewhat abated his firmneſs, and ſeemed to ſoften his philoſophical ſpirit. He beſought her to moderate her ſorrow, and to fortify herſelf againſt the grief ariſing from the loſs of her huſband, by the contemplation of his life ſpent in a ſteady courſe of virtue. Paulina, on the contrary, reſolutely declared, that ſhe was determined to die with him. This declaration ſurpriſed Seneca, who unwilling to bereave her of ſo much glory, and loth to leave one, whom he tenderly loved, expoſed to inſults and injuries, after a ſhort pauſe, Since to the delights of a ſhort life, you prefer, ſaid he, the everlaſting fame of a glorious death, I ſhall not envy you this honour. Let us ſhare the glory of ſo brave an end, tho' your ſhare will be by far the greater. After this converſation, both had the veins of their arms opened at the ſame inſtant. As Seneca was aged, and his body extenuated with a ſlender diet, his blood iſſued but ſlowly; whereupon he cauſed the veins of his legs and thoſe about the joints of his knees to be likewiſe cut. As he ſuffered cruel agonies, he perſuaded his wife to retire into another chamber, leſt his torments ſhould ſhake her reſolution, or he himſelf, affected with her pangs, betray weakneſs and impatience. As his eloquence did not fail him to the laſt moment of his life, he called for his ſcribes, and dictated to them many things, which were publiſhed after his death. As Nero bore no perſonal enmity to Paulina, and was well appriſed, that her death would double the hatred of the public towards him, he ſent orders to the ſoldiers to prevent her from dying; who thereupon commanded her domeſtic ſlaves and freed-men to bind up her arms and ſtop the blood; but whether this was done without her knowledge, or with her concurrence, is uncertain; for as men are commonly prone to believe the worſt, there were ſome who aſſerted, that while ſhe deſpaired of her pardon, ſhe aſpired at the glory of dying with her huſband;

The conſtancy of his wife.

She is prevented from dying by Nero's orders.

band; but yielded to the allurements of life, as ſoon as ſhe found the prince inclined to mercy. However that be, ſhe outlived her huſband but a few years, ever pale and in a languiſhing condition, and retained to the laſt a reverence for his memory worthy of all praiſe. Seneca, in the mean time, to haſten his death which advanced but ſlowly, beſought Statius Annæus, an intimate friend of his and well ſkilled in medicine, to bring him a draught of poiſon, which he had prepared long before, and kept by him. This he ſwallowed but in vain, his limbs being chilled with cold, and his juices ſtagnated. He had therefore recourſe to a hot bath, to haſten by that means the operation of the poiſon, or to make his blood flow more freely. With the water of the bath he ſprinkled ſuch of his ſlaves as ſtood near him, ſaying, With this liquor I make a libation to Jupiter the deliverer. This he did in imitation of the Greeks, who in departing after a banquet, uſed to make libations to Jupiter the preſerver. As the bath had not the deſired effect, and the ſoldiers were very preſſing, he was at laſt conveyed into a ſtove, and there ſuffocated with the ſteam. His corps was burnt without any funeral ſolemnity, purſuant to a will which he had made, even while he was in high favour with the prince[w]. Thus died the celebrated L. Annæus Seneca, on the twelfth, or, as others will have it on the thirteenth, of April. Dion Caſſius aſſures us, that he was privy to the conſpiracy, from which charge Tacitus does not attempt to clear him. He tells us indeed, that Nero had no proof of his being engaged in the plot; but adds, that a rumour prevailed, that Subrius Flavius, in a ſecret conſultation with the centurions, not without the privacy of Seneca, had determined as ſoon as Nero was cut off by the aid of Piſo, to diſpatch Piſo too, and transfer the empire to Seneca; nay, the very words, ſaid to have been uttered by Flavius, in that conference, became current, viz. That it availed nothing to depoſe a minſtrel, if he were to be ſucceeded by a tragedian; for as Nero uſed to play upon the harp, ſo Piſo's chief delight was to ſing attired like an actor in a tragedy. Of Seneca's writings we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. As to his manners, we ſhall only ſay, that many things were imputed to him, perhaps not undeſervedly, altogether inconſiſtent with the philoſophy which he profeſſed. He entertained a mighty

Seneca takes poiſon in vain.

His laſt words.

Is ſuffocated in a hot bath.

[w] Tacit. c. 62, 64. [x] Dio, l. lxii. p. 713.

opinion of his own virtue; but few have hitherto concurred with him in the ſame ſentiments.

Fenius Rufus is accuſed and apprehended.

HITHERTO Fenius Rufus had proceeded with more ſeverity, than either Tigellinus or Nero himſelf, againſt the conſpirators his accomplices; but was in the end detected; for while in the examination of Flavius Scevinus the ſenator, he urged him with many menaces to a full confeſſion, Scevinus ſmiled, and told him, That no man was better acquainted with the particulars of the plot than himſelf. Fenius attempted to refute the charge; but, faultering and perplexed in his ſpeech, he gave manifeſt tokens of his guilt and diſmay: whereupon he was by the emperor's orders immediately ſeized and dragged to priſon. At the ſame time the brave tribune Subrius Flavius was impeached. He at firſt defended himſelf; but being preſſed by the informers, he not only owned the charge, but gloried in it; and in anſwer to Nero, who aſked him, Upon what provocation he had ſlighted the obligation of his oath? for the ſoldiery, eſpecially the officers bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to protect the prince againſt all foreign and domeſtic enemies; Becauſe I abhorred thee, ſaid he, though there was not in the whole army one more zealouſly attached to thee than I, ſo long as thou didſt merit affection; but I began to hate thee, when thou becameſt the murderer of thy mother, the muderer of thy brother and wife, a charioteer, a comedian, and an incendiary. Tacitus tells us, that the whole conſpiracy afforded nothing which proved ſo bitter and pungent to Nero as this reproach. He ordered Flavius to be immediately put to death, committing the execution to Veianus Niger, a tribune, who led him into the next field, and there ordered in the firſt place a funeral trench to be dug, ſuch as ſerved for a grave to the ſoldiers, who died in the camp. Flavius found fault with it, as too ſtreight and ſhallow; and turning to the guard of ſoldiers, This, ſaid he, without betraying the leaſt concern, is not even done according to the laws of diſcipline. When the tribune deſired him to ſtretch out his neck valiantly; I wish, replied he, thou mayeſt ſtrike as valiantly; and truly the tribune was ſeized with ſuch a violent trembling, that he with difficulty cut off his head at two blows. However, he afterwards bragged to Nero, that he had deſignedly employed more blows than one. The next example of firmneſs and conſtancy was adminiſtered by Sulpicius Aſper Subrius Flavius reviles Nero to his face.

His laſt brave words, and contempt of death.

the centurion; who being aſked by Nero, Why he had conſpired againſt him? anſwered in a few words, Becauſe there was no other relief againſt thy abominable enormities. The other centurions faced death with equal bravery. But Fenius Rufus betrayed a meaneſs quite unbecoming a man of his rank and profeſſion; nay, he even filled his laſt will with unmanly lamentations. Nero hoped to find the conſul Veſtinus likewiſe concerned in the conſpiracy; but, as he was a man of a violent ſpirit and altogether untractable, the conſpirators had not thought fit to impart their deſign to him. He had once lived in cloſe confidence with Nero; but afterwards abuſing the freedom which the emperor allowed him, and utterly deſpiſing him, he uſed frequently to inſult the prince with poignant ſarcaſms, which left behind them a bitter remembrance, as they were for the moſt part founded on truth. Beſides, Nero dreaded the haughty and violent temper of Veſtinus; and therefore wiſhed for a plauſible pretence to get rid of him; but as no accuſer appeared to charge him, ſince he could not ſatiate his rancour under the title of a judge, he had recourſe to the violence of a tyrant, and diſpatched Gerelanus the tribune, at the head of five hundred men, with orders to obviate the attempts of the conſul. He had that day diſcharged all the functions of a conſul, and was celebrating a banquet at home with great gaiety, when the ſoldiers entering, told him, That the tribune waited for him. Veſtinus, without delay, roſe from table, and in a trice the tragedy was begun and finiſhed; he was ſhut up in a chamber; the phyſician attended; his veins were cut, and he while he was ſtill in full vigor, conveyed into a hot bath, and ſuffocated with the ſteam, without uttering a ſyllable that argued either grief or compaſſion for himſelf. In the mean time, the whole company that ſupped with him were beſet by a guard, and not releaſed till the night was far ſpent, Nero making himſelf ſport with the fears of men, who had paſſed at once, from the mirth and joy of a feaſt, to the deadly apprehenſion of their laſt doom. At length he ordered the guards to withdraw, ſaying, that the conſul's gueſts had paid dear enough for their good cheer[y]. Lucan the poet was next ſentenced to die. His veins being opened, and his blood

Fenius Rufus dies meanly.

The quick and brave death of the conſul Veſtinus.

[y] Tacit. c. 63——69.

Lucan dies with great intrepidity.

iſſuing in ſtreams, he ſoon perceived his feet and hands to grow cold and ſtiff; but before his faculties were impaired, recollecting ſome lines of his own, in which he deſcribed a wounded ſoldier expiring after the ſame manner, he rehearſed them, and they were the laſt words he uttered [z] (N). Suetonius, or whoever elſe is the author of his life, tells us, that his behaviour towards Nero, who loved him, was ſuch as would have provoked the beſt of princes. His informing, and indeed falſly, if the author of his life is to be credited, againſt his own mother, will reflect eternal ignominy on his memory. The emperor had promiſed him his pardon; but the only favour he granted him, was the choice of his death, which happened on the thirteenth of April in the twenty-ſeventh year of his age [a]. We ſhall ſpeak of his writings anon. Senecio, Quinctilianus, and Scevinus, ſuffered death with a ſpirit far different from the former effeminacy of their lives. The other conſpirators were put to death, without ſpeaking or doing any thing worthy of notice.

Nero's cruelty to the children of the conſpirators.

Suetonius tells us, that Nero not ſatisfied with the puniſhment of the conſpirators themſelves, drove their innocent children out of Rome, and cauſed them, together with their tutors, governors, and domeſtics, to be either poiſoned, or ſtarved to death [b]. Whole families, as that writer aſſures us, were cut off at one meal. During this mighty carnage, which filled Rome with deaths, corpſes, and funerals, no one durſt ſhew the leaſt ſymptom of ſorrow for their murdered relations; nay, they muſt teſtify joy, unleſs they had a mind to be treated like traitors and enemies to the ſtate and emperor. Hence, as the city was filled with carcaſſes, ſo was the capitol with victims: one had loſt a ſon; one a brother; this man a friend, that a near relation: but whatever was the loſs, every one paid his public thankſgiving to the gods; adorned, in token of joy, [z] Idem, c. 70. [a] Suet. in vit. Lucan. [b] Suet. c. 36.

(N) The verſes mentioned here, were, without all doubt, the following:

Scinditur avulſus, nec ſicut vulnere ſanguis
Emicuit lentus, ruptis cadit undique venis;
Diſcurſuſque animæ diverſa in membra meantis Interceptus aquis.

joy, his houſe with laurel; fell proſtrate at the emperor's feet; kiſs'd his hand, &c. Antonius Natalis and Cervarius Proculus were pardoned, in conſideration of their early confeſſion and diſcovery. Milichus the freed-man was amply rewarded, and honoured with a Greek name ſignifying protector. Granius Silvanus, one of the tribunes of the prætorian guards, obtained his pardon; but ſoon after ſcorning to owe his life to the tyrant, fell by his own hand. All the friends of Seneca, tho' rather calumniated than convicted, were condemned to baniſhment. Cæſonius Maximus and Cadicia, the wife of Scevinus, were driven out of Italy, and only by their puniſhment knew that they had been charged as criminals (O). The accuſation againſt Attilia, Rewards the inſtruments of his cruelty.

(O) The following beautiful epigram in Martial, inſcribed to one Ovidius, an intimate friend of Cæſonius Maximus, may give us ſome light into this matter:

Maximus ille tuus, Ovidi, Cæſonius hic eſt,
Cujus adhuc vultum vivida cera tenet.
Hunc Nero damnavit; ſed tu damnare Neronem
Auſus es, & profugi, non tua fata, ſequi:
Æquora per Scyllæ magnus comes exulis iſti,
Qui modo nolueras conſulis ire comes.
Si victura meis mandantur nomina chartis,
Et fas eſt cineri me ſupereſſe meo;
Audiet hæc præſens, venturaque turba, fuiſſe
Illi te, Senecæ quod fuit ille ſuo (31).

From theſe verſes it is plain, that Cæſonius had been a conſul, and was one of Seneca's moſt intimate friends; which was, without doubt, the motive that prompted Nero to baniſh him. As Ovidius accompanied him into baniſhment, ſo had Cæſonius in all likelihood accompanied formerly Seneca, when he was by Claudius baniſhed into the iſland of Corſica. The ſubject of the preſent epigram is the effigies of Cæſonius in wax, ſent either by Martial to his friend Ovidius, or by Ovidius to the poet. Cæſonius himſelf died, it ſeems, before this time in exile. After his conſulſhip, he was ſent into Africa, to govern that province, whither Ovidius refuſed to follow him; but like a true friend, he attended him, when diſgraced and condemned to baniſhment; a ſignal inſtance of fidelity and friendſhip, and worthy of being by ſo great a poet tranſmitted to the lateſt poſterity.

(31) Martial. l. vii.

Attilia, Lucian's mother, was dropt; ſo that, without being cleared, ſhe eſcaped unpuniſhed [c].

And now the conſpiracy being utterly ſuppreſſed, and the conſpirators either ſentenced to death or baniſhment, Nero aſſembled the ſoldiery, diſtributed amongſt them a largeſs of two thouſand nummi a man, and ordered them to be thenceforth ſupplied with corn at the public expence. Upon Petronius Turpilianus, Cocceius Nerva, and Tigellinus, he beſtowed triumphal ornaments, as a reward for their zeal in proſecuting the conſpirators; nay, he cauſed triumphal ſtatues to be erected in the forum to the two latter, and their images to be placed in the palace; a diſtinction ſeldom granted, and only to perſons of the greateſt merit. Nymphidius was diſtinguiſhed with the conſular ornaments. He was the ſon of a freed-woman, who, as ſhe was very beautiful, had long proſtituted herſelf to the domeſtics of the emperors, bond and free, without diſtinction. Nymphidius boaſted himſelf the ſon of Caligula, whom he reſembled both in his countenance and the tallneſs of his ſtature; and it is not improbable, ſays our hiſtorian, that the emperor addicted as he was to all manner of lewdneſs, had deſcended to gallantries with his mother. But of him we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more at length hereafter; for he too had his ſhare in the calamities and viciſſitudes of Rome. The emperor, having thus rewarded the inſtruments of his tyranny, aſſembled the fathers, and acquainted them with the late tranſactions. To the people likewiſe he addreſſed an edict upon the ſame ſubject, and publiſhed ſeveral evidences againſt the conſpirators, with their own confeſſions, in order to confute a rumour current among the populace, that the plot was forged, and that Nero, merely to ſatiate his cruelty and out of baſe fear, had ſacrificed ſo many illuſtrious citizens. In the ſenate, where the more abject flattery prevailed, every particular, the more ſenſibly he was affected with inward grief for the loſs of his friends or relations, the more outward joy and congratulations he expreſſed. It was by the whole body decreed, that public thankſgivings and oblations ſhould be paid to all the deities, and particular honours to the ſun, who having a chace in the circus, where the parricide was to be perpetrated, had brought to light the dark contrivances of the conſpirators; that the circenſian games ſhould be ſolemnized with extraorextraordinary pomp; that the month of April, in which the conſpiracy was detected, ſhould thenceforth bear the name of Nero; that a temple ſhould be erected to the goddeſs Salus or Safety, in the place whence Scevinus had taken the dagger, &c. The dagger itſelf was by Nero dedicated in the capitol with this inſcription, To Jupiter the avenger (P). Such was the iſſue of this conſpiracy, which to the ſame moment owed, as Tacitus obſerves, its beginning, progreſs, and perfection, and was with faithful ſilence and ſecrecy concealed in a combination ſo numerous, ſo variouſly framed, amongſt thoſe of every condition, ſex, and age, till it was accidentally diſcovered in the manner we have related.

The mean flattery of the ſenate.

[c] Tacit. c. 73.

Nero betakes himſelf again to his harp.

NERO, now delivered from all fear, betook himſelf again to his harp. As the time approached for diſputing the prizes in the quinquennial games, the ſenate, to prevent Nero from appearing there as a competitor, offered him the prize of muſic, and alſo the crown of eloquence. But the emperor anſwered, That he needed not their partiality; ſince he himſelf was a match for all his competitors, and would only, by the juſt determination of the judges, purchaſe the praiſe and recompence of his ſkill. He appeared therefore publicly upon the ſtage, and there rehearſed a poem of his own compoſing; but the populace applauding him, and begging he would diſplay all his ſtudies, for theſe were their words, he entered the great theatre, and there appearing amongſt the common harpers and minſtrels, contended with them for the prize, with ſuch eagerneſs and anxiety, that he never ventured to ſit down, however fatigued, that being contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws of the harp, nor to ſpit,

He appears on the public ſtage as a competitor for the prizes.

(P) The dagger was inſcribed to Jupiter the avenger, Jovi vindici; words, ſays our hiſtorian, which, at that time, were not minded. But upon the revolt of Julius Vindex, which afterwards happened, an augury and preſage of approaching vengeance was drawn from them. Tacitus tells us, that he found in the journals of the ſenate, that Cerealis Anicius, conſul elect, when it came to his vote, moved that a temple ſhould in all ſpeed be raiſed at the public charge, and conſecrated to to the deified Nero; a motion which he really meant as a compliment, to one who was entitled to divine worſhip; but from thence too was inferred an omen of his approaching fate; ſince to princes divine honours were not paid, till they finiſhed their mortal courſe(32).

(32) Tacit. c. 74.

ſpit, nor to wipe the ſweat from his face, ſave only with his arm. In the end, adoring the multitude with his knee bent and his hands lifted up, according to the cuſtom of the common-players, he waited with awe and trembling the determination of the judges. The common people of Rome applauded him with loud ſhouts and clapping of hands, from an utter inſenſibility, ſays our hiſtorian, of the crying reproach, which diſgraced the Roman empire. But the inhabitants of the municipal cities of Italy, who ſtill retained the ſevere manners of the antients, and ſuch as came from remote provinces, and attended them at Rome upon embaſſies, or their own private affairs, could not behold, without indignation, the ſovereign of Rome thus debaſing himſelf upon the ſtage, and much leſs join thoſe, who applauded this his ſhameful debaſement. They were therefore frequently beaten by the ſoldiers, who ſtood in ſeveral cluſters among the croud to obſerve the faces of the ſpectators [d].

Appears frequently on the ſtage, and tires the audience.

NERO, encouraged with the applauſe of the multitude, appeared thenceforth almoſt every day on the ſtage, inviting, not only the ſenators and knights, but likewiſe the populace and the whole rabble of Rome, to hear him, though he performed for the moſt part in the theatre, which he had built in the palace. He often kept the audience, not only the whole day, but the night too; for till he was tired and gave over, no one was allowed to depart upon any occaſion, however neceſſary and urging: inſomuch, that woman are ſaid to have been delivered in the theatre, and ſeveral perſons ſo tired, that, finding the gates of the palace ſhut, they either leaped privately over the wall, or, in order to be carried out, pretended to be in a ſwoon [e]; ſome, by never ſtiring night nor day from their ſeats, were ſeized with mortal diſtempers, which, however, they dreaded leſs than the prince's reſentment, which they unavoidable incurred by their abſence: beſides the ſeveral concealed and private obſervers, employed to mark the carriage of the audience, there were numbers of open ſpies, who publicly ſet down the names of ſuch as were preſent, obſerved their faces, and watched all the ſymptoms of pleaſure or diſſatisfaction in every one preſent: the vulgar were immediately puniſhed by the ſoldiery for the leaſt diſattention; diſattention; towards perſons of rank the emperor's reſentment was for the preſent ſmothered, but vented at laſt in a more dreadful manner. We are told, that Veſpaſian, afterwards emperor, was not only bitterly reproached by Phœbus, Nero's freed-men, but charged as a criminal, for having nodded while the emperor was ſinging: this diſattention would have coſt him his life, had not his friends, men of great rank and merit employed their prayers and mediation in his behalf. This year the death of Poppæa, Nero's wife, filled Rome in appearance with grief and mourning, but in reality with much joy; for ſhe was no leſs abhorred, than her huſband, on account of her lewdneſs and cruelty. She was killed by Nero himſelf with a kick on the belly, while ſhe was big with child, for finding fault with him, as Suetonius tells us, upon his coming home late [f]; or becauſe ſhe ventured to rally him, as we read in Dion Caſſius [g], upon his ſkill and addreſs in chariot-driving. Her body was not burnt according to the Roman cuſtom; but after the manner of foreign monarchs, embalmed and repoſited in the ſepulchre of the Julian family. Her obſequies were celebrated with the utmoſt pomp, and her penegyric pronounced from the public roſtrum by the emperor himſelf [h]. Pliny aſſures us, that more perfumes were burnt at her funeral, than Arabia Felix produced in a year [i]. She conſtantly kept and carried about with her, if Dion Caſſius is to be credited [k], five hundred aſſes, and daily bathed in their milk for the preſervation of her beauty. Upon the death of Poppæa, Nero deſigned to marry Antonia, the daughter of Claudius, and his own ſiſter by adoption; but ſhe declined the match, and was on that account by his orders put to death, as if ſhe had been concerned in a conſpiracy, probably that of Piſo [l]. Soon after he married Statilia Meſſalina, the widow of the late conſul Atticus Veſtinus, and deſcend from Statilius Taurus, who had been twice conſul in the reign of Auguſtus. She too, as appears from ſome antient medals [m], was honoured with the title of Auguſta.

[d] Tacit annal. l. xvi. c. 5 [e] Suet. c. 23.

Veſpaſian in danger to his diſattention.

The death of Poppæa.

Not long after the death of Poppæa, Nero doomed to deſtruction two of the greateſt men in Rome, Caius Caſſius Longinus a learned civilian, and L. Junius Silanus Torquatus, Junius Silanus condemned.

[f] Suet. c. 35. [g] Dio, l. lxii. p. 71. [h] Tacit. c. 6. Suet. c. 35. Dio, p. 71. [i] Plin. l. xii. c. 18. [k] Dio, l. lxi. p. 72. [l] Suet. c. 35. [m] Goltz, p. 46.

quatus, the former for his great wealth and the exemplary gravity of his manners; the latter, becauſe he was related to the Cæſars, and, for his modeſty and other eminent qualaties, judged by the Roman people worthy of the empire. Caſſius was blind, very aged, and lead a retired life, as did likewiſe Silanus, though in the prime of his youth, having from the late bloody doom of his uncle Torquatus, who had aſſumed the port of a prince, learnt to ſhun all outward appearance of grandeur. However, the very ſame imputations, which had formerly been objected to his uncle, were urged againſt him; viz. that he aſpired at the ſovereign power, affected more majeſty and ſtate than became a private citizen, kept about him men with the title of principal ſecretaries, procurators, auditors of the revenues, treaſurers, &c. names and offices of imperial grandeur, which he already perſonated: imputations utterly falſe and groundleſs. To Caſſius Nero objected, that amongſt the images of his anceſtors he preſerved in high reverence that of Caius Caſſius, thus inſcribed, The leader of the party. At the ſame time, he ſuborned certain perſons to forge an accuſation againſt Lepida, the wife of Caſſius and aunt to Silanus, as if ſhe had been guilty of inceſt with her nephew, and had practiced magical rites of a miſchievous tendency. Againſt Caſſius and Silanus the ſenate pronounced ſentence of perpetual baniſhment, but referred the puniſhment of Lepida to the judgment of the emperor. Caſſius was tranſported into Sardinia, and, in regard of his great age, the ſhort remains of his life were ſpared. Silanus, under colour of carrying him to the iſland of Naxos, was conveyed to Oſtia, and afterwards confined in Barium a city of Apulia, where a centurion, commiſſioned to put him to death, laying hold of him, adviſed him to cut his veins. Silanus anſwered, that he was not fond of life; but that no executioner ſhould have the glory of putting him to death. Hereupon the centurion ordered his men to ſecure him; but Silanus, who was a young man of great ſtrength, reſolute, and daring, though deſtitute of arms, made a vigorous reſiſtance, till he fell by the ſword of the centurion, under a multitude of wounds, all received before, like a brave man, who falls facing the enemy in the day of battle[n]. With no leſs intrepidity died Lucius Vetius, and his mother-in-law Sextia, with Pollutia his daughter. Nero had long hated them, as ſtanding reproaches upon him for the murder of Rubellius Plautus the huſband

And Caſſius Longinus.

[n] Tacit. c. 7, 8.

huſband of Pollutia and ſon-in-law to Vetus. He therefore ſuborned a freed-man of Vetus to accuſe him, and then ſent a guard of ſoldiers to ſeize him at one of his ſeats in the neighbourhood of Formiæ. Hereupon his daughter Pollutia flew to Naples, where the emperor then was; being denied acceſs to him, watched at the gates of his houſe, till ſhe had an opportunity of beſeeching him to hear the defence of an innocent man, and not to ſacrifice, upon the depoſition of a treacherous ſlave, one who had formerly been his collegue in the conſulſhip. But in the end, being convinced, that the implacable tyrant was not to be ſoftened with ſupplications, ſhe returned to her father, and acquainted him, that he muſt baniſh all hope, and with intrepidity meet a fate, which he could not avoid. At the ſame time, tidings arrived, that the ſenate was haſtening his trial, and proceeding to a terrible and mercileſs ſentence. Hereupon he diſtributed amongſt his domeſtics whatever ſums of money were then in his poſſeſſion, and at the ſame time ordered them to remove and appropriate to themſelves the rich furniture of his villa. Then retiring with his mother-in-law Sextia and his daughter Pollutia, into a private apartment, they all three opened their veins in one and the ſame chamber, with one and the ſame inſtrument; and being covered for decency with a ſingle garment, they were conveyed into a warm bath, where they all three bled to death, the father's eyes being the whole time fixed upon his daughter, thoſe of Sextia on her grand-daughter, and hers upon both: they all prayed with emulation for a ſpeedy end; each wiſhed to expire firſt, and leave behind ſuch dear relations ſtill alive, though haſtening to die: and fortune obſerved the order of ſeniority and nature, the oldeſt expiring firſt, and the youngeſt laſt. After their death the ſervile ſenate was for pronouncing them guilty of high treaſon, and having their bodies dragged through the public ſtreets, and thrown into the Tiber; but Nero interpoſed, declaring himſelf ſatisfied with the puniſhment, which they had voluntarily undergone [a]. P. Gallus, a Roman knight, formerly intimate with Fenius Rufus and a friend to Vetus, was baniſhed. To the freed-man the accuſer a place was aſſigned in the theatre among the officers of the tribunes of the people. As the name of Apr had been already changed into that of Nero, the name of May into that of Claudius, ſo was the name of June now changed into that of Germanicus, Cornelius Orfitus moving, that the name of June ſhould ſhould be aboliſhed, ſince two of the Junii Torquati, already executed for treaſon, had rendered it abominable [p]. This year the country of Campania was ravaged with dreadful tempeſts and violent whirlwinds; whole villages were overturned, plantations torn up, the fruits of the earth ſcattered, &c. At the ſame time, a terrible peſtilence raged at Rome, and ſwept away in a ſhort ſpace above thirty thouſand perſons of all ranks and conditions. The ſenators and knights were leſs bewailed, as our hiſtorian obſerves, ſince by a contagion common to all, they eſcaped falling by the cruelty of the prince. Nero, after ſo many accumulated acts of tyranny, ſhewed this year ſome compaſſion upon the inhabitants of Lions, whom he preſented with a large ſum to repair the damage their city had ſuffered by accidental fire (R).

Several other perſons of diſtinction condemned.

[a] Idem, c. 10, 11.

Campania ravaged with dreadful tempeſts.

In the following conſulſhip of C. Suetonius Paulinus and C. Luſius Teleſinus, Soſianus, who had been condemned, as we have related above, to perpetual baniſhment, for certain viruleut verſes by him compoſed againſt Nero, having inſinuated himſelf into the friendſhip of one Pammenes, who was an exile in the ſame place, and celebrated for his knowledge in the myſteries of aſtrology, obſerved that meſſengers were daily arriving to conſult him, and at the ſame time

[p] Idem, c. 12.

(R) The burning of Lions happened, according to Seneca (33), a hundred years after it was founded. Hence Lipſius concludes, that this misfortune befel that flouriſhing colony in the fifty eighth year of the Chriſtian æra, orders for founding it having been given in the conſulſhip of Hirtius and Panſa, forty-three years before the ſaid æra. But either theſe orders were not immediately put in execution, or the burning did not happen ſo early, ſince all the letters, in which Seneca ſpeaks of this calamity, are by the beſt chronologers thought to have been written in the ſixty-fourth, or ſixty-fifth of the Chriſtian æra. That Nero ſhould defer relieving the inhabitants for the ſpace of ſeven years, as Lipſius pretends, is altogether improbable. This city ſhewed its gratitude to Nero, by ſteadily adhering to his party, after all the other cities of Gaul had declared for the revolters (34).

(33) Senec. epiſt. 91. (34) Dio, l. xlvi. p. 323. Senec. ep. 91. Noris Gall. p. 292.

time learnt, that from P. Anteius a yearly ſtipend was allowed him. Upon this intelligence he intercepted letters from Anteius, and even ſtole the papers containing the calculation of his nativity, and a ſcheme drawn concerning the birth and fortune of Oſtorius Scapula; which he no ſooner had in his poſſeſſion, than he wrote to the emperor, that he had mighty diſcoveries to communicate; for Anteius and Oſtorius were meditating ſome ſudden attempt upon the ſtate, and diving into their own deſtiny, and that of Cæſar. Light veſſels were immediately diſpatched away, and Soſianus with all poſſible expedition tranſported to Rome; where, upon the firſt divulging of his diſcovery, Anteius ſealed his laſt teſtament, being warned by Tigellinus to loſe no time, and then ſwallowed a draught of poiſon; but growing impatient of its ſlow operation, he haſtened his death by opening his veins. Oſtorius was then at an eſtate of his on the borders of Liguria, whither a centurion was ſent with orders to kill him with all diſpatch. For Oſtorius was a man of extraordinary valour, of prodigious ſtrength, great experience in war, eminently qualified for the command of an army, and had been diſtinguiſhed in Britain, while he ſerved there under his father, with a civic crown: hence Nero, who ever ſince the diſcovery of the late conſpiracy, lived under continual dread, fearing that brave officer ſhould take arms againſt him, was glad of any pretence to get rid of him. The centurion, having beſet all the avenues to the villa, acquainted Oſtorius with his orders from the emperor, which were no ſooner ſignified to him, than turning againſt himſelf that bravery, which he had ſo often exerted againſt the enemy, he opened all his veins without betraying the leaſt concern or diſmay; but as the blood flowed ſlowly, he diſpatched himſelf with a poignard, ordering one of his ſlaves to hold up the weapon ſteadily; then graſping and ſtrengthening the ſlave's hand with his own, he ran his throat upon the fatal ſteel. Within the compaſs of a few days, Annæus Mella, Cerealis Anicius, Rufus Criſpinus, and Caius Petronius, underwent the ſame bloody doom. Criſpinus had been captain of the prætorian guards under Claudius, and diſtinguiſhed, though only a knight, with the ornaments of the conſulſhip; but lately baniſhed, as privy to the conſpiracy, into Sardinia, where, upon notice that he was doomed to die, he ſlew himſelf. Mella was brother to Gallio and Seneca, and the father of Lucan. He was accuſed by one of Lucan's intimate friends, named Fabius Romanus, who feigned, that the father and ſon were equally concerned in the conſpiracy; and having counterfeited letters to this purpoſe in the hand of Lucan, ſhewed them to Nero, who ordered them to be carried to the accuſed, whoſe immenſe riches were his only crime. Mella no ſooner ſaw them, than he opened his veins, and by a voluntary death anticipated his ſentence: in his will he bequeathed immenſe ſums to Tigellinus and his ſon-in-law Coſſutianus Capito, in order to ſecure the remainder. Cerealis likewiſe became his own executioner, but fell unpitied, becauſe he had formerly diſcovered a plot againſt Caligula. Caius Petronius, to whom ſome learned critics aſcribe the fragments, equally elegant and obſcene, which have reached our times, was a man entirely abandoned to all manner of voluptuouſneſs. He waſted the day in ſleep, and the night in revels: as others had by induſtry acquired a name and character, Petronius was by his ſignal ſloth and indolence raiſed to notice and fame: he indulged himſelf in all the gaieties and delights of life; but at the ſame time had the prudence to keep within bounds, and not ſquander away, like many others, his eſtate. Neither was he a ſlave to his groſſer appetites; but exceeding curious and refined in his luxury: his behaviour was extremely obliging and polite; his wit, in which he excelled all men of his time, natural and artleſs; and all his actions accompanied with a certain air of negligence. However, he diſcharged the proconſular government of Bithynia, and ſoon after the conſulſhip itſelf, with great reputation, ſhewing himſelf in both theſe employments equal to the management of the greateſt affairs. Then returning to his former vices, he was by Nero admitted to a great intimacy, nothing appearing to the emperor elegant and polite, but what was recommended to him by the taſte and approbation of Petronius. This Tigellinus could not bear, and therefore to get rid of one, who in credit was his rival, and in the ſcience of pleaſures his ſuperior, had recourſe to the cruelty and jealouſy of the prince, two paſſions to which all others gave room; accuſed Petronius of having lived in great intimacy with the conſpirator Scevinus; ſuborned one of his ſlaves to confirm the charge, and precluded him from all means of defence. Nero happened at that time to be upon the road to Campania, and Petronius, having accompanied him as far as Cumæ, was there by his orders put under arreſt: whereupon, without flattering, flattering himſelf with vain hopes, or condeſcending to entreaties, he reſolved to prevent his ſentence by a voluntary death, which he underwent in a manner altogether new, but well ſuited to the life he had led; for having ordered his veins to be cut, he did not ſhew any eagerneſs to put an end to his agonies, but directed them to be cloſed again, and then opened by intervals, juſt as his fancy moved him, diſcourſing the whole time with his friends, not upon ſerious ſubjects, as if he aimed at the glory of conſtancy in braving death, but upon indifferent matters, hearkening with attention to gay epigrams, love-verſes, and entertaining ſtories: ſome of his ſlaves he rewarded with bounties, others he puniſhed with ſtripes: he even diverted himſelf with walking out, even refreſhed himſelf with ſleep, that his death, though in reality violent, might appear altogether natural. In his laſt will he flattered neither Nero nor Tigellinus, nor any of the great men in power, as moſt others had done; but, under feigned names of harlots and catamites, deſcribed the ſecret abominations of the emperor, tranſmitted to him this picture of himſelf carefully ſealed, and then broke his ſignet, that it might not after his death become a ſnare to the innocent. Nero, greatly amazed to find all his nocturnal and moſt private impurities thus brought to light, after having long conſidered with himſelf by what means Petronius had come to the knowledge of them, fixed at length his ſuſpicion upon Silia, the wife of a ſenator, one privy to all his debaucheries, and very intimate with Petronius. She was therefore doomed to baniſhment, for not concealing what ſhe had ſeen and undergone in the prince's nocturnal revels. At the ſame time, Numicius Thermus was put to death, for no other crime, but becauſe a freedman belonging to him accuſed Tigellinus of treaſon; which offence the informer expiated under the moſt exquiſite torments [p].

The death of Anteius.

Of Oſtorius, Mella, Anicius, &c.

The character of Petronius.

His calm and uncommon manner of dying.

AFTER the ſlaughter of ſo many illuſtrious men, Nero at length attempted, ſays our hiſtorian, to extirpate virtue itſelf, in the perſons of Bareas Soranus and Thraſea Pætus, long ſince the objects of his hatred. Thraſea had withdrawn from the ſenate, as we have related above, when the affair of Agrippina came under debate there; at the ſports, called Juvenales, he could not approve of the emperor's acting and ſinging upon the ſtage; when the ſenate was about to condemn to death Antiſtius the prætor, Thraſea and Soranus accuſed.

[p] Tacit. c. 11---19.

for a virulent ſatire by him compoſed againſt Nero, he propoſed a mitigation of the ſentence, and carried it; when divine honours were decreed to Poppæa, he abſented himſelf, and declined attending her funeral; he had not now in three years once ſet his foot in the ſenate, and, though inveſted with the quindecemviral prieſthood, had never made oblations for the ſafety of the prince, and the preſervation of his heavenly voice, &c. Theſe were the crimes urged againſt Thraſea by Capito Coſſutianus and Marcellus Eprius, two informers of great acrimony and vehemence. Oſtorius Sabinus, a Roman knight, took upon him the taſk of accuſing Bareas Soranus: the crimes imputed to him were his friendſhip with Plautius, murdered by Nero's orders in Aſia, and his intrigues with the Aſiatics, while he governed them in quality of proconſul, in order to engage them in a revolt. But his real crimes were, as Tacitus informs us, his having governed Aſia with ſignal vigilance and juſtice, his opening the port of Epheſus, a work mightily applauded by the Aſiatics, and his leaving the inhabitants of Pergamus unpuniſhed for oppoſing Acratus, one of Nero's freedmen, when he would have ſtripped their city of all its pictures and ſtatues. The juncture Nero choſe for deſtroying theſe two great men was, that of the arrival of Tiridates to receive the crown of Armenia, either becauſe the public attention was then wholly engaged in that new ſight, or becauſe Nero meant on that occaſion to diſplay his greatneſs and power, by the ſlaughter of the two moſt illuſtrious men in the whole empire. While the whole city flocked out to ſee a foreign king, Thraſea received orders not to attend his entry. Hereupon he compoſed a memorial to Nero, beſeeching the emperor to acquaint him with the allegations againſt him, and offering to vindicate himſelf, were he but appriſed of the charge. Nero received the memorial greedily, hoping that Thraſea, under the apprehenſion of his impending doom, might have writ ſomething tending to the glory of the prince and his own diſcredit; but finding himſelf diſappointed, and dreading the countenance, the great ſpirit, and free ſpeech of a man ſo generally eſteemed and revered, he ordered the ſenate to be ſummoned. In the mean time, Thraſea having aſſembled his friends and relations to conſult with them, whether he ſhould attempt a defence or be ſilent, Ruſticus Arulanus, a young man of great ſpirit and one of the tribunes of the people, who aſſiſted at the conſultation, offered to thwart the decree of the ſenate, by interpoſing againſt

The firmneſs of Thraſea.

againſt it. But Thraſea would by no means allow him to purſue ſuch methods, as would in the end prove fatal to him. The next day, two cohorts of the prætorian guards ſurrounded the temple of Venus, where the ſenate was to meet; all the avenues to it were beſet with men in their gowns, the common dreſs of the city, but armed with ſwords which they took no care to conceal; the great ſquares and ſeveral temples were filled with bands of ſoldiers under arms. Through theſe the ſenators paſſed to their aſſembly, where, after a ſpeech ſent to them by Nero, and read by his quæſtor, in which he ſufficiently declared what he required of them, they condemned Thraſea, Soranus, and his daughter Servilia, but granted them the choice of their own deaths. The charge brought againſt Servilia was, that ſhe had conſulted the magicians, which ſhe owned; but declared at the ſame time, that her conſultation had been confined to the conſervation of her own family, whether the wrath of Nero might not be appeaſed, and whether no tragical judgment would follow the cognizance of the ſenate. Farther than this ſhe had not enquired; but nevertheleſs ſhe was brought into the ſenate, and there arraigned by Oſtorius Sabinus, who queſtioned her, whether ſhe had not turned into money all her ornaments, and even ſtripped from her neck her jewels, to defray the expence of magic rites and ſacrifices? To this queſtion young Servilia, for ſhe was under twenty, embracing the altars with a flood of tears, anſwered, that the whole of her conſultation had been to know, whether the emperor, and the fathers of the ſenate, would to her dear and indulgent parent, beſet with terrors, graciouſly afford protection and ſafety. With this view, ſaid ſhe, I preſented the diviners, men till now utterly unknown to me, with my jewels, apparel, and the other ornaments peculiar to my quality, as I would have preſented my blood and life, had my blood and life been required. But whatever this my proceeding was, my unfortunate father was an utter ſtranger to it; and if it is a crime, I alone am the delinquent. Theſe words alarmed Soranus, who interrupted her while ſhe was yet uttering them, crying out, that as ſhe was not ſuppoſed to be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, her cauſe ought to be diſjoined from his; that his own fate, whatever it ſhould prove, he was ready to undergo, but hoped, that in the danger of the father they would not involve the innocent daughter. Having thus ſpoken, he was haſtening to embrace his daughter, who flew to meet him; but the conſul's lictors ſtepped between and prevented them [q].

They are both condemned by the ſenate.

The affecting ſpeech of Servilia in the ſenate.

Sentence was no ſooner pronounced againſt the pretended criminals, than the quæſtor was diſpatched to acquaint Thraſea with it, who was then in his gardens, reaſoning there with Demetrius, a Cynic philoſopher, about the nature of the ſoul, and its departure from the body. While he was intent upon this diſcourſe, Domitius Ceciliaanus, one of his moſt intimate friends, arrived, and related to him what the ſenate had decreed. Thraſea heard him without betraying, either in his voice or countenance, the leaſt concern; only turning to his friends, who came with Cecilianus, he embraced them, took his laſt leave of them, and preſſed them forthwith to retire, leſt they ſhould for their unſeaſonable compaſſion be involved in the ſame fate. His wife Arria was very earneſt to follow the example of her mother, who bore the ſame name, and was wife to Cecina Pætus, with whom ſhe died, as we have related elſewhere. But Thraſea would not by any means allow her to ſhare in his lot, beſeeching her to preſerve her life, and not deprive her daughter of her only remaining refuge. He then went forth into a gallery, and there the quæſtor found him, and delivered to him in form the ſentence of the ſenate, which he immediately put in execution, retiring into his chamber with Helvidius his ſon-in-law, Demetrius, and the quæſtor, in whoſe preſence he ordered the veins of both his arms to be cut. As the blood ſprung, he called the quæſtor nearer, and ſprinkling the floor with it, Let us, ſaid he to him, make this libation to Jupiter the Deliverer. Behold, young man; may the gods avert the omen! but you are born in ſuch times, as require you to fortify your mind with examples of conſtancy. After this, falling into grievous torments, occaſioned by the ſlow approaches of death, he turned towards Demetrius; but of the laſt words and particulars of this great man's death we are bereft, by a lamentable chaſm in this laſt annal of our hiſtorian, and by the ſame misfortune robbed of the detail, which that inimitable writer left of the other remarkable incidents that happened during the remainder of this, and the whole two laſt years of Nero's reign. This loſs we ſhall ſupply in the beſt manner we can with the accounts which have been tranſmitted to us by other writers, eſpecially Suetonius and Thraſea's magnanimity in death.

[q] Idem, c. 20——33.

and Dion Caſſius ; but as neither of them has deſcribed the particulars of the death of Thraſea, Soranus, and his daughter Servilia, we cannot therein ſatisfy the curioſity of our readers.

SOON after the death of Thraſea, Nero, to divert the attention of the public from their domeſtic calamities, received Tiridates with all the pomp of majeſty and grandeur imaginable, and crowned him in one of the great ſquares king of Armenia. This was the moſt magnificent and pompous ceremony that had ever been ſeen in Rome ; but as we have already deſcribed it in our hiſtory of the Greater Armenia, we ſhall only add here, that Nero allowed him, during his ſtay at Rome, eighty thouſand nummi a day, and loaded him, upon his departure, with preſents of immenſe value. The Armenian, who was a good courtier, had flattered the vain prince, and pretended to be raviſhed with his harmonious voice, and the ſkill he diſplayed in chariot-driving. After the coronation of Tiridates, Nero ſhut up the temple of Janus, in token of an univerſal peace, as appears from a medal dated the thirteenth year of his reign, which did not begin till the month of October, before which time, that is, in the month of May, the Jews, grievouſly oppreſſed by their governor, eſpecially Florus, had taken arms [r]. Nero ſolicited Vologeſes, brother to Tiridates, ſtill king of the Parthians, to come likewiſe to Rome ; but in vain, Vologeſes returning no other anſwer, than that Nero might with leſs trouble, croſs the Mediterranean and come into Aſia, where he would endeavour to meet him. The emperor, piqued with this anſwer, reſolved to make war upon the Parthian ; and with this view made mighty preparations ; ordered the flower of the armies in Illyricum, Germany, and Britain, to begin their march towards the kingdom of Albania ; and raiſed a new legion of Italians, each man ſix foot tall, which he called the legion of Alexander the Great [s]. Thus was ſize firſt required in a ſoldier by a prince brought up amongſt minſtrels, ſongſters, and charioteers, who, it ſeems, had no real deſign of employing his choſen legion, or any others, in military feats : for upon intelligence, that the Parthian king was inflexible, and prepared on his ſide for a vigorous defence, he thought it adviſeable to leave the glory of conqueſts and warlike exploits to others, and confine his ambition to the unprincely honour of playing, ſinging, and acting upon the ſtage. As the time therefore of the olympic games approached, he left Italy, and paſſed over into Greece, with no other deſign, but to gain the reputation of the beſt harper, ſinger, actor, and charioteer, in the whole Roman empire. The Greeks who ſurpaſſed all other nations, in flattery, underſtanding that the emperor piqued himſelf upon his ſkill in playing upon the harp, had diſpatched two embaſſadors to him with all the crowns deſigned by their ſeveral cities for ſuch players; which was ſo acceptable to Nero, that he not only gave their embaſſadors audience before any others, but admitted them to an entertainment, which he had prepared for his moſt intimate friends. On this occaſion one of them having begged him to ſing them a ſong, he immediately complied with his requeſt, and was ſo taken with their extravagant flattery, that he cried out, The Greeks alone have a good ear; none but they underſtand muſic! and a few days after ſet out for Greece, leading with him, ſays Dion Caſſius, ſuch multitudes, as might have eaſily reduced the Parthians and all the nations of the eaſt, had they not, like their general, been deſtitute of all courage, and armed only with harps, fiddles, maſques, buſkins, and ſuch-like theatrical implements. With this army he embarqued, and landing at Caſſiope, he immediately began to ſing before the altar of Jupiter Caſſius. Thence he advanced into the heart of Greece, playing, ſinging, and acting in all the cities, through which he paſſed. But he chiefly exerted his ſkill at the Olympic games, where, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, the head of the empire was not aſhamed to appear, as a competitor, among the common harpers, players, and charioteers. He won the prize of muſic, by corrupting, as was commonly believed, with large preſents, either the judges, or his competitors. The prize of chariot-driving he evidently forfeited; for having attempted to drive with ten horſes, he was thrown off, and ſo hurt, that though he remounted, yet he was conſtrained to give over before he had finiſhed the career. However, as he inſiſted with the judges upon their excluding all caſual events and misfortunes, the prize was to his unexpreſſible ſatisfaction decreed him. When the games were

Tiridates crowned king of Armenia by Nero.

[r] Vide P. Pagi, an. 71. Suet. c. 19.

[s] Dio, l. lxiii. p. 719.

Nero paſſes over into Greece.

Sings on the public ſtage, and drives a chariot at the Olympic games.

were over, Nero not only rewarded the judges with the rights of Roman citizens and rich preſents, but reſtored the whole province of Achaia to its antient liberty, taking upon himſelf the office of crier, and ſolemnly proclaiming the freedom of the Achæans at Corinth on the day of the Iſthmian games: ſo that from this time the Greeks continued free from all manner of taxes, impoſitions, and tributes, governing themſelves by their own laws, till the reign of Veſpaſian, who revoked all the privileges and exemptions granted them by Nero, as Galba obliged the judges to refund the vaſt ſums, with which the chanting emperor had preſented them. As the province of Achaia belonged to the ſenate and people, Nero, when he declared it free, beſtowed upon them in its room the iſland of Sardinia [t]. After this he travelled all over Greece, not prompted by the commendable curioſity of viſiting the antiquities of that once celebrated country, but by the unprincely ambition of diſplaying his ſkill and art in ſinging and playing upon the harp. He challenged every-where the beſt performers, and never failed, as we may well imagine, being declared victor; inſomuch, that he is ſaid to have gained in this progreſs above eighteen hundred prizes. He tranſmitted a particular account of each victory to the ſenate, enjoining them to acknowledge the favours of the gods towards him with victims, oblations, and public proceſſions, and to take care, that the ſame devotions were practiſed throughout the whole empire [u]. That there might remain no monuments of other victors, he commanded all their ſtatues to be pulled down, to be dragged through the ſtreets, and to be either daſhed to pieces, or thrown into the common ſewers [w].

Sings in moſt of the cities of Greece.

The Greeks, notwithſtanding the favours he beſtowed upon them, longed for his departure, his numerous train occaſioning a great dearth of proviſions, and almoſt a general famine. Philoſtratus aſſures us, that Xerxes, who entered Greece in an hoſtile manner, putting all to fire and ſword, did not ſo grievouſly afflict that unhappy country, as Nero, who came as a friend, and with no other view than to divert the inhabitants. He every-where ſtripped the cities and temples of the few pictures, ſtatues, and other ornaments, which his officers had left them. The unfortunate

[t] Suet. l. vi. c. 22. Dio, l. lxiii. p. 719. Pauſan. in Cor.
[u] Apoll. Thy. l. v. c. 3. Dio, l. vi. p. 323. Pauſan. ibid.
[w] Suet. c. 24.

tunate province felt the effects, not only of his avarice, but likewiſe of his cruelty, of which Philoſtratus gives us the following inſtance: an actor in a tragedy at the Iſthmian games having ſung ſo as to deſerve the chief applauſe, and refuſing, as he was better ſkilled in muſic than in the courtly art of flattery, to lower his voice, which quite drowned Nero's, the emperor, tranſported with rage, cauſed him to be ſtrangled on the ſtage in the ſight of all Greece [x]. No wonder that his art every-where triumphed, when it was backed by ſo much cruelty. Loaded with the crowns and prizes he had won, he went to conſult the oracle at Delphos, and was warned by the pretended deity of the place, "To beware of ſeventy-three," which, not reflecting on Galba's age, he imagined to be the term of his life, and conceived ſo great aſſurance of his living and enjoying an uninterrupted happineſs till that age, that having ſoon after loſt many things of great value by ſhipwreck, he confidently told his friends, that the very fiſh would bring them again; nay, he was ſo poſſeſſed with this notion, that two years after, when the firſt tidings were brought him of the inſurrections in ſeveral provinces, he was ſo far from being alarmed, that he ſeemed rather to rejoice at thoſe diſturbances, ſince they furniſhed him with a plauſible pretence of ſeizing the eſtates of the inhabitants. The pythoneſs he preſented with a large ſum, which Galba not long after obliged her to pay back [y]. Thus Dion Caſſius and Suetonius; but Lucianus Samoſatenus [z], Themiſtius [a], and the emperor Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate [b], aſſure us, that the pythoneſs reviled him as an Oreſtes, an Alcmæon, two parricides who had murdered their mothers, without deigning to return him any further anſwer; which ſo provoked him, that he cauſed all the iſſues from the oracle to be ſtopt up; commanded ſeveral perſons to be murdered in the temple, in order to profane it; ſtripped Apollo, or rather his prieſts, of the lands he poſſeſt at Cyrrha, in the neighbourhood of Delphos; and carried away with him five hundred ſtatues of braſs, which no tyrant before him had offered to remove. We are told, that, as he departed, Apollo ſnatched the crown from off his head, ſignifying thereby, as was afterwards interpreted, that he was not to wear it long [c]. He declined declined viſiting Athens, which city was ſaid to be haunted by the furies, and likewiſe Lacedæmon, abhorring the very name of Lycurgus and his laws [d]. This year, Ceſtius Gallus, governor of Syria, being defeated on the eighth of November by the Jews, after he had raiſed the ſiege of Jeruſalem, acquainted Nero with his overthrow; who thereupon appointed Mucianus governor of Syria in his room, and named Flavius Veſpaſianus to the command of the troops in that province, though he had not long before forbid him his preſence, and threatened him with deſtruction, for having nodded while the emperor was ſinging on the ſtage [e].

Conſults the oracle at Delphos.

[x] Philoſ. ſtrat. ibid. & Pauſan. in Bæot. [y] Suet. c. 40. Dio, p. 634. [z] Lucian. Sam. Nero dial. [a] Themiſt. orat. quinque, p. 226. [b] Julian. p. 492. [c] Pauſan. in Phoc.

Veſpaſian ſent againſt the Jews.

BEFORE he left Greece, he undertook to cut the Iſthmus, in order to open a communication between the Ionian and Ægean ſeas, and by that means prevent the frequent wrecks that happened on the coaſts of Peloponneſus. As the iſthmus, or neck of land which parts the two ſeas, is ſcarce ſix miles over, Julius Cæſar, Caligula, and Claudius, had formed the ſame deſign; but dropt it, as we are told, upon their being aſſured, that by their undertaking, if it ſucceeded, whole countries would be drowned, by reaſon that the Ionian ſea was much higher than the Ægean. Beſides, at the firſt breaking of the earth, blood was ſaid to have iſſued, groans to have been heard, and frightful ſpectres ſeen [f]. But Nero, not crediting ſuch reports, and always ready to attempt what was generally deemed impoſſible, aſſembled his prætorian guards, encouraged them with large promiſes to undertake the work chearfully, and having ſolemnly prayed that the deſign might turn to his advantage, and to the advantage of the commonwealth, without ſo much as mentioning the ſenate, he ordered the trumpets to ſound, and advanced at the head of his guards, ſinging and dancing, to the place where the work was to begin. There, with a golden pick-ax, which the governor of the province preſented to him, he pretended to ſet an example to others; but being tired after three ſtrokes, he carried away in a baſket the handful of earth he had moved, and poſted away to Corinth, as proud as if he had undergone the labours of Hercules. He ordered the priſoners from all parts to be tranſported into Greece, and ſuch as were convicted, whatever their crimes were, to be condemned only to this work [g].

Nero undertakes to cut through the Iſthmus of Corinth.

[d] Dio, l. lxiii. p. 721 Tacit. annal. xvi. c. 31.
[e] Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 40.
[f] Plin. l. vi. c. 4. Dio, p. 722.

work [g]. Veſpaſian ſent him ſix thouſand Jews, whom he had already taken priſoners. Theſe were, according to Joſephus, employed in the laborious work of hewing the rocks, while the prætorian guards only removed the rubbiſh [h]. But either the inſurmountable difficulties that occurred, or the troubles which began to break out, or were apprehended, about this time, obliged Nero to drop the enterpriſe, though he was with ſuch ardor and eagerneſs bent upon the execution of it, that he had rather have renounced the harp for ever, than ſeen his favourite project thus defeated [i].

Drops that enterprize.

The following year, L. Capito and C. Rufus being conſuls, Nero, continuing ſtill in Greece, and wanting money to ſupply his prodigality and defray his exorbitant expences, plundered firſt the province of Achaia, putting, under various pretences, ſuch of the Greeks to death as were thought wealthy, and ſeizing their eſtates. From Achaia he extended his rapines to Italy and to Rome, where all the riches of the known world centred, enjoining Helius, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, whom he had left governor of the city, to ſeize, under ſome pretence or other, the eſtates of all the wealthy citizens, to confiſcate their effects, and turn them into money. Nero had taken with him into Achaia, ſuch of the ſenatorial and equeſtrian order as were any ways conſiderable for their birth, virtue, or fortunes, with a deſign to diſpatch them at a diſtance from Rome, and conſequently with more ſafety and leſs noiſe; ſo that tidings were daily brought to the city of the death of ſome of her moſt illuſtrious citizens, and orders to Helius to ſeize their eſtates. For this year Nero iſſued an edict, declaring, contrary to the cuſtom which had hitherto obtained, the eſtates confiſcated even of thoſe who anticipated their ſentence by a voluntary death. Of the many great men who ſuffered this year, none was more generally lamented than the brave Domitius Corbulo. He was equal, ſays Tacitus, in courage, prudence, and experience, to the moſt renowned commanders of antient Rome, and at the ſame time a true pattern of the modeſty, virtue, and integrity of the primitive Romans. He was adored on account of his unbounded generoſity, beneficence, and good-nature, even by the moſt inveterate enemies, of the Roman name, who would readily have ſubmitted to Rome, had Rome been governed by a Corbulo,

He plunders Greece.

The character of Corbulo.

[g] Suet. c. 31. Lucian. Nero, p. 143. [h] Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 36. [i] Lucian. Nero dial. ſeu de Foſſione Iſthmi, p. 143.

Corbulo. Nero, well acquainted with his commendable qualities, honour, and integrity, repoſed in him, an entire confidence, and inveſted him with an unlimited power in the eaſt, where he performed thoſe feats, which we have deſcribed at length in our hiſtory of Armenia. Though he commanded a powerful army, entirely at his devotion, was by all judged the moſt worthy of the ſovereign power in the whole Roman empire, and might have eaſily ſeized it, as he was equally adored by Romans and foreigners of every rank and condition; yet he never entertained the leaſt thought of aſſuming it. This inviolable fidelity to ſo cruel a tyrant, ſo worthleſs a prince, was the only thing, which either Romans or foreigners ever blamed in him. To this Tiridates alluded, when ſpeaking of him to Nero, he told the emperor, that in Corbulo he had an excellent ſlave. But this year, Nero, having reſolved to extirpate virtue from off the face of the earth, wrote a letter to Corbulo, filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of friendſhip imaginable, ſtyling him, his father, his benefactor, his only refuge, &c. In the letter he invited him into Greece, pretending an eager deſire to ſee one, to whom he was ſo highly indebted. Corbulo, judging of the emperor's ſincerity, from the uprightneſs of his own heart, immediately ſet out for Greece. But Nero, the inſtant he was informed of his arrival at Cenchreæ, the port of Corinth on the ſide of the Ægean ſea, diſpatched orders for his immediate execution; which were no ſooner communicated to the brave general, than drawing his ſword, he plunged it into his breaſt, ſaying, that he well deſerved to die, no doubt on account of his credulity and inviolable attachment to ſo vile a monſter [l]. Such was the end of the greateſt commander and the beſt man in the whole Roman empire. He was beloved by the emperor, ſays Dion Caſſius, for his unſhaken fidelity; but hated for his virtue, of all crimes the greateſt. He left behind him an account of his wars and other tranſactions in the eaſt, which are frequently quoted by Pliny, but have not reached our times [m]. The ſame year, Annæus Cornutus, one of the moſt learned men in Rome, was baniſhed and confined to a deſert iſland, for no other crime but the ſtudy of philoſophy and profeſſion of virtue. The famous poets Lucan and Perſius had been his diſciples; for he took great

His death.

pleaſure

[l] Dio, p. 690.

[m] Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 25. & Noris. de Cænotaph. Piſana. p. 334. Ven 1681.

pleaſure in inſtructing the Roman youth in the principles of the philoſophy of the Stoics, of which ſect he was himſelf. Perſius had a great veneration and eſteem for him; whence he left him by his laſt will, for he died in the ninth year of Nero's reign, ſeven hundred volumes, and a conſiderable ſum of money, which he reſtored to the heirs of the deceaſed, being ſatisfied with the books. He is ſaid to have adviſed Perſius's mother, to ſuppreſs ſome poetical compoſitions, which her ſon had wrote in his youth [n] (S). Nero, upon [n] Dio. p. 715. Perſ. vit. p. 495.

(S) Dion Caſſius tells us (35), that Nero having a mind to write the Roman hiſtory in verſe from the foundation of the city to his own time, for he had ſome genius for poetry, and being told, that he could not compriſe it in fewer than four hundred books, conſulted Cornutus upon that ſubject, who anſwered, that the number of books was too great, and that no one would read them. This Nero did not reſent, believing Cornutus only meant, that no one would read them on account of their number. But one urging, that the books of Chryſippus were more numerous, and yet generally read, The books of Chryſippus, replied Cornutus, contain many uſeful precepts which ſerve to improve both our manners and underſtanding. This anſwer provoked Nero to ſuch a degree, that he was for having him immediately put to death; but, ſeveral of Cornutus's friends and diſciples interpoſing in his behalf, he was only baniſhed. Aulus Gellius quotes certain comments upon Virgil done by Annæus Cornutus, whom he ſtyles an illuſtrious and learned grammarian (36), and likewiſe his ſecond book upon the figures of rhetoric (37). Macrobius too ſpeaks of Annæus Cornutus as a man well ſkilled in the Greek tongue. The treatiſe of the theology of the Greeks, which has reached our times, and paſſes under the name of Phornutus, is by Theodoret and others aſcribed to Cornutus. From this work Porphyrius pretends, that Origen learnt to explain the ſcripture by allegories (38). It is certain that Origen often makes uſe of the writings of Cornutus to prove the tenets of the Chriſtian religion (39). But whether this be the Annæus Cornutus, who was baniſhed by Nero, is much queſtioned by the critics (40). Suidas likewiſe mentions a philoſopher, named Cornutus, and born

(35) Dio, l. xlii. p. 715.
(36) Aul. Gell. l. ii. c. 6.
(37) Idem. l. ix. c. 10.
(38) Euſeb. l. vi. c. 19.
(39) Vide Hier. ep. 84.
(40) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 26.

upon his leaving Rome, had committed the government of the city, as we have hinted above, to Helius a freedman of the late emperor, inveſting him with an abſolute power over all perſons, ſenators not excepted, whom he was allowed to baniſh, condemn, and execute, without ſo much as acquainting the emperor with the crimes laid to their charge, or waiting for his conſent. And truly Helius, aſſiſted by Polycletus, another freedman, made no leſs dreadful havock of the Roman nobility at Rome, than his maſter did in Achaia. Virtue, quality, or wealth were unpardonable crimes, and puniſhed with death. Few noble families eſcaped the cruelty of the emperor, or the imperial freedman. The latter, more cruel, if poſſible, than Nero himſelf, cut off the neareſt relations, and even the children of thoſe he condemned; which alarmed the city to ſuch a degree, that a general inſurrection was apprehended. Hereupon Helius diſpatched meſſengers after meſſengers to the emperor, repreſenting to him the ſtate of affairs, and preſſing him to return to the capital with all poſſible expedition. As Nero put off his departure from day to day, and returned no other anſwer to Helius, than that if he truly loved him, he could not envy him the glory he was daily acquiring in Greece; but would rather wiſh, that Nero might return worthy of himſelf; the freedman left Rome unexpectedly, and arriving in ſeven days in Greece, ſo terrified the emperor with the exaggerated account he gave him of the general diſcontent that reigned in the city, that he immediately left Greece, where he had ſtayed at leaſt a year, and embarked for Italy.

Cruelties exerciſed in Rome by Helius the freedman.

In his paſſage his fleet was diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, the ſhips, laden with all the wealth of Greece, caſt away, and he himſelf in imminent danger of being loſt with them. But with much ado he eſcaped, and upon his landing cauſed many of his numerous retinue to be inhumanly maſſacred, for having imprudently betrayed joy while he was in danger of periſhing [o]. He entered Naples through a breach in the Nero returns to Italy.

His entrying to Naples, Rome, &c.

[o] Dio, p. 723. Suet. c. 23.

born at Leptis in Libya, who, according to him, came to Rome before the reign of Nero, and wrote ſeveral philoſophical tracts. This we take to be the Annæus Cornutus mentioned by Dion Caſſius; but Suidas is miſtaken in ſuppoſing him to have been put to death by Nero.

the wall, according to the cuſtom of the victors in the Olympic games, and in the ſame manner Antium, Albanum and Rome. He made his entry into the latter city in the triumphal chariot of Auguſtus, pompoſly attired, having with him in the ſame chariot another player upon the harp by name Diodorus, wearing an olympic crown on his head, and carrying a Pythic crown in his hand. Before him marched in great pomp and richly dreſſed, eighteen hundred perſons, each of them with a crown in his hand, and under it an inſcription, ſignifying where it had been won, the name of the perſon whom the emperor had overcome, the ſubject and title of the ſong, and ſuch-like important circumſtances. His chariot was followed by the whole rabble of the city, crying out by way of deriſion, that they were the ſoldiers of Auguſtus, and claimed a ſhare in the glory of the triumphant victor. From the Via Sacra the proceſſion turned to the circus, which Nero entered through a breach, having cauſed one of the arches to be thrown down. Thence they proceeded through the Velabrum and the forum to the palace, and from the palace to the temple of Apollo, where he diſplayed all his crowns, and ordered them to be carried from thence to his golden houſe, and there hung up round his bed, upon the many ſtatues which he had erected to himſelf in the habit and attire of a harper. The remaining part of the year he ſpent in playing upon the harp, ſinging, and acting upon the ſtage, no one of the nobility daring to abſent themſelves, upon any pretence whatſoever, from his theatrical repreſentations, though they often laſted, not only the whole day, but the night too. We are told, that he perſonated with great art Canace in labour, Oreſtes murdering his mother, Œdipus pulling out his own eyes, and Hercules phrentic; in which laſt repreſentation, a raw ſoldier, then upon guard, ſeeing the emperor bound in chains, as the argument required, and ſuppoſing it real violence, ran in, ſword in hand, to his relief, and cleared the ſtage, which did not a little divert the weary and tired out multitude. While he was acting in a tragedy, the buſtoon happening to fall out of his hand, he betrayed ſuch concern, and fear of forfeiting the reputation of an able actor, that he could not purſue his part, till one of his fellow actors aſſured him upon his oath, that not one of the audience had taken the leaſt notice of ſo ſmall a fault, and merely caſual. To preſerve his voice, he uſed to lie conſtantly on his back, with a thin plate of lead upon his ſtomach Spends the remaining part of the year in acting upon the ſtage.

He takes particular care of his voice.

ſtomach, took frequently vomitory and purging potions, and abſtained from all ſorts of fruit, and meats reputed prejudicial to his voice: nay, he gave over at length, through fear of hurting his voice, making ſpeeches to the ſoldiery or ſenate, contenting himſelf to ſignify his pleaſure to them in writing, or by the mouth of ſome of his friends or freed-men. After his return from Greece, he eſtabliſhed a new employment, charging one, whom he called, with a name borrowed from the Greek tongue, his phonaſcus, to take care of his voice. He would never ſpeak but in the preſence of this new officer, who was firſt to admoniſh him, when he talked too loud, or ſtrained his voice, and afterwards, if the emperor, tranſported with any ſudden emotion, did not hearken to his admonitions, to ſtop his mouth with a napkin. The moſt effectual means of courting his favour was to commend his voice, to pretend raptures while he ſung, to appear dejected, and be very importunate, if he took a fancy, as he ſometimes did, like other ſingers, not to do what he was moſt ardently deſirous of doing [p]. Thus he trifled away his time, not forbearing, however, in the midſt of diverſion and pleaſures, to purſue feats of cruelty and blood, till the next year, the fourteenth of his reign, when a bloody doom overtook at length this man of blood. Either this, or the preceding, year, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by Vinicius, and diſcovered at Beneventum; and this is all we find concerning it in the hiſtories of thoſe times, which have reached ours. Of this conſpiracy, Plutarch, we conjecture, ſpeaks in his treatiſe of talkativeneſs, where he tells, that a plot formed againſt Nero was diſcovered in the following manner, when it was ripe for execution. One of the conſpirators, ſeeing a priſoner dragged to Nero's tribunal, accoſted him, as he was bewailing his misfortune, and whiſpered him in the ear, If by the favour of the gods you eſcape today, you will be to-morrow indebted to me for your ſafety. The priſoner underſtood him, and as he was chiefly ſolicitous about averting his own doom, he immediately acquainted Nero with what had been told him. Hereupon the conſpirator was forthwith ſeized, and being put upon the rack, owned the conſpiracy and diſcovered his aſſociates [q]. Of this conſpiracy we find no further account in the

A conſpiracy diſcovered.

[p] Suet. c. 25.

[q] Plut. de garrulitaate.

the antients, which makes us the more ſenſible of the irreparable loſs we have ſuffered by the chaſm in this part of Tacitus's annals.

The next conſuls were Silius Italicus, the celebrated poet, and Galerius Trachalus [r]. Theſe were the laſt conſuls named by Nero. Pliny, in one of his letters [s], gives us a ſuccinct account of the life and death of Silius, for he died in the reign of Trajan; and tells us, that under Nero he accuſed, not by conſtraint, but choice, ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction, and procured their deſtruction; but adds, that under the ſucceeding emperors he led a life free from all blemiſh. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of him in the reign of Domitian, when he wrote his poem on the Punic war. Trachalus was an orator and civilian of great note [t], and nearly related to Galeria, the wife of Vitellius, who ſaved his life, as we ſhall relate hereafter. This year, Nero, after having long wallowed in the blood of humane race, and made ſpoil, we may ſay, of the creation, was at length overtaken by the bloody doom, which his enormous and crying iniquities well deſerved. His raging fury had quite tired out and exhauſted the patience both of Romans and foreigners, who were equally diſpoſed to a general revolution, and only wanted a perſon of credit and experience to head them. The firſt, who had courage enough openly to declare his generous reſolution of redeeming the world, from the no leſs ignominious than tyrannical yoke, under which it had now groaned for thirteen years and upwards, was Julius Vindex, deſcended from the antient kings of Aquitain, and at this time governor of Celtic Gaul. He was a true lover of his country, had on ſeveral occaſions ſignalized his courage, prudence, and experience in the military art, bore an utter averſion to ſlavery, and was poſſeſſed with an ardent ambition of tranſmitting his name to poſterity by ſome commendable action [u]. We are told, that before he openly declared his deſign, he communicated it to Galba, then governor of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, who neither countenanced nor diſcovered it to Nero, as did ſeveral of the governors of other pro-provinces, to whom Vindex had imparted it by letters, which they immediately ſent to Nero [w]. Philoſtratus, in his life of Apollonius Tyanæus, writes, that the governor of Bœtica, now Andaluſia, coming to Gades, or Cadiz, to viſit Apollonius, conferred with him in private for three days together; and that it was afterwards believed, that Apollonius had encouraged the governor to revolt from Nero and join Vindex, whoſe deſign was not yet publicly known [x]. Whether Philoſtratus ſpeaks here of Galba, or of ſome other, we know not. Galba indeed, was not governor of Bœtica; but in Philoſtratus ſuch miſtakes frequently occur. Though Galba did not at firſt ſhew himſelf inclined to favour the revolt, yet the brave Vindex, having about the begining of March, aſſembled the Gauls, haraſſed and reduced to beggary, by heavy tributes and impoſitions, openly declaring to them his deſign, encouraged them to concur chearfully in his meaſures, and in a long ſpeech diſplayed their many grievances, from which he ſaid there were no hopes of relief, ſo long as their tyrannical and cruel oppreſſor lived or reigned. His deſign was univerſally applauded by the Gauls, who immediately flocked to him from all parts; inſomuch, that though he had no Roman troops under his command, yet he found himſelf in a ſhort time at the head of an hundred thouſand armed men. Hereupon he wrote once more to Galba, exhorting him to eſpouſe the common cauſe of mankind, and put himſelf at the head of the Gauls, who were already a body of an hundred thouſand armed men, and could, upon occaſion, raiſe a greater force. At the ſame time arrived an expreſs from the governor of Aquitain, demanding ſuccours againſt Vindex. Upon the receipt of theſe important diſpatches, Galba called a council of his friends to adviſe with them, before he returned an anſwer to either of the meſſengers. In the council they were almoſt all of opinion, that he ought to wait and ſee how Rome ſtood inclined before he declared. But Titus Vinius, tribune of the only legion in the province, ſtanding up, "What room, ſaid he, is there here for de"liberation? It is a crime even to queſtion, whether or "no we ſhall continue faithful to Nero, and as ſuch it "will be puniſhed by him. There is no medium;

Julius Vindex revolts in Gaul.

[r] Plin. l. iii. ep. 7. Front. Aquæduc. p. 119. Idatius, &c. [s] Plin. ibid. [t] Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 90. [u] Dio, l. lxiii. p. 724. Suet. c. 40. Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 16.

And raiſes a powerful army.

[w] Plut. vit. Galbæ. [x] Philoſtrat. vit. Apoll. Tyan. l. v. c. 13.

" you muſt either hearken to the overture of Vindex and " look on Nero as your declared enemy, or march this " inſtant againſt a perſon, who had rather have Galba for " emperor than Nero." This ſpeech made a deep impreſſion upon the mind of Galba, who was likewiſe animated by ſeveral favourable omens, and above all by a prediction, which was uttered about this time by a young virgin of great diſtinction in Spain, and anſwered exactly another, which had been delivered two hundred years before, viz. that Spain ſhould one day give a prince to Rome, and to the world a ſovereign. He therefore heſitated no longer; but by an edict appointed a certain day for the Spaniards to meet at New Carthage, now Carthagena. The Spaniards, who had heard of the revolt in Gaul and ſuſpected his deſign, obeyed the ſummons with great alacrity; for they abhorred the very name of Nero, and flocked from all quarters to Carthagena, where Galba, aſcending the tribunal, round which were placed the images of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons, whom Nero had cauſed to be inhumanly maſſacred, openly declared his deſign in the following ſpeech: " Fellow-ſoldiers and friends, we are aſſembled " to beſtow on mankind the great benefit of liberty and " freedom, a benefit, which indeed is our birth-right, " though we have not theſe many years been allowed to " taſte the ſweets of it. For what ſlave has endured greater hardſhips, has ſuffered a more cruel ſervitude, than " we under the inhuman tyrant, whom the evil fortune of " the Roman empire hath placed over us? What kind of " extortions has he not uſed to ſupply, with rapine and " injuſtice, what he has ſpent, with ignominy and ſhame? " What kind of cruelty has he not practiſed? Has he not " wallowed in the blood of his father, his brother, his mo- " ther, his wife, his inſtructor, and of all, who, in the " ſenate, city, or provinces, were any-ways conſiderable " for their birth, wealth, courage, or virtue, without di- " ſtinction of ſex or age? The blood of ſo many inno- " cent victims cries aloud for vengeance. Let us there- " fore appeaſe the manes of our deceaſed friends and re- " lations with the blood of the tyrant, by whom they " have been thus inhumanly butchered. Let us rouſe our " courage, and ſo long as we have arms, and ability to " manage them, be aſhamed tamely to obey, like ſo many " slaves, not a prince, but an incendiary, a parricide, a " ſinger, a minſtrel, a player, a charioteer, nay one who Galba revolts in Spain.

His ſpeech againſt Nero.

" is not even a man, but a monſter of mankind, having " a man to his huſband, and a man to his wife. The " Gauls have already ſhaken off the ignominious yoke, " and the whole empire is ready to follow their ex- " ample and join us and them. For myſelf, I have never " entertained any ambitious or aſpiring deſigns, and heartily " wiſh I were allowed to ſpend the ſmall remainder of " my days in privacy and retirement; but ſince ſome have " impoſed upon me a part, which I never deſigned to act, " and leaſt of all at this age, I will not decline, with your " approbation, the heavy taſk, but chearfully ſacrifice my " own inclinations to the good of my country, not with " the awful title of emperor or Auguſtus, which ſacred " names I adore" —Here he was interrupted by the loud ſhouts, and joyful acclamations of the numerous aſſembly, ſaluting him with one voice, emperor and Auguſtus. But Galba, declining theſe ſpecious titles, declared, that he devoted himſelf to the ſervice of his country only as a lieutenant to the ſenate and people [y]. This happened nine months and thirteen days, as we read in Dion Caſſius, before Galba's death, and conſequently on the third of April; for he was aſſaſſinated on the fifteenth of January of the following year. After this Galba ordered levies to be made throughout the whole province; ſelected a certain number of perſons of known prudence and experience, and with them formed a kind of ſenate; appointed a band of young knights, whom he called evocati, to be as a guard at the door of his chamber; and cauſed edicts to be fixed up in every city of the province, inviting all to join him, and lend what aſſiſtance they could towards the recovery of their liberty, and the ſucceſs of an enterpriſe, which ſo nearly concerned them. We are told, that as he was fortifying a town, which he deſigned for a place of arms, a ring was found of great antiquity, on the ſtone whereof was engraved a Victory; and that about the ſame time a ſhip from Alexandria came into the port of Dertoſa or Tortoſa, laden with arms, without either pilot, mariners, or paſſengers [z]. Otho, who ſtill governed Luſitania, was the firſt of all the governors of provinces who declared for Galba, ſending him all his gold and ſilver plate to turn it into money, and likewiſe his domeſtics, who were more accuſtomed to a

He declines the title of emperor.

y Suet. in Galba, c. 10. Dio, l. lxiv. p. 730. Plut. in Galb. Suet. in Galb. c. 10.

court, and knew better than Galba's how to ſerve an emperor [a].

Nero is not affected with the tidings of the revolt of Vindex.

THE firſt tidings of the revolt of Vindex and the Gauls came to Nero at Naples, on the ſame day, on which he cauſed his mother to be murdered, that is, on the 19th of March. But he was ſo far from being affected with it, that he ſeemed rather to rejoice at the news, as having a plauſible pretence to plunder thoſe wealthy provinces; ſo that he continued to ſing, play, and act upon the ſtage, as uſual, for eight days together, without iſſuing any orders for ſuppreſſing the revolt, or even writing or ſpeaking to any one about it: he was only once heard to ſay, upon receiving letters of a freſher date, exaggerating the impending danger, that he would make Vindex and the Gauls pay dear for diſturbing his pleaſures. At length the edicts of Vindex, filled with moſt bitter invectives, rouſed him ſo far as to prompt him to write to the ſenate, recommending to the fathers the revenging of the injuries offered to him, and in him to them and the whole republic, and excuſing his abſence with the pretence of an inflammation in his throat. But he reſented nothing ſo much as

What he chiefly reſented.

Vindex's calling him in one of his edicts an unſkilful harper, and Ahenobarbus inſtead of Nero. He declared, that he would quit his adopted name, and reſume that of his family ſince they reproached him with it, as if it were a name to be aſhamed of. The other imputation affected him ſtill more; he could not bear it: but in the tranſports of his paſſion broke out into bitter invectives againſt Vindex, abuſing him as one entirely ignorant of an art, which he had, with his own induſtry and indefatigable pains, refined and brought to the greateſt perfection: to refute this calumny, he played more frequent than ever, obſerving with great attention the countenances of the ſpectators, and aſking them whether they had ever heard or known a more ſkilful player upon the harp than himſelf? But, the alarm encreaſing, and meſſenger after meſſenger arriving with diſmal accounts, he at length left Naples in a great fright, and repaired to Rome. However, his fear was greatly abated by his obſerving on the road a tomb, on which was engraved a Gaul overcome by a Roman knight, who dragged him on the ground by the hair. This frivolous preſage ſo revived him, that he returned thanks to the gods for for ſuch an auſpicious omen. Upon his arrival in the city, inſtead of aſſembling the ſenate or people, he only ſummoned ſome of the principal men to his palace, and after a ſhort conſultation, in which no reſolution was taken, he ſpent the reſt of the day in ſhewing his counſellors certain muſical inſtruments lately invented by himſelf, and ſo contrived as to play by water. Here, entirely forgetful of the danger that threatened him, he diſcourſed of the nature and workmanſhip of each of them, promiſing to produce them, ere it was long, upon the ſtage, "provided Vindex would give him leave." The following night he ſent in haſte for the chief men of the ſenatorial and equeſtrian order, who immediately flew to the palace, not doubting, but the emperor deſigned to adviſe with them in the preſent moſt urging juncture, and come to ſome ſpeedy reſolution. But they were greatly ſurpriſed to find, that they had been ſummoned in the dead of the night to be entertained with a farther account of the inſtruments, which had been ſhewn them the day before, and ſome new improvements, which had ſince occurred to Nero [b]. However, he wrote a letter to the ſenate, complaining of Vindex, ſet a price upon his head, called back the troops that were on their march towards Albania, and ordered the legions in Illyricum to be forthwith tranſported into Italy. We are told, that when news was brought to Vindex, that Nero had promiſed ten millions of ſeſterces to any one who ſhould bring him his head, he anſwered with great calmneſs, "Whoever ſhall bring Nero's head to me, ſhall, if he pleaſes, have mine in exchange." Nero ſeemed to deſpiſe Vindex, and to be under no apprehenſion of the Gauls; but intelligence being brought him of the revolt of Galba, juſt as he was ſitting down to ſupper, he was ſo ſtruck with it, that he remained a long time motionleſs, without being able to utter a ſingle word; and when he came to himſelf again, he overturned in a violent rage the table, tore his garments, broke in pieces two cups of great value, and daſhing his head againſt the wall, cried out, he was undone; his misfortunes were without example; his empire was ſeized, while he was ſtill alive, and become the prey of an uſurper. However, he could not, even in the height of his conſternation and fear, refrain from his uſual debaucheries; but purſued his former courſe of life, feaſting, revelling, and, upon his receiving news

[a] Idem. ibid. & Plut. in vit. Oth.

His unconcern.

Complains of Vindex to the ſenate.

Is alarmed at the news of the revolt of Galba.

[b] Suet. c. 40, 41. Dio, p. 694—697.

out of the provinces that ſeemed any-ways favourable to his affairs, jeſting and ridiculing the heads of the rebellion. He even appeared in the theatre, and becauſe one of the actors performed his part ſo as to deſerve an extraordinary applauſe, he ſent him word, that he invaded the rights of the emperor [c]. In the mean time, the ſenate, out of fear and flattery, declared Galba a traitor and an enemy to the ſtate; whereupon Nero immediately ſeized his eſtate, and commanded it to be put up to auction; which Galba no ſooner underſtood, than he in his turn expoſed to ſale Nero's eſtate in Spain, and found a great number of purchaſers [d]. This enraged Nero to ſuch a degree, that, in the firſt tranſports of his fury, he reſolved to ſend perſons into all the provinces to murder the governors and commanders of the armies, under pretence of their being privy to the conſpiracy, to order all the exiles to be maſſacred, leſt they ſhould join the revolters, to cut the throats of all the Gauls in Rome, as accomplices and favourers of their countrymen, to poiſon the whole ſenate at an entertainment, to ſet fire to the city, and at the ſame time let looſe the wild beaſts kept for the public ſpectacles, that the people being thus diverted from extinguiſhing the flames, their deſtruction, and the deſtruction of the city, might be the more inevitable. But dropping, upon farther thoughts, theſe barbarous deſigns, not out of remorſe, but deſpair of effecting them, he reſolved to march in perſon againſt the rebels; and depoſing the two conſuls, Silius and Trachalus, entered alone upon the conſulſhip, pretending an antient prediction, importing, that when Rome had but one conſul, by him the Gauls ſhould be overcome. Having therefore aſſumed the faſces and other marks of the conſular dignity, he ordered levies to be made throughout Italy, named the officers who were to command under him, and cauſed an immenſe number of waggons to be got ready for conveying with ſafety, not the engines of war, but his muſical inſtruments and the decorations of the ſtage; for he was ſo mean-ſpirited as to declare to his intimate friends, that he did not intend to try his fortune with the rebels in the field, but upon his arrival in the province, to preſent himſelf without arms before the armies, to weep, and with ſighs and tears beg forgiveneſs of his former conduct; which if touched with compaſſion, they ſhould grant him, as he hoped

His deſperate reſolution.

Depoſes both the conſuls.

His meanneſs.

[c] Suet. c. 42. [d] Plut. vit. Galb.

hoped they would, he designed to engage and fix their affections, by diverting them with plays and songs of triumph, which, he said, it was high time for him to begin to compose. That he had no design of facing the enemy in the field was manifest from his other preparations; for he ordered all the players upon instruments, singers, and actors to attend him; and arming his concubines, like Amazons, with battle-axes and shields, appointed them to guard his person [e].

In the mean time, Galba's party gained daily new strength, all the governors of the provinces declaring for him, except Clodius Macer, who commanded in Africa, and L. Rufus Verginius, or Virginius, the governor of Upper Germany, where he had under his command some of the best legions in the whole empire. The latter even marched against Vindex with all his forces, and being joined by the inhabitans of Treves, capital of Belgic Gaul, and powerfully assisted in Celtic Gaul itself by the cities of Langres and Lions, he advanced as far as the city of Besancon, which he besieged. Upon this intelligence, Vindex hastened to the relief of the place; but upon his arrival Verginius desiring an interview with him, the two generals had a private conference, in which they agreed, as was commonly believed, to act against Nero; but Verginius could not by any means be prevailed upon to declare for Galba. After they had long conferred together, Vindex returned to his troops, and with them advanced to Besancon, in order to take possession of the place, pursuant to the private agreement of the two chiefs. But Verginius's men, believing that Vindex designed to attack them, marched out without their general's orders, fell upon the Gauls, who expected nothing less and were quite unprepared for an engagement, and with great slaughter put them to flight. Thus Dion Cassius [f]; but Plutarch tells us, that the two armies engaged in defiance of the orders of their commanders, who did all that lay in their power to divert them from that wild resolution [g]. Be that as it will, it is agreed on all hands, that the two armies engaged, that twenty thousand Gauls were killed upon the spot, and that Vindex after the battle laid violent hands on himself. After the death of Vindex, the victorious legions tore the images of Nero, Rufus Virginius marches against Vindex.

Vindex defeated.

Lays violent hands on himself.

[e] Suet. c. 44. Galb.

[f] Dio, l. lxiii. p. 725.

[g] Plut. vit.

Nero, and importuned Verginius to accept the empire, saluting him Cæsar, emperor, Augustus, &c. Verginius was descended of an equestrian family; but had on many occasions signalized his prudence, valour, equity, and such virtues and endowments as are requisite in a brave commander and excellent citizen [h]. Dion Cassius assures us, that he might have easily seized on the empire, had he but seconded the ardent wishes of the troops under his command. But, either out of a greatness of soul truly heroic, or a lively apprehension of the evil consequences, which would inevitably accrue from allowing the soldiery to chuse the emperor, he not only rejected their offer, but resolutely declared, that he would neither take upon himself the sovereign power, nor suffer any one else to assume it, who was not named to it by the senate, to whom alone the disposal of the empire belonged. The same answer he returned to the soldiery, when, upon the news of Nero's death, they importuned him anew to accept of the empire [k]. This refusal says Dion, gained him higher renown than the empire itself could have done, and filled the world with the fame of his name [l]. He lived thirty years after this glorious and generous action, revered by all men; and having escaped the fury of so many princes, by whom he was both suspected and hated on account of his virtue, he died at length under Nerva, being then consul for the third time, in the eighty-third year of his age and ninety-seventh of the Christian æra. Tacitus tells us, that, in the following troubles and seditions, no one was exposed to greater dangers, no one so often threatened and assaulted by the soldiery as he; for though they admired his magnanimity, till then without example, yet they hated him, as having despised them by refusing the empire. In how great esteem he was held by the good princes, we may judge from the opinion which Vitellius entertained of him, a prince suspicious, distrustful, and open to every alarm. For though a slave of Verginius was charged as one employed to assassinate the emperor, though the soldiers had, upon the death of Otho, declared for him the third time, yet Vitellius never seemed in the least to question his fidelity [m]. Before he died, he ordered

Verginius refuses the empire.

His conduct and unblemished character.

[h] Tacit. hist. l. i. c. 52. Plin. l. ii. ep. 1.
[k] Dio. p. 727. Plut. ibid.
[l] Dio, p. 726. Dio, excerpt. Val. p, 697.
[m] Tacit. ibid.

an epitaph, compoſed by himſelf, to be engraved on his tomb, importing, that he had overcome Vindex, and thereby acquired the empire to his country, not to himſelf. Cluvius Rufus, who wrote the hiſtory of thoſe times, begging him one day to excuſe him, if the laws of hiſtory obliged him to relate ſomething that he might not like, As to my actions and conduct, replied Virginius, I deſire you would relate them, ſuch as they are; for I am not conſcious to myſelf, of having ever done any thing but with a view to the applauſes and approbation of poſterity [n]. This was the only time he was ever heard to ſpeak of his own actions, however great and glorious. Cornelius Tacitus, the celebrated hiſtorian, was conſul, when he died, and pronounced his funeral oration. Pliny the younger, who had received innumerable favours at his hands, beſtows on him the following elogium; No tongue can ſufficiently commend Rufus Verginius, or anſwer the opinion I entertain of his virtue [o]. To reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

The bad ſituation of Galba's affairs.

THE death of Vindex and declaration of Verginius not to ſuffer any one to aſſume the ſovereignty, without the conſent of the ſenate, exceedingly perplexed Galba. Beſides, it was reported, that the legions commanded by Verginius, finding they could not perſuade their general to accept of the empire, threatened to return to Nero; nay ſome of Galba's own troops, repenting the new oath they had taken, attempted to abandon him; and certain ſlaves, whom one of Nero's freedmen had preſented him with, formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and would in all likelihood have diſpatched him, had they not diſcovered themſelves, by exhorting one another, as Galba was paſſing through a narrow-ſtreet to his baths, not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity. The new emperor therefore, in the utmoſt conſternation, wrote to Verginius, earneſtly ſoliciting him to act in concert with himſelf againſt Nero, the common enemy of mankind, and to lend an helping hand to the great work of reſtoring Rome to her antient liberty. What anſwer Verginus returned him, we are no-where told; but it ſeems to have been no ways favourable to his deſign, ſince he retired a few days after with his friends to a city in Spain called Clunia, quite diſheartened, repenting what he had had done, and ready to lay violent hands on himſelf [c]. In the mean time, at Rome the levies commanded by Nero went on but ſlowly; for though he ſummoned all the tribes to take the military oath, yet no one appeared who was fit to bear arms; inſomuch, that he was obliged to iſſue an edict, ordering all maſters to ſend him a certain number of ſlaves, whom he enfranchiſed and liſted among his troops. He likewiſe obliged perſons of every rank and profeſſion to contribute the greateſt part of their yearly income towards the intended expedition, according as they were rated in the books of the cenſors. Theſe heavy impoſitions, together with his fooliſh and unſeaſonable niceneſs, for he would receive no money but what was new coined, incenſed the people to ſuch a degree, that they openly oppoſed the collectors, telling them, that the beſt and moſt ready means of ſupplying the prince with money, was to oblige the informers to refund the immenſe ſums they had earned with their infamous practices [d]. As a famine began to be felt in the city, the fury of the populace was heightened by the arrival of a ſhip from Egypt, at that time the granary of Rome, laden not with corn, as was expected, but with ſand for the gladiators and wreſtlers. Upon this the people roſe in a tumultuous manner, overturned in the night moſt of the emperor's ſtatues, tore his images, plundered the houſes of his friends and favourites, and committed innumerable diſorders, no one offering to appeaſe or reſtrain them. At the ſame time, news arrived of the revolt of the legions in Germany, which ſo affected Nero, that calling for poiſon, he incloſed it in a golden box, and went immediately into the Servilian gardens, whence he diſpatched the freed-men, in whom he chiefly confided, to Oſtia to prepare his fleet, being reſolved to ſail to Egypt, whither he had already ſent ſome German troops. He was prompted to this reſolution by the predictions of ſome aſtrologers, who had foretold him long before, that he would one day be abandoned by all; but at the ſame time aſſured him, that in the end he would obtain the empire of the eaſt, or the kingdom of Jeruſalem. However, before he left the palace, he ſounded the tribunes and centurions of his guards, aſking them whether they were diſpoſed to accompany him in his flight? But ſome of them ſhifting, others poſitively refuſing to Nero provokes the people at Rome.

[n] Plin. l. vi. ep. 10. & l. ix. ep. 19. [o] Plin. l. ix. ep. 9.

Is alarmed at the news of the revolt of the German legions.

[c] Suet. c. 10. Dio, p. 698. Plut. in Galb. [d] Suet. c. 44.

to attend him, and one of them crying out, Uſque adeone mori miſerum eſt? Is it ſo ſad a thing to die? he was quite diſtracted and confounded in his thoughts; reſolving at one time to fly to the Parthians, at another to addreſs Galba as a ſuppliant, to appear in public clad in deep mourning, and, with all poſſible humility and dejection, implore the forgiveneſs of the people for his former conduct; and, if he found them inflexible, to beg the government of Egypt. To this purpoſe an oration was found after his death among the reſt of his papers; but he was deterred from delivering it by an apprehenſion of his being torn in pieces by the outrageous multitude, before he could reach the roſtra. He therefore put off the taking of any reſolution till the next day; and in the mean time his ruin was completed by one, whom he leaſt of all ſuſpected, Nymphidius Sabinus, who, though of a mean deſcent, had been by Nero upon the death of Fenius Rufus appointed collegue of Tigellinus in the command of the prætorian guards, and now entertained thoughts of ſeizing the ſovereignty for himſelf. However, he did not immediately declare his ambitious views; but, pretending to eſpouſe the cauſe of Galba, aſſured the guards, that Nero was fled, and promiſed them in Galba's name ſuch ſums, as neither Galba nor any other was able to diſcharge. This promiſe ſecured for the preſent the empire to Galba, occaſioned afterwards the loſs of it, and in the end produced the deſtruction of Nymphidius and the guards themſelves. For the ſoldiery, thus deceived and tempted with the mighty promiſes of Nymphidius, abandoned Nero, notwithſtanding their long and ſworn fealty to the houſe of the Cæſars, and proclaimed Galba emperor: even Tigellinus, the chief author of the crimes that rendered Nero's name ſo odious and deteſtable, forſook and betrayed him in his extremity. The emperor, altogether unacquainted with the treaſonable practices of Tigellinus, awaked about mid-night; and underſtanding, to his unſpeakable ſurprize, that his guards were retired, he leapt out of his bed, ſent in great haſte for his friends, and none of them obeying the ſummons, went at laſt in perſon, attended by a few domeſtics, to their ſeveral houſes; but finding the doors every-where ſhut, and no one deigning even to return an anſwer to his prayers and entreaties, he haſtened back to his chamber, which he found rifled and ſtript even to the coverings of his bed. The golden box, in which he kept the poiſon prepared by the famous Locuſta, being likewiſe carried carried off, he ſent for Spicillus, a celebrated gladiator, to diſpatch him; but neither he, nor any other being found who would undertake that taſk, he cried out in a fit of deſpair, What! have I in this forlorn condition neither friends nor enemies? Which words he had ſcarce uttered, when he left his room in a great hurry with a deſign to throw himſelf into the Tiber; but changing his mind, he ſtopt all on a ſudden, and deſired ſome private place to recollect himſelf and reſume his courage. Hereupon Phaon, one of his freed-men, offered him his country-houſe, which ſtood between the Salarian and Numentan roads, about four miles from the city. He accepted the offer, and, without further delay, attended by four perſons, of whom Sporus was one, left Rome meanly apparelled and worſe mounted, hiding his face, through fear of being diſcovered, with a handkerchief. Upon his ſetting out, he was terrified and diſmayed by dreadful flaſhes of lightning, and a violent earthquake, as if the ghoſts of the many perſons he had murdered were riſing up, ſays Dion, againſt the unmerciful tyrant. As he paſſed by the camp of the prætorian guards, he heard them curſing him, and wiſhing proſperity and ſucceſs to Galba. A paſſenger, whom he met on the road, in ſeeing him and his attendants, Theſe, ſaid he, are no doubt in purſuit of Nero; another aſked him, What news of Nero in the city? His horſe ſtarting at the ſight of a carcaſs that lay in the way, the covering of his face was ſhaken off, and he known by a ſoldier of the prætorian guards, named Miſſicius, who ſaluted him with the title of emperor; which ſo alarmed Nero and his attendants, that at the firſt turning they quitted their horſes, and, betaking themſelves to a narrow path, crept with much difficulty through buſhes and briars to the wall, which encloſed Phaon's grounds, who entreated the emperor to conceal himſelf in a ſand-pit, till he found means of conveying him in with more ſecrecy: but Nero anſwered, that he would not be buried till he was dead; and lay concealed among the briars, while Phaon, examining the wall, was conſidering how he might introduce him undiſcovered. In the mean time, Nero, being preſt with drought, took up water out of a ditch with his hands, ſaying, To this liquor is Nero reduced: he likewiſe cleared with his own hands his garments of the briars that had ſtuck to them. In order to procure a more private acceſs for him to the houſe, a hole was opened in the wall, through Flies from Rome.

Nero betrayed by Nymphidius, and abandoned by his guards.

His fright and conſternation.

His forlorn condition.

through which he was dragged, and conveyed into a room very indifferently furniſhed, where he paſſed the remainder of the night and part of the following day, in ſuch agonies as can hardly be expreſſed, alarmed at the leaſt noiſe he heard, as if aſſaſſins were come to murder him, and not daring to ſpeak through fear of being diſcovered. He now repented the many crimes he had committed, wiſhed he had purſued a quite different conduct, was ſenſible, that thoſe, who had put him upon the meaſures he had followed, were his greateſt enemies; and had conſtantly in his mouth the following words, taken out of a tragedy, entitled, Œdipus baniſhed, the laſt in which he had acted; My father, mother, and wife, doom me to deſtruction [e]. As thoſe who attended him were conſtantly ſoliciting and importuning him to prevent with a voluntary death the dangers that threatened him, he at laſt ordered his grave to be dug, and wood and water to be provided for the waſhing and burning of his body, bemoaning himſelf, while he gave theſe orders, in a manner altogether unmanly, and often repeating with many ſighs and tears, What an artiſt will the world loſe [f].

THE news of Nero's flight filled the city with joy, the ſenate aſſembled early in the morning, and proclaimed Galba emperor; and, having taken the uſual oaths to him, declared Nero an enemy to the ſtate, and doomed him to be puniſhed more majorum. One of Phaon's friends immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to him with a letter, acquainting him with the tranſactions of the ſenate. As ſoon as the meſſenger appeared, Nero ſnatched the letter out of his hand; and finding by it, that he was declared an enemy to the ſtate, and doomed to be puniſhed more majorum, he aſked, what kind of puniſhment that was? Phaon told him, that, purſuant to the ſentence of the ſenate, he was to be ſtript naked, his head was to be faſtened in a pillory, and he in that poſture to be whipt to death; which ſo terrified him, that he ſnatched up two daggers, which he always carried about with him, as if he were determined to anticipate in that inſtant the execution of ſo cruel a ſentence by a voluntary death; but, after trying their points with a trembling hand, he put them up again, ſaying, that his fatal hour was not yet come: then turning

Is declared by the ſenate an enemy to the ſtate, and condemned to die.

[e] Suet. c. 48. Dio, p. 627. [f] Suet. c. 49.

turning to Sporus, he desired him to begin his complaints and lamentations, since the fatal moment approached. He betrayed such meanness as to desire with many tears, that some of his attendants would by their example encourage him to die with resolution and intrepidity. But none of them shewing the least inclination to animate him at the expence of their own lives, he strove to raise his drooping spirits with the following words ; Courage, Nero, courage ; such pusillanimity in an emperor is base and dishonourable ; the pains of death are but short and momentary ; strike boldly, &c. Thus he continued animating himself, but to no effect ; till hearing the noise of some horsemen, sent by the senate to seize him and bring him alive to Rome, he cried out in a Greek verse, A dismal noise of horses sounds in my ears ; and drawing one of his daggers, he put it to his throat ; but his heart failing him, he begged Epaphroditus his freed-man and secretary to lend him his assistance; which he did with great reluctance, and paid dear for it, being afterwards put to death by Domitian, for imbruing his hands in the blood of the Cæsars. Before he was quite dead, the centurion, sent by the senate to apprehend him, entered the room, and, pretending he was come to his relief, endeavoured to stop the blood : Nero gave him no other answer, but, 'Tis too late : Is this your fidelity and allegiance ? With which words he expired, his eyes staring in a frightful manner, and ready to start out of his head, to the great terror and amazement of all who were present [g]. Upon the first rumour of his death, one of Galba's freed-men, not trusting to common report, flew to the place where his body lay, and having with his own eyes beheld the lifeless carcass extended on the ground, and all covered with gore, hastened away to Spain with the important tidings [h]. Many others, prompted by the like curiosity, flocked to Phaon's country-house ; so that his death being no longer questioned, the joy of the Roman people was so great and universal, that they ran up and down the streets, with such caps on their heads as were worn by manumitted slaves, congratulating one another upon their deliverance from so hard a bondage, overturned and dashed in pieces most of Nero's statues, knocked out the brains of as many of his friends

Betrays great meanness.

His death.

The joy of the Roman people.

[g] Suet. ibid.

[h] Plut. vit. Galb.

as fell into their hands, &c. Amongſt others they faſtened the gladiator Spicillus to one of Nero's ſtatues, which they dragged along the ſtreets, and cruſhed the unhappy favourite to pieces: they laid a famous informer, named Aponius, flat on the ground, and drove carts heavy loaden with ſtones over him. Many others were ſeized by the outrageous and undiſtinguiſhing multitude, and by them torn in pieces, though they had no ſhare in Nero's crimes: inſomuch, that Mauriſcus, who was deſervedly eſteemed one of the beſt men of the city, declared in full ſenate, that he was afraid they ſhould ſoon have cauſe to wiſh for Nero [i]. Such was the miſerable end of Nero, the ſixth emperor of Rome, who by his unheard-of iniquities well deſerved all the misfortunes which befel him. He died in the thirty-firſt year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years and eight months complete, according to ſome, or eight months wanting two days, according to others: for St. Jerom, Euſebius [k], and Zonaras [l] place his death on the eleventh of June; whereas the learned archbiſhop Uſher, father Pagi, and cardinal Noris alledge ſtrong arguments to prove, that he died on the ninth of the ſaid month. We need not enlarge on his character, ſince the name of Nero is by moſt nations made uſe of emphatically to expreſs a barbarous, raging, and abandoned tyrant. Pliny calls him the common enemy and fury of mankind [m], and moſt writers propoſe him as the pattern of a complete tyrant; and truly his whole life ſeems to have been a conſtant ſtruggle, to ſhew how abandonedly wicked, how execrably bad an human creature can be, when veſted with great power. The only thing he earneſtly commended to his attendants before he died was, that his head might not be cut off, but his body burnt entire. His requeſt was readily granted by Icelus, one of Galba's freedmen, who likewiſe allowed his obſequies to be performed with the uſual ſolemnity. His aſhes were carefully gathered, and depoſited in the ſtately monument of the Domitian family, by his concubine Acte, and two other women, who in his infancy had been charged with the care of his education. He was no eloquent ſpeaker, Seneca having having diverted him, if Suetonius is to be credited, from peruſing the works of the antient orators, leſt he ſhould deſpiſe his ſtyle and compoſitions. He had a genius for poetry, and wrote verſes with great eaſe: ſome indeed accuſed him as a plagiary; but from this imputation Suetonius clears him, aſſuring us, that from the tablets on which he wrote, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, and which our author narrowly examined, it evidently appeared, that the verſes were neither tranſcribed by him, nor dictated by another, being effaced, interlined, and corrected, as thoughts or expreſſions occurred to him, which he liked better [n]. Though he died generally hated and abhorred, yet the vulgar, abandoned to debauchery and inured to the idle amuſements of the theatre and circus, began ſoon to regret the loſs of a prince, by whoſe infamous vices they ſubſiſted. Hence they flocked to his tomb, adorned it with flowers, carried his images, as it were, in triumph, &c. Vologeſes likewiſe, king of the Parthians, ſhewed a particular reſpect for Nero after his death, and by the embaſſadors, whom he ſent to the ſenate to renew his alliance with the Roman people, earneſtly begged, that the memory of Nero might be revered, and a monument erected to him [o]. Some even gave out, that he was not dead, but would ſoon appear again and take vengeance of his enemies: edicts were publicly hung up as iſſued by him, and ſoon after a ſlave, who greatly reſembled him, and was no leſs ſkilled in ſinging and playing upon the harp, attempted to paſs himſelf upon the provinces of Aſia and Achaia for the deceaſed prince; but was ſeized and executed in the iſland of Cythnus [p]. Several counterfeit Neros appeared afterwards; one eſpecially in the reign of the emperor Domitian, near twenty years after the true Nero was dead, created great diſturbances in the eaſt, where he was followed by vaſt crouds. Artabanes, who then reigned in Parthia, eſpouſed his cauſe, and ſent him powerful ſuccours; but was at length with much ado, prevailed upon to abandon the impoſtor, and deliver him up to the Romans [q]. But what above all to us ſeems ſurpriſing is, that towards the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century, an opinion prevailed in the church, that Nero was to appear again

[i] Plut. ibid. [k] Hier. & Euſeb. in chron. [l] Zonar. p. 190. [m] Plin. l. vii. c. 8.

[n] Suet. c. 50——52.
[o] Suet. c. 57. Aur. Vict. epit.
[p] Dio, l. lxiv. p. 732. Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 2.
[q] Suet c. 57.

gain at the end of the world, and either to be himſelf the antichriſt, or to reign in the weſt and re-eſtabliſh idolatry there, while the antichriſt reigned in the eaſt. This opinion is by Sulpicius Severus aſcribed to St. Martin [r]. Some believed, that Nero was to be raiſed from the dead under another name; others, that he did not really die; but his wound being cured, was conveyed to ſome private place, where he is to lie concealed, till the time appointed for the appearance of the antichriſt. This opinion, which ſome pretended to prove from the Revelations, is taken notice of by Lactantius [s]; but what were his ſentiments on that ſubject is hard to determine, all the copies of his works being in that place ſtrangely corrupted. It is, however, manifeſt, that he ſuppoſes with Sulpicius Severus, Nero's body never to have been found, notwithſtanding the account which both Suetonius and Plutarch give us of his obſequies. St. Auſtin expreſſes no ſmall ſurprize, that ſuch an abſurd, and, as he ſtyles it, ridiculous, opinion ſhould have found partizans amongſt men of knowledge and learning [t]. But what opinion has hitherto been broached, that has not found ſome zealous proſelytes among the learned? The family of the Cæſars, properly ſpeaking, ended in Caligula, who had been adopted by Tiberius; but nevertheleſs, as Nero was, as well as Claudius, deſcended from Auguſtus by his mother Agrippina, the houſe of the Cæſars is ſaid to have ended in him. As for the writers who flouriſhed in Nero's reign, we refer the reader to our notes (T).

[r] Sulp. Sever. hiſt. ſacr. l. ii. [s] Lactan. de morte perſecutor. c. 2. [t] Aug. de civit. Dei, l. xx.

(T) Theſe were, Fabius Ruſticus, who wrote the hiſtory of his own time, and is frequently quoted by Tacitus, though in the opinion of that impartial writer, he betrayed too much zeal in extolling Seneca, to whoſe friendſhip he was chiefly indebted for the plentiful fortune he poſſeſſed. He was the beſt hiſtorian of his age; but none of his works have reached us (41). M. Serviſius, who is placed by Tacitus among the hiſtorians who wrote the hiſtory of Rome. He died in the ſixth year of Nero's reign and fifty-ninth of the chriſtian æra (42). Some writers take him to be the ſame perſon with M. Servilius Nonianus, who was conſul with C. Ceſtius Gallus, in the twenty-ſecond year of (41) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 25. (42) Tacit. Annal. xiv. c. 9.

Tiberius's reign and thirty-fifth of the chriſtian æra. Pliny ſpeaks of one M. Servilius Nonianus, who flouriſhed ſome time before him, and was eſteemed a man of great learning and eloquence (43); and Quintilian mentions one, whom he calls Servilius Novianus, as a man of an extraordinary genius, but more diffuſe in his writings, than was conſiſtent with the laws of hiſtory (44). Voſſius endeavours to prove, that Nonianus and Novianus were too different writers (45); but moſt critics take them to be one and the ſame with M. Servilius Nonianus, who was conſul under Tiberius. A. Perſius Flaccus acquired great fame in Nero's reign by his ſatires. He was of an equeſtrian family, but allied to the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome. He was born in Volaterræ, a city of Hetruria, on the twelfth of December, in the thirty-fourth year of the chriſtian æra and twenty-firſt of Tiberius's reign, Paulus Fabius Perſicus and L. Vitellius being conſuls. At the age of ſixteen he ſtudied philoſophy, together with Lucan, under Annæus Cornutus, the famous ſtoic, of whom we have ſpoken above. He was nearly related to the wife of the celebrated Thraſea Pætus, and lived in great friendſhip with that zealous and undaunted patriot; but never ſhewed great value for Seneca. He was a man of a mild temper, of an unblemiſhed character, of an extraordinary modeſty, and unbounded beneficence. The ſubject of his ſatires are the faults of the orators and poets of his time, whom he expoſes with great humour and elegance, without ſparing Nero himſelf: hence they were received with uncommon applauſe, greedily read, and mightily cried up by all men of taſte, eſpecially by Lucan, who was greatly taken with his noble thoughts and fine expreſſions. He died ere he had put the laſt hand to them, before he was twenty-eight complete, on the twenty-fourth of November, in the year of the chriſtian æra ſixty-two, the ninth of Nero's reign, P. Marius and L. Aſinius Gallus being conſuls. He wrote ſome other poetical pieces; but, Cornutus, as we have hinted above, adviſed his mother to ſuppreſs them (46). Some writers have confounded him with Caius Perſius Flaccus, a man of great learning, but who is ſuppoſed to have flouriſhed about two hundred years before our poet (47). Remmius Palemon taught rhetoric at Rome with great applauſe under Tiberius, Caius, and Claudius, and, dying in the reign of Nero, left behind him a poem on weights and meaſures, which has reached our times. He was a native of Vicentia, and originally a ſlave; but by teaching acquired a conſiderable fortune, tho' he was generally deſpiſed, as a man quite deſtitute of honour, virtue, and honeſty. Under him Perſius ſtudied eloquence (48). Cæſius Baſſus (43) Plin. l. xviii. c. 2. (44) Quint. l. x. c. 1. (45) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 27. (46) Suet. Perſ. vit. Hier. chron. (47) Vide Voſſ. poet. Lat. c. 3. (48) Idem, c. 42. Plin. l. xiv. c. 4.

Baſſus died about the latter end of Nero's reign, and left behind him ſeveral poetical pieces highly eſteemed. He excelled in lyrics; but fell far ſhort of Horace (49). He is ſuppoſed to have been conſumed with his houſe by the flames of mount Veſuvius. C. Balbillus, who, according to Seneca, was a man of great integrity, and well verſed in all the branches of literature (50), was appointed præfect or governor of Egypt in the ſecond year of Nero's reign and fifty-fifth of the Chriſtian æra (51). He ſailed, according to Pliny (52), in ſix days from the ſtreights of Meſſana to Alexandria. He wrote an account of the remarkable things he had ſeen in Egypt, and deſcribed a battle, which, during his adminiſtration, happened at the mouth of the Nile, between the crocodiles and dolphins. The victory, according to him, was gained by the latter (53). Lucan was put to death by Nero's orders as we have related above. His chief performance is his Pharſalia, wherein he deſcribes the war between Cæſar and Pompey, in the opinion of Quintilian, more like an orator than a poet (54). As about no one writer critics are more divided in their opinions than about Lucan, we ſhall not preſume to decide a queſtion ſo much controverted, or even deliver our ſentiments. However, we cannot help thinking, that ſuch as equal him to Virgil, do not ſo much extol Lucan, as they diſcredit themſelves, by manifeſtly betraying their want of taſte and judgment. If age had ripened his genius, for he was not twenty-ſix complete when he died, and joined to his fire and vivacity the more mature judgment of the inimitable Virgil, we might have admired in him a complete poet. To him Voſſius aſcribes the panegyric upon Piſo, which paſſes under Ovid's name (55). He likewiſe wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, and ſeveral other pieces, which have been long ſince loſt. A Greek woman named Pamphyla, gained great reputation under Nero, by a general hiſtory, which ſhe compriſed in thirty-three books, well known to the antients, but not conveyed down to us (56). Andromachus, a native of Crete, by profeſſion a phyſician, inſcribed to Nero a Greek poem on treacle, which has been tranſmitted to us among the works of Galen (57).

But of all the writers who flouriſhed under Nero, the moſt renowned, without diſpute, is the philoſopher L. Annæus Seneca. His father Marcus, or, as others call him, Lucius Annæus Seneca, is by the antients ſurnamed the Declaimer, from his having collected and publiſhed together the declamations of the moſt celebrated orators of his time, as appears from the preface which he prefixed to them. He left Corduba, or Cordova, in Spain, his native city, and came to Rome with two of his ſons, M. Annæus Seneca and Lucius Annæus Seneca, about fifteen years before the death of Auguſtus. A third ſon named Lucius Annæus Mela, the father of Lucan the poet he left in Spain. As he was a perſon of great diſtinction in his own country, he was, ſoon after his arrival in Rome, admitted into the equeſtrian order. His eldeſt ſon, M. Annæus Seneca, being adopted by Junius Gallio, a ſenator, took the ſame name; and this is the Gallio, proconſul of Achaia, at whoſe tribunal St. Paul was accuſed. L. Annæus Seneca, his ſecond ſon, who was very young when he came to Rome, applied himſelf firſt to the ſtudy of eloquence under his father, and afterwards embraced with great ardour the philoſophy of the ſtoics, having for his inſtructors Attalus, Sotio, and others. He began very early to abſtain, purſuant to the doctrine of Pythagoras, from all kinds of meat; but a perſecution being raiſed under Tiberius againſt the Jews and Egyptians, who refrained from certain meats, he was eaſily prevailed upon by his father to renounce that doctrine and practice. However, he abſtained from oyſters and muſhrooms, which were then in great requeſt, conſidering them rather as incentives to gluttony than nouriſhment, refrained from wine, uſed no perfumes, nor baths, ſlept little, avoided the popular diverſions, &c. (58). By his firſt wife, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us, he had a ſon named Marcus. To his ſecond wife he took Pompeia Paulina, probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who, in the firſt year of Nero's reign, commanded in Lower Germany. He pleaded at the bar with great applauſe; inſomuch, that Caligula, who was himſelf a ready and eloquent ſpeaker, as Tacitus informs us, jealous of the reputation he gained, had, without any other provocation, reſolved on his deſtruction; but was diverted from his cruel purpoſe by a favourite concubine, who perſuaded him, that Seneca's health was ſo impaired by his ſtudies and auſterities, that he could not protract his life much longer (59). But, notwithſtanding the weakneſs of his conſtitution, and the many infirmities to which he was ſubject, he outlived both Caius and Claudius. By the latter he was baniſhed, as we have related already, into the iſland of Corſica, after he had been quæſtor; which dignity he attained before the reign of Claudius, but whether in the time of Tiberius or Caius, is uncertain. Though he profeſſed a philoſophical life, he has been accuſed of many things altogether (58) Senec. epiſt. 108, 83: (59) Dio, l. lix. p. 655.

(49) Idem ibid. (50) Senec. nat. quæſt. l. iv. c. 2. (51) Tacit. annal. l. xiii. c. 22. (52) Plin. l. xix. c. 13. (53) Senec. ib. Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 25. (54) Quint. l. x. c. 1. (55) Voſſ. ibid. l. i. c. 26 (56) Idem, hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 7. (57) Idem, poet. Græc. l. iii. c. 7.

altogether unworthy of that profeſſion. Not to mention the crime for which he was baniſhed under Claudius, Dion Caſſius charges him with other more abominable practices, and even with having taught his pupil Nero thoſe unnatural abominations, which will render his name infamous to the lateſt poſterity (60). And nevertheleſs that writer does not betray the leaſt prejudice againſt him; but, on the contrary, beſtows frequently high elogiums upon him. Tho' he often declaimed with great zeal againſt riches, yet, in the ſpace of four years, what by the favour of the prince, what by exceſſive uſury and hunting after teſtaments and inheritances, he amaſſed an immenſe treaſure. To his uſury and iniquitous extortions, Dion Caſſius chiefly aſcribes the revolt of the Britons, as we have related above. Tacitus, who ſpeaks of him as favourably as he thought conſiſtent with truth, owns, that he courted popular favour and was greedy of applauſe (61); and both Suetonius and Quintilian tell us, that he cried down the eloquence of the antient orators, to the end his own might be the more eſteemed. The ſatire he wrote againſt Claudius is altogether unworthy of a philoſopher, and likewiſe his conſolatio ad Polybium. even in the opinion of his great admirer and panegyriſt Lipſius, who therefore would willingly aſcribe it to ſome other; but owns, that he finds no arguments wherewithal to ſupport that opinion. Of this piece we conjecture Dion Caſſius ſpeaks, where he tells us, that Seneca, during his exile, inſcribed a book to the freedmen of Claudius, filled with ſuch mean and ſervile flattery, that being aſhamed of it himſelf, he did all that lay in his power to ſuppreſs it (62). As to his ſtyle, Quintilian tells us, that it was well ſuited to the taſte which prevailed in thoſe days, and for ſome time generally imitated by the young orators (63). But Quintilian himſelf, tho' he admires the lively and fertile genius of Seneca, yet wiſhes he had employed it better, and ſtudied rather to imitate the antients, than to form a ſtyle of his own; for from the antient maſters of eloquence he would have learnt to diſtinguiſh the true beauties of ſpeech from falſe ones (64). Suetonius ſeems to have entertained the ſame opinion of Seneca's ſtyle (65). From Aulus Gellius it appears, that in his time Seneca's ſtyle was ſtill admired by the young orators; but utterly deſpiſed by men of riper years and more mature judgment (66). Eraſmus agrees with Quintilian, and confirms his opinion with many learned obſervations (67), which we recommend to the peruſal of our readers. Lipſius finds fault with the ſtudied gingle of his periods, reckons many of his thoughts deſtitute of ſolidity, and his expreſſions often obſcure and unnatural (68). But after all, his works deſerve the higheſt eſteem in regard of the fine morals they contain and inculcate; and every reader will find in them powerful motives to embrace, and excellent rules to purſue, a virtuous life. We ſhall not enlarge upon them, ſince they are already ſo well known; but only obſerve, that of his works which have reached our times, Monſieur le Fevre is of opinion, that his conſolatio ad Marciam was written in the reign of Caius, or perhaps of Tiberius; his conſolatio ad Helviam in the beginning of his exile; his conſolatio ad Polybium about the forty-third year of the chriſtian æra and the third of Claudius's reign, when that prince was preparing to invade Britain; his epigrams, during his exile; his books de ira, de otio ſapientis, de conſtantia ſapientis, de providentia, de tranquillitate animæ, after the death of Caligula; his ludus in Claudium immediately after the death of that prince; his books de clementia and de beneficiis, in the beginning of Nero's reign; that de vita beata a few years after, when he was in the height of his grandeur and proſperity; and his book de brevitate vitæ, after he had withdrawn from court; his letters and his naturales quæſtiones are ſuppoſed by the ſame critic, to have been written the year before his death (69). Beſides his other pieces, of which we know not the dates, le Fevre aſcribes to him the tragedy intituled Medea, being induced thereunto by the authority of Quintilian (70). The Oedipus is likewiſe thought to have been written by him; but the Agamemnon, the Troas, and the Hercules furens, are, in the opinion of the above-mentioned critic, altogether unworthy of the genius and eloquence of Seneca. From him, however, others differ, and aſcribe to Seneca the Troas and the Hippolytus; but the tragedies intituled Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyeſtes, and Hercules in Oeta, to Seneca the father. As for the Octavia, it was, without all doubt, written after the death of Seneca, and even of Nero (71).

(60) Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 685. (61) Annal. xiii. c. 11. (62) Dio, ibid. p. 685, 686. (63) Quint. l. x. c. 1. (64) Idem, ibid. (65) Suet. in Ner. c. 52. (66) Aul. Gell. l. xii. c. 2. (67) Eraſm. Sen. prol.

As for the ſentiments of Seneca touching religion, In many places, ſays Tertullian (72), he favours us; noſter eſt; hence his authority is frequently made uſe of by Lactantius to confound the Gentiles. St. Auſtin produces ſeveral paſſages out of a book, which was written by Seneca againſt ſuperſtition and ſuperſtitious worſhip, but has not reached us, plainly ſhewing, that he acknowledged but one Supreme Being, and was fully convinced of the folly of idolatry. There is, ſays he, as quoted ed by St. Auſtin (73), but one Supreme Ruler, but one Deity. We adore nevertheleſs many, not with a view to pleaſe the gods, but out of a commendable compliance with the cuſtoms and laws of our country. Thus this able philoſopher, this grave ſenator, who thought it beneath him, ſays St. Auſtin, to diſguiſe himſelf on the ſtage, was not aſhamed to diſguiſe himſelf in the temples, and to aſſume a maſk, not to divert the people, but to lead them aſtray (74). In the abovementioned book he diſapproved of the Jewiſh ceremonies; but never once mentioned the chriſtians; which, in the opinion of St. Auſtin, plainly ſhews, that he found nothing in their religion but what he judged commendable, though he durſt not commend it, through fear of diſobliging the prince and the miſled multitude. Some letters of his to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to him, were publiſhed very early, which St. Auſtin and St. Jerom ſeem to have thought genuine; nay, the latter was by them induced to place Seneca among the eccleſiaſtic writers (75). But theſe letters are now univerſally rejected as ſpurious, and altogether unworthy of St. Paul, and even of Seneca; which inclines us to believe, that the letters, which have been conveyed down to us, are not the ſame with thoſe which were handed about in the time of St. Auſtin and St. Jerom. Lipſius is of opinion, that the ſuppoſed letters from Seneca to St. Paul, and from St. Paul to Seneca, were written by one and the ſame impoſtor (76); and Baronius diſcovers in them ſome enormous miſtakes (77). And thus much of the writers who flouriſhed under Nero.

(68) Lipſ. vit. Senec. c, 5. & 11. (69) Prolegom. in Senec. (70) Vide Faber. in Senec. prolegom. (71) Vide Turneb. & Faber. in Senec. (72) Tertul. ad nat. l. ii.

(73) Aug. de civit. Dei, l. vi. c. 10. (74) Idem, ibid. & in pſal. cxl. (75) Aug. epiſt. liv. Hieron. de vir. illuſt. c. 12. (76) Lipſ. in proleg. in Senec. (77) Vide Baron. ad ann. 66. art. 11——13. & Godeau hiſt. eccleſ. ad ann. 60.

CHAP. XVIII.

From the death of Nero to the death of Vitellius, when the empire became hereditary a ſecond time.

SERVIUS Sulpicius Galba, the ſeventh emperor, was, by his father, deſcended from the Sulpician family, one of the moſt antient and illuſtrious in Rome. Sulpicius Galba governed Spain in quality of prætor in the year of of Rome 602, and was the chief cauſe of the war with Viriatus, the celebrated leader of the Luſitanians. He was afterwards created conſul; but acquired greater renown by his eloquence, than by the offices he bore, being reckoned the moſt eloquent orator of his time. His grandſon, Sergius Galba, ſerved with great reputation under Julius Cæſar, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Gauliſh war; but afterwards, imputing the loſs of the conſulſhip to the ill offices of the dictator, he joined Brutus and Caſſius, and was on that account condemned by the Pedian law. His ſon, Servius Galba, was more famous for his ſtudies, than his employments; for he was not advanced above the degree of a prætor, when he publiſhed ſeveral hiſtories, which are greatly cried up by the antients. His ſon, Sergius Galba, married Mummia Achaica, the grand-daughter of the celebrated Q. Lutatius Catulus Capitolinus, and great grand-daughter of L. Mummius, who took and razed Corinth. By her he had two ſons, Caius and Servius Sulpicius Galba the emperor. Caius, having in his youth ſquandered away his eſtate, led a retired life in the country, till the twenty-ſecond year of Tiberius's reign; when, upon his receiving a letter from that prince, forbidding him to draw his lot for a province, he laid violent hands on himſelf. Tacitus ſuppoſes him to have been conſul [u]; but Suetonius tells us, that he fell by his own hand, upon his being by Tiberius forbidden to ſtand for the conſulſhip [w]. The emperor was born on the twenty-fourth of December, the fifth year before the common chriſtian æra, that is, the eve of the nativity of our Saviour. His mother, Mummia Achaica, dying while he was yet an infant, his father ſoon after took to his ſecond wife Livia Ocellina (U), a lady of great quality and wealth. She [u] Tacit. annal vi. c. 40. [w] Suet. in Galb. c. 3.

(U) Suetonius tells us, that Galba, appriſed of the paſſion which ſhe had conceived for him, called her one day aſide, and pulling off his robe, ſhewed her the imperfections of his ſhape, for he was ſtrangely diſtorted; which, inſtead of leſſening, heightened her eſteem for him to ſuch a degree, that though ſhe was courted on account of her wealth and beauty by the chief nobility of the city, ſhe conſtantly declared that if ſhe could not marry Galba, ſhe would not marry at all (78).

(78) Suet. c. 3.

She adopted young Galba, who thereupon took the name of L. Livius Ocella; which, however, he ſeems to have retained but a ſhort time. We are told by Suetonius, that while he was one day amongſt other noble youths of his own age ſaluting Auguſtus, the emperor laying his hand upon his head, "And you too, my ſon, ſaid he, ſhall one day taſte of empire." The ſame writer adds, that Tiberius, who was greatly addicted to the ſtudy of aſtrology, foreſaw the future grandeur of Galba; but at the ſame time knew, that he was not to attain the ſovereign power till he was ſtricken in years; ſo that he never betrayed the leaſt uneaſineſs or concern about his diſtant promotion [x]. Livia Auguſta, the mother of Tiberius, to whom he was related, ſhewed a great kindneſs and eſteem for him while ſhe lived, and at her death left him an immenſe ſum of money: which Tiberius never paid him, he being without that legacy one of the moſt wealthy citizens of his time. He was well verſed in all the liberal ſciences, eſpecially in the civil law. He married Lepida, deſcended of an illuſtrious family; but ſhe, and the two ſons he had by her, dying, he led ever after a ſingle life, notwithſtanding even the ſolicitations of Agrippina the mother of Nero, become a widow by the death of Domitius. She had conceived a great paſſion for him in his wife's life time; which occaſioned a quarrel between her and the mother of Lepida, who publicly upbraided her with her ſcandalous conduct [y]. He was, by the intereſt of Livia, preferred to employments before the age required by the laws. During his prætorſhip he diverted the people at the ſports called Floralia, with a new kind of entertainment, viz. elephants walking upon the rope. When his prætorſhip was expired, he was appointed governor of Aquitain, and about a year after raiſed to the conſulſhip, in which office he ſucceeded L. Domitius, the father of Nero, and was ſucceeded by Salvius Otho, the father of Otho, who was emperor after him. Caligula named him to the command of the legions in Germany, in the room of Getulicus; which truſt he diſcharged with great reputation, having in a ſhort time reſtored the antient diſcipline, which his predeceſſor had entirely neglected. Beſides, he repulſed with incredible expedition the Germans, who had made an inroad into Gaul; which gained him the favour and eſteem of Caligula. Upon the [x] Suet. c. 4. [y] Idem, c. 5.

the death of that emperor, he was earneſtly ſolicited by many perſons of great intereſt and power, to lay hold of that opportunity, and ſeize the empire for himſelf; but he, without hearkening to their propoſals, obliged his troops to take the uſual oaths to Claudius, who thereupon received him into the number of his moſt intimate friends, and ever after ſhewed ſo great eſteem for him, that being upon the point of ſetting out on his expedition into Britain, he put off his journey for ſome days, on account of a ſlight indiſpoſition which ſeized Galba. Some time after, Africa being ſtrangely haraſſed with inteſtine troubles and the invaſions of the neighbouring barbarians, he was, without drawing lots according to cuſtom, ſent into that province in quality of proconſul, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf there even above thoſe, who had gained the greateſt reputation in that government. He remained there two years, during which time he reſtored, with great prudence and neceſſary ſeverity, the province to its former tranquillity. Suetonius tells us, that one of his ſoldiers having ſold, while proviſions were very ſcarce, his allowance of corn for an hundred denarii, the proconſul, to puniſh his avarice, forbad his comrades to ſupply him; by which means he was ſtarved. Upon his return from Africa, he was honoured with the triumphal ornaments, and admitted among the Titian prieſts and the prieſts of Auguſtus. From this time to the middle of Nero's reign, that is, the ſixtieth year of the chriſtian æra, he led a retired life, dreading to give the tyrant any umbrage. During his retirement, he never ſtirred out, even to take the air, but attended by a chariot with a vaſt ſum of money in it; that he might not be reduced to want, in caſe he found it neceſſary to conſult his ſafety by a ſudden flight. Thus he lived, till Nero, of his own motion, named him to the government of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, that prince not having yet learnt, as Plutarch obſerves, to fear, and exclude from the great employments, men of intereſt and power. He governed that province for the ſpace of eight years, at firſt with exceſſive rigor, of which authors give us ſeveral inſtances: a banker being convicted of fraud in his profeſſion, he ordered both his hands to be cut off and nailed to his counter. He cauſed a guardian to be crucified for poiſoning his ward, whoſe next heir he was. The criminal urged, that he was a Roman citizen, and, as ſuch, exempted from that ignominious death; upon which Galba commanded, by way of diſtinction, a white croſs to be prepared for him much higher than uſual, but would not revoke his former ſentence. However, by degrees he abated of his rigor, through fear of giving Nero occaſion of jealouſy, and abandoned himſelf, contrary to his inclination, to ſloth and idleneſs, ſaying, that no man could be called to an account for doing nothing: Nevertheleſs he took no care to ſuppreſs the many bitter lampoons, which were handed about againſt Nero and ſung throughout his province, or to enquire after or puniſh the authors of them [z]. He could not check the cruelties and extortions practiſed by the imperial procurators, whoſe province it was to collect the taxes and other duties belonging to the revenue; but openly ſhewed a tender concern for the ſufferings of the oppreſſed people, which gained him the hearts of the natives, but provoked the emperor's officers to ſuch a degree, that, at their inſtigation, Nero had already ordered him to be privately diſpatched. But, before theſe orders could be put in execution, he openly revolted in the manner we have related above [a].

We left Galba at Clunia, a city of his province, whither he had retired with his friends, in the utmoſt conſternation, upon the news of the death of Vindex, and the declaration of Verginius not to ſeize the empire himſelf, nor ſuffer any one elſe to aſſume it, who was not choſen by the ſenate. While he was deliberating with his friends what meaſures to take, and in the utmoſt deſpair ready to lay violent hands on himſelf, his freedman, by name Vicellius, of whom we have ſpoken above, arriving in ſeven days from Rome, and underſtanding upon his arrival, that Galba was repoſing in his chamber, opened the door, and, entering in ſpite of his guards, acquainted him, that Nero was dead, and he, by the army, the ſenate, and people, declared emperor; adding, that not truſting to common report, he had gone himſelf to the place where the tyrant lay, ſeen his lifeleſs carcaſe extended on the ground, and heard Galba, in the camp of the prætorian guards, proclaimed emperor. We may well imagine, how great was the joy of Galba upon this intelligence; it flew in a trice through the neighbouring cities, and drew vaſt crouds to Clunia: Galba received them in the moſt obliging manner, communicated to them the news he had received, and aſſured assured them of the truth of it, tho' the expedition used by the messenger rendered it almost incredible. Two days after, Titus Vinius, tribune of the only legion then in the province, having received from his friends in Rome a distinct account of what had passed in the capital, came from the camp and imparted it to his general. Nor was it long, ere messengers arrived from the consuls Silius and Trachalus, who, tho' deposed by Nero, had, it seems, upon his death, resumed the fasces, with the decrees of the senate, declaring Galba emperor and vesting him with the sovereign power [b]. Suetonius writes, that he no sooner received these dispatches, than laying aside the title of lieutenant to the senate and people, he assumed that of emperor [c]; but Zonaras tells us, that he would not suffer himself to be styled emperor or Cæsar, till he was acknowledged as such by the deputies, who were sent to him by the senate and met him at Narbonne [d]. Be that as it will, he no sooner received the decrees of the senate, than he left Spain and set out for Rome, attended by his Spanish guard, by his chief friends, and by Otho, prætor of Lusitania, the first governor who had declared for him; but advanced slowly, being, on account of his age, carried the whole way in a litter. Suetonius tells us, that on his journey he dispatched assassins into Judæa, with private orders to murder Vespasian, whose power and abilities he dreaded. But Tacitus [e] and Josephus [f] assure us, that Vespasian entertained not the least thought of revolting from Galba; but, on the contrary, upon the first news of his assumption to the empire, he dispatched his son Titus to perform fealty and homage in his name, and to receive his orders concerning the war he was carrying on against the Jews. With Titus king Agrippa set out from Judæa, in order to assure the new emperor of his submission and obedience; but they proceeded no farther than Achaia, where they received news of Galba's death. The only person whom Galba seemed to dread and suspect was Verginius Rufus, who was at the head of a powerful army in Germany, and acquired great reputation by the defeat of Vindex, and was greatly beloved by the soldiery. But he, tho' earnestly pressed to assume the sovereignty, not only by the troops under his command, but likewise by deputies from the legions, which, by Nero's orders, had from Illyricum crossed over into Italy,

Galba receives the news of Nero's death.

[z] Suet. c. 6—9 [a] Suet. c. 9, 10 Dio, l. lxiii. p. 725.

Assumes the title of emperor.

Verginius refuses the empire.

[b] Plut. ibid. [c] Suet. c. 11. [d] Zonar. p. 190. [e] Tacit. hist. l. i. c. 10. [f] Joseph. bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 29.

Italy, continued firm to his firſt reſolution of reſerving to the ſenate the power of electing an emperor; nay, when certain news was brought him of Nero's death, he ſtill perſiſted in refuſing the title of emperor, tho' his ſoldiers bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to ſtand by him to the laſt drop of their blood, and one of the tribunes, forcing his way into his tent, with his drawn ſword, threatened to kill him upon the ſpot, if he continued to withſtand the ardent wiſhes of the whole army. When he received from Rome a certain account of the reſolutions of the ſenate, he immediately took the oath of fidelity to the new emperor, and perſuaded, not without much difficulty, the troops under his command to lay aſide all thoughts of raiſing him to the empire, which by the ſenate had been decreed to another. Galba was ſo taken with his loyal and generous conduct, that he immediately ſent for him, with a deſign to have him near his perſon, and confer upon him ſuch rewards, as his fidelity well deſerved. Verginius received with the utmoſt reſpect Flaccus Hordeonius, who was appointed to command in his room, reſigned the army to him, and ſet out without delay to meet the emperor, who already approached the frontiers of Gaul. Upon his arrival, he was received very coldly by Galba, without the leaſt token, ſays Plutarch, of affection or hatred, of gratitude or reſentment. The emperor had a perſonal value and eſteem for him, and would have raiſed him, had he followed his own inclination, to the chief employments in the ſtate. But Titus Vinius, who had already gained a great ſway over the emperor and was jealous of Verginius, did all that lay in his power to eſtrange from him the mind of the emperor, and to put a ſtop to his promotion. But herein he was more his friend, as Plutarch obſerves, than he intended, and contributed to that happineſs which he thought he was oppoſing: for, by preventing his preferment, he preſerved him from thoſe calamities, in which the other officers of the army were involved, and ſecured to him a life of quiet and tranquillity, which he enjoyed to an advanced age [g]. Galba, upon his arrival at Narbonne, found there the embaſſadors ſent to him from the ſenate, received them in a moſt obliging manner, and invited them to an entertainment, at which he refuſed to make uſe of the ſilver and gold plate which belonged to Nero, Obliges his legions to acknowledge Galba.

Is received coldly by Galba.

[g] Plut. ibid.

Nero, and had been ſent him from Rome, contenting himſelf with his own, which ſhewed, that he utterly deſpiſed all pomp and outward appearances of grandeur. However, he was ſoon perſuaded by Vinius to alter his conduct in this particular, and put upon other meaſures, which haſtened his ruin. He treated with the utmoſt ſeverity ſome cities of Spain and Gaul, that had been backward in acknowledging him, publiſhed threatening edicts againſt them, and deprived ſome of them of great part of their territories, loading them with heavy taxes, and cauſing their walls to be beaten down [h]. In Gaul he ordered Vettius Chilo, and in Spain Obultronius Sabinus and Cornelius Marcellus to be put to death, and with them, if we believe Suetonius [i], even their wives and children, for having refuſed to join him, when he firſt revolted from Nero. As Galba was known to be a man of an humane temper, and naturally averſe to all manner of cruelty, theſe executions were generally imputed, and not undeſervedly, to Vinius and his other favourites, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the courſe of the preſent reign.

Galba's ſeverity.

Nymphidius Sabinus aſpires at the empire.

In the mean time, at Rome, Nymphidius Sabinus, of whom we have ſpoken in the preceding reign, having, by his immenſe largeſſes, gained the affections of the prætorian guards, and perſuading himſelf, that Galba, by reaſon of his infirmities and old age, would never reach the capital, uſurped all the authority there. Preſuming upon his intereſt, he obliged Tigellinus, who commanded, jointly with him, the prætorian guards, to lay down his commiſſion. After this, he made ſeveral magnificent and expenſive entertainments, inviting to them ſuch as had been conſuls or had commanded armies, diſtributed large ſums among the people, and with ſhews and other diverſions, which he daily exhibited, gained ſo great an intereſt with all ranks, that he already looked upon himſelf as ſovereign. The ſenate, dreading his power, conferred extraordinary honours upon him, ſtyled him their protector, attended him when he appeared in public, and had recourſe to him for the confirmation of their decrees, as if he had been already inveſted with the ſovereign power. This baſe compliance puffed him up to ſuch a degree, that he uſurped,

His power in Rome.

[h] Tacit. hiſt. l. i. 53.

[i] Suet. c. 15.

not leiſurely and by degrees, but all at once, an abſolute authority. Plutarch tells us, that he was ſo provoked againſt the conſuls for ſealing the diſpatches, which they ſent to the emperor, with their own ſignets, and not with his, that he would have depoſed them, had they not ſtudied to appeaſe him with ſubmiſſions quite unbecoming perſons of their rank and ſtation. Tho' he acted as ſovereign, he had not yet openly declared his deſign of ſeizing the ſovereignty; but when he underſtood, that Galba was already in Gaul, and approached the borders of Italy, that Cornelius Laco was appointed commander of the prætorian guards, and Titus Vinius the new emperor's chief favourite, he ſummoned the officers under his command, and, after having bitterly inveighed againſt Galba's favourites, who, he ſaid, would exerciſe the ſame power and authority, which had been uſurped by Tigellinus, if they were allowed time to eſtabliſh themſelves, he exhorted them to ſend embaſſadors to the emperor, and beg, in the name of the whole army, that he would diſcharge from his ſervice Laco and Vinius. If Galba complied with their requeſt, he did not doubt, but the whole power would devolve upon him, ſince he had contributed more than any other to the ruin of Nero, and promotion of Galba; and this power he deſigned to make uſe of againſt Galba himſelf: if the emperor rejected the petition of the army, that, he hoped, would eſtrange their minds from him, and diſpoſe them to a revolt. But the officers did not approve of the motion; on the contrary, they thought it abſurd and unreaſonable to direct an emperor of Galba's years and experience, and tell him who of his friends were to be truſted, and who diſcharged. Hereupon Nymphidius changed his meaſures, and, contrary to the advice of Clodius Celſus, a native of Antioch, his intimate friend, reſolved to conceal no longer his deſign. Accordingly he imparted it, without diſguiſe, to ſome of the officers, and they to the ſoldiers under their command; and it was agreed, that Nymphidius ſhould be conveyed that very night into the camp, and there proclaimed emperor. But Antonius Honoratus, one of the tribunes, touched with remorſe, aſſembled his men in the evening, ſignified to them his repentance, and encouraged them to continue ſteady in their allegiance to Galba. We had, indeed, ſaid he, ſome colourable pretence to revolt, from Nero, whoſe cruelty and tyranny we could no longer bear. But what can prompt us to abandon and betray Galba? Can you reproach him with the murder of his wife and mother? did he ever diſgrace the imperial dignity by debaſing himſelf to act upon the ſtage? Notwithſtanding all the provocations that monſter had given us, we thought ourſelves bound to continue faithful to him, to defend and protect him, till we were aſſured by the traytor Nymphidius, that he had abandoned us and was fled into Egypt. What, but ſome evil genius, can thus hurry us on from one treaſon to another? Muſt Galba fall a victim to appeaſe the ghoſt of Nero? muſt one of Livia's family be ſacrificed to make way for the ſon of Nymphidia? Let us rather call him to an account for the death of Nero, and approve our fidelity to Galba by inflicting on the baſe traytor the puniſhment he deſerves. The diſcourſe of the tribune brought all who heard him over to his ſentiments; ſo that they reſolved to maintain inviolably the oath which they had taken to Galba. Moſt of the other cohorts joined them, and with loud ſhouts proclaimed a-new Galba emperor. Nymphidius hearing the noiſe, and either imagining they proclaimed him, or fearing ſome inſurrection, haſtened to the camp, attended by a great number of lights, and holding a ſpeech in his hand compoſed by Ciconius Varro, which he intended to pronounce to the army. Upon his arrival at the camp, he found the gates ſhut and the ſoldiers under arms on the ramparts. This greatly alarmed him; but nevertheleſs advancing nearer, he aſked them, What they deſigned, and by whoſe orders they had taken arms? To this queſtion they anſwered with one voice, We are determined to acknowledge no other emperor but Galba. Nymphidius, pretending to concur in their ſentiments, commended their fidelity; and, not yet deſpairing of being able by large promiſes to gain them over to his intereſt, ordered them to open the gates to their general. They obeyed; but Nymphidius, upon his firſt entering the camp, was ſaluted with a dart, which Septimus, who marched before him, received on his ſhield.

Attempts to ſtir up the prætorian guards to a revolt.

The ſpeech of one of the tribunes againſt him.

He goes to the camp.

Is there murdered.

The traytor immediately betook himſelf to flight; but being cloſely purſued by the ſoldiery, was overtaken and ſlain. His body was dragged through the camp, and next morning expoſed to public view in an incloſure made for that purpoſe [i]. For this account we are indebted to Plutarch; tarch; for Tacitus and Suetonius only tell us, that Nymphidius embarked in measures to seize the sovereignty, but perished in the attempt. Nymphidius boasted himself, as we have related above [k], the son of the emperor Caligula; but was commonly thought, according to Plutarch [l], to be the son of a celebrated gladiator named Martianus, to whom he bore a greater resemblance than to Caligula; for his mother Nymphidia was a public prostitute. Galba being at the same time informed of the treason and the punishment inflicted on the traitor, dispatched orders to the senate, enjoining them to put all his accomplices to death without distinction. Among these were executed Cingonius Varro, consul elect, who had composed his speech, and Mithridates of Pontus, the same, as we conjecture, who, having been by the Romans stript of his dominions twenty years before, had delivered himself into their hands, and had by them been conveyed to Rome. They were both, without all doubt, privy to the conspiracy; nay, Mithridates had said publicly, while men of all ranks were with emulation testifying their joy for the promotion of Galba, that while he was at some distance, they entertained mighty expectations of him; but the moment he appeared, they would think it a disgrace to the present age, that he had ever been styled Cæsar. But, notwithstanding their guilt, they were deemed to perish as innocents, because they died without being heard in their own defence. Every one expected, from a man of Galba's years and experience, a quite different conduct; and therefore the whole city was greatly alarmed at such illegal and arbitrary proceedings, against persons of their rank and quality [m]. But what occasioned a far greater surprize was, his ordering Petronius Turpilianus, who had been consul in the eighth year of Nero's reign, to be forthwith put to death, for no other crime, but because he had been faithful to that prince, and commanded as general under him. As Turpilianus was broken with age, and had no longer any troops under his command, the emperor, as was publicly said, ought to have put off his execution, till his arrival at Rome, and heard him himself. From these hasty and illegal executions it was generally concluded, that the new prince would not observe that moderation in his actions, which he had promised in his speeches.

[i] Plut. ibid.

His accomplices punished by Galba's orders.

Galba's unseasonable severity.

[k] Vol. xiv. p. 250. l. i. c. 5.

[l] Plut. ibid.

[m] Tacit. hist.

After a long and bloody march, Galba reached at length the Milvian bridge, within twenty-five furlongs of the city, and was there met by a numerous body of marines, who by Nero had been formed into a legion, and were come to addreſs the new emperor for a confirmation of their eſtabliſhment. But Galba either rejecting their petition, or putting off the affair to another time, they grew mutinous, beſet the emperor, ſtopping up the way to all others who came to wait upon him, and with a tumultuous noiſe, required an eagle and legionary enſigns. Hereupon Galba ordered his horſe to ride in among them, who put many of them to the ſword and the reſt to flight. The emperor, not ſatisfied with this ſeverity, commanded every tenth man of thoſe who had eſcaped to be decimated; ſo that, according to Tacitus, ſeveral thouſands fell, either by the ſwords of the horſe, or thoſe of the executioners [n]. Dion Caſſius tells us, that ſeven thouſand of the diſarmed multitude were cut in pieces upon the ſpot. Such, as had the good luck to outlive the maſſacre and execution of their companions, were by Galba's orders, committed to priſon, where they lay till his death, when they were by Otho ſet at liberty, and anew formed into a legion [o]. The entrance of the new emperor into the capital, through ſo much blood and ſlaughter, was looked upon as an omen portending greater calamities, than the city had ſuffered even under Nero; and the populace were confirmed in their apprehenſions by ſeveral prodigies, eſpecially by an earthquake, attended with a dreadful noiſe, which happened upon Galba's firſt entering the palace [p]. But what moſt of all rendered him both odious and contemptible was, his ſuffering himſelf to be entirely governed and blindly controuled by his three favourites, Titus Vinius, Cornelius Laco, and Martianus Icelus, who, as they lodged in the palace, and were continually about the emperor, were commonly ſtyled his pedagogues. Titus Vinius was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, but diſgraced it by his infamous conduct, being, according to Tacitus, of all men the moſt notoriouſly wicked. In his very firſt campaign under Calviſius Sabinus, he was branded with infamy; for the wife of that general, led with a prepoſterous curioſity to view the diſpoſition of the camp, entered it

He cauſes a great number of marines to be maſſacred.

Is governed by his favourites.

The character of Titus Vinius

[n] Tacit. c. 6.
[o] Dio, l. lxiv. p. 729. Tacit. c. 8.
[p] Suet. c. 18.

it in the night, diſguiſed in the habit of a ſoldier; and, having there ventured into the place where the guard was kept, was debauched by Vinius, in the very quarter which was ſacred to the Roman eagles and banners. For this crime he was by the emperor Caligula put in irons, and kept under cloſe confinement; but being ſoon after ſet at liberty by Claudius, he diſcharged ſeveral public employments with a character free from reproach. Upon the expiring of his prætorſhip, he was preferred to the command of a legion, and acquitted himſelf in it with applauſe. Afterwards he was guilty of a crime, altogether infamous and worthy only a ſlave; for being invited by Claudius to an entertainment, he purloined a golden cup of great value. But the only puniſhment which the emperor inflicted upon him for ſo ſcandalous an action was, to invite him again to his table the very next day, and to diſtinguiſh him from the reſt of his gueſts, by ordering, that Vinius alone ſhould be ſerved in an earthen cup. Yet he ruled the province of Narbonne Gaul, in quality of proconſul, with unbiaſſed juſtice and eminent integrity. He was upon the cloſe of his proconſulſhip, appointed to command, under Galba, the legion which was quartered in Spain; where, contrary to the opinion of the other officers, he encouraged his general, in the manner we have related above, not to let ſlip the opportunity that offered to ſeize the ſovereignty. He was a man of great boldneſs and addreſs, and, according as he choſe to apply his talents, capable of performing great things for the public welfare, or plunging the ſtate in endleſs calamities. Cornelius Laco, the other favourite, whom Galba had appointed captain of the prætorian guards before he left Spain, was a man of ſlender parts, of no courage or activity, but mightily conceited with his own talents, a certain enemy to every counſel, however excellent, if not ſuggeſted by himſelf, and headſtrong in oppoſing every man eminent for ability and diſcernment. Icelus was a manumiſed ſlave, but not inferior to the other two in favour and authority. Nero had veſted him, by the gold ring, with the order of knighthood, and he was now every-where called by an equeſtrian name, that of Martianus. He was a man of inſatiable avarice, and is ſaid, by ſpoil and rapine, to have amaſſed more wealth in the ſeven months that Galba reigned, than the moſt rapacious freedman of Nero had done during the fourteen years of his reign. As the aged emperor repoſed an entire confidence in thoſe miniſters, without ever enquiring into their conduct, they proſtituted the credit and character of their maſter to their own vile gain and wicked paſſions. By them all things were ſet to ſale; offices, provinces, public revenues, public juſtice, and the lives of men both innocent and guilty. He was old; they were inſatiable, and eager to make the moſt of a ſhort reign; ſo that in the court of Galba appeared all the evils and exceſſes lately ſeen and abhorred in that of Nero: they were equally grievous, ſays Tacitus, but not equally excuſed, in a prince of Galba's years and experience. He had himſelf an heart altogether upright and well-meaning; but, as the numberleſs iniquities of his miniſters were imputed to him, he was no leſs hated, than if he had committed them himſelf. This, ſays Dion Caſſius [q], is the unhappy condition of princes: it is not enough for them to abſtain from all violence; they muſt reſtrain others, eſpecially their miniſters, from committing any: no prince will be reckoned good, when his miniſters are known to be bad; nor be much beloved, when they are much hated. Miniſters, it muſt be owned, are often doomed to ſuffer imputations altogether groundleſs, as proceeding rather from envy and the nature of their poſt, than from their evil conduct; in which caſes it is but reaſonable and generous to protect them. But here the guilt was notorious, and manifeſt to all men but Galba. He, whom of all men it moſt imported to know it, knew it not; and hence, without check or controul, they abuſed the power with which he too blindly entruſted them, and ſacrificed his life, his glory, and diadem to their own private views, to ſordid intereſt, which was the ſmalleſt thing they ought to have ſacrificed for ſo good a maſter. But the meaſures, which they took, proved in the end no leſs fatal to them, than to the emperor, as we ſhall have occaſion to relate.

Of Cornelius Laco and Icelus.

Their ſcandalous conduct.

Galba calls to account and puniſhes the miniſters of Nero.

Galba's firſt care, after his arrival in the capital, was to call to an account, and puniſh, according to their deſerts, ſuch as had borne the chief ſway in the late tyrannical adminiſtration. Among theſe, Elius Polycletus, Petinius, Patrobius, Narciſſus, all Nero's freedmen, and Locuſta, the famous poiſoner, were publicly executed, to the infinite ſatisfaction of the people, who, with loud ſhouts of joy, attended them as they were led

[q] Dio, l. lxiv. p. 728.

led to the place of execution. No one doubted, but Tigellinus would ſuffer the like doom. He had been the chief author and promoter of all Nero's iniquities, had perpetrated many unknown to him, and at laſt forſaken and betrayed him. Hence the execution of no man was more ardently wiſhed for, more vehemently urged, by ſuch as hated, by ſuch as lamented, Nero; both concurring from oppoſite paſſions, in the ſame antipathy and requeſt. But he had, with immenſe preſents, purchaſed the favour of Vinius, who protected him with his mighty authority, on pretence that his daughter had been ſaved by Tigellinus; and truly he had ſaved her, ſays Tacitus, not from any clemency of his, after ſuch numbers murdered by him, but purely to purchaſe means of ſhelter and eſcape in time to come. For this is the policy, continues our hiſtorian, of every deſperate offender, from diſtruſt of preſent fortune and dread of change, to arm himſelf betimes with private favour againſt the public hatred. Hence it comes, that for the protection of innocence no regard is ſhewn, but the guilty combine for mutual exemption from puniſhment [q]. Of this ſcandalous partiality the people loudly complained: Turpilianus, ſaid they, without having been guilty of any iniquity, or been polluted with the crimes of Nero, has been put to death for no other guilt, but becauſe he would not betray his prince and maſter; whereas he who plunged his prince into thoſe abominations, for which he deſerved to die, and afterwards treacherouſly forſook and betrayed him, is not only ſuffered to live, but to enjoy the immenſe wealth, which by all manner of rapine he has accumulated. As often as the emperor appeared abroad, the people crowded about him, demanding the execution of Tigellinus. This they earneſtly begged, in the theatre, in the circus, at the gates of the palace, &c. As the execution of this execrable inſtrument of Nero's tyranny was thus demanded by the univerſal voice of the Roman people, it had been but juſt, as well as politic and popular, to have ſacrificed him, though he had been leſs guilty than he really was, to the manes of ſo many illuſtrious Romans murdered by him, and to the honeſt rage of the public. This would have obliged both the friends and enemies of Nero, gained the affections of the people, and ſtrengthened Galba's party. But theſe were ſmall conſide-

Tigellinus is protected by Vinius.

The people demand his execution.

[q] Tacit. c. 72.

rations with Vinius, in compariſon of filling his coffers. In order, therefore, to oblige Tigellinus, who had engaged to pay him an immenſe ſum, in caſe he eſcaped unpuniſhed, he perſuaded Galba, who repoſed in him an entire confidence, not only to withſtand the ardent wiſhes and earneſt ſollicitations of the whole Roman people, but to check them with an edict, wherein he reproached them with cruelty, and begged they would not make his government appear tyrannical, nor inſiſt upon the execution of an unhappy man, who was dying of a conſumption. Nothing ſo much provoked the indignation of the people as this edict; for it was afterwards known, that Tigellinus had that very day made a ſacrifice to the gods for his recovery, which was followed by a magnificent entertainment; and that Vinius, after having ſupped with the emperor, had ſpent the whole night in revelling with Tigellinus: it was moreover known, that Vinius had carried his daughter with him to the entertainment; and that Tigellinus, after having thanked the father for the edict, preſented the daughter, firſt with two hundred and fifty thouſand drachmas, and afterwards with a necklace, which he took from the neck of the chief of his concubines, valued at one hundred and fifty thouſand more. Halotus, another of Nero's miniſters, and perhaps no leſs hated, on account of his enormous cruelties and extortions, than Tigellinus, (for with equal ardour the Roman people demanded his execution) was in the ſame manner, and from the ſame motives, protected by the authority of Vinius; nay, in conſideration of an immenſe ſum, which he paid to that wicked miniſter, he not only eſcaped unpuniſhed, but was preferred to a moſt honourable and profitable employment [r]. Thus were criminals, notoriouſly guilty of the moſt crying iniquities, but poſſeſſed with wealth enough to purchaſe the favour of the reigning miniſter, ſcreened from the puniſhment due to their crimes, while others, leſs guilty, were by droves hurried to execution. This ſcandalous and barefaced partiality gained to the miniſter what he chiefly aimed at, immenſe treaſures, but derived upon the prince infinite public hatred; for, by not reſtraining his miniſter, he incurred the ſame cenſure and blame, as if he himſelf had done the evil, or authorized it [s].

Galba checks them with an edict.

Halotus is likewiſe pardoned and preferred.

Which derives public hatred upon Galba.

THE

[r] Plut. ibid. Suet. c. 15. [s] Plut. ibid. Tacit. c. 4.

THE example of Vinius was followed by the other miniſters and favourites of the new emperor; for being indulged in immoderate power, they expoſed to common ſale all the honours and emoluments of the ſtate. His bondmen too were greedy to profit by their ſudden ſunſhine, and eager to convert into haſty gains the ſhort reign of a maſter already enfeebled with age. So that the people began loudly to complain: Why, ſaid they, was Nero depoſed, if things are not mended under Galba? Why a new prince choſen, but for the eaſe of the public, after a reign of violence and tyranny? The public hatred, which the numberleſs iniquities of the new emperor's miniſters derived uponhim, was heightened by his ill-timed ſtrictneſs and unpopular parſimony; tho' his parſimony was chiefly aſcribed to Vinius, who was ſaid to have checked the emperor's generoſity to others, that he might the better gratify his own avarice. However that be, while the emperor endeavoured to reform the abuſes, and retrench the exorbitant expences that had prevailed in the preceding reign, he ran into the other extreme. No man's money, ſays Tacitus, did he ever covet, but was ſparing of his own, and of the public money greedy and tenacious. Authors relate ſeveral inſtances of his unſeaſonable parſimony, altogether unbecoming a perſon of his rank and ſtation. Plutarch tells us, that one Canus, a celebrated player upon the flute, having one night entertained him while he was ſupping, the emperor, after having highly commended the excellence of his performance, ſent for his purſe, and preſented him with five denarii, about three ſhillings of our money, telling him, that he made him that preſent out of his privy purſe, and not out of the public money. Suetonius adds, that when his table, upon any extraordinary occaſion, was more ſplendidly ſerved than uſual, he could not refrain from ſighing and expreſſing his diſſatisfaction, in a manner inconſiſtent with common decency [t]. As the public treaſure had been quite exhauſted by Nero, who had conſumed above ſeventeen millions in profuſe penſions and donations, Galba, after examining every expedient to find the neceſſary ſupplies, preferred to all others, as the moſt juſt, that of ſupplying the public at the expence of thoſe, for whoſe ſake the public had been impoveriſhed. All the partakers, therefore, in the late emperor's extravagance were called to account; and it was enacted, that they ſhould retain Galba's parſimony.

[t] Plut. ibid. Suet. c. 16.

He orders nine tenths of Nero's donations to be restored, tain only a tenth of that wild liberality and restore the rest. But as they had scarce a tenth left unwasted, having lavished the plunder of the public and of their fellow-citizens, in the same riot and prodigality in which they had squandered away their own private fortunes, the emperor obliged those who had had any dealings with them, who had bought or received any thing from them, to refund the whole. For these searches and exactions a new court was instituted, in which presided according to Tacitus thirty, according to Suetonius fifty, Roman knights; who extended their enquiries even into Greece, and there obliged the players upon instruments, the actors, wrestlers, charioteers, the judges at the olympic games, the priestess of Apollo Delphicus, &c. to restore nine tenths of Nero's donations. As this was an affair without bounds, and many were affected by it; as on all hands were seen open sales and the public crier, and this court was new in its institution, and from the multitude of officers, from the numerous suits, heavy and vexatious, the whole city, nay, the whole empire, was in a ferment. The soldiers of the prætorian guards were kept quiet a while, in expectation of the mighty donative, which had been promised them by Nymphidius, in Galba's name, supposing, that though they did not receive the full, yet the emperor notwithstanding his parsimony, would not scruple to bestow upon them the same sum that had been given them by Nero. But when he refused to fulfil the promise which had been made in his name, and ordered only a small sum, less than had yet been given by any prince to be distributed among them, they could not refrain from seditious invectives, vilifying the emperor for his old age and avarice. This disaffection was heightened by a saying of Galba: a saying according to Tacitus, worthy of the primitive virtue of the Romans and the commonwealth, but to himself dangerous; That he chose his soldiers and did not buy them. His severity too in exacting a strict observance of military discipline, a quality so admired of old, and by the armies ever distinguished with applause, was very grievous to a slothful soldiery, scorning the antient discipline, and for fourteen years so accustomed to the base reign of Nero, that at this time they no less admired the vices of their princes, than of old they had adored their virtues [a]. Though the rest of his conduct did not, not, according to Tacitus, anſwer his ſeverity in keeping the ſoldiery to their duty, yet he performed, as Suetonius informs us, many things worthy of ſo great a prince [w]. That writer does not deſcend to particulars; but Zonaras tells us, that he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe who had, by falſe accuſations, occaſioned the ruin of innocent perſons; that he delivered up to all maſters ſuch of their ſlaves as had borne witneſs againſt them; and that he recalled from exile thoſe, who had been baniſhed by Nero upon the law of majeſty [x]. Caſaubon thinks it plainly appears from an antient inſcription, that he ſuppreſſed the tax of the quadrageſima or the fortieth penny, which had been firſt taken off, and afterwards reſtored by Nero [y]. He diſcharged ſeveral of the prætorian guards, who had been engaged in the conſpiracy of Nymphidius; and diſmiſſed without the uſual rewards, the German cohort, which had ſerved the other Cæſars with unſhaken fidelity, ordering them to return to their country, becauſe he ſuſpected them more inclined to Cn. Dolabella, than to him [z]. However, he took particular care of ſome other cohorts of Germans, who having been ſent by Nero before him to Alexandria, while he meditated a journey thither, and ſoon after recalled, were returned ſickly, and greatly fatigued with ſo long a courſe of ſailing [a].

Refuses the soldiery the usual donative.

[a] Plut. ibid. Tacit. c. 5. Suet. c. 16. Dio, p. 729.

Diſcharges the German cohort.

About the ſame time that Julius Vindex revolted in Gaul, Clodius Macer, who governed Africa in quality of proprætor, took up arms againſt Nero, levied new forces, and even a legion, which from him was called the Macrian legion, but was ſoon after diſbanded by Galba, whom he refuſed to acknowlege, through fear of being called to an account for the numberleſs murders and extortions, to which his unbounded avarice and cruelty had prompted him. Plutarch tells us, that without either accepting or rejecting the imperial title, he ſtrove to maintain himſelf in poſſeſſion of Africa, and to famiſh the city, by ſtopping the veſſels which thence conveyed corn to Rome. He was inſtigated to this revolt, according to Tacitus [b], chiefly by Galvia Criſpinilla, who had been to Nero the directreſs of his luſts, and afterwards, paſſing over into Africa, had inſinuated herſelf into the favour of the proprætor Macer. According to this [w] Suet. c. 14. [x] Zonar. p. 190. [y] Vide Spanh. l. ix. p. 793. [z] Suet. c. 12. [a] Tacit. c. 31. Idem, hiſt. l. i. c. 7.

Clodius Macer killed in Africa.

this account, Macer seems not to have revolted till after Nero's death. Be that as it will, he was slain at the command of Galba by Trebonius Garucianus, the imperial procurator in Africa. As for Crispinilla, she returned to Rome; and though it was notorious, that she had suggested to Macer the pernicious counsel of famishing the Roman people, and on that score capital punishment was demanded against her by the universal voice of Rome; yet, by the connivance of the prince and the favour of his ministers, (for she was both opulent and childless) she escaped her doom, and lived in perfect impunity during the reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius [c]. About the same time, was assassinated Fonteius Capito, who commanded in Lower Germany, by Cornelius Aquinas and Fabius Valens, two tribunes, without staying for the emperor's command. There were, who believed that Capito, however abominable he was, however stained with avarice, and immersed with impurities, had yet declined engaging in any turbulent counsels; that having rejected the solicitations of Aquinas and Valens to rebel with them, he was by them charged with their own ill faith and treason; and that Galba either imposed upon or afraid of making further enquiry, ratified the execution. However it was, both these executions, that of Macer as well as that of Capito, were ill received, this being, as Tacitus well observes, the usual fate of a prince under public hatred, that every action of his, whether good or evil, is generally disapproved, perversly construed, and contributes to his ruin [d]. Suetonius tells us, that after the death of these two commanders, Galba at length quitted his military habit, and a dagger, which till then he had worn fastened to his neck, and hanging down on his breast, tho' he was not in a condition to make use of it, being enfeebled with age and infirmities [e].

Ant. Fonteius Capito in Lower Germany.

Vitelius governor of Lower Germany.

Capito was succeeded in the government of Lower Germany by Aulus Vitellius, afterwards emperor, who was raised to that post chiefly by the interest of Vinius, whose favour he had gained, by supporting the same faction in the circus. Galba, in conferring upon him that command, openly declared, that he did not prefer him out of any esteem he had for him, or opinion of his abilities, but because he believed those to be less feared, who were most addicted to gluttony, and that his keen appetite might be satiated with the plenty of that pro-province; ſo that his preferment was owing to the contempt, and not to the eſteem, the emperor had for him [f]. Philoſtratus, in his life of Apollonius Tyaneus tells us, that this year was born at Syracuſe, and expoſed to public view, a child with three heads; which monſtrous birth denoted, according to the interpretation of his Apollonius, the three heads or emperors, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, by whom the Roman ſtate was for ſome time governed in one and the ſame year. He adds, that the cities of Sicily were then in arms againſt each other, and ſtrangely haraſſed with inteſtine diviſions [g]. But of theſe diſturbances we find no farther account in that writer, nor any mention of them in others.

[c] Idem. ibid. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Suet. c. 11.

THE following year, on the calends of January, Galba entered on his ſecond conſulſhip, having his favourite miniſter, Titus Vinius, for his collegue. He had ſcarce aſſumed the faſces, when an expreſs arrived from Pompeius Propinquus, procurator of Belgic Gaul, informing him, that the legions in Upper Germany, in open violation of their oaths and allegiance, demanded imperiouſly another emperor, and referred the free election of one to the pleaſure of the ſenate and people of Rome. Verginius had been removed from them, as we have related above; and as he had neither been reſtored, nor preferred to any other command or employment, but treated in a manner, like a criminal, they conceived themſelves to be charged as delinquents, for having offered him the empire. Hordeonius Flaccus, who had been ſent to ſucceed him, they utterly contemned; and truly he was a man void of firmneſs, void of authority, and from his lameneſs and the infirmities of his age, unequal to the direction of the moſt orderly and peaceable army. Hence, under their preſent frenzy, they were further inflamed by his impotent endeavours to reſtrain them. This intelligence ripened the deſign, about which Galba had been for time deliberating with himſelf and in concert with his friends, concerning the adoption of a ſucceſſor; for he imagined himſelf to be deſpiſed, not ſo much on account of his age, as for want of iſſue. But his favourites already at variance and purſuing each his own private views, were divided into two factions: Vinius was for Otho; Laco and Icelus were combined together, not ſo much to favour the intereſt

The legions in Upper Germany revolt.

Galba deliberates concerning the adoption of a ſucceſſor.

[f] Suet. in Vitell. c. 7.

[g] Phil. vit. Apoll. Tyan. l. v. c. 4.

intereſt of any particular, as to exclude him. As Vinius had a daughter who was a widow, and Otho was not married, no one doubted but an alliance between them was intended. But Galba, moved with a concern for the commonwealth, which, he thought, was in vain reſcued from Nero, were it to devolve upon Otho, the chief confident of that prince's impure pleaſures, did not in this particular, ſuffer himſelf to be blindly guided by Vinius; but hearing him favourably, referred the farther conſideration of the affair to another time. However, out of complaiſance to his chief miniſter, he appointed him and Otho conſuls for the enſuing year. Hence it was generally taken for granted, that Otho would, upon his entering the conſulſhip, be by Galba declared his ſucceſſor; which cauſed an univerſal joy among the ſoldiery, who, for the moſt part, favoured Otho, and among the courtiers and creatures of Nero, who were paſſionate for a prince ſo reſembling their former. But while Galba was deliberating about the choice, and putting it off from day to day, diſmal tidings were daily brought from Upper Germany; for the legions there, being ſummoned, according to cuſtom, on the calends of January, to take the uſual oath of fidelity to the emperor, had torn his images, broken his ſtatues, and openly declaring, that they would never acknowledge Galba, ſworn allegiance to the Roman ſenate and people. Hereupon the emperor, beſet with anxieties, as not knowing whither the fury of the revolters might tend, and not truſting to the faith of the troops in Rome, applied what to him ſeemed the only remedy, and held a council for declaring a ſucceſſor, to which, beſides Vinius and Laco, he ſummoned Marius Celſus, conſul elect, and Ducennius Geminus, governor of Rome. On this occaſion Vinius promoted anew with great zeal the adoption of Otho, and Ducennius Geminus that of Dolabella, who was nearly related to Galba. But the emperor, preferring the welfare of the public to all other regards, after a ſhort ſpeech concerning his great age, ordered Piſo Licinianus to be ſent for, and, to the great ſurprize of all, named him his ſucceſſor. Piſo was the ſon of Marcus Craſſus and Scribonia, and both by father and mother nobly born, being by his father deſcended fron the celebrated Marcus Licinius Craſſus, who was ſlain in the fatal battle of Carrhæ, and by his mother from Pompey the Great. He was at this time in the thirty-firſt year of his age, and by all highly eſteemed on account of his extraordinary parts;

He adopts Piſo Licinianus.

his

his engaging behaviour, and ſingular modeſty. His gravity, reſembling that of the antient Romans, was, ſays, Tacitus, by thoſe who judged cenſoriouſly, accounted melancholy and auſtere; but that part of his temper, which alarmed the diſcontented, pleaſed the perſon adopting [h]. Suetonius tells us, that Galba had always ſhewn a great eſteem for him, and named him in his laſt will for his heir, before he was raiſed to the empire [i]. Some, however, believed, that he was by Laco prevailed upon to adopt him for his ſucceſſor; for Laco had, unknown to Galba, held private conferences with him at the houſe of Rubellius Plautus, but artfully recommended him to Galba, as one to whom he was an utter ſtranger. Galba, after having declared to him, in the preſence of his friends and counſellors, his deſign of adopting him, and naming him for his ſucceſſor in the empire, is ſaid to have taken him by the hand, and to have ſpoken thus: "Were I as a "private perſon to adopt you for my ſon, glorious even "then would be the adoption to us both, ſince my family would receive new luſtre from the blood of the great "Pompey and of Marcus Craſſus, and yours from that of "the Sulpitian and Lutatian families. I am now a public perſon, called to the empire by the united conſent of "the gods and men; and of this ſovereignty, for which "our anceſtors have often expoſed their lives, I offer you "the poſſeſſion, while you are neither ſeeking nor purſuing "it. To this I am urged only by the love of my country, and "your excellent qualifications. Auguſtus, who would intail "the empire upon his own houſe, in his own houſe ſought "a ſucceſſor. I chuſe out of the common-wealth an heir "to the common-wealth: not that I am reduced to this "choice by any want of relations of my own; but them "I overlook, as well as your relations, becauſe I do not "judge them ſo well qualified for ſo important a charge as "yourſelf. You have a brother, in nobility your equal, "in age your ſuperior, a man worthy of this fortune, did "I not find in you one ſtill more worthy. You have "paſſed your youth without reproach, and ſuch hitherto "has been your courſe of life, that nothing in your con-"duct thus far is ſubject to blame: but you have yet "only had adverſe fortune to contend with. Proſperity is "more

His ſpeech to him on that occaſion.

[h] Tacit. c. 14. Plut. in Galb. [i] Suet. c. 17.

" more enſnaring; it tries the temper of the ſoul, and " expoſes its weakneſſes: calamities we often bear with " patience; but are utterly ſubdued and corrupted by a " flow of felicity. I do not doubt but you will, with " your uſual firmneſs, ſtill retain the ſame integrity, faith
" in friendſhip, candor, and freedom of ſpirit, endow" ments, which, above all others, adorn the mind. But " in others, you will find a different conduct towards you;
" by falſe complaiſance they will endeavour to weaken
" your fortitude, and, by deceitful flattery and ſmoothing
" ſpeeches, poiſon every honeſt affection of your mind; and
" to his own ſordid gain will every particular be wreſting " your honour and good inclinations. You and I, upon " this occaſion, converſe with hearts perfectly ſincere; but " others will make their addreſſes to our fortunes, rather " than to us: and indeed, to reaſon princes into their " duty is a dangerous taſk; but eaſy is the art of flatter" ing any prince whatſoever. Could this immenſe em" pire ſubſiſt without a ſingle ruler, I ſhould glory in re-
" ſigning, glory in being the firſt emperor, who reſigned
" the power of the republic into her own hands; but " ſuch long ſince has been the unhappy ſituation of the " ſtate, that all the good, which my old age allows me " to do the Roman people, is, to leave them a good ſuc-" ceſſor; nor can you, with all your youth, do more for " them, than afford them in yourſelf a benevolent prince.
" Under Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, we were all " the inheritance of one family. That the empire has " begun in me to be elective, is ſome equivalent for our " antient liberty, and the only liberty we are capable of " enjoying. Now, the Julian and Claudian families be" ing extinct, the beſt men, by this way of adoption, will " become the greateſt. To be deſcended from princes is " the effect of chance; but, in the work of adoption, the " judgment is exerciſed; and whenever you want to chuſe,
" the general conſent will direct you to the perſon moſt
" worthy to be choſen. Have always before your eyes
" the example of Nero, who, elated with the glory of his " race and a long genealogy of the Cæſars, was not in rea" lity dethroned by Julius Vindex, the governor of a pro" vince, unprovided with forces, nor by me aſſiſted with " one legion, but by his own cruelty, and infamous de" baucheries; nor was there, till then, any inſtance of " an emperor by public ſentence condemned and depoſed.

" It

" it was my lot to be called to an unſettled ſtate; nor
" muſt you be alarmed, if while the whole world con" tinues in this general uproar, there are two legions " which yet remain unreclaimed to obedience. As to my " old age, the only objection to my government, it is no " longer one, ſince when it comes to be known that I " have adopted you, I ſhall ſeem young in my ſucceſſor.
" Nero will never be regretted by the moſt abandoned " and profligate: to you and me it belongs ſo to govern,
" that he may not alſo be regretted by the good. To
" ſay more in this way of inſtruction, the preſent conjunc-
" ture does not allow me. One certain rule you have to " obſerve, which is, ſo to behave yourſelf towards your " ſubjects, as, were you a ſubject, you would wiſh your " prince to comport himſelf towards you. This rule com-
" prehends the whole art of reigning with juſtice and e" quity; for you muſt remember, that it is not with us
" as with other nations, where a particular family rules " with abſolute ſway, and all beſides are ſlaves; but you are
" to govern a people incapable of complete liberty, and im" patient of abſolute bondage [i]."

Piſo's modeſt behaviour

WHEN Galba had done ſpeaking, Piſo returned him thanks for the extraordinary and unexpected honour conferred on him, addreſſing him, now both his father and emperor, with a ſpeech full of reverence, and, where he mentioned himſelf, full of modeſty. He betrayed no ſymptoms of joy, no change in his countenance, none afterwards in his behaviour, as if he had been inſenſible of ſo mighty a favour; manifeſt indications, ſays Tacitus, that he was more capable of reigning, than deſirous to reign. The next thing that came under debate in the council was, where to declare the adoption, whether to the people aſſembled, to the ſenate, or to the army. The reſult was to do it in the camp; and thither he immediately repaired, tho' that day, the tenth of January, was rendered unuſually terrible by heavy rains, frequent claps of thunder, and inceſſant lightning; which, in antient times, would have proved ſufficient ground for diſſolving public aſſemblies, but were looked upon by Galba, and contemned, as fortuitous and unmeaning. Upon his arrival in the camp, he declared to a full aſſembly of the ſoldiers, with His adoption declared to the ſoldiery.

[i] Tacit. c. 15.

with the brevity becoming an emperor, that he adopted Piſo after the precedent of the deified Auguſtus, according to the cuſtom of the army, where every one chuſes his man. And leſt the revolt of the German legions might, if by him concealed, be thence thought more formidable, he frankly told them, that the fourth legion and the eighteenth, at the inſtigation of ſome few incendiaries, had departed from their duty, but would ſoon return to their allegiance. As no mention was made of the diſtributions uſual on ſuch occaſions, only the ſoldiers who ſtood next to him applauded his ſpeech, and through all the reſt was obſerved a ſullen ſadneſs and ſilence for having thus loſt the donative, which cuſtom and their own inſolent claims had, in ſome degree, rendered neceſſary. Tacitus tells us, that with any liberality however ſmall, Galba might have gained the affections of the ſoldiery; but ſuffered by practiſing, out of ſeaſon, the rigorous purity of antient times, which they were no longer able to bear [k]. From the camp Galba proceeded to the ſenate, where he ſpoke with the ſame brevity and bluntneſs as to the ſoldiery. The ſpeech which Piſo made was better received. In the mean time, Otho, who had been the foremoſt to eſpouſe the cauſe of Galba, had promoted it with vigor, and thence conceived hopes of being adopted and named by him for his ſucceſſor, enraged at his diſappointment, and burning with anger againſt Galba, with envy towards Piſo, determined to make a reſolute effort, while the authority of the one was daily decaying, and that of the other not yet confirmed. Many concurring motives inſpired him with this reſolution. As he had conſumed his fortune in a courſe of riot and expence, and contracted immenſe debts, in the quiet eſtabliſhment of the ſtate he ſaw nothing but deſpair, and only upon public confuſion founded his hopes. Beſides, he looked upon his being thus put by, as a certain ſign of the diſpleaſure and ill-will of Galba towards him, and thence thought reſignation and acquieſcence more threatening, than boldneſs and temerity. His favourite freed-men too and his ſlaves, inured to a licentiouſneſs and riot inconſiſtent with the œconomy of a private family, were to their lord continually diſplaying the alluring advantages attending the ſovereign power, and repreſenting them as his own, if he routed himſelf and made them ſo. The aſtrologers at the ſame time urged

And to the ſenate.

Otho reſolves to attempt the ſovereignty.

[k] Idem, c. 18, 19.

urged him by their predictions, while they were confidently averring, that the ſtars preſaged approaching revolutions and a year of great glory to Otho. Of this tribe Ptolemy was one, who having accompanied Otho into Luſitania, and foretold him that he ſhould ſurvive Nero, had gained mighty credit from the event. Now he perſuaded him, that, if he exerted his might and laid hold of the preſent opportunity, he would certainly attain the accompliſhment of his wiſhes, the ſovereign power. Hereupon Otho, with whom theſe predictions paſſed as uttered by a prophetic ſpirit, and as the propitious warnings of the fates, reſolved to make a bold puſh and try his fortune. The direction of the treaſonable deſign he committed to one of his freed-men, by name Onomaſtus, who introduced to him two men as proper inſtruments in it, Veturius, a ſoldier of the life-guard, and Barbius Proculus, teſſerarius of the ſame band; that is, one whoſe office it was to receive the parole from the tribune in writing, and carry it to the tents of the ſoldiers. Otho, having firſt in a long converſation tried their temper and capacity, and found them to be men of great addreſs and reſolution, imparted to them his deſign, loaded them with mighty preſents, promiſed them more ample rewards, and furniſhed them with vaſt ſums to bribe and debauch the inclinations of as many of the reſt as they were able. Thus two common ſoldiers undertook to transfer the Roman empire from one prince to another, and transferred it effectually. They admitted very few into the ſecret; the minds of the reſt, already uneaſy and wavering, they eſtranged from the emperor by various artifices, eſpecially by filling them with utter deſpair of the donative, which had been promiſed, and ſo often put off. This, ſaid they, is not only defrauding us of our deſerved rewards, but blaſting our expectations for ever, and giving a bad precedent to other emperors, who will not fail to follow an example ſo prejudicial to us, ſo advantageous to themſelves. Rome was at this time filled with troops; Galba had brought with him a Spaniſh legion; the legion, which had been raiſed by Nero, ſtill remained in the city; and beſides theſe forces, there were many from Germany, Britain, and Illyricum, ſuch as had been thence detached by Nero's orders, and ſent forwards to the Caſpian ſtreights, for the war which he meditated againſt the Parthians, but recalled to ſuppreſs the revolt of Vindex in Gaul. Theſe, dreading the ſeverity of diſcipline, which in this reign began to be revived,

Gives credit to an aſtrologer.

Two common ſoldiers undertake to transfer the empire.

revived, were all ready to revolt; and though not combining in favour of any particular, yet prepared for the firſt daring ſpirit. The prætorian guards indeed, tranſported with a fondneſs for Nero, were entirely addicted to Otho, who, they hoped, would recal the licentiouſneſs which they had enjoyed under that prince; nay, ſome of them were ſo impatient to ſee him inveſted with the ſovereign power, that on the fourteenth of January they were prepared, as he returned home from ſupping abroad, to have hurried him away and declared him emperor; only they apprehended, that, during the dark, whoever chanced to be preſented to the German or Pannonian army, might by them, for the moſt part unacquainted with the perſon of Otho, be, inſtead of him, ſaluted emperor. The execution of the deſign was therefore put off till the next day, when Otho early in the morning went to attend the emperor, and was, according to cuſtom, received by him with a kiſs, and admitted to be preſent at a private ſacrifice, which Galba offered in the temple of Apollo. We are told, that Umbricius the ſoothſayer had no ſooner viewed the entrails of the victim, than he warned the emperor of diſmal preſages, of treaſonable plots juſt impending, and a domeſtic foe, all in the hearing of Otho, who ſtood next to him, and, by a different conſtruction, underſtood it all as propitious to himſelf, and a ſucceſsful iſſue foretold of his own machinations. However, he was not a little diſconcerted at the diſcovery, and could not help betraying ſome diſmay and confuſion. But, in the mean time, Onomaſtus his freed-man arriving, acquainted him, that the ſurveyor and builders waited his coming. This was the ſignal before ſettled amongſt them, to intimate that the ſoldiers were aſſembling, and the conſpiracy ripe for execution. He therefore immediately withdrew, feigning to thoſe who aſked him the cauſe of his departure, that he was about purchaſing certain houſes, which being old, and thence ſuſpected to be decayed, it was neceſſary firſt to examine them. Then, leaning on his freed-man, he proceeded through the palace of Tiberius to the Velabrum, and from thence to the gilt pillar by the temple of Saturn, where the ſeveral high-ways in Italy terminated. There he was received by a party of the guards and proclaimed emperor; but as they were not above twenty-three, though his ſoul was not of the ſame ſoft temper and effeminacy with his perſon, but, on the contrary, bold and daring, yet he was ſo diſmayed at the ſmallneſs of their number, that he deſired to retire and drop his deſign. This the ſoldiers would not ſuffer; but putting him in great haſte into a chair, hurried him away with their drawn ſwords. Plutarch tells us, that he preſſed them to make all the haſte they could, crying out, "I am a loſt man." The party that attended him was ſoon joined by much the like number of ſoldiers, and theſe, in their progreſs to the camp, were followed by others, who came in, three and four at a time, till at laſt they made up a conſiderable body. Upon their arrival at the camp, Julius Martialis the tribune, who that day commanded the main guard, ſuffered them to enter, either overcome with ſurprize at ſo daring an undertaking, or privy to the conſpiracy, or elſe believing the camp to be generally infected, and that it was in vain to reſiſt. In the camp they met with no oppoſition, thoſe who were not privy to the deſign being encompaſſed by ſuch as were; ſo that ſome out of fear, others by choice, joined the revolters, and at laſt all with one voice ſaluted Otho emperor and Cæſar [i].

Galba is warned of a treaſonable plot.

Otho is ſaluted emperor by a ſmall party of the guards

was

And carried to the camp.

In the mean time, Galba, utterly unacquainted with the revolution, was ſtill bent upon the ſacrifice, and tiring, ſays Tacitus, with his ſupplications, the guardian gods of the empire, already under the ſway of another head. News was firſt brought him, that a ſenator, it was uncertain who, was by a party of the guards hurried away to the camp, there to be preſented to the ſoldiery; and ſoon after word was brought, that Otho was the ſenator thus hurried thither. Inſtantly from all parts of the city people crouded to Galba with the ſame tidings, each relating them his own way. Some exaggerated every thing beyond meaſure; others, not laying aſide, even at ſo deſperate a juncture, their wonted flattery, ſoothed him with relations far ſhort of facts. In this ſudden alarm Galba haſtily ſummoned his friends, and in a conſultation held with them it was reſolved, that the temper of the cohort then upon duty in the palace ſhould firſt of all be ſounded, not by Galba in perſon, whoſe authority was reſerved as the laſt remedy upon the higheſt emergency, but by Piſo; who having cauſed them to be aſſembled at the foot of the ſtairs of the palace, exhorted them with great elo-

Meaſures taken by Galba to ſuppreſs the revolt.

[i] Plut. ibid. Suet. in Oth. c. 6. Tacit. c. 23—28.

quence and energy, to continue ſteady in their allegiance, diſplayed the vices and debaucheries of Otho, and aſſured them, that they ſhould receive from Galba and him as large a donative for their fidelity preſerved, as was offered them by Otho for dipping their hands in the blood of their ſovereign. When he had ended his ſpeech, ſome of the cohort ſtole away; but the major part diſplayed their enſigns, and prepared their arms to defend their emperor. Celſus Marius was immediately ſent to ſecure the troops that had been detached from the army in Illyricum, and were then poſted in the Vipſanian porch. To Amulius Serenus and Domitius Sabinus, centurions of the firſt rank, orders were given to bring away from the court of the temple of Liberty the band of German ſoldiers there. To the camp of the prætorian guards repaired the tribunes Cerius Severus, Subrius Dexter, and Pompeius Longinus, to try, whether, by reaſon and exhortations, the mutiny, then in its infancy, might not be quelled and obedience reſtored. Two of theſe tribunes the ſoldiers only terrified with threats, but laid violent hands on Longinus, ſtripped him of his arms, and ignominiouſly drove him out of the camp, he being, above the reſt, obnoxious to them, on account of his known fidelity and invincible attachment to Galba. The band detached from the Illyrian army drove Celſus from amongſt them with flights of darts. The ſecond legion of marines, eager to revenge the blood of their brethren, maſſacred by Galba on his firſt entry as emperor into Rome, joined, without heſitation, the prætorian bands. The German troops continued a great while wavering and irreſolute, being in their bodies ſtill feeble, (for they were lately returned from Alexandria ſickly and fatigued) and in their minds entirely peaceable, and rather inclined to Galba, out of gratitude for the care he was taking to cheriſh and reſtore them [k]. Suetonius tells us, that they immediately haſtened to the aſſiſtance of Galba; but not being acquainted with the ſtreets, they miſtook their way and came too late [l]. Galba, in the mean time, was held in ſuſpenſe between two different counſels. Vinius was of opinion, that the emperor ſhould remain in the palace, arm his ſlaves in his defence, fortify the avenues, and by no means iſſue forth amongſt men mad with rage. All the reſt alledged the neceſſity of diſpatch

The troops refuſe to obey the officers ſent to them.

Galba is in ſuſpenſe what to do.

[k] Idem, c. 31, 32.

[l] Suet. in Galb. c. 20.

diſpatch and inſtant meaſures, before the conſpiracy of a few, yet weak and unſupported, had gathered ſtrength and numbers. Galba yielded to the advice of the latter, their counſels appearing to him more plauſible. Piſo, however, was ſent away before to the camp, as a young man of great fame and reputation, and one who was generally looked upon as an enemy to the hated miniſter Titus Vinius. Scarce had he left the palace, when it was rumoured about, that Otho was ſlain in the camp; and ſoon after there appeared perſons who averred, that they themſelves had been upon the ſpot when the traitor was killed, and beheld his dead body extended on the ground. It was by many conjectured, that this rumour was firſt framed, and afterwards heightened, by the partizans of Otho, with no other view, but to entice Galba from his retirement. However that be, upon this occaſion, not only the ſimple and thoughtleſs vulgar broke out into loud ſhouts and extravagant demonſtrations of zeal; but the greater part of the Roman knights and ſenators, now deveſted of their fears, and therefore void of caution and reſerve, forced the gates of the palace; and ruſhing in, preſented themſelves before Galba, complaining, that the vengeance, by them meditated in his behalf, was now ſnatched out of their hands. The moſt cowardly, ſuch as had not courage enough to face the leaſt danger, as the event well proved, were at this juncture profuſe of words and boaſts, and in tongue valiant and daring. No man knew the fact, and all averred it; ſo that Galba deprived of true information, put on a breaſt-plate; and finding himſelf unable, through age and infirmities, to ſuſtain the preſſing crowd, he was put into a chair. Before he left the palace, Julius Atticus, one of the guards, preſſing through the croud, preſented himſelf before the emperor, and diſplaying a ſword all over bloody, declared with a loud voice, that by his hand Otho had been ſlain. Galba returned no other anſwer, than, Fellow ſoldier, whoſe orders hadſt thou? Such was his firmneſs in reſtraining the licentious inſolence of the ſoldiery, without being diſmayed by menaces, or corrupted with the moſt ſoothing flattery [m].

Receives falſe information from the crowd.

And from Julius Atticus.

In the mean time they had to a man declared for Otho in the camp; and placing him amidſt the enſigns upon that very tribunal, where a little before ſtood the golden ſtatue of [m] Tacit. c. 35.

The revolt of the ſoldiery for Otho.

Galba, encompaſſed him round with banners diſplayed. The common ſoldiers refuſed to the tribunes and centurions acceſs to his perſon; nay, they gave him caution to beware of all who were in command or authority among them. Firſt the prætorian guards, and then the legion of marines, unanimouſly ſwore allegiance to him, and with loud ſhouts, ſaluted him emperor, Cæſar, and Auguſtus. After this, Otho, now confiding in his ſtrength, inflamed them with a long ſpeech, filled with bitter invectives againſt Galba and his favourites; and then ordered the common armoury to be thrown open, whence arms were inſtantly ſnatched at random, without any regard to the cuſtom of war, or the different orders and ranks of men. Galba, in the mean time, having left the palace, was approaching the forum, when he was overtaken by Piſo, who hearing the cries of the rebellious ſoldiery reſounding quite to the city, had thought it adviſeable not to proceed to the camp. At the ſame time, Celſus Marius, who had been ſent to the Illyrian army, returned with a melancholy account. In this conjuncture, ſome adviſed Galba to retire back to the palace; others propoſed ſeizing the capitol; and ſeveral were taking poſſeſſion of the place where the people uſed to aſſemble. In this conteſt, as in a ſtorm, Galba's chair was borne, ſometimes one way and ſometimes another, according to the different movement and fluctuation of the multitude; when on a ſudden appeared firſt a party of horſe, and then a body of foot, ruſhing furiouſly into the forum. At this ſight, the ſtandard-bearer to the cohort, which had remained with Galba, rent from his ſtandard the effigies of the emperor, and daſhed it againſt the ground. Upon this ſignal, the whole cohort abandoned him, and joined the detachments from the camp. Hereupon, thoſe who carried Galba, ſeized with dread and trembling, flung him from the chair proſtrate upon the ground, and there left him to the mercy of his enemies. His laſt words are differently reported, as he was hated by ſome, or admired by others. By ſeveral it was ſpread abroad, that he aſked in the ſtyle of a ſuppliant, What evil he had merited? and begged time, only for a few days, to diſcharge the donative, which had been promiſed in his name. But moſt agree, that of his own accord he preſented his throat to the aſſaſſins, bidding them ſtrike abſolutely, if the good of the commonwealth ſo required. Of the very perſon, who gave him the mortal blow, we have no clear account. Some hold it to have been one Terentius, Galba abandoned by all.

He is murdered.

rentius, an evocatus, or reſumed veteran; others one Lecanius. The more current tradition in Tacitus's time was, that Camurius, a common ſoldier of the fifteenth legion, cut his throat with his ſword. The reſt hackled and mangled in a terrible manner, his legs and arms (for his breaſt was covered with armour); nay, they were tranſported with a ſpirit ſo brutal and inhuman, that even after they had cut off his head, they ſatiated their rage by diſfiguring with numberleſs wounds his lifeleſs body. Upon Titus Vinius they next diſcharged their rage. Some writers tell us, that through fear he was quite bereft of ſpeech; others, that with a loud voice he cried out, they had no ſuch orders from Otho; whence they conclude, that he was privy to the conſpiracy, and had embarqued in that treaſon, for which he had adminiſtered cauſe. Before the temple of Julius Cæſar, he was wounded in the knee; and preſently after, by one Julius Carus, a legionary, pierced quite through the body. Among the many perſons who had firſt made boaſt of their inviolable faith and attachment to their ſovereign, one was found who performed what he had promiſed. This was Sempronius Denſus, centurion of a prætorian cohort, and by Galba appointed to guard the perſon of Piſo. He had not received any particular favour of Galba; but only from a principle of honour, and in compliance with the oath he had taken, he placed himſelf before the emperor's chair, commanding thoſe who were advancing againſt him, to ſpare the emperor. As they ſtill advanced, he threw away the vine branch, which he held in his hand as the badge of his office; and drawing his ſword, ſingly encountered them all, boldly upbraiding them as deteſtable parricides; inſomuch that, partly by his blows, partly by his reproaches, he drew upon himſelf the ſwords of the aſſaſſins; and tho' he could not ſave the emperor, yet procured to Piſo, who was already wounded, opportunity to retire. He was himſelf killed; but Piſo eſcaped to the temple of Veſta, where he was by a bondman of the ſtate received through compaſſion and concealed in his chamber; which Otho no ſooner knew, than he diſpatched Sulpitius Florus, belonging to the Britiſh bands, a man juſt before preſented by Galba with the priviledge of a Roman citizen, and Statius Murcus, one of his guards, with orders to diſpatch Piſo. By them therefore Piſo was dragged forth, and butchered near the gate of the temple. His head was immediately cut off and carried carried to Otho, who beheld it with unſpeakable joy, thinking himſelf now relieved from all fear and perplexity. The bleeding heads of the emperor and his adopted ſon were ſtuck upon long poles, and thus carried along amidſt the banners of the military bands, cloſe by the eagle of a legion. Many, who had not the leaſt ſhare in the murder either of Galba or Piſo, diſplayed their ſwords and hands all embrued with blood, and demanded of the new emperor a gratuity. Tacitus and Plutarch tell us, that above an hundred and twenty petitions of this nature, preſented in one day to Otho, fell afterwards into the hands of Vitellius, who commanded ſearch to be made after the authors, and puniſhed them all with death, not from any tenderneſs for Galba, but out of policy, looking upon their puniſhment as a wholeſome method of ſecuring himſelf againſt ſuch traitors [n].

With Titus Vinius.

The fidelity and bravery of Sempronius Denſus.

Piſo murdered.

The ſenate and people flatter the new emperor.

The news of Galba's death was no ſooner divulged, than the ſenate, the Roman knights, and the people earneſtly crowded to the camp, ſtriving to out-run each other, and to overtake and paſs ſuch as were before them. To a man they condemned the conduct of Galba, magnified the judgment and choice of the ſoldiery, kiſſed the hands of Otho; and the more counterfeit their indications of zeal were, the more loud were their proteſtations. The ſenate, as if they were not the ſame men, ſays Plutarch, or had other gods to ſwear by, took the ſame oath to Otho, which Otho had not long before taken to Galba, and had juſt then violated. The new emperor received all who preſented themſelves to him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, and at the ſame time endeavoured to pacify the ſoldiery, breathing menaces and ravage. They demanded, that Manius Celſus, conſul elect, and a faithful friend to Galba even in his laſt diſtreſs, might be inſtantly put to death. They hated him on account of his integrity and unſhaken fidelity; but what they chiefly aimed at was, to have their hands let looſe to general pillage and maſſacre, and to deſtroy every worthy and able man in the Roman ſtate. But, as Otho had not ſufficient authority to check the fury of the licentious ſoldiery, he perſonated great wrath againſt Celſus, ordered him to be put in irons;

[n] Tacit. c. 38——42. Plut. ibid.

irons, as if he reſerved him for ſome more ſevere puniſhment; and by that means redeemed him from a violent death juſt impending. From this moment all things were tranſacted by the arbitrary will of the ſoldiers. By them were choſen the captains of the prætorian guards, namely Plotius Primus, once a common ſoldier, thence preferred to command the watch, and during the reign of Galba, a chief man among the partizans of Otho; and with Plotius they joined Licinius Proculus, one in high confidence with Otho, and thought to have been employed by him to promote his intrigues. To the government of Rome they advanced Flavius Sabinus, partly in deference to the judgment of Nero, in whoſe reign he had adminiſtered the ſame office, and partly out of regard to his brother Veſpaſian. They then demanded, that the fees, wont to be by them paid to their centurions, for exemption from certain military burdens, ſhould be utterly aboliſhed; for under this name every ſoldier paid, as it were, an annual tribute. Hence the fourth part of a legion uſed to be abſent at once, roaming like vagrants up and down the countries, where they were quartered, and robbing and plundering, in order to raiſe money wherewithal to purchaſe a diſpenſation from military toils. As moſt of the ſoldiers were debauched by ſuch wild immunity, and reduced to beggary by the fees they paid for it, they were always ready to run headlong into ſedition, diſſenſion, and civil wars. Otho, therefore, readily granted them their requeſt: but that he might not eſtrange from him the affections of the centurions, he undertook to pay out of his own revenue the fees for ſuch exemptions and furlongs, when they were judged neceſſary; a regulation, which, by his ſucceſſors, was perpetuated as part of the military eſtabliſhment. In the cloſe of the day, Laco, captain of the guards to Galba, was ſeized, and ſoon after by Otho condemned to an iſland, where, by his orders, he was murdered by a veteran, whom the emperor had ſent before him for that purpoſe. Icelus, as he was only a manumiſed ſlave, was publicly executed. The day, thus ſpent in black and tragical iniquities, was concluded with public rejoicings. The next day, the city prætor aſſembled the ſenate, when to Otho were decreed the tribunitial authority, the title of Auguſtus, and all the honours enjoyed by other emperors. From the ſenate, the new emperor was carried in a kind of triumph croſs the Otho ſaves Celſus.

The ſoldiery act arbitrarily.

Otho ſuppreſſes the fees paid by the the ſoldiers to their centurions.

Laco and Icelus put to death.

Otho acknowledged by the ſenate.

the forum, ſtill flowing with blood, and over heaps of dead bodies to the capitol, and thence to the palace, where at length he granted leave to burn and bury the ſlain. The remains of Piſo were, by his wife Verania and his brother Scribonianus, committed to the grave, as were thoſe of Titus Vinius by his daughter Criſpina, after they had found out and redeemed, at a great price, their heads, which their murderers had retained, in order to ſell them to their relations. The body of Galba, after it had lain long neglected in the ſtreets, and ſuffered during the licentiouſneſs of the night, inſults without number, was, by Argius one of his principal bondmen, bearing the office of ſteward, depoſited in a mean grave within his own gardens. His head, miſerably mangled and ſtuck upon a pole by the vile rabble attending the camp, was then ſet up before the tomb of Patrobius, a freed-man of Nero, whom Galba had cauſed to be executed. Here it was found the day following, and laid with the remains of his body, which had been already burnt [o]. Such was the end of Galba, after he had lived ſeventy-two years and twenty-three days, and reigned, from the time he declared againſt Nero, nine months and thirteen days, but from that prince's death only ſeven months and as many days. He had paſſed through the reigns of five emperors, much happier under the ſovereignty of other princes, than his own. He had but moderate talents, and was, according to Tacitus, rather free from vices, than endowed with many virtues. He had commanded with great reputation in the German wars, afterwards governed Africa, as proconſul, with moderation and gentleneſs, and, in the latter part of his life, ruled with the ſame equity and juſtice the Hither Spain. He would, to uſe the expreſſion of our hiſtorian, in the opinion of all men, have paſſed as one capable of the empire, had he never been emperor; not that his being advanced to that high ſtation cauſed any alteration in him, but becauſe he ſuffered himſelf to be blindly governed and controuled by his freed-men and miniſters; men who were continually proſtituting the credit and character of their maſter, to their own vile gains and wicked paſſions. Had he been bleſſed with good counſellors, he would, in all probability, have proved an excellent prince. He was temperate, frugal, free from ambition, an enemy to the inſolence of the ſoldiery, and wiſhed wiſhed well to the commonwealth. But what availed his good qualities? He himſelf robbed no man; but his ſervants and miniſters ſet no bounds to their rapines; and he, who ought not to have employed bad men, or at leaſt ought to have reſtrained and puniſhed them, was blind to all their iniquities. As he never enquired into their behaviour, nor blamed it, they never mended it, nor feared him. The ſad fate, which their corruption and his own indolence brought upon him, is a ſufficient warning to princes, either never to truſt implicitly to the advice and conduct of any miniſters, or at leaſt to be well aſſured, that they are ſuch, if ſuch are to be found, as may be implicitly truſted.

Galba's body buried.

His character.

[o] Tacit. c. 47, 48. Plut. ibid. Suet. c. 20.

OTHO, now honoured by the ſenate with the title of Cæſar and Auguſtus, took upon him the conſulſhip, having for his collegue his brother Salvius Titianus; but reſigned the faſces on the firſt of March to Verginius Rufus, as his brother did to Poppæus Vopiſcus. The new emperor had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the ſovereignty, when he was alarmed with diſmal tidings concerning Vitellius; tidings, which, before the murder of Galba, had been ſuppreſſed, with a deſign to have it believed, that only the army in Upper Germany had revolted. Vitellius, as we have related above, had been by Galba preferred to the command of the legions in Lower Germany, which he had entered about the beginning of December in the preceding year, and with great care viſited the winter quarters of the legions there. To their ranks he reſtored numbers who had been degraded; many he redeemed from ignominious puniſhments; and cancelled the marks of ignominy inflicted upon others. Having by this means gained the affections of the ſoldiery, Fabius Valens, who commanded a legion under him and was highly diſguſted with Galba, who, he thought, had not rewarded him according to his deſerts, ſolicited his new general to aſſume the ſovereignty, magnifying to him the zeal and ardour of the ſoldiery, by whom he was no leſs beloved, than Galba hated. By his ſpeech Vitellius was, ſays Tacitus, excited to covet the ſovereignty, rather than to hope for it. In Upper Germany, Alienus Cæcina, who commanded a legion there, had entirely captivated the affections of the ſoldiers by his graceful perſon and engaging behaviour. He exerciſed the office of quæſtor in the province of Spain called Bœtica, when Galba revolted, whom he immediately joined, and was thence by him preferred to the command of a legion.

Vitellius is excited to take upon him the ſovereignty by Valens.

gion. But Galba, having ſoon after diſcovered, that he had embezzled the public treaſure, ordered him to be proſecuted. Cæcina, reſenting this, did all that lay in his power to ſtir up the troops to a revolt, hoping, by an univerſal confuſion, to eſcape the puniſhment due to his crime. Neither in the army itſelf were there wanting ſeeds of tumult and diſcord: for they had all to a man been engaged in the war againſt Vindex; nor could they be induced to acknowledge Galba, till after Nero was ſlain. Hence a report was maliciouſly raiſed among them, and raſhly believed, that the legions were to be decimated, and the centurions, for the moſt part, caſhiered. The cities of Treves and Langres, which lay contiguous to the winter quarters of the legions, and had been by Galba deprived of great part of their territories, were more inflamed againſt him than the legions themſelves; and therefore aſſured them by their deputies, that they were ripe for an inſurrection, and ready to join them, as ſoon as they declared againſt Galba. On the firſt of January, when the legions were, according to cuſtom, to ſwear allegiance to the emperor, they refuſed the oath, tore the images of Galba, and declared, that they acknowledged no other ſovereign, but the ſenate and people of Rome; not one tribune or commander daring to exert himſelf in behalf of the emperor, or offering to harangue the multitude from a tribunal. It is true, Hordeonius Flaccus, commander in chief, was upon the ſpot; but had not courage enough either to reſtrain ſuch as were already ruſhing into rebellion, or to recover ſuch as were only wavering, or even to rouze and animate thoſe who ſtill continued ſteady and faithful to Galba. Four centurions, viz. Nonius Receptus, Donatus Valens, Romilius Marcellus, and Calpurnius Repentinus, all belonging to the eighteenth legion, would have protected the images of Galba, but were by the furious multitude ſeized and confined in chains. Further than this, none of them ſhewed the leaſt regard to their duty, or their former oaths: but it happened in this as in other inſurrections, whither the greater part led, the reſt blindly followed. The following night, the eagle-bearer of the fourth legion haſtening to Cologn, where Vitellius then reſided, acquainted him with what had paſſed, and exhorted him to lay hold of the preſent opportunity. Hereupon meſſengers were by Vitellius forthwith diſpatched to acquaint the troops under his command, that the army in

The troops in Upper Germany inclined to a revolt.

Refuſe the oath to Galba.

Vitellius proclaimed emperor.

in Upper Germany had revolted from Galba; ſo that they muſt either make war upon the revolters, or, if they preferred peace and tranquillity, join with them and create an emperor: at the ſame time, he deſired them to conſider, that, with much leſs danger, they might elect a prince at once, than continue in ſearch of one. The winter quarters of the firſt legion lay neareſt, and with it Fabius Valens, who entering Cologn the very next day, accompanied with the cavalry of his legion and a body of auxiliaries, openly ſaluted Vitellius emperor, and led him in a kind of triumph through the principal and moſt frequented ſtreets in the town. His example was immediately followed, with great competition, by all the legions of the ſame province. The army in Upper Germany no ſooner heard, that Vitellius had been ſaluted emperor by the troops under his command, than relinquiſhing the plauſible names of the ſenate and people of Rome, they acceded to the party of Vitellius. This happened on the third of January; whence it is evident, ſays Tacitus, that they had been no-ways attached to, or concerned about, the free Roman ſtate the two days before. The zeal of the inhabitants of Cologn, Treves, and Langres was equal to that of the legions; they all offered, with great ardour, ſupplies of men, horſes, and money, each according to the meaſure of his power and ſufficiency. Neither was ſuch liberality confined to the leading men of thoſe colonies; but the common people too ſignalized their zeal for Vitellius, in ſurrendering, inſtead of money, of which they were deſtitue, their girdles, the trappings of their horſes, the ſilver ornaments upon their armour, &c. not doubting, but they ſhould, in due time, be amply rewarded for their ſeaſonable generoſity; for, while Vitellius was giving away his own fortune and laviſhing in bounties that of others, without meaſure or diſcernment, they beſtowed, as Tacitus obſerves, upon this extravagance the title of liberality and good-nature [p].

The zeal of the people in his behalf.

And now Vitellius, truſting to his ſtrength and the zeal of the ſoldiery, began to act as ſovereign, and diſpoſed of ſeveral employments, which had hitherto been adminiſtered by the imperial freed-men, but were by him conferred upon Roman knights. At the ſame time, to gain the

He begins to exercise the ſovereign power.

[p] Tacit. c. 56, 57. Plut. in Galb. Suet. in vit. c. 8.

the affection of the ſoldiery, he ordered the fees exacted from them by the centurions, for exemptions from duty, to be paid out of his own treaſure as emperor. He could not help humouring, in many inſtances, the revengeful temper of the ſoldiers, demanding the execution of particulars: however, in ſome inſtances, he defeated it under colour of committing the obnoxious perſons to priſon.

Several perſons put to death at the requeſt of the ſoldiery.

Pompeius Propinquus, governor of Belgic Gaul, who had acquainted Galba with the commotions begun in Germany, was immediately put to death; but Julius Burdo, commander of the naval forces in Germany, was, by Vitellius's orders, ſecured in priſon, and afterwards diſcharged, when the rage of the ſoldiery began to abate. They ſuſpected, that he had firſt enticed Fonteius Capito, of whom we have ſpoken above, to revolt, and then betrayed him: hence againſt him chiefly the fury of the army raged; but Vitellius, who had a particular value for him, ſaved him by deceiving them; and indeed there was no other means of protecting and ſhewing mercy. Criſpinus, the centurion, by whom Fonteius Capito had been put to death, was publicly executed, and with him Nonius, Donatus, Romilius, and Calpurnius, the four centurions lately mentioned; men condemned for adhering to their faith and duty; a crime ever thought moſt heinous by ſuch as have renounced both [q].

UPON the news of the revolt of the armies in Germany, Valerius Aſiaticus, governor of Belgic Gaul, declared for Vitellius: his example was followed by Junius Blæſus, governor of Gallia Lugdunenſis, or that part of Gaul which took its name from the city of Lions, and by an Italian legion and a body of horſe quartered at Lions. The forces in Rhœtia and thoſe in Britain went likewiſe, without heſitation, over to his ſide. Vitellius, now become, by the acceſſion of ſo many armies, mighty both in forces and treaſure, appointed two generals to conduct the war, and to each aſſigned a different rout. To Fabius Valens, Orders his troops to march to Italy.

he gave orders to croſs Gaul, and in his march endeavour to gain over the natives to his party; but if he could not prevail upon them to join, to over-run and pillage their country, and then make an irruption into Italy, by that part of the Alps which was called Cottian, and is now known by the name of mount Cenis. Cæcina was ordered

[q] Tacit. c. 57—59.

ed to advance thither by a nearer way, and to pass over the mountains called Penini, now the Great St. Bernard. Valens had under his command the flower of the army of Lower Germany, to the number of forty thousand fighting men. From Upper Germany, Cæcina led thirty thousand. Vitellius was to follow, with a numerous body of German troops, to support the whole weight of the war. But while the soldiers were urgent for action, and eager to begin their march, notwithstanding the rigor of the winter season, the general was passing his time in voluptuous sloth, in revels, and banquets. By the middle of the day, he was always intoxicated with wine, and so gorged with feasting, that he was not capable of giving any directions. But such was the zeal and ardour of the soldiers, that of themselves they supplied all the duties of the leader, as effectually as if he had attended in person. As soon as they were drawn out and armed, they demanded with eagerness, that the signal might be given for marching. We are told, that on the very day the army under the command of Valens began their march, an eagle, measuring his motion by that of the troops, glided gently along, and flew just before them, as if he shewed them the way, without being frighted with the joyful shouts uttered by the soldiery, who thence concluded, that the enterprize would prove successful. They advanced with assurance to the territories of Treves, as to those of a friendly state. But at Dividurum, now Metz, tho' they were there received in a very friendly manner, they were seized with a sudden panic, ran to their arms, and would have put the inhabitants, all to a man, to the sword, without the least provocation, had not their general, with much ado, restrained their fury, and by entreaties prevailed upon them to forbear pursuing the utter destruction of the unoffending city. There were slaughtered, however, not for the sake of pillage or spoil, but from fury and madness, near four thousand persons. The rest of Gaul was so alarmed with the news of this slaughter, that thenceforward, as the army approached any city, the inhabitants crowded out to meet them, accompanied with their magistrates in the attire of suppliants, and readily supplied them with all manner of provisions. In the capital of the Leucians, that is, in the city of Toul, Fabius received tidings of the murder of Galba, and that the sovereignty was devolved upon Otho. This news did not affect the soldiers, for they were only intent upon war: as for the Gauls they bore equal hatred to Otho and Vitellius; but as they were poſſeſſed with dread of the latter, they declared for him. From Toul, the army advanced to Langres, a city entirely attached to the party of Vitellius, and were there kindly received. The inhabitants of Autun ſupplied them out of fear (for they hated Vitellius) with money, arms, and proviſions. What the city of Langres had done out of fear, that of Lions did through joy; for Galba had loaded them with taxes, deprived them of part of their territories, and converted to his own exchequer the revenues of their ſtate. As animoſities had been long ſubſiſting between the people of Lions and thoſe of Vienne, Valens, at the inſtigation of the former, marched againſt the latter, under pretence that they had aided the conſpiracy and attempts of Vindex, and had lately levied troops for the ſupport of Galba. But the people of Vienne gained over Valens with an immenſe ſum, and a donative to the ſoldiery of three hundred ſeſterces a man. They were commanded, however, to ſurrender the arms belonging to the ſtate, and to ſupply the ſoldiers with proviſions. From thence, in a ſlow progreſs, the army was led through the territories of the Allobroges and Vocontii; the general, upon every march which he made, upon every ſhifting of his camp, ſtriking infamous bargains with the proprietors of the ſeveral lands, and the magiſtrates of the ſeveral cities, for the favour and exemptions. This he did with ſuch open menaces, that he ordered Lucus, a municipal town of the Vocontii, to be ſet on fire, becauſe they ſhewed ſome reluctance to pay the ſum he had required. Lucus was, in former times, one of the chief cities, of the Vocontii, or Dauphiné, but has been long ſince utterly deſtroyed. Marching in this manner, Valens arrived at length at the Alps. Tacitus obſerves, that he had been long ſordidly poor, but by this march became ſuddenly rich, and abandoned himſelf, as his appetites had been whetted by a long courſe of penury, to all manner of riot and exceſſes[r].

The march of Valens through Gaul.

He arrives at the Alps.

Cæcina commits great devaſtations in the country of the Helvetii.

On the other hand, Cæcina rioted in greater ſpoil and more blood. The Helvetians, not appriſed of the tragical end of Galba, refuſed to own the ſovereignty of Vitellius. Hereupon Cæcina, who longed paſſionately for a pre-

tence

[r] Tacit. c. 60——67.

ence to plunder their country, inſtantly decamped, and entering their territories in an hoſtile manner, ravaged their fields, ſacked their cities, and made a dreadful havock of the unhappy inhabitants: many thouſands were cut off, and great numbers made priſoners, and ſold for ſlaves; for the Helvetians, once renowed for their valour and experience in war, were at this time only famous for the reputation which they had formerly acquired: they were fierce and daring, ſays our hiſtorian, while danger was at a diſtance, but ſtruck with terror when it arrived. As the army, after having committed univerſal ravage and ſpoil, was marching in order of battle to Aventicum, the metropolis of the country, deputies from thence were diſpatched to offer a ſurrender of the city, which was accepted. Julius Alpinus, a leading man among the Helvetians, was, by Cæcina's orders, put to death; the fate of the reſt was referred to the judgment of Vitellius, who, moved with the tears and entreaties of Claudius Coſſus, their deputy, a man of great eloquence and addreſs, granted to all pardon and ſecurity [s]. While Cæcina was waiting in the country of the Helvetians, till he had learnt the pleaſure of Vitellius, and preparing at the ſame time to paſs the Alps, he received joyful tidings from Italy, that the ſquadron of horſe named Syllana, and then encamped on the banks of the Po, had declared for Vitellius. They had ſerved under him in Africa, when he was proconſul there; had been recalled from thence by Nero, in order to be ſent forward into Egypt; and, upon the inſurrection of Vindex, detained in Italy. As the officers were unacquainted with Otho, and engaged by obligations to Vitellius, they eaſily prevailed upon their men, by magnifying to them the great ſtrength of the approaching legions and renown of the German armies, to go over to the ſame party, and ſwear fealty to Vitellius. With themſelves, as a preſent to their new prince, they brought into his intereſt the ſtrongeſt municipal cities beyond the Po, viz. Milan, Novara, Jurea, and Vercelli. As ſuch an extenſive country could not be guarded by a ſingle band of cavalry, Cæcina, who had this information directly from themſelves, diſpatched thither forthwith the ſeveral cohorts of Gauls, Luſitanians, and Britons, with a body of German troops, and the ſquadron of horſe called called Taurina. As for himſelf, he was ſome time in ſuſpenſe, whether it were not adviſable to bend his march over the mountains of Rhœtia towards Noricum, againſt Petronius, governor of that province, who, having on all hands raiſed forces, and broken down the bridges over the rivers, was ſuſpected to act for Otho. But fearing he might loſe the detachments already ſent forward, and reflecting, that where-ever the deciſive battle was fought, Noricum would certainly prove one of the acquiſitions following a general victory, he ordered his ſoldiers lightly armed to take their rout over the Apennine, and led himſelf the heavy body of legionaries over the Alps, ſtill covered with ſnow [t].

A ſquadron of horſe revolts to Vitellius, and brings over ſeveral cities to the ſame party.

[s] Idem, c. 68, 69.

He paſſes the Alps.

Rome in great conſternation.

The arrival of theſe troops in Italy, filled Rome with conſternation. Not only the ſenate and equeſtrian order, who had ſome ſhare in the adminiſtration and ſome concern for the public welfare, but even the populace, loudly complained, that two men, of all the moſt infamous for effeminacy, profuſion, and debauchery, were thus fatally choſen, as it were on purpoſe to rend and deſtroy the empire. They thought their vows for either would be alike deteſtable, their ſupplications alike impious, ſince ſuch men they both were, that whoſoever of the two proved the conqueror, would thence prove the worſt. In the mean time, Otho, tho' hitherto entirely abandoned to his pleaſures, was not at this juncture lulled aſleep by them; but, ſuſpending his voluptuous ſallies and artfully diſſembling his paſſion for luxury, conducted all things ſuitably to the dignity of the empire. In order to gain the affections of the people, who ſuſpected his virtues to be aſſumed, and apprehended a return of his vices, he cauſed Celſus Marius, conſul elect, to be brought before him in the capitol. He had already reſcued him, as we have related above, from the cruelty of the ſoldiers, under colour of committing him to priſon; and now aimed to obtain the character of tenderneſs and clemency, by mercy ſhewn to a man ſo illuſtrious, ſo beloved by the Roman people, and ſo odious to all the partizans of Otho's cauſe. Celſus, when he appeared, confeſſed, without betraying the leaſt fear, the imputed crime of having perſevered ſteady in his allegiance to Galba; he even appealed to Otho, whether he ought not to approve ſuch an example of fidelity. Otho commended his his ſteadineſs, and, in a very obliging manner, deſired him rather to forget his confinement, than remember his releaſe. Neither did he treat him as a criminal pardoned, but forthwith admitted him amongſt his moſt intimate friends, and preſently after choſe him one of his generals for conducting the war. The ſaving of Celſus cauſed an univerſal joy amongſt men of rank, was applauded with loud acclamations to the populace, and was not ill received even by the ſoldiers, who now admired in him the ſame virtue, againſt which they had, in the height of their fury, been ſo much incenſed [u]. The public joy for the deliverance of Celſus was greatly heightened by the doom of Tigellinus. He had been the chief author of all the enormities committed by Nero, whom he had afterwards betrayed and abandoned; and was therefore abhorred by thoſe who loved, and thoſe who hated, Nero. While Galba reigned, he was protected as we have related above, by the power and authority of Titus Vinius: hence the people were the more inflamed againſt him, their old deteſtation of Tigellinus concurring with their recent hatred to Vinius. From every quarter of the city they now flocked to the forum and the palace, and filled with their multitudes the circus and the ſeveral theatres, demanding, with bold and ſeditious words, the execution of Tigellinus, till at length the fatal injunction to die was diſpatched to him, then at the baths of Sinueſſa. There, amidſt an herd of harlots, after many paſſionate embraces and unmanly delays, he at laſt cut his throat with a razor [w].

Otho ſtrives to gain the affections of the people.

[t] Idem, c. 71.

He pardons Celſus Marius.

Tigellinus is ordered to put himſelf to death.

While the forces of Vitellius were yet on their march to Italy, Otho, with frequent meſſengers and private letters, ſtrove to divert his competitor from engaging in a war which might prove fatal to both. He offered him immenſe ſums, and ſuch a place of retirement as he himſelf ſhould chuſe to live in, agreeable to his profuſe life and taſte; nay, he engaged to take him for his partner in the empire, and to marry his daughter. With the ſame or the like offers Vitellius tempted Otho; ſo that they ſoon proceeded to reproaches, upbraiding each other with their debaucheries and profligate lives; nor in this did either bring a falſe charge againſt the other. Otho, having recalled the embaſſadors ſent by Galba to the armies in Frequent meſſengers and letters between Otho and Vitellius.

[u] Idem, c. 71. Dio, l. lxiv. p. 731. [w] Idem, c. 72.

Germany, diſpatched others in their room in the plauſible name of the ſenate; but the embaſſadors continued with Vitellius. As for the prætorian guards, who, by the appointment of Otho, accompanied them, Vitellius obliged them to return back, without ſuffering them to mix amongſt his legionaries. At the ſame time, Valens tranſmitted letters to the prætorian bands and city cohorts, in the name of the German army, exhorting them to abandon Otho and embrace the ſame intereſt. He likewiſe upbraided them for transferring the ſovereignty to Otho, when it had been ſo long before conferred upon Vitellius. But the German army continuing faithful to Vitellius, notwithſtanding the great promiſes of Otho, and the prætorian bands ſteady in their allegiance to Otho, notwithſtanding the officers of Vitellius, the two chiefs began to employ ſnares and miniſters of death againſt each other: aſſaſſins were diſpatched by Otho into Germany, and by Vitellius to Rome; but the attempts on both ſides were defeated [x].

Moſt of the provinces declare for Otho.

The firſt tidings from abroad that raiſed Otho's hopes, were from Illyricum, whence he received advice, that the legions in Dalmatia, in Pannonia, and Mœſia, had declared for him, and ſworn allegiance. The army in Judæa was by Veſpaſian ſworn to Otho, as were the legions in Syria, by Mucianus governor of that province. Egypt too, and all the provinces extending to the eaſt ſubmitted to him. The like ſubmiſſion was paid him in Africa, in Spain, and in Narbonne Gaul; but the latter province ſoon acceded to the party of Vitellius, which was the neareſt and ſtrongeſt. Aquitain likewiſe firſt declared for Otho; but ſoon after, from the ſame motive, ſwore fealty to Vitellius: for there was no true zeal, as Tacitus obſerves, in the people for the cauſe and intereſt of either of the pretenders, and only by the impreſſions of fear they were tranſported and changed from one ſide to another. Otho in the mean time, as if full peace had reigned, applied himſelf to the civil adminiſtration of the empire: in the ſenate he had many obliging and popular harangues; upon ſuch antient ſenators as had already ſuſtained the firſt employments in the ſtate, he conferred the pontifical or augural dignities; ſeveral young noblemen, lately lately recalled from exile, he inveſted with ſuch ſacerdotal offices, as had been enjoyed by their fathers or anceſtors. To Cadius Rufus, Pedius Blœſus, and Scævinus Promptimus, ſenators degraded in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, he reſtored their former dignity. By the like benevolence he attempted to gain the affection of whole cities and provinces. He ſupplied the colonies of Hiſpalis and Emerita with a freſh recruit of families, and made the whole people of the Lingones free of Rome. To the province of Bœtica he ſubmitted all the cities of Mauritania; and granted great privileges to the Cappadocians and Africans. But not forgetting, even while his ſovereignty was at ſtake, to honour the memory of his once favoured Poppæa, he procured a decree from the ſenate for replacing her ſeveral ſtatues, which had been thrown down after the death of Nero; nay, he ſuffered the ſtatues of that prince to be reared in public places, and did not betray any diſtaſte, but rather ſatisfaction, upon his being ſaluted by the people in the theatre with the name of Nero Otho. Cluvius Rufus, who wrote the hiſtory of his own times, and ſucceeded Galba in the government of Spain, tells us, that Otho, in his firſt diſpatches to the governors of the provinces, in his grants and letters, ſubſcribed himſelf Nero Otho; but being appriſed, that this gave offence to the nobility, he omited the former name [y].

[x] Idem, c. 73. Suet. in Oth. c. 8. Plut. ibid.

He ſtudies to gain their affections.

While the minds of all men were intent upon the progreſs and iſſue of the civil war, the Roxolanians a people of Sarmatia, having made an irruption into Mœſia, to the number of nine thouſand men, and cut off two cohorts, were unexpectedly attacked by the third legion, put to flight, and obliged to ſeek for ſhelter in the marſhes, where, through the rigor of the winter, they all periſhed to a man. For this victory, Marcus Aponius, governor of Mœſia, was diſtinguiſhed with a triumphal ſtatue, as were Fulvius Aurelius, Julianus Titus, and Numiſius Lupus, commanders of the legions there, with the conſular ornaments. Great was Otho's joy on this occaſion; for to himſelf he aſſumed the glory, as if the ſucceſs in war was owing to his auſpices [z].

The Roxolanians defeated.

At Rome, in the mean time, aroſe, from an unforeſeen accident, a ſedition, which well nigh involved the city in [y] Tacit. c. 77, 78. Suet. c. 7. Plut. in Oth. [z] Tacit. c. 79.

deſtruction. Otho had ordered the ſeventeenth legion to be removed from Oſtia, where it was quartered, to Rome, and committed the care of ſupplying them with arms to Varius Criſpinus, a tribune of the prætorian guards. Criſpinus chuſing, for the execution of his orders, the cloſe of the evening, when the camp was compoſed and the ſoldiers retired to their tents, directed the armoury to be thrown open, and the carriages belonging to the chariots to be loaded. The lateneſs of the hour gave no ſmall jealouſy to the drunken ſoldiery. Some of the moſt turbulent, and moſt intoxicated with wine, began to cry out, That Criſpinus was diſaffected to Otho: that the ſenate was arming againſt the perſon and cauſe of their emperor; and that thoſe arms were to be employed, not for him, as Criſpinus gave out, but againſt him. This report being in a trice ſpread over the whole camp, a general uproar enſued; they all betook themſelves to their arms, and having cut in pieces Criſpinus, while he was endeavouring to repreſs their ſeditious fury, and with him ſuch of the centurions as were remarkable for ſeverity of diſcipline, they inſtantly advanced with their drawn ſwords to Rome, after to the imperial palace. Otho was then entertaining at a great banquet the chief lords and the women of the greateſt diſtinction in the city. As they doubted whether the danger proceeded from the caſual rage of the ſoldiery, or the premeditated treachery of the emperor, they were all ſeized with dread and terror, and not knowing whether they ſhould fly or ſtay, they conſtantly watched the countenance of Otho; who, being alarmed at the danger threatening his gueſts, among whom were eighty ſenators, not only diſpatched forthwith the captains of the guards to ſoften the rage of the ſoldiers, but ordered the company to retire with all ſpeed by private ways; which they did accordingly, rambling in the dark here and there, few to their own home, moſt to the houſes of their meaneſt dependents, where ſearch and purſuit were leaſt apprehended. They were no ſooner gone, than the ſoldiers, breaking down the gates of the palace, forced their way into the banqueting room, and there, with one voice, demanded to have a ſight of Otho, having in their paſſage wounded Julius Martialis and Vitellius Saturninus, two officers, who ſtrove to oppoſe their tumultuous entrance. On every hand arms were brandiſhed, and terrible menaces uttered, not only againſt the tribunes and centurions, but againſt the

A ſedition among the prætorian guards.

Their rage and fury.

the whole body of the ſenate; for as they could aſſign no particular victim to their fury, they claimed a latitude for a general ſlaughter, as if the whole ſenate had conſpired againſt Otho; till the emperor, riſing from his banqueting couch, by ſupplications, entreaties, and even tears, to the diſgrace of the imperial dignity, prevailed upon them, with great difficulty, to deſiſt and return to their camp. The next day, the houſes in the city continued cloſely ſhut up; ſcarce a ſoul was to be ſeen in the ſtreets; and the ſoldiers, with down-caſt looks, ſhewed rather tokens of anger and rage, than remorſe. Their captains therefore, Licinius Proculus and Plotius Primus, harangued them in companies apart, and endeavoured to appeaſe their fury; but to no purpoſe, till they diſtributed among them a large ſum, five thouſand ſeſterces a man. Then, and not before, Otho ventured to enter the camp, where the ſoldiers, returning at length to a ſenſe of their duty, gathered round him, and, with a compoſed behaviour, required of their own motion, that the authors of the inſurrection ſhould be put to death. The emperor, aſcending the tribunal, repreſented to them the enormity of their late conduct, enlarged on the reſpect due to the ſenate, and the neceſſity of maintaining military diſcipline in the camp; but as he was well appriſed, that a ſovereignty, like his, acquired by flagrant iniquity, could never be preſerved by reviving the rigid virtue and diſcipline of the antient Romans, he concluded, that of the late tranſgreſſion but few were guilty, and that of theſe few two only ſhould bear the puniſhment. His ſpeech was favourably received, and two of the ringleaders in the late tumult were immediately executed, no one ſhewing the leaſt concern for them, though capital puniſhment was inflicted upon them in the ſight of their comrades and the whole army. Thus was the ſedition at length entirely quelled; but nevertheleſs the city ſtill continued in the utmoſt conſternation, from the apprehenſion of a civil war, and the dread of being involved in the ſame calamities, which had proved fatal to it in the time of Antony and Auguſtus. They were, on one hand, under neceſſity of obliging Otho, and, on the other, afraid to diſoblige Vitellius, who was ſupported by a ſtrong party, and might in the end get the better of his rival. The ſoldiers, diſperſed all over the city, crept into houſes in diſguiſed habits, as ſpies, watching for matter of miſchief and deſtruction againſt ſuch as were ſignal for their nobility or wealth.

They are appeaſed with a large donative.

The conſternation of the city.

wealth. Some too believed, that certain ſoldiers from the army o Vitellius were arrived at Rome, to ſound the affections of the Roman people. Hence all places were filled with ſuſpicion and diſtruſt; nay, men were not exempt from caution and fear in the moſt ſecret receſſes of their own houſes. But, under the eye of the public, this ſort of dread chiefly prevailed: there people ſtudied with great care to frame their faces agreeable to the quality of the news that was ſaid to be brought, that they might not ſeem to betray any diffidence, when affairs bore an ambiguous aſpect, or be ſlow in rejoicing, when they appeared proſperous. The ſenators chiefly, when aſſembled, were at a loſs how to preſerve in all points a ſafe and unexceptionable conduct. They dreaded the conſequences that might attend their iſſuing decrees againſt Vitellius; and, on the other hand, were afraid, that, by forbearing to iſſue them, they might rouſe the jealouſy of Otho. In this perplexity, without publiſhing any decrees, they contented themſelves with uttering invectives againſt Vitellius, but ſuch as, being common and vulgar, were not remarkable; nay, even theſe the moſt wary took care to utter under the din of a general clamour, and when many were ſpeaking at once [a].

The general alarm heightened by ſeveral prodigies.

THE general terror was greatly heightened by ſeveral prodigies ſaid to have happened at this time. From the hands of the ſtatue of Victory triumphant, ſtanding upon her chariot in the porch of the capitol, the reins dropped, as if ſhe were grown too weak to hold them any longer. Out of Juno's chapel ſuddenly aroſe an apparition of a ſize more than human. The ſtatue of Julius Cæſar, in an iſland in the Tiber, turned quite round from weſt to eaſt, upon a day utterly free from tempeſts. In Hetruria an ox ſpoke. Divers animals were ſaid to have produced unnatural births. But the moſt affecting omen of all was, an haſty and dreadful inundation of the Tiber, whoſe waters, ſwelling to an immenſe height, overthrew the Sublician bridge, and having their courſe obſtructed by the heap of ruins, not only overflowed the adjacent quarters, but covered places, which were reckoned ſecure againſt any ſuch diſaſter. Many were ſwept away in the ſtreets, and many drowned in their ſhops and beds. Amongſt the populace a famine enſued, the corn and other proviſions being in great great part carried away by the river. As ſoon as the waters retired, Otho performed the ſolemnity of luſtration, and purified the city with ſacrifices. Then weighing carefully with his friends all the methods of conducting the war, he reſolved to ſend a powerful force by ſea to invade Narbonne Gaul, ſince the Apennine mountains, with thoſe of the Cottian Alps, and all the other approaches to Gaul, were beſet and ſhut up by the armies of Vitellius. With this view he reinforced the navy and the marines, with a detachment from the prætorian bands. The direction in chief of the expedition was committed to Antonius Novellus, to Suedius Clemens, both lately centurions of the firſt rank, and to Æmilius Pacenſis a tribune, diſmiſſed by Galba, and now by Otho re-eſtabliſhed. Oſcus, one of the emperor's freed-men, was charged with the care of the ſhips, and employed to inſpect the fidelity and behaviour of the other officers. As for Otho himſelf, he reſolved to march againſt Cæcina and Valens, at the head of the prætorian guards and the other troops, which were then quartered in the neighbourhood of Rome. Under him commanded, as his lieutenants, Suetonius Paulinus, Marius Celſus, and Annius Gallus, all men of known valour and experience, and capable of performing great feats, had not Otho placed his chief confidence in Licinius Proculus, captain of the prætorian guards, and ſuffered himſelf to be governed by him, though quite unexperienced in war [b].

[a] Idem, c. 80—85.

Otho propoſes to take the field.

Otho, before he left Rome, ordered Cornelius Dolabella to retire to Aquinum in Campania, where he was kept under confinement for no crime of his, but only as obnoxious on account of the antient luſtre of his name and kindred to Galba. Then the emperor ordered many of the magiſtrates, and a great part of ſuch as had been conſuls, to prepare for the field, with no deſign of allowing them any ſhare or charge in the war, but only under colour of accompanying him. Amongſt theſe was included Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, whom Otho did not diſtinguiſh with any new marks either of his favour or diſpleaſure. Vitellius had likewiſe left at Rome his mother, his wife, and his children; and to theſe Otho, either through fear or from an affected moderation, ſhewed a tender regard, commending them to the protection of his friends. Great was on this Otho orders the chief ſenators and nobility to follow him to the war.

[b] Idem, c. 87.

on this occaſion the conſternation of the city; the chief ſenators were diſabled by age from bearing the toils of war; the nobles were ſunk in ſloth, and through a long peace had quite forgot the military laws; the Roman knights were unacquainted with the functions and duties of a camp. The more theſe degrees of men ſtrove to conceal their fear, they more apparently they diſcovered it. Some, to diſguiſe their want of courage, purchaſed gay and glaring armour, with fine and ſtately horſes; others provided materials for riot and feaſting, as ſo many implements of war. The giddy and thoughtleſs multitude were puffed up with great hopes. Thoſe who found their fortunes and credit deſperate during peace, rejoiced in the public commotions, promiſing to themſelves in particular moſt ſecurity in the general diſtraction; but they all ſoon felt the heavy evils and preſſures of war, the price of proviſions being doubled, and the populace at once deprived of the uſual bounties of the prince, who with much-ado could find corn and money to ſupply his numerous armies [c].

He takes his leave of the ſenate.

When all Otho's forces were ready to take the field, he aſſembled on the fourteenth of March the ſenate, and to their care recommended the commonwealth. In the next place he ordered the people to meet, and in a long ſpeech to them boaſted, that his intereſt and title were ſupported by the majeſty of the city and the joint conſent of the people and ſenate. Againſt the partizans of Vitellius he ſpoke with great gentleneſs and reſtraint, taxing the German legions rather with ignorance, than with inſolence and rebellion. Of Vitellius himſelf he made no mention; but whether from any moderation of his own, or becauſe the perſon who compoſed his ſpeech, refrained from opprobrious and offenſive words, in due caution for himſelf, is uncertain; for as Otho, in all military deliberations, conſulted Suetonius Paulinus and Marius Celſus, ſo in his civil adminiſtration he was believed to employ the talents of Galerius Trachalus. Be that as it will, the emperor's ſpeech was received by the populace with loud ſhouts and many acclamations, each ſtriving to ſurpaſs the other in ſtrains of flattery, not from any affection to Otho, but from a cuſtom tranſmitted from reign to reign of flattering any emperor, whoſoever he were, with empty applauſes and an hollow diſplay lay of zeal. Otho, upon leaving Rome, committed to his rother Salvius Titianus the charge of maintaining its tranquillity, and of managing the other affairs of the empire. When he had thus ſettled matters in the city, in the beſt manner he could, he at laſt ſet out, at the head of the prætorian cohorts, of a choſen body of ſuch of the prætorian bands, as ſerved under the ſtandard of veterans, and a vaſt number of marines. He marched himſelf before the enſigns on foot, wearing a breaſt-plate of iron, undreſſed, rough, and utterly unlike his picture drawn by common fame [d].

[c] Idem, c. 88, 90.

And leaves Rome.

FORTUNE ſeconded his firſt attempts; for his fleet, having made a deſcent in the province of the maritime Alps, defeated the Ligurians, whom Marius Maturus, who governed that province in quality of procurator, had armed againſt them, plundered Albium Intemelium, now Vintimiglia, and laid waſte the whole country. On this occaſion a woman having concealed her ſon, the ſoldiers ſuſpecting, that with him ſhe had in the ſame place concealed her money, put her upon the rack; but could not with all the torments which rage and cruelty ever deviſed, prevail upon her to diſcover the place where her ſon lay concealed. Tacitus tells us, that pointing to her belly, ſhe replied he lay there, and could not, with all the tortures ſucceſſively tried, nor even with the agonies of death, be brought to return them any other anſwer. In the mean time, news being ſent in great hurry and alarm to Fabius Valens, that Otho's fleet was upon the coaſt of Narbonne Gaul, he ſent thither two cohorts of Tungrians, four troops of horſe, and the whole ſquadron of Treverians, under the command of Julius Claſſicus. To theſe were joined a cohort of Ligurians and five hundred Pannonians. They no ſooner arrived, than they were attacked by Otho's men, who had already landed. The engagement laſted till night, and was renewed the next day, when Vitellius's forces were at length put to flight with great ſlaughter. However, as the victory to Otho's men proved very bloody, they retired to Albingaunum, a municipal city in Liguria, and there continued without making any further attempts upon Narbonne Gaul. At the ſame time, Decimus Pacarius, governor of Corſica, having declared for Vitellius, was ſlain by the inhabitants, who brought his head to Otho [e].

The ſucceſs of his fleet in Narbonne Gaul.

IN

[d] Tacit. hiſt. l. ii. c. 11. [e] Idem, c. 15——18.

The country between the Po and the Alps ſubmits to Vitellius.

In Italy, the whole country, which extends from the Po to the Alps, was held by the troops of Vitellius; for the ſquadron of horſe, named Syllana, had brought over with them ſeveral cities to his party, as we have related above; and the cohorts, which Cæcina had ſent thither before him, were already arrived. To them therefore ſeveral cities ſubmitted, not from any affection to Vitellius, or that they preferred his cauſe to the cauſe of Otho; but by long peace and eaſe they were quite debaſed, ready for any bondage, and the eaſy acquiſition of the firſt comer. At Cremona Vitellius's men ſurpriſed and took priſoners a cohort of Pannonians; and between Placentia and Ticinum intercepted an hundred horſe and a thouſand marines. Animated with this ſucceſs, they paſſed the Po over-againſt Placentia, and ſurpriſing certain ſcouts, filled the reſt with ſuch dread, that to Placentia they carried tidings, that Cæcina approached with his whole army. Veſtrius Spurinna, who commanded in that city for Otho, and had with him five cohorts of the prætorian guards, a thouſand veterans, and a few horſe, though he was certain that Cæcina was not yet come, determined to confine his own men within the fortifications; but they, headſtrong, unmanageable, and unacquainted with matters of war, ſnatching up the enſigns and ſtandards, ſallied out tumultuouſly, turning againſt their own commander, while he ſtrove to reſtrain them, the points of their weapons, and giving out with fierce clamours, that a plot was intended, and Cæcina treacherouſly called in; ſo that Spurinna was obliged to approve their reſolution, ſince it was not in his power to prevent it. With them therefore he marched out of Placentia, and arriving, when night already approached, within ſight of the Po, repreſented to them the neceſſity of pitching and fortifying their camp againſt any ſudden attack. This toil, which was utterly new to men inured to the gaieties of the city, cooled their courage at once; all over the camp dutiful and ſubmiſſive language was heard; they applauded with one voice the prudent care of their commander, who, for the ſeat of the war, had choſen a colony ſo ſtrong and opulent; and, ſubmitting to orders, ſuffered themſelves to be led back the ſame night to Placentia, where the walls were forthwith ſtrengthened, new bulwarks added, towers raiſed, &c[f]. In the mean time, Cæcina, having paſſed the Alps, entered Italy, and after [f] Idem, c. 19.

after attempting in vain, by many ſecret conferences and mighty promiſes, to corrupt and debauch Otho's forces, reſolved to lay ſiege to Placentia; and accordingly encamped before the place. The firſt day paſſed in mutual reproaches, Cæcina's men marching up to the walls, and upbraiding Spurinna's upon the ramparts, as players, dancers, idle ſpectators of Pythian and olympic games, men corrupted by the licentious amuſements of the theatre and circus, who triumphed in the murdering of Galba, a naked and diſarmed old man, but were not very forward to face an armed enemy in the field. Theſe reproaches ſo inflamed them, that the next day, when Cæcina ordered a general aſſault, they behaved with incredible bravery, made a dreadful ſlaughter of his men, and obliged them to retreat in the utmoſt confuſion. In this conflict, the amphitheatre of Placentia, which ſtood without the walls, and was the moſt ſtately and capacious building in Italy, was burnt down. This defeat brought great diſgrace upon Vitellius's party; and Cæcina, aſhamed of his diſappointment, immediately repaſſed the Po, and bent his march towards Cremona, which had ſubmitted to Vitellius. Upon his march, Turullius Cerealis revolted to him with a great number of marines, and Julius Briganticus with a few horſe; the latter a Batavian by nation, and commander of a ſquadron of horſe: the other a centurion of the firſt rank, who having ſerved in that character amongſt the forces in Germany, was thence well affected to Cæcina [g]. About the ſame time, Martius Macer, who commanded under Otho, a body of two thouſand gladiators, having embarked them upon the Po, landed unexpectedly on the oppoſite ſhore, where he ſurpriſed and defeated the auxiliary troops which belonged to the forces of Vitellius, cut many of them to pieces, and obliged the reſt to fly for refuge to Cremona. Macer reſtrained his men from purſuing them, leſt the fugitives, ſtrengthened by freſh ſuccours from the city, might have changed the fortune of the combat. From this reſtraint great diſtruſt aroſe amongſt the ſuſpicious ſoldiers of Otho, the moſt cowardly urging criminal imputations againſt their leaders, and putting a malevolent conſtruction upon all their proceedings. Cæcina, greatly concerned to ſee all his enterprizes abortive, and fearing leaſt Fabius Valens, who Cæcina beſieges Placentia.

Is forced to raiſe the ſiege.

Vitellius's auxiliaries defeated.

was

[g] Idem, c. 20—23. Plut. in Oth.

was now approaching, ſhould rob him of the whole glo of the war, hurried with more impatience than circun ſpection to retrieve his honour. At a place about twel miles from Cremona, named Caſtores, he ſecretly conve ed the flower of his auxiliaries, into the woods, which la juſt above the great road; the horſe he commanded t march further on, and, after having engaged the enemy to betake themſelves to a voluntary flight, and continu it, till the auxiliaries lying in the woods had an opportu nity of riſing at once out of their ambuſh and falling upo the enemy. But this ſtratagem being betrayed by ſome de ſerters to Otho's generals, Paulinus and Celſus, they craftil drew Cæcina's forces into the ſame ſnare; for Paulinu taking the command of the foot, and Celſus that of the horſe, they placed three cohorts in cloſe ranks in the high-road, and on either ſide of it concealed among the woods the firſt legion, the thirteenth, ſix cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thouſand horſe. The three cohorts in the high-road were immediately attacked by Cæcina's horſe, who after having ſtood their ground a while, turned their backs and fled. But Celſus, who was aware of the artifice, with-held his men from purſuing them; and, in the mean time, the forces, which Cæcina had concealed in the woods, roſe out of their ambuſh. Then Celſus, pretending fear, retired inſenſibly before them, till they found themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides; for on both their flanks they were attacked by the cohorts and the legions, and the horſe, ſuddenly weeeling about, fell upon them in the rear. Tacitus tells us, that Cæcina's whole army had been cut off, if the legions under the command of Paulinus had come up with more expedition; but that general moved too ſlowly, and with more caution than was neceſſary, or indeed conſiſtent with the rules of war. Our hiſtorian charges him with two material overſights on this occaſion: the firſt was, that, inſtead of ſounding the charge and ſupporting his cavalry, by falling briſkly upon Cæcina, he ſpent his time in filling the ditches and clearing the grounds, that he might extend his front, thinking it too early to begin to conquer, till he had provided againſt being conquered. By this delay leiſure was given to the enemy to ſhelter themſelves amongſt the vineyards; whence they renewed the charge, and killed the moſt reſolute and forward of the prætorian horſe. The ſecond was his not taking advantage of the diſorder

Cæcina's forces defeated.

the

the enemy were in, both in the field of battle and in the camp, but cauſing a retreat to be ſounded very unſeaſonably. But Paulinus was, as our hiſtorian informs us, a man by nature wary and ſlow, better pleaſed with deliberate counſels ſupported by reaſon, than with victory reſulting from chance. The ſoldiery complained loudly of his conduct, and prevailed upon Otho to remove him together with Celſus, and to place in their room his brother Titianus and Proculus captain of the prætorian guards. Titianus therefore was ſent for, and to him was committed the rule and direction of the war, though Proculus bore in all deliberations the greater ſway. The two degraded generals were kept in the camp, rather as counſellors than commanders; for Otho entertained a mighty opinion of their experience and abilities in war [h].

Paulinus and Celſus removed.

In the mean time, Fabius Valens arrived with the troops under his command at Ticinum, where, while he was fortifying his camp, news was brought of the late unſucceſsful battle. Hereupon his troops, accuſing him of treachery, as if he had, by feigned delays, detained them from aſſiſting at the engagement, turned away, without waiting for their general's orders, to join Cæcina. Upon the conjunction of the forces of Valens with thoſe of Cæcina, the officers of Vitellius were for coming to a deciſive battle. Otho, on the other hand, advancing to a village between Cremona and Verona, called Bedriacum, had recourſe to a conſultation, whether it were adviſeable to protract the war, or riſk the fortune of a battle. Upon this occaſion Suetonius Paulinus, the moſt experienced commander of his age, declared, that it was his opinion, that haſte and preſent action were advantageous to the enemy; but to Otho procraſtination and delay, ſince the entire army of Vitellius was arrived, and in want of many neceſſaries, which obliged them to offer battle, as the ſpeedieſt way of ſupplying their preſent want. On the contrary, Otho's army was abundantly provided: Italy, the ſenate, and people of Rome were entirely at his devotion, and ready to ſupply him, not only with proviſions, but with treaſure, more prevalent than the ſword in all civil diſſenſions. Moreover, ſeveral provinces had revolted from Vitellius; whereas all the countries which Paulinus is againſt engaging the enemy.

[h] Tacit. c. 20——24. Plut. ibid.

which had at firſt declared for Otho, continued inviolably attached to him. In his front lay the river Po; his cities were ſecure in the ſtrength of men and walls; and that none of them would yield to the attacks of the enemy, was evident from the brave defence of Placentia. He added, that were the war protracted till the ſummer, the Germans, of all the enemy's forces the moſt formidable, would never endure ſo great a change of country and climate, but inſenſibly moulder away, and utterly vaniſh with all their terrors. He concluded, that as the legions of Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Mœſia were upon their march and would arrive in a few days, the emperor might then reſume the preſent deliberation; and if it were judged adviſeable to engage, he might bring into the field a far greater ſtrength. With the counſel of Paulinus Marius Celſus concurred; and Annius Gallus, who was abſent, being ill of the hurt which he had received a few days before from his horſe falling with him, declared to thoſe who were ſent to learn his advice, that he entertained the ſame ſentiments, and would have the emperor by all means to wait, at leaſt till the legions from Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Mœſia had joined him. But Otho, Titianus his brother, and Proculus were bent upon engaging. The two latter, hurried by raſhneſs and want of experience, were always averring, that fortune, and the gods and the deity of Otho attended upon his counſels, and would undoubtedly proſper his enterprizes: to ſuch groſs flattery had they betaken themſelves, that no one might dare to thwart their opinion, which in the end prevailed. Many reaſons are alledged by the antients for this ſtrange determination: ſome writers tell us, that the prætorian guards, diſliking the ſtrict diſcipline they were then under, and longing for the diverſions and gaieties of the city, grew refractory, and demanded to be led againſt the enemy, not doubting but they ſhould carry all before them. Others write, that, from an averſion to both princes, the armies had deliberated about dropping their enmity, and agreeing among themſelves to ſet up a proper emperor, or to refer the choice to the ſenate; and that hence Otho's generals had declared for delays and procraſtination; Paulinus particularly, who conſidered himſelf as the moſt antient conſular, as one famous in war, and one who, by his exploits in Britain, had gained a great name. There were, no doubt, in both armies, a few, in whoſe breaſts cordial cordial wiſhes were entertained for public tranquillity, inſtead of civil diſſenſion, and for a prince worthy and innocent, in the room of two, of all men the worſt, and infamous for every kind of iniquity. But Paulinus, as Tacitus judiciouſly obſerves, was too wiſe a man to imagine, that in an age abandoned to corruption, the common herd, who, from a paſſion for war, had promoted civil diſcords and violated the public peace, would, for the ſake of peace, extinguiſh a fire of their own kindling, and relinquiſh the war; or that two armies ſo different in manners and language, could ever be brought to agree upon a point of ſuch importance. Beſides the generals and leaders in both armies, being deeply involved in debt, preſſed with indigence, and for the moſt part guilty of enormous crimes, would have taken care to make choice of ſuch an emperor, as was moſt like themſelves, and ſhould be obliged to them for his election [i].

Otho reſolves to venture a battle.

When an engagement was reſolved upon, it was debated next in the council, whether the emperor ſhould be preſent in the action, or remove elſewhere. Titianus and Proculus adviſed him to retire to Brixellum, now Berſello, where, ſecure from the uncertain accidents of battles, he ſhould reſerve himſelf, they ſaid, for the direction of the whole and the great ends of ſovereignty. Paulinus and Celſus, that they might not ſeem to adviſe expoſing the perſon of the prince to perils, dared not oppoſe his departure. This advice, which Otho readily embraced, was attended with two bad conſequences; he conſiderably weakened the army, by taking with him a numerous detachment of the beſt troops to guard him; and beſides, the forces remaining loſt all courage, ſince they ſuſpected the fidelity of their leaders. In the mean time, the band of gladiators, who ſerved under Otho, being attacked and defeated by a detachment of Germans, Macer, who commanded the former, was by the whole army required to ſlaughter; nay, they had already wounded him with a lance, and were falling upon him with their drawn ſwords, when, by the ſudden interpoſition of the tribunes and centurions, he was reſcued. However, Otho, being obliged to remove him, ſent Flavius Sabinus, brother to Veſpaſian, to take the charge of the forces that had been under his command, to the great joy of the ſoldiers, pleaſed with the change of leaders, while the leaders abhorred the charge of a ſoldiery ſo licentious and unruly. After the departure of Otho to Brixellum, the name and honour of the generalſhip remained with his brother Titianus, but the whole authority with Proculus. As for Celſus and Paulinus, they were on no occaſion conſulted, but only bore the empty title of commanders, and thence ſerved as cloaks for the faults and miſtakes of others. The tribunes and centurions were under the greateſt concern, to ſee men of ſuperior worth and capacity thus neglected, while the very worſt men bore ſway. But the common ſoldiers, who ſuſpected their fidelity, were chearful and elated, though rather diſpoſed to canvaſs and interpret, than to obey and execute, the orders of their commanders. The two armies were encamped on the banks of the Po, whence Otho's forces moved their quarters, and retired within four miles of Bedriacum, which is by Tacitus, as we have hinted above, placed between Cremona and Verona, but by Sanſon between Cremona and Mantua, upon the river Oglio, where the preſent city of Caneto ſtands. Their march was ſo unſkilfully conducted, that in it they were extremely diſtreſſed for want of water, though it was then the ſpring of the year, about the thirteenth of April, and there were rivers on all hands. Proculus was for continuing the march the next day, with a deſign to attack the enemy encamped about ſixteen miles off, at the confluence of the Adda and the Po. This reſolution was utterly diſapproved by Celſus and Paulinus, who declared againſt expoſing the army, fatigued with marching, and loaded with baggage, to the enemy, who, being themſelves light and unincumbered, and having moved ſcarce four miles, would never loſe the advantage of attacking them, either as they marched with their ranks broken, or afterwards while they were fortifying their camp. This point was ſtill under debate, when a Numidian, diſpatched by Otho upon a ſwift horſe, arrived with letters to the generals, wherein the emperor, having firſt reproached them in a very bitter ſtrain, with want of ſpirit and reſolution, commanded them peremptorily to engage without loſs of time. Such orders as theſe, ſent by princes who are at a diſtance, prove commonly moſt fatal. Of this we have innumerable inſtances; and the reaſon is very obvious: it is impoſſible for a man, who is not

Otho retires to Brixellum.

[i] Tacit. c. 38.

The whole power devolved upon Proculus.

Otho orders them to engage without delay.

not upon the ſpot, to make a right choice of the ground, the opportunity, and favourable moment for engaging. This is as much as can be expected from the moſt able commanders, who are upon the ſpot. Upon the receipt of the emperor's letters, Celſus and Paulinus dropped all oppoſition, and the army immediately decamped [k].

THE ſame day, two tribunes of the prætorian guards came to Cæcina, as he was intent upon building a bridge croſs the Po, and deſired a conference. He was already ſetting himſelf to receive their overtures, when the ſcouts, in great haſte, appriſed him, that the enemy was at hand. The diſcourſe with the tribunes being thus interrupted, it remained uncertain, whether they intended to betray their own party, to contrive a plot againſt the enemy, or had ſome deſign truly worthy and honeſt. Cæcina, having diſmiſſed the tribunes, immediately quitted his poſt upon the river, and haſtened to the camp, where he found the ſignal of battle already given by Valens, and the ſoldiers under arms. While Valens was drawing up his legions, his cavalry ſallied forth by themſelves, but were by a party of Otho's forces, much inferior in number, repulſed, and forced to fly for ſhelter to their ramparts; whence the Italic legion, with their drawn ſwords, drove them back to the encounter. The legions of Vitellius were ranged in order of battle, without the leaſt conſternation or alarm; for though the enemy approached, they were prevented from ſeeing them by a thick coppice. In the army of Otho, an univerſal confuſion prevailed; the generals diſtruſted the ſoldiery, and the ſoldiery were incenſed againſt their generals. The carriages and retainers to the camp, were mixt and crowded amongſt the ranks; from a deep ditch on each hand, the way was too ſtreight even for an army marching, where no danger from an enemy was to be apprehended. No order was obſerved, ſome thruſting themſelves into the front, ſome retiring to the rear, as each found himſelf prompted by bravery or by fear. Beſides, a groundleſs report was ſpread among the foremoſt ranks of Otho's army, that the forces of Vitellius had revolted from him and would join them. Upon this report, they accoſted the enemy with the ſalutation of friends; but the others returned the compliment with an hoſtile

The battle of Bedriacum.

[k] Idem, c. 39, 40.

hoſtile and threatening murmur, which not only diſheartened them, but gave occaſion to the reſt, who were unapprifed of the cauſe of ſuch greeting, to apprehend that they were betrayed. At the ſame time, the enemy attacked them with great vigor; and Otho's men, though fewer in number and fatigued, ſuſtained the charge with great reſolution and intrepidity. As the place was embaraſſed with trees, hedges, and vineyards, they fought with ſmall regularity, bearing down one upon another, body to body, buckler to buckler, with ſwords and axes, after a dreadful manner, each man exerting his might, as if the event of the whole war depended upon his valour. In the open plain, between the Po and the highway, two legions chanced to encounter; the one-and-twentieth belonging to Vitellius, and named Rapax; and the firſt on Otho's ſide, entitled Adjutrix. The former was famous for feats of valour; the latter till then had never been led into the field, but was fierce, reſolute, and eager of acquiring renown. They engaged with incredible fury, rejecting the uſe of darts, and cloſing reſolutely with ſwords and axes. After a long and bloody conteſt, the ſoldiers of the firſt, having routed the foremoſt ranks of the one-and-twentieth, carried off their eagle; a diſgrace which ſo enraged this legion, that they returned to the charge, ſlew Orphidius Benignus, commander of the firſt, and took ſeveral ſtandards. In another quarter, the thirteenth legion, which fought for Otho, was defeated by the fifth. Alphenus Varius, at the head of his Batavians, having utterly routed the body of Otho's gladiators, attacked his army in flank; which ſtruck the prætorian bands with ſuch dread, that they betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, putting in diſorder ſuch of their own men, as ſtill kept their ranks, and faced the enemy. Thus the whole army, no longer able to ſtand their ground, retired in the utmoſt confuſion, bending their courſe towards Bedriacum. As the ways were obſtructed by the bodies of the ſlain, (for above forty thouſand fell on both ſides) the enemy made a dreadful ſlaughter of the fugitives, it being of no advantage to take priſoners, who in civil wars were not converted into ſale, and gain. Suetonius and Proculus took different routs, both ſhunning that to the camp, out of an apprehenſion of the ſoldiery, who had already charged their commanders with the loſs of the battle. Vedius Aquila, commander of the thirteenth legion, having with more courage than diſcretion entered the camp, while it was yet broad day, was charged by the troops that had remained there and by thoſe who were returned from the battle, as a traitor to his cauſe, and abuſed in a moſt outrageous manner; not that he had really committed any crime; but ſuch is the cuſtom of the crowd, for every man to caſt upon others his own guilt and diſgrace. Titianus and Celſus durſt not venture into the camp till night, when the guards were already poſted, and the tumult of the ſoldiery repreſſed. The victorious army of Vitellius purſued the fugitives within five miles of Bedriacum, where they halted, not thinking it ſafe to attempt forcing the enemy's camp the ſame day; and beſides, they entertained hopes of a voluntary ſurrender. Otho's forces ſeemed diſpoſed to make a vigorous defence, boaſting, that they had been overcome by acts of treachery, and by no ſuperior bravery of the enemy. But the officers and Titianus himſelf, in a council which they held the day following, agreed to ſend deputies to Cæcina and Valens to treat of a ſurrender. Their propoſals were accepted, and, upon the return of the deputies, the gates of the camp were thrown open. Then both armies meeting, the conquerors, as well as the conquered, burſt into tears, and, at once pleaſed and grieved, uttered their deteſtations of the ſad lot of civil wars. Aſſembling now without diſtinction in the ſame tents, they dreſſed with great tenderneſs one another's wounds; ſome thoſe of their brothers, ſome thoſe of their friends. There were ſcarce any ſo exempt from affliction, as not to have ſome dead friend to bewail. The bodies of Orphidius and other officers of diſtinction were ſought for and buried with the uſual ſolemnity. In the end, they all ſubmitted to Vitellius, and to him took the oath of allegiance [1].

Otho's army routed.

more

Thoſe who fled to the camp ſurrender.

Otho, in the mean time, waited at Brixellum for an account of the battle. The firſt rumours were melancholy, but uncertain, till the fugitives brought a certain account of the utter defeat. The firſt who arrived with the diſmal tidings was a common ſoldier, who being taxed with falſhood and cowardice by ſome perſons about the emperor, to convince them of the truth of his account, and to ſhew that he had not fled for want of courage, fell upon his ſword at Otho's feet; who, admiring his reſo-

[1] Tacit. c. 41, 45. Plut. ibid.

refolution and fidelity, cried out, "No more ſuch worthy and gallant men ſhall on my ſcore be brought into danger." This Suetonius the hiſtorian tells us he learnt of his father Suetonius Lenis, who, in the battle of Bedriacum, commanded in quality of tribune the thirtenth legion, which fought for Otho [m]. The battle was no-ways deciſive; for Otho had ſtill with him many brave troops inviolably attached to his cauſe and intereſt; his forces beyond the Po ſtill remained entire; there were numerous garriſons in Bedriacum and Placentia; and the legions from Mœſia, Dalmatia, and Pannonia were advancing; nay, the Aſiatic, Syrian, and Egyptian legions were already near the Adriatic. But nevertheleſs, he was no ſooner informed of the defeat of his army, than he manifeſtly betrayed a fixed purpoſe of ſacrificing his life to the public tranquillity. The ſoldiers appriſed of his deſign, did all that lay in their power to ſupport him under his concern. They preſſed him to take courage, ſince there ſtill remained freſh forces, declaring, without flattery or deceit, that they were ready for his ſake to expoſe themſelves to the greateſt dangers and ſuffer all extremities. Thoſe who ſtood at a diſtance ſignified their zeal and ardour by ſtretching out their hands; ſuch as were neareſt fell at his knees, kiſſed his hand, and with many tears entreated him to ſtand by them, and to accept of that duty and fidelity which could never expire, but with their laſt breath. But above all, the intrepidity and fidelity of an obſcure and private ſoldier diſplayed itſelf on this occaſion; for finding the emperor ſtood altogether unſhaken and fixt in his purpoſe, he drew his ſword; and addreſſing himſelf to Otho; "From this, Cæſar, ſaid he, judge of our fidelity; for there is not a man amongſt us, but would ſtrike thus to ſerve you!" Having thus ſpoken, he turned his ſword againſt himſelf, and fell at the emperor's feet. Plautius Firmus, captain of his guards, by repeated inſtances, beſought him not to abandon an army ſo faithful and zealous; ſoldiers ſo ſingularly affectionate and loyal. In bearing calamities, ſaid he, more greatneſs of ſpirit is ſhewn, than in flying from them. To ſupport themſelves with hope, even in ſpite of fortune, was ever the part of the magnanimous and brave, as it was that of the timorous and ſpiritleſs, to be drawn headlong by cowardice into utter deſpair. As during theſe expreſſions Otho betrays a deſign to lay violent hands on himſelf. The zeal of his ſoldiers on this occaſion.

[m] Suet. in Oth. c. 10.

preſſions Otho happened to look chearful or penſive, there followed ſhouts of joy or diſmal groans. Nor was this zeal confined to the prætorian guards, who were inviolably attached to the perſon of Otho; but thoſe who had been ſent before the reſt out of Mœſia, and were now arrived, declared, that in the approaching army the ſame ſteadineſs prevailed, and that the legions had already reached Aquileia. Hence it is evident, that the war might have been renewed, and that its iſſue, notwithſtanding the late overthrow, was altogether uncertain. But neither by perſuaſions and entreaties, nor by all the apparent probability of ſucceſs, could Otho be prevailed upon to continue the war, or be diverted from the reſolution he had taken; a reſolution which no one expected from a perſon of his ſoft and effeminate temper. Having commanded ſilence, he ſpoke to them after this manner: this day, my fellow-ſoldiers, which gives me ſuch ſenſible proofs of your affection and loyalty, is far preferable to that on which you ſaluted me emperor. I therefore beſeech you not to deny me the ſatisfaction of laying down my life for the preſervation of ſo many brave men. To expoſe wantonly to freſh perils ſuch virtue and fortitude, is a price, which I judge too high for the redeeming of my own life. I am well appriſed, that the enemy has neither gained an entire nor a deciſive victory: I have advice, that the Mœſian army is not far off; that the legions from Aſia, Syria, and Egypt are near the Adriatic; that the forces in Judæa have declared for us; the ſenate favours our cauſe; we have in our power the wives and children of our enemies, &c. But alas! it is not with Pyrrhus, with Hannibal, with the Cimbrians, we fight; but it is eagle againſt eagle, and Rome againſt Rome. Italy muſt bleed, whether I vanquiſh or am vanquiſhed; and even he who triumphs will have occaſion to mourn. Shall I ever bear, that ſuch a number of Roman youth, that ſo many noble armies be cut off, and raviſhed for ever from the common-wealth? With me let me carry this ſatisfaction, that for my cauſe you were all ready to die; but be content to ſurvive me. Vitellius began the civil war, and thence ſprung the ſource of our ſtruggling for the empire by arms. To me will be owing the example of ſtruggling for it no more than once. By this rule let poſterity judge of Otho. Vitellius ſhall again poſſeſs in ſafety his brother, his children, and his wife. Others have held the ſovereignty longer; in a manner more glorious none ever yet relinquished it. Assure yourselves, it is my free choice to die rather than to reign, since I cannot so much advance the Roman state by wars and bloodshed, as by sacrificing myself to the public peace and tranquillity. Nothing but my death can seal a lasting peace, and secure Italy against such another unhappy day. But let us no longer retard one another: let not me delay your care of your own preservation, nor you me in the pursuit of a design never to be shaken or changed. To multiply words about the subject of dying, is the part of a dastardly spirit. How much I am undaunted in this my purpose, I desire you to take this signal proof, that I complain of no man; since to be blaming the gods or men, upon the approach of death, implies a mean and indirect desire of living [n].

His fine ſpeech before he dies.

rious

After this discourse, he desired those who attended him to leave him, and submit without delay to Vitellius. The young men he pressed with authority, the old by entreaties, addressing himself to all with great courtesy, in a language suitable to their years or dignity. At the same time he rebuked, as ill-judged and unreasonable, the tears and lamentations of his friends, with a countenance calm and composed, and a speech flowing and assured. To such as were about to depart, he ordered boats and carriages to be given. To those who were absent, he sent passports, forbidding any one to stop them in their journey. All such memorials and letters, as were signal for expressions of zeal towards him, or for invectives against Vitellius, he committed to the flames. What money and jewels he had, he distributed amongst his friends. His brother's son, Salvius Cocceianus, one just in the bloom of his youth, who was bewailing him with a flood of tears, he endeavoured to comfort with tender expressions, bidding him be in no apprehension of Vitellius, who, he said, could not, for his whole family preserved in safety, refuse a return of mercy in this single instance. The clemency of the conqueror, continued he, I have purchased by thus hastening to die, since pressed by no desperate distress, but at a juncture when so many brave men were demanding to be lead to battle, I have, for the sake of the commonwealth, forborne making a last effort. To myself I have acquired sufficient fame; to my posterity sufficient lustre. Into an house newly raised, I have translated the sovereignty, after the same fame had been veſted in ſo illuſtrious families, namely, the Julian, the Claudian, and the Sergian: but that Cæſar has been your uncle, you muſt neither forget, nor too zealouſly remember. After this, he cauſed all thoſe who were about him to retire; and withdrawing into a private room, he wrote conſolatory letters to his ſiſter, and to Meſſalina, who had been formerly married to Nero, and whom he himſelf had deſigned to marry, recommending to her his memory and aſhes. While he was thus exerciſing his thoughts about his laſt moments, a ſudden tumult interrupted him; for notice was brought him of an uproar among the ſoldiers, who threatened with preſent death all who were about to depart, as traitors and deſerters. Againſt Verginius chiefly they were enraged, and had already beſieged his houſe, which for his ſecurity he had ſhut up. Hereupon Otho, appearing again, reprimanded the authors of the inſurrection, gave audience to ſuch as were departing, and continued thus employed till they were all gone in perfect ſafety. He then withdrew again to his chamber, which he left open till the night was far ſpent, allowing free entrance to all who were deſirous to ſee him. After this, having quenched his thirſt with a draught of cold water, he called for two daggers; and having carefully examined the points of both, he placed the ſharpeſt under his pillow. He next reſolved to be fully aſſured that his friends were all gone; which he no ſooner underſtood than he lay down, paſſing the night in perfect repoſe, and, as is affirmed, not without ſleep. At break of day he took the dagger, and gave himſelf a mortal ſtab on the left ſide of the breaſt. Upon hearing him groan, his freedmen entered and his ſlaves, with Plotius Firmus, captain of his guards, and found no more than one wound. His death was no ſooner divulged, than the whole place reſounded with the mournful cries of the ſoldiers, accuſing themſelves, with the deepeſt concern, for not watching him more carefully, and ſtriving to ſave a life which was laid down to preſerve theirs. His funeral was diſpatched with great expedition, (for ſuch had been his own deſire) to prevent his head being cut off and expoſed to public deriſion. The prætorian cohorts bore his corſe, magnificently attired, often kiſſing his wound, and his hand, and even paying him divine honours. At his funeral pile ſome of the ſoldiers ſlew themſelves; and others who were at Bedriacum,

His calm behaviour.

[n] Tacit. c. 46, 47. Plut. ibid. Dio, l. lxiv. p. 732, 733. Suet. c. 9.

His death.

Is lamented by the ſoldiery.

His obſequies.

cum, Placentia, and in other quarters, underſtanding the manner of his death, were ſo deeply and ſenſibly affected, that they ſlew one another, not caring to outlive a prince, whom they ſo tenderly loved. To him they raiſed a tomb of a mean ſtructure, and thence like to remain, with this epitaph only, To the Memory of Marcus Otho; which they thought the beſt ſecurity againſt any inſults from the conqueror[o]. Such was the end of Otho, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his age, after having reigned, according to ſome three months, according to others three months and five days. He derived his original from the municipal city of Tarentinum in Hetruria. His father had ſuſtained the dignity of conſul; his grandfather that of prætor. His mother's line was not of equal luſtre; but far from ſordid. He ſpent his tender years in idleneſs, in ſcandalous debaucheries his youth, and grew acceptable to Nero, purely by imitating his profligate life. To him therefore, as to the chief confident of his impure pleaſures, Nero committed the care of his beloved miſtreſs Poppæa Sabina, till he could accompliſh the removal of Octavia his wife; but ſoon ſuſpecting him for a rival, he ſent him into Luſitania; where the adminiſtration of that province furniſhed a pretence for keeping him from Rome. In Luſitania he governed with gentleneſs and popularity, was the foremoſt to eſpouſe the cauſe of Galba, and promoted it with vigour. Thence he conceived hopes of being by him adopted and declared his ſucceſſor; but finding himſelf diſappointed, and ſeeing nothing but deſpair in the quiet and eſtabliſhment of the ſtate, (for he lived in a courſe of riot and expence, which even to the fortune of a ſovereign would have proved burthenſome) he revolted from Galba, and ſeized the empire in the manner we have related. His death was much applauded, as his life was cenſured; for though he had lived like Nero, yet he left this character behind him, that no one ever died more gloriouſly[p]: and indeed nothing can be more glorious in a man, than to ſacrifice his life for the good of his country.

His character.

After the death of Otho, the ſoldiers began anew to mutiny; nor was there any one to reſtrain them. They applied to Verginius, preſſing him with many entreaties and menaces, to accept the ſovereignty, or at leaſt to go as their [o] Tacit. c. 49. Suet. c. 11. Plut. ibid. [p] Tacit. c. 50. Suet. Plut. ibid.

their embaſſador to Cæcina and Valens. Already they were breaking into his houſe, when he, by a back way, ſtole out and eſcaped them. But Rubrius Gallus, a perſon of great note, immediately undertook the embaſſy to Vitellius's commanders, and obtained pardon for all the troops that lay at Brixellum; and at the ſame time Flavius Sabinus prevailed upon the forces under his command to go over to the conqueror; ſo that war had now every-where ceaſed, and peace was at once re-eſtabliſhed. Many ſenators had accompanied Otho from Rome, and had been afterwards by him left with a ſmall body of troops at Mutina. The ſenators found themſelves expoſed there to great danger; for news being brought thither of the defeat, the ſoldiers ſlighted it as a report void of truth; and ſuſpecting the ſenate to be diſaffected to Otho, they watched the words of particulars, and wreſted even their countenances and behaviour to a malignant ſenſe. At laſt they proceeded to inſult them with invectives, and ſeemed only to want a pretence of putting them all to the ſword. On the other hand, they were afraid of being deemed diſſaffected to Vitellius, whoſe brother was among them, if they ſeemed ſlow and cool in their rejoicings for the victory. They reſolved therefore to return as far as Bononia, and wait there for other advices more certain and copious. They poſted men upon the ſeveral roads leading to the city, purpoſely to examine ſuch as paſſed. By theſe one of Otho's freed-men being queſtioned, why he had left his lord? anſwered, That he had about him his lord's laſt will and commands; that he had left him indeed alive, but fixed in his purpoſe of dying, and of ſacrificing his life to the public tranquility. Hereupon they immediately declared for Vitellius, whoſe brother now preſented himſelf to be flattered, as did all the ſenators to flatter him; when on a ſudden one Cœnus, a freed-man of Nero's, arriving, affirmed, that by the arrival of the fourteenth legion, in conjunction with the forces from Brixellum, the army which had lately conquered, was entirely routed, and the fortune of the other party retrieved and changed. What prompted him to ſuch forgery was, that Otho's warrants for poſt-horſes, which were now neglected, might by ſuch tidings be reſtored to force: and truly Cœnus was by this means with great ſpeed carried to Rome; but there, a few days after, put to death by Vitellius's orders. The fiction, however, was believed by the ſoldiers, who began anew to threaten the ſenators for having having departed from Mutina, and declared for Vitellius; inſomuch, that they were obliged to conceal themſelves, not daring for fear of the incenſed ſoldiery, to appear abroad, till letters from Fabius Valens, aſſuring them of Otho's death, removed their fright [q].

Otho's troops ſubmit to Vitellius.

Rome was, in the mean time, free from all terror and alarm; the interludes ſacred to Ceres, which yearly began on the twelfth, and ended on the nineteenth, of April, were celebrating, when news was brought into the theatre, that Otho had by a voluntary death, put an end to his life. Hereupon, the ſpectators with loud ſhouts applauded the name of the new emperor, uttering againſt Otho the ſame invectives which a little before they had uttered againſt Vitellius. The troops in the city immediately ſwore allegiance to Vitellius. The people carried the images of Galba round the temples, crowned with laurels and adorned with flowers, and piled up heaps of coronets, after the manner of a ſepulchre, cloſe by the lake of Curtius, where Galba had been ſlain. In the ſenate the many honours given to former princes at intervals, and during a long courſe of reigning, were at once decreed to Vitellius. On the German armies high commendations were beſtowed, and an embaſſy ſent to return them public thanks, and congratulate them upon their late victory. The letters addreſſed by Fabius Valens to the conſuls Verginius Rufus and Poppæus Vopiſcus, of whom the firſt was abſent, were publicly read, and found to be conceived in terms no-ways arrogant; but more applauded was the modeſty of Cæcina, who had not ſent any, it being deemed aſſuming in any but the emperor to write to the ſenate and magiſtrates [r]. In the mean time, Italy was afflicted with greater calamities than ſhe had ſuffered during the war. The ſoldiers of Vitellius, diſtributed amongſt the cities and municipal towns, committed moſt dreadful devaſtations, without ſparing even the temple. Some, in the diſguiſe of ſoldiers, killed their particular enemies; and the ſoldiers themſelves, as they were well acquainted with the country, marking out the richeſt inhabitants, plundered their houſes and farms, putting all to fire and ſword without mercy, if any reſiſtance was offered. Their generals durſt not reſtrain them, being themſelves equally guilty over against Page 614. Vol. V.

Honours heaped upon Vitellius by the ſenate.

Italy miſerably afflicted.

[q] Tacit. c. 53, 54. [r] Idem, c. 55.

VITELLIUS.

VESPASIAN.

TITUS.

DOMITIAN.

Phillips Simmons Sculpt

guilty and awed by their men. Of the two Cæcina was leſs addicted to avarice, but courted the favour of the ſoldiery. Valens was himſelf infamous for pillage and rapine, and thence blind to the exceſſes of others. Thus, by ſo mighty a force of foot and horſe, by ſuch acts of violence, ſo many depredations and inſults, was Italy quite exhauſted, and many of the moſt wealthy inhabitants reduced to beggary [s].

Vitellius receives intelligence of the victory at Bedriacum.

VITELLIUS, in the mean time, not yet appriſed of the ſucceſs of his own arms, having left Hordeonius Flaccus with a ſufficient force to guard the banks of the Rhine, was marching towards Italy with the reſidue of the German army, reinforced with eight thouſand men drawn from Britain, and freſh levies haſtily made amongſt the Gauls. After a few days march, he received the agreeable news of the victory at Bedriacum and the death of Otho. Hereupon, tranſported with joy, he aſſembled his men, and from the tribunal acquainted them with the intelligence he had received, beſtowing mighty praiſes upon the bravery of his victorious troops. The army, not yielding in the baſe arts of flattery to the ſenate, made him at this juncture a general requeſt, that he would raiſe his favourite freed-man Aſiaticus to the equeſtrian dignity. The emperor, with ſeeming indignation, rejected their demand; but what in the face of the public he had refuſed, he ſoon after privately conferred at a banquet, honouring Aſiaticus, a moſt infamous and rapacious ſlave, with the gold ring, the badge of knighthood. This proceeding was not a little reſented by the ſoldiery. As he was marching through Gaul, other meſſengers came with tidings, that to his party had acceded both the Mauritanias, viz. the Tingitana and Cæſarienſis; Lucius Albinus, who, in quality of procurator, governed there and had declared for Otho, being killed by the Moors, upon a report, that Albinus, ſcorning the title of procurator, intended to uſurp the enſigns of majeſty and the royal name of Juba. With him were ſlain Aſinius Pollio, who commanded a body of horſe, Feſtus and Scipio, both captains of cohorts, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. Into theſe tranſactions Vitellius made no enquiry, nor took any notice of the murder of ſo many great men, an haſty hearing being all he afforded to any affair, however important. His army he com-

Both the Mauritanias declare for him.

manded

[s] Idem, c. 56.

He purſues his march to Italy.

manded to purſue their march by land; he himſelf ſailed down the Saône, without the luſtre and appointment of an emperor, till Junius Blæſus, governor of Lioneſe Gaul, a man of great generoſity and proportionable wealth, furniſhed him with a princely train, and accompanied him with great ſtate and magnificence. But this very behaviour provoked Vitellius againſt him, tho' he then diſguiſed his averſion under many courteous expreſſions. At Lions he was met by the generals of both parties, the conquerors and the conquered. Valens and Cæcina he commended in public, and placed them on each ſide his chair of ſtate. Soon after he ordered the whole army to march out and meet his ſon, yet an infant, who was brought covered with an imperial coat of armour. His father, taking him thus dreſſed in his arms, beſtowed upon him the ſurname of Germanicus, and all the marks of ſovereignty. He freely forgave Salvius Titianus, Otho's brother, the inſtinct and tenderneſs of nature, which had prompted him to eſpouſe his brother's cauſe, and his own want of abilities pleading for him.

How he treated the generals of Otho.

Of Marius Celſus we are only told, that Vitellius reſerved for him the conſulſhip, to which he had been formerly deſigned, and which he was to diſcharge in the month of July. He long poſtponed admitting Suetonius Paulinus and Licinius Proculus, keeping them in ſuſpenſe like criminals. At length he heard them, when they both made a defence rather neceſſary than honourable; nay, altogether unworthy of a man of Paulinus's character; for upon themſelves they freely took the ſhame of treaſon, aſcribing to a fraud concerted between them the long march before the battle, the great fatigue of Otho's ſoldiers, the intermixing the carriages among the troops, when drawn up in battle-array, &c. Vitellius gave credit to the confeſſion of their treachery, and forgave them the crime of fidelity, with which they were charged. Galerius Trachalus, who compoſed Otho's ſpeech, was ſaved by Galeria, the wife of Vitellius. But all the centurions, who had ſignalized their faith and bravery in the cauſe of Otho, were by the new emperor's orders put to the ſword; which eſtranged from him the minds of the ſoldiery, eſpecially of the Illyrian legions. However, he ſuffered the laſt wills of ſuch as died fighting for Otho to continue in force, and the law in behalf of thoſe who died inteſtate.

Sends ſeveral edicts to Rome.

Before him he ſent an edict to Rome, to ſignify, that he deferred receiving the name of Auguſtus, and and would not at all accept that of Cæſar. By another, he ordered the aſtrologers to depart Italy by the calends of October; which was no ſooner publiſhed, than a libel was hung up in the ſame ſtyle, ordering, in the name of the aſtrologers, Vitellius Germanicus to quit the world by the ſame day; which ſo incenſed him againſt all thoſe of that profeſſion, that no ſooner was any of them detected, than he cauſed them, without further enquiry, to be forthwith executed. By a third edict he enjoined, under a heavy penalty, that thenceforth no Roman knight ſhould debaſe himſelf to fight among the gladiators, or with the wild beaſts; a practice which had been greatly encouraged by former emperors. Before Vitellius left Lions, he diſpatched orders to Rome, for the execution of Dolabella, who had been confined by Otho, as we have related above, to the city of Aquinum, and, upon tidings of the death of that prince, was returned to Rome. The crimes alledged againſt him were, that he had broke out of priſon, and, preſenting himſelf as a new leader to the vanquiſhed party, had attempted to corrupt the cohort quartered at Oſtia. Theſe crimes were urged againſt him before Flavius Sabinus, governor of the city, by Plautius Varus, a man of prætorian dignity and one of Dolabella's intimate friends. The charge of treaſon could not be proved; but nevertheleſs Vitellius, who dreaded a man of his birth and abilities, and likewiſe hated him on account of his having married Petronia, his divorced wife, reſolved by all means to get rid of one, whom he looked upon as a competitor. Having therefore ſent for him from Rome, and directed him in the letter he wrote to him, not to take the Flaminian road, but to come round by Interamna, now Terni, he placed aſſaſſins there, with orders privately to diſpatch him; but they, without waiting till he arrived at the place appointed, cut his throat in an inn upon the way, while he was not under the leaſt apprehenſion of danger [t]. This inſtance of cruelty raiſed great murmurs both among the people and nobility, and upon the new reign derived univerſal hatred and abhorrence.

Dolabella falſly accuſed.

And maſſacred by Vitellius's order.

From Lions Vitellius removed to Vienne, where he publicly adminiſtered juſtice, and thence continued his rout to Italy. As he was a man of a moſt voracious appetite, which Vitellius's gluttony.

[t] Idem, c. 63.——65.

which Tacitus ſtyles quite beaſtly and boundleſs, and greatly addicted to banquetting, from Rome and Italy were brought him dainties of all ſorts, and every incentive to gluttony, the roads from both ſeas being continually filled with carriers loaded with viands for the emperor's table. The chief men of the municipal cities through which he paſſed, were quite beggared by their magnificent feaſts, that being the only means of making court to the new prince. The ſoldiers, following the example of their leader, rioted in all manner of exceſſes, plundering and laying waſte, without controul, the cities, villages, and farms contiguous to the road. The emperor was overtaken on his rout, by Marcus Cluvius Rufus, governor of Spain, who came to clear himſelf of the crimes with which he was charged by Hilarius, the emperor's freed-man, who urged, that, upon advice of the conteſt between Otho and Vitellius, Cluvius had attempted to eſtabliſh an independent principality, and to appropriate to himſelf both the provinces of Spain. But, the charge appearing groundleſs, Vitellius ordered his freed-man to be puniſhed, and took Cluvius into the number of his chief favourites, commanding him to attend him, without depriving him of the government of Spain, which he ſtill adminiſtered, though abſent. The like honour was not ſhewn to Trebellius Maximus, who had fled out of Britain, frightened by the menaces of the ſoldiers there. In his room he ſent Vetius Bolanus, then attending at court. Vitellius arriving in Italy, found the country filled with troops, thoſe of his own army and the army of Otho, diſperſed amongſt the villages and municipal towns, and mixed together; which occaſioned continual quarrels, and innumerable diſorders: for the vanquiſhed legions continued ſtill in their former diſaffection, and breathed nothing but war. The emperor therefore reſolved to ſeparate them, and deliver Italy from ſo heavy a burden. The fourteenth legion was accordingly remanded back to Britain, from whence they had been by Nero called over. With them were ſent the Batavian cohorts, who had fought for Vitellius; whereas the legion had eſpouſed the cauſe of Otho; and hence a ſource of perpetual quarrels. At Turin eſpecially a tragical battle had enſued, while a Batavian inſulted an artificer, as having defrauded him, and a ſoldier of the legion protected the artificer, as his hoſt, had not two prætorian cohorts quartered there, by eſpouſing the party of the legionaries, intimid-

He receives Cluvius Rufus into favour.

He ſeparates the diſaffected forces.

intimidated the Batavians as the weaker. The emperor, when informed of their disagreement, ordered the Batavians, as men in whom he could confide, to be incorporated with his own army, and the legion to be led forthwith over the Alps, bending their rout so as to avoid Vienne; which city was thought to be disaffected to Vitellius. But, notwithstanding this order, they no sooner descended from the Alps, than they turned their ensigns to Vienne, and were marching thither, till such as were prone to mutiny were by the better-disposed prevailed upon to march back, in compliance with the emperor's orders, and pursue their rout to the coast of the ocean, whence they were transported in a body to Britain. In the next place, the prætorian cohorts were first separated, and then discharged; but sweetened with the rewards which were bestowed upon such as had fully served their term of warfare. The first legion of marines was sent into Spain, to be there tamed with tranquillity and repose. The seventh and eleventh were sent back to their old quarters in Dalmatia and Pannonia. The thirteenth was kept in Italy, and there employed in erecting two amphitheatres, since Cæcina and Valens were preparing each a public combat of gladiators, the former at Cremona, the other at Bononia. Thus Vitellius parted and dispersed, without the least noise or disturbance, the disaffected troops which had served under Otho; but had not authority enough to restrain the licentiousness of his own army. As the officers, and even the common soldiers, usually adopt the manners of their emperors, about Vitellius was seen only universal disorder, universal drunkenness, and all things rather resembling nocturnal revellings and the debauchees of Bacchanals, than a Roman army and military discipline. In this situation a tumult arose, which derived its beginning from matter of pastime, but was not quelled without much bloodshed. Two soldiers, one of the fifth legion, the other from amongst the auxiliary Gauls, having, while they sported together, provoked each other to wrestle, the legionary was thrown down, and the Gaul triumphed over him with great scorn. This immediately divided those, who had assembled only as beholders, into two parties; insomuch, that the soldiers of the legions, falling with fury upon the auxiliaries, put two cohorts to the sword. But this tumult was in the end composed by another; for dust and the lustre of arms being discerned at a distance, a general cry ran in an instant through the whole army, that the fourteenth legion had returned, and was approaching with hostile minds; for they were known to be disaffected to Vitellius. Hereupon they all joined to oppose the common enemy. But their fear was soon allayed; for it proved the rear of their own army. However, as they chanced, in the mean time, to meet a slave belonging to Verginius, they charged him as one employed to assassinate Vitellius; and, rushing into the banqueting room, insisted, that Verginius should be put to death. Tho' Vitellius entertained not the least doubt about the innocence of Verginius, yet it was with the utmost difficulty that he prevailed upon the enraged soldiery, to forbear shedding the blood of one, who had borne the supreme dignity of consul, and been once their own general [u].

Frequent disturbances amongst the troops of Vitellius.

The next day, Vitellius gave audience to the embassadors from the senate, whom he had ordered to wait for him at Ticinum, now Pavia; then he entered the camp of the victorious army, where he was received with loud shouts and joyful acclamations. After he had commended the zeal and bravery of the conquering legions, and promised them their usual rewards, he sent back to their own country the eighteen Batavian cohorts, which had attended him in his journey, having found by experience, that they were altogether ungovernable and too prone to mutiny. He likewise dismissed to their several territories all the auxiliary Gauls, who had been levied in the beginning of the war. At the same time, that the revenues of the empire, already exhausted, might be able to supply his wild extravagancies, he ordered the number of men in the legions and auxiliaries to be retrenched, put a stop to further levies, and granted discharges to all who required them; which, to those who continued in the service, proved matter of great disgust, since upon them, now reduced to a few, rested all the military duties before shared amongst many. From Ticinum the emperor bent his rout to Cremona, where he beheld the public sports, exhibited with extraordinary magnificence by Caecina. While he was there, he conceived a desire of viewing the field of battle at Bedriacum, and surveying the scene of the recent victory. As the battle had been fought not quite forty days before, the field was still covered with bodies all rent and deformed, with torn and mangled limbs, car-

He disbands several troops

He surveys the field of battle.

[u] Idem, c. 65—69.

cases

caſſes of men and horſes putrified, and the ground dyed with corruption and gore; all the trees felled, the corn trod down, and the whole a ſhocking ſcene of cruelty, ſlaughter, and deſtruction. The emperor, however, perſiſted in his reſolution, and with a great retinue ſet out for Bedriacum; the people of Cremona ſtrewing the road with flowers and laurel, rearing altars, and ſacrificing victims, even where the ghaſtly remains of their ſlaughtered countrymen were ſtill to be ſeen. Cæcina and Valens accompanied him, and pointed out the ſeveral quarters of the combat. Here the legions begun the onſet; here the horſe in a body ruſhed upon the enemy's ſquadrons; from thence the auxiliaries fell upon the rear; in this place the one-and-twentieth legion engaged and routed the firſt; in that the thirteenth was put to flight by the fifth, &c. The tribunes and commanders of the ſeveral legions recounted and heightened, by boaſts and invention, their own feats of bravery. The common ſoldiers too, turning aſide from the road to review the field, from ſpace to ſpace, called to mind the ſeveral conflicts paſſed, ſome with ſhouts of joy, but many not without concern, and even tears, in beholding the bodies of the ſlain, mingled in heaps with the carcaſſes of horſes and other beaſts of burden. As for Vitellius, he turned not once his eyes from a ſpectacle ſo tragical, nor ſhewed he the leaſt horror at the ſight of ſo many thouſand Roman citizens ſlain and unburied; nay, he even teſtifyed joy, and offered a pompous ſacrifice to the tutelar gods of the place [w]. Suetonius writes, that ſome of his train being offended with the ſtench of the half-putrified bodies, the emperor was ſo imprudent as to tell them, "A dead enemy ſmells well, but a dead citizen better;" evidently betraying, by that impious ſaying, his natural bent to cruelty and bloodſhed. The ſame writer adds, that afterwards calling for a large quantity of wine, he firſt drank plentifully himſelf, and then cauſed the reſt to be diſtributed amongſt his ſoldiers [x]. From Bedriacum, Vitellius purſued his rout to Bononia; and the nearer he advanced to that place, his march proved the more looſe and debauched. Amongſt his military bands were blended bands of the comedians and herds of eunuchs, agreeable to the genius of the court in Nero's reign: for of him Vitellius always ſpoke with admiration and praiſe. At Bononia he aſſiſted at the combat of gladiators exhibited by Valens, which was extremely

A ſingular inſtance of the cruelty of Vitellius.

[w] Idem, c. 70, 71.

[x] Suet. ibid. c. 9.

pompous and magnificent, all the decorations of the entertainment having been brought from Rome. Before he ſet out from thence, that he might to Valens and Cæcina procure ſome vacant months for exerciſing the conſulſhip, he abridged the term appointed for others, and Valerius Marinus, deſigned conſul by Galba, he poſtponed to a farther time, for no offence given, but becauſe Valerius was a man apt to acquieſce under any injury. As he was on his march from Bononia, he received letters from his friends in Syria and Judæa, informing him, that the provinces in the eaſt had taken the oath of fidelity to him. As he dreaded Veſpaſian and upon the very mention of his name was frequently obſerved to ſtart, he no ſooner received theſe tidings, than both he and his army, having now no rival power to fear, abandoned themſelves to all the exceſſes of cruelty, luſt, and rapine. In all the great towns through which he paſſed, every pleaſure, and every diverſion, proved a bait to ſtop him. He entered the cities in a kind of triumph, and ſtirred not upon the rivers but in his painted galleys, curiouſly adorned with garlands of flowers, and plentifully ſtored with the moſt exquiſite delicacies and incentives to gluttony. He was accompanied by threeſcore thouſand armed men, a greater number of retainers to the camp, and an immenſe multitude of buffoons, mimics, players, ſingers, charioteers, &c. for in ſuch diſgraceful familiarities he took great pleaſure. Among theſe there was no order or diſcipline; nay, their rapines and daily diſorders, however inſupportable, proved to the emperor matter of ſport and diverſion. Hence, not ſatisfied with free quarters where-ever they came, they infranchiſed ſlaves, plundered the houſes of their hoſts, inſulted their wives and children, and, where any reſiſtance was offered, beat, wounded, and killed at their pleaſure; for tho' they were conſtantly quarrelling among themſelves, yet, in conteſting with the peaſants, they were always unanimous. Not only the colonies, villages, and municipal cities were conſumed by furniſhing ſuch vaſt ſupplies of proviſion; but, as the grain was then ripe, the lands were ſtript and laid waſte. As the emperor drew near Rome, the crowd, great in itſelf, was encreaſed by the arrival of the ſenators and Roman knights, who came out to meet the emperor; a compliment which ſome paid out of fear, others out of flattery. When the mighty multitude was within ſeven miles of Rome, Vitellius cauſed a quantity of meat ready dreſſed

His army let themſelves loſe to ſpoil and ravage.

to be distributed among the soldiers, to every man his portion, as if he had been fattening a number of gladiators. In the mean time, the populace, who came in droves to the camp and were scattered all over it, while the soldiers heeded them not, cut and conveyed away their belts without being perceived; which it seems, was a joke in great vogue with the multitude and the rabble of the city. But the soldiers, who were strangers to such jokes, and could not brook them, upon being asked by way of derision, what was become of their belts? ran to arms, and with their drawn swords falling upon the disarmed multitude, slaughtered great numbers of them, which occasioned a general alarm and consternation in the city. When the tumult in the camp was composed, Vitellius, mounted upon a stately courser and in his coat of armour, with his sword by his side, began to advance to the gates of the city, ordering the senate and people to march before him. But being advised by his friends not to enter the city in his warlike dress, as if it had been taken by storm, he put on the senatorial robe, and made an entry altogether orderly and pacific, surrounded with standards and colours, and followed by his numerous troops; the whole a glorious sight, and an army worthy of a better emperor[y]. In this state he went to the capitol, to offer sacrifice to Jupiter; and there finding his mother Sextilia, embraced and honoured her with the title of Augusta. From the capitol, he marched in the same pomp to the imperial palace. The next day, he assembled the senate, and made a public speech, in which he promised extraordinary advantages from his administration, uttered high and pompous things of himself, and chiefly enlarged upon his temperance, tho' all Italy had seen him, during his march, wallowing in voluptuousness and continually intoxicated with wine. The thoughtless multitude, however, broke out into loud acclamations and wishes; and, as he refused the title of Augustus, they pressed him so, that he accepted it at last with as much vanity as he had before refused it. He likewise took upon him the office of chief pontiff; but was so ignorant of religious rites, that a few days after, that is, on the eighteenth of July, he published an edict concerning the celebration of certain solemnities, tho' that day had been always held unlucky, because on it had happened the tragical overthrows at Cremera and Allia. His chief study

The populace slaughtered by the soldiery.

The emperor's entry into Rome.

His conduct

was

y Tacit. c. 87—89.

was to gain the good graces and applauſe of the rabble. With this view he frequented the theatre and circus, exhibited public ſhews, and did all that lay in his power to keep them in good humour. He went often to the ſenate, even when the deliberations were about things of ſmall moment. As Helvidius Priſcus, prætor elect, chanced to offer his ſentiments againſt thoſe of the emperor, he ſeemed at firſt to reſent it; but afterwards returning to himſelf, he anſwered the ſenators who interpoſed, that it was nothing new nor ſurpriſing, that two ſenators ſhould be of different opinions; and that he himſelf had often oppoſed Thraſea; a compariſon which was generally ridiculed. In room of the prætorian cohorts, which he had diſcharged, he raiſed ſixteen new ones and four city cohorts, each containing a thouſand choſen men. For captains of the prætorian guards, he appointed Publius Sabinus, raiſed from the command of a cohort, and Julius Priſcus then only a centurion. Priſcus owed his preferment to the intereſt of Valens, and Sabinus his to that of Cæcina; for by theſe two favourites all the functions of ſovereignty were diſcharged, and no portion of power left to Viteilius. They ſtrove to excel each other in credit and ſway, in greatneſs of train, in numerous levees and dependents; and hence were ever at variance with one another, their antient and mutual hatred, which, even during the war, had been ill-diſguiſed, being inflamed by the malignity of their ſeveral friends. However, this their animoſity did not render them more remiſs in ſeizing for themſelves fine houſes and gardens, and the wealth of the empire. Aſiaticus too, formerly the emperor's pathic and now his freed-man, had a great ſhare in the adminiſtration; for, before two months were elapſed, he is ſaid to have equalled in wealth all former imperial freedmen. As for Vitellius, he quite abandoned the functions of an emperor, reſigning himſelf entirely to riot, luxury, and gluttony. In his court no man ſtrove to riſe by virtue or ability. One only road there was to preferment, namely, by means of conſuming banquets, to gorge the appetite of the emperor, ever craving, and never ſatisfied. He eat conſtantly three, and often four and five, meals a day, having brought himſelf to an habit of diſcharging his ſtomach by vomiting when he pleaſed. All his meals were expenſive almoſt beyond belief, but not always at his own charge; for he frequently invited himſelf to his friends houſes to breakfaſt in one place, to dine in another, and to ſup in a third, third, all on the ſame day. He was every where entertained in a moſt ſumptuous and expenſive manner: but of all theſe entertainments the moſt memorable was made for him by Lucius his brother; in which, if Suetonius [z] and Eutropius [a] are to be credited, two thouſand different diſhes of fiſh and ſeven thouſand of fowl were ſerved up; the choiceſt of both ſorts that the ſea and land afforded. His own profuſeneſs fell not much ſhort of his brother's at the dedication of a charger, which by reaſon of its vaſtneſs and capacity, he termed the target of Minerva. It was nevertheleſs filled with the ſounds of the fiſh called ſcari, the brains of pheaſants and peacocks, the tongues of birds called phænicopteri, and the ſmall guts of lampries, brought from the Carpathian ſea and the farthermoſt coaſts of Spain. As he judged it ſufficient to enjoy preſent pleaſures, without troubling himſelf about future events, he ſquandered away in banquets above ſeven milions of our money in four months time [b]; nay, Joſephus tells us, that if he had reigned long, the whole wealth of the empire would not have been ſufficient to ſupply the expence of his table. Beſides the vaſt ſums he conſumed by his riotous living, he erected at a great charge ſtables for the uſe of charioteers, exhibited almoſt daily ſhews in the circus, combats in the theatre and amphitheatre, thoſe of gladiators, thoſe of wild beaſts, and in the moſt flowing plenty wantonly ſcattered treaſure. But nothing gave greater diſguſt to the virtuous, tho' it proved matter of joy to the profligate and debauched, than his ſolemnizing with great pomp in the field of Mars the obſequies of Nero, and obliging the Auguſtal prieſts, an order by Tiberius conſecrated to the Julian family, to aſſiſt at that ceremony [c].

His favourites uſurp all the power.

His gluttony and profuſeneſs.

WHILE Vitellius was thus waſting the wealth of the empire in voluptuouſneſs and conſuming banquets, fortune, or rather providence, was raiſing him a competitor in a diſtant part of the world. Veſpaſian had been ſent by Nero as we have related elſewhere, with three legions and a conſiderable number of auxiliaries, to make war upon the Jews, which he was carrying on with great ſucceſs, when news was brought him of the death of that prince and the acceſſion of Galba to the empire. Hereupon he immediately

The ſtate of affairs in the eaſt.

[z] Suet. c. 13. [a] Eutrop. p. 720. [b] Tacit. c. 95. [c] Idem ibid.

ately dispatched his son Titus to pay homage to the new emperor, and to receive his orders concerning the prosecution of the war. But receiving upon his arrival at Corinth, as he had been long stopped by contrary winds, certain advice of the murder of Galba, and at the same time understanding that Vitellius had taken up arms and designed to dispute the empire with Otho, he resolved to return to Judæa, to receive there farther instructions from his father. Having therefore left Greece, he steered his course to the island of Rhode, to that of Cyprus, and thence to Syria. In the island of Cyprus his curiosity prompted him to visit the temple of Venus at Paphos, which was at that time highly renowned amongst the natives as well as foreigners. After he had surveyed the signal wealth of the temple, the donations of princes, and other curiosities, he began to consult the oracle, first concerning the security of his voyage, and then proposed, but in dark terms, questions concerning himself. The priest, by name Sostratus, returned him in public a short answer, but desired a secret interview, wherein he disclosed to him his future grandeur. Hereupon, full of hopes, he proceeded to his father; but before his arrival the armies in the east had already sworn fidelity to Otho. In Judæa three legions, as we have hinted above, were under the command of Vespasian; men thoroughly exercised in war. Mucianus governed Syria at the head of four legions. Between these two commanders, as they ruled in two bordering provinces, great animosities had reigned; which, however, they dropped upon the death of Nero, and agreed to act in concert for their mutual security and interest. This union was first begun by the interposition of their common friends, and afterwards accomplished by Titus. Into the same confederacy were gained the tribunes, the centurions, and by degrees the common soldiers, who, upon hearing that Otho and Vitellius were contending for the empire, began to rage and complain, that while others enjoyed rewards for bestowing the empire, they alone were doomed slaves to every emperor. The ardour of the soldiery was well known to the generals; but they judged proper to wait the issue of the war between Otho and Vitellius. Nay, even after Otho's death, Vespasian took the usual oath to Vitellius, and wished him a prosperous reign in presence of his army, as a precedent for them to follow. His troops heard him with disgust and silence, and were not without great difficulty prevailed upon to take the same oath, thinking themselves no less able to create and support an emperor, than the German legions or the prætorian bands. They were ſeven legions with mighty auxiliaries, and the two provinces of Syria and Judæa, were in their poſſeſſion: to them lay contiguous that of Egypt, which was governed by Tiberius Alexander, by birth an Egyptian, at the head of two legions. Several forces were quartered in Cappadocia and Pontus, upon the frontiers of Armenia, in Aſia and the other provinces. The governor of Egypt, who was entirely addicted to Veſpaſian, accounted for his own the third legion then in Mœſia, ſince it had been tranſlated thither out of Egypt. Hopes too were entertained, that the other legions in Illyricum would eſpouſe the ſame intereſt. Veſpaſian, however, continued ſtill in ſuſpenſe, conſidering with himſelf, how dangerous it was to caſt himſelf, at the age of ſixty, and his two ſons Titus and Domitian in the prime of their years, upon the caprice of fortune and fate of war: in private purſuit, room was always left for retreat; but to thoſe who ſtrive for the ſovereignty, no middle lot remains; they muſt either reign or periſh. At the ſame time, he had before his eyes the great ſtrength of the German army; a thing perfectly known to him, who was a man of great experience in war. However he yielded at length to the ſolicitations of Mucianus and the other officers, promiſing to aſſume the title of emperor, when a proper opportunity offered. Hereupon the two commanders, after having ſpent ſeveral days in private conferences, parted, Mucianus to Antioch, and Veſpaſian to Cæſarea, the former the metropolis of Syria, the latter of Judæa. In the mean time, at Alexandria was begun the example of acknowledging Veſpaſian for emperor, through the haſte and zeal of Tiberius Alexander, who brought the legion there to ſwear allegiance to him on the firſt of July, which was the day ever afterwards kept and ſolemnized as the firſt of his reign. The army in Judæa took to him in perſon the ſame oath on the third of July, with ſuch ardour, that they would not wait the arrival of Titus, who was then on his journey back from Syria, where he had been concerting meaſures with Mucianus. Theſe glad tidings no ſooner reached Syria, than Mucianus adminiſtered to his ſoldiers, who were themſelves well-diſpoſed, the oath to Veſpaſian. Before the fifteenth of July the whole province of Syria had taken the ſame oath. To the party too acceded Sohemus king of Edeſſa, Antiochus king of Comagene, and Agrippa king of Ituræa, ræa, who was returned with great expedition from Rome, upon private intelligence conveyed to him by his friends concerning the tranſactions in the eaſt. Allegiance was likewiſe ſworn by all the maritime provinces, extending to Aſia and Achaia, and by all the inland regions bordering upon Pontus and the two Armenias [d].

Vespasian and Mucianus enter into an alliance for their mutual defence.

Veſpaſian proclaimed emperor.

He eſtabliſhes a council at Berytus.

Vespasian, having now taken upon him the imperial authority, eſtabliſhed in the firſt place, at Berytus in Phœnicia, a council for the direction of all important affairs. Thither repaired Mucianus, with a train of general officers and tribunes, and of all ſuch centurions and private men as made a ſignal appearance. From the army too in Judæa came a great number of the principal officers, who, while they ſtrove to ſurpaſs each other in pomp and parade, furniſhed the appearance of the court and grandeur of an emperor. The firſt ſtep taken for proſecuting the war was, to inliſt men, and to recal to the ſervice the diſmiſſed veterans. Fortified cities were allotted for forging of arms. At Antioch money was coined, gold and ſilver. All theſe undertakings were, in their ſeveral quarters, diligently diſpatched by careful and capable inſpectors. To the kings of Parthia and Armenia, Vologeſes and his brother Tiridates, embaſſadors were ſent; and at the ſame time proviſions was made, that, when the legions were withdrawn to proſecute the civil war, the countries behind ſhould not be left naked and defenceleſs. It was reſolved in a council of all the chief officers, that Titus ſhould carry on the war in Judæa, Veſpaſian ſeize the ſtreights leading into Egypt, and Mucianus with part of the forces encounter Vitellius. To all the generals and armies letters were ſent, with orders to invite to arms, with the promiſe of great rewards, the prætorian ſoldiers which had been diſbanded by Vitellius. In the mean time, Mucianus, at the head of the ſixth legion, and thirteen thouſand veterans, began his march, acting rather like a collegue, than a miniſter, of the emperor. He bent his rout through Cappadocia and Phrygia to Byzantium, where he had ordered the fleet to attend him. He loaded the countries, through which he paſſed, with exorbitant taxes; for which, however, the craving

His preparations for war.

[d] Tacit. c. 72——81 Suet. in Veſp, c. 9. Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 36.

craving neceſſities of war furniſhed an excuſe. Out of his own treaſure too he helped to ſupport the war; thus liberal of a private ſum, which he was ſure to repay himſelf with uſury out of the public. The reſt contributed after his example; but few were found who recovered their ſhare [c].

The Illyrian army declares for Veſpaſian.

In the mean time, the Illyrian army, upon advice that the legions in the eaſt had declared Veſpaſian emperor, eſpouſed the ſame party with extraordinary zeal. The third legion, then in Mœſia, was the foremoſt; the eighth and the ſeventh, entitled Claudiana, followed the example of the third, being both devoted to Veſpaſian, though they had not been in the laſt fight. They had indeed advanced as far as Aquileia, and there hearing melancholy tidings of Otho, inſulted thoſe who brought them, rent the ſtandards bearing the name of Vitellius, and, ſharing the public money amongſt themſelves, acted with open hoſtility. Hence, conſidering that they might urge to Veſpaſian theſe acts of violence as matter of ſervice and merit, whereas they muſt expect to be puniſhed for them by Vitellius, they not only declared for the former, but by letters ſolicited the army in Pannonia into the confederacy, and were preparing to have recourſe to force, if they refuſed. In Pannonia the thirteenth legion and the ſeventh, called after the name of Galba, acceded without heſitation to the cauſe of Veſpaſian, being chiefly inſtigated by Antonius Primus. He was a native of Toloufe; and there, while he was a youth, known by the nick-name of Beccoc, or rather Beccoc, which in the language of the Gauls, ſignified the bill of a cock. He had been degraded under Nero from the ſenatorial dignity, for forging a will; but reſtored to his rank by Galba, who likewiſe preferred him to the command of the ſeventh legion. He was believed to have made frequent applications to Otho by letters, offering to ſerve him in the capacity of general; but being by him neglected, he had borne no ſhare in that war. When he found, that Veſpaſian was likely to prevail, abandoning Vitellius, he betook himſelf to him, and proved a mighty addition to the cauſe; for he was a man of great perſonal bravery, daring, and enterpriſing, a prompt ſpeaker, powerful in popular tumults, and tho' rapacious, profuſe,

And the Pannonian legions.

The character of Antonius Primus.

[c] Tacit. 82——84. Joſeph. ibid. c. 40.

fuſe, and in peace altogether wicked and corrupt, yet very uſeful in war. The Mœſian and Pannonian armies drew after them the forces in Dalmatia. Into Britain too diſpatches were ſent to the fourteenth legion, others into Spain to the firſt; for they had both engaged for Otho againſt Vitellius. At the ſame time, letters were diſperſed over all the territories of the Gauls [f].

Vitellius hears of the revolt.

Vitellius firſt informed of the revolt of the third legion in Mœſia; which intelligence was conveyed to him by Aponius Saturninus, who commanded in that province; but much ſoftened and qualified. The emperor's friends too, ſoothing him with flattering ſpeeches, took care to put favourable conſtructions upon the ill tidings. Vitellius himſelf, in a harangue to the ſoldiers, inveighed againſt the prætorians lately diſcharged, as if they had publiſhed lying reports, and aſſured both the ſoldiery and people, that there was no ground to fear a civil war. The name of Veſpaſian he took care to ſuppreſs, and diſperſed ſoldiers all over the city, with directions to ſilence the rumour among the populace; a precaution which greatly encreaſed the public alarm.

Sends for ſuccours.

From Germany, however, from Britain, and from both Spains, he ſent for ſuccours, but in a very negligent manner, the better to conceal the neceſſity which preſſed him. In the provinces and commanders of the provinces, no leſs remiſſneſs was found: Hordeonius Flaccus, who commanded in Germany, and Vettius Bolanus, governor of Britain, were wavering in their fidelity to Vitellius; nor in Spain was there any forwardneſs or expedition ſhewn, the commanders of the three legions there, men equal in authority, (for over thoſe provinces preſided then no ruler of conſular dignity) watching the fortune of the war, and being ready to follow it.

Africa faithful to him.

In Africa, the legion and cohort levied by Clodius Macer, and afterwards diſcharged by Galba, upon orders from Vitellius, returned to the ſervice. The youth too of the province offered themſelves to be inliſted with ſignal alacrity, Vitellius having ruled there as pro-conſul with great uprightneſs, as had Veſpaſian in the ſame quality with ignominy and public hatred. Valerius Feſtus, governor of the province, promoted at firſt the inclinations of the people with exemplary emplary zeal; but ſoon after beginning to waver, while he aſſerted in public the cauſe of Vitellius, by ſecret intellience he encouraged that of Veſpaſian, being reſolved, whatever party prevailed, to maintain the juſtice of the ſtronger [g].

[f] Tacit. c. 85——87. Suet. c. 18. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 737.

THE meaſures concerted and agreed on by Veſpaſian and Mucianus were, that the Illyrian army ſhould advance as far as Aquileia, poſſeſs themſelves of the Pannonian Alps, and there wait, till their forces from all quarters behind them came up, in order to enter Italy the following year in a body. In the mean time, the fleet was to keep conſtantly cruizing both in the Mediterranean and Adriatic ſeas, in order to prevent the conveying of corn to Rome from Egypt, and proviſions from Achaia or Sicily. By this means they did not doubt, but Italy would be obliged to ſubmit without bloodſhed But theſe orders did not reach the Illyrian army, till it was too late to put them in execution; for the leaders of Veſpaſian's party in Illyricum, having held a council at Petovio, now Pettaw in Stiria upon the Drave, to deliberate, whether they ſhould content themſelves with guarding the paſſes of the Pannonian Alps, till the forces behind them advanced, or, by a reſolution more daring, march forward and venture a ſtruggle for Italy, ſome indeed, thought it adviſeable to wait the arrival of ſuccours, magnifying the fame and renown of the German legions; but Antonius Primus, who was againſt all delay, argued, that to themſelves diſpatch was altogether advantageous, and to Vitellius only pernicious; ſince the German legions, once indeed formidable, were, by haunting the circus and theatres, and following the idle diverſions of the city, at preſent utterly ſoftened and debauched, and dreadful to none but their hoſts; whereas, if time were allowed them, their antient vigour would ſtill return, by their applications to the cares and purſuits of war. Not far from them, added he, lies Germany, from whence a ſure recruit of forces; beyond the Channel, Britain; juſt by, Gaul, as alſo both Spains; from all a ready ſupply of men, horſes, and contributions. Italy itſelf is in their poſſeſſion, with the immenſe treaſures of Rome. The protracting of the war therefore to another ſummer will prove highly advantageous to them; but in this interval where ſhall we find proviſions?

Antonius Primus is for invading Italy with the Illyrian army.

[g] Tacit c. 96—98.

ſions? where money? Let us therefore delay no longer, but, with a bold puſh, make an irruption into the boundaries of Italy. The meaſures which I adviſe, I am reſolved to purſue. You, who are yet free to follow fortune on either ſide, ſtay, and with you detain the legions. To me a few cohorts, lightly equipped, will be ſufficient. You ſhall ſoon hear that I have opened my way into Italy, and ſhaken the power of Vitellius. You will then be glad to follow in the track of one who has conquered for you. This ſpeech, uttered with eyes darting fire and a fierce and thundering voice, moved even ſuch as were moſt cautious and wary. The common ſoldiers, who, together with the centurions, had conveyed themſelves into the council, ſcorning the reſolution of others as cold and ſpiritleſs, extolled him as the only brave man, the only reſolute leader. His reſolution being generally approved of, to render the march into Italy ſecure, letters were forthwith diſpatched to Aponius Saturninus, who had already joined the party of Veſpaſian, with directions to follow in haſte with his army from Mœſia. That the provinces, thus bereft of their armies, might not be expoſed to the incurſions of the bordering nations, the chiefs of the Jazyges, a Sarmatian nation, were taken into the ſervice and retained in pay. Into the party too were drawn Sido and Italicus, kings of the Suevians, men noted for their attachment and fidelity to the Romans. On the ſide towards Rhœtia guards of auxiliaries were poſted, that country being governed by Portius Septimius the procurator, a man unſhaken in his fidelity to Vitellius. Sentilius Felix was ordered to poſſeſs himſelf of the bank of the Oenus, now the Ins, flowing between Rhœtia and Noricum. Theſe precautions being taken, Primus marched with great expedition to invade Italy, at the head of a choſen body of infantry and part of the horſe. He was accompanied by Arvius Varus, an officer of great bravery and experience in the art of war, which he had learned under the renowned Corbulo, whom he was ſuppoſed, in ſecret conferences with Nero, to have accuſed, and thereby occaſioned the ruin of that celebrated commander. By favour, thus infamouſly gained, he was raiſed to the rank of a principal centurion. Primus and Varus advancing to Aquileia, were admitted into the city, and likewiſe into the neighbouring towns of Opitergium and Altinum: Padua too and Abeſte, now Eſte, received them with His propoſal approved.

He ſeizes Aquileia, and ſeveral other cities.

with great demonſtrations of joy. In the latter place they learned, that three cohorts of Vitellius's army, with the ſquadron of horſe called Scriboniana, had erected a bridge at Forum Allienum, now Ferrara, and were poſted there. At break of day therefore they attacked them, before they were appriſed of their approach, put ſome of them to the ſword, and obliged the reſt either to ſave themſelves by flight, or to change their allegiance. In the mean time, two legions arriving at Padua from Pannonia, viz. the ſeventh, ſurnamed Galbiana, and the thirteenth, named Gemina, Primus, after having allowed them a few days for repoſe, bent his march to Verona, with a deſign to ſeize that city, and make it the ſeat of war, as it was ſituated among ſpacious plains, fit for encounters of horſe, in which his prime force lay. In their march they became maſters of Vicetia, an acquiſition, which, tho' ſmall in itſelf, paſſed for one of great moment; ſince in it Cæcina was born, and from the general of the enemy the place of his nativity was ſnatched. The ſeizing of Verona was deemed a more important conqueſt; for it was a wealthy and flouriſhing city, and beſides, the key of Germany and Rhœtia: ſo that now all communication between Vitellius and thoſe countries was cut off. In the mean time, letters arrived from Veſpaſian, with orders to his generals not to venture beyond Aquileia, but to wait there the coming of Mucianus. To his authority he added reaſoning, viz. that ſince Egypt, ſince the magazines for ſupplying Italy with proviſions, ſince the revenues of the moſt opulent provinces, were under his power, the army of Vitellius, through want of grain and pay, might be forced to come over. Mucianus in his letters urged the ſame counſels; but he was prompted by a paſſion for gaining all the glory, and reſerving for himſelf the whole honour of the war. But from quarters of the world ſo diſtant, the counſels arrived when other meaſures were already taken [h].

Takes Verona.

THE diſmal tidings of the irruption of the enemy into Italy no ſooner reached Rome, than Vitellius, at length thoroughly alarmed, ordered his two generals, Cæcina and Valens, to prepare with all expedition for taking the field. New levies were raiſed, and to all, who ſhould voluntarily liſt themſelves, not only diſmiſſion was promiſed after the victory, Vitellius orders Cæcina and Valens to take the field.

[h] Tacit. l. iii. c. 1—5.

victory, but the ſame rewards that were paid to veterans after a long courſe of warfare. As Valens was juſt then recovered from a ſevere fit of ſickneſs, Cæcina alone was ſent forward at the head of the German army. But the appearance of thoſe forces, ſo awful upon their late entry, proved far different upon their departure. They had, by imitating the exceſſes of their emperor, by ſurrendering themſelves to the voluptuous entertainments of the city, and following other practices too abominable to be named, quite waſted their martial ardour and enfeebled their bodies. Their march was lazy and ſlow, their ranks thin, great numbers, eſpecially of the Germans and Gauls, having been ſwept off by diſtempers ariſing from their riotous living. Their horſes were quite lifeleſs, and the men grown too delicate to bear the ſun, the duſt, or the weather; but the more averſe they were to military toils, the greater propenſity they had to diſobedience and mutiny. It was generally believed, that Cæcina, who commanded them, out of jealouſy and hatred to Fabius Valens, Vitellius's chief favourite, had already reſolved to change ſides, and ſignified his intention to Flavius Sabinus, Veſpaſian's brother, whom Vitellius had not yet removed from the government of Rome. Cæcina, after Vitellius had embraced and diſmiſſed him with high marks of honour, leaving the city, ſent forward part of the cavalry to poſſeſs themſelves of Cremona, ordering the reſt to repair to Hoſtilia, a place of ſome ſtrength, and about thirty miles from Verona. He himſelf turned away to Ravenna, to confer there with Lucius Baſſus, who, from the command of a ſquadron of horſe, had been by Vitellius preferred at once to that of the two fleets, the one riding at Ravenna, the other at Miſenum; but was nevertheleſs highly diſſatisfied, becauſe he was not appointed captain of the prætorian guards. It is uncertain, whether he drew Cæcina off from Vitellius, or Cæcina him. Thoſe who compoſed the relation of this war, while the Flavian family was poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty, tell us, that they were both guided by a ſincere concern for the public tranquillity, and affection for the commonwealth. But our hiſtorian is of opinion, that as they were men of no faith or principles, they were prompted by jealouſy and ſpite; and that, rather than others ſhould ſurpaſs them in intereſt with Vitellius, they choſe to overthrow Vitellius himſelf [i]. Cæcina having rejoined the legions, employed many

The bad condition of the German army.

Cæcina wavers in his fidelity.

His treachery.

[i] Idem, c. 6.

many devices to alienate the affections of the centurions and common ſoldiers from Vitellius, to whom of themſelves they were ſtrongly devoted. Baſſus undertook the ſame taſk with the fleet, and accompliſhed it without much difficulty; for, as they had lately ſerved under Otho, they were ready to abandon their faith to Vitellius. Cæcina advanced to Hoſtilia, and pitched his camp between that village and the marſhes formed by the river Tartarus, being defended behind by the river, and on each ſide by the marſh. As he had with him ſix legions and a great number of auxiliaries, it was in his power to have utterly defeated Primus's two legions, (for his other forces were not yet arrived)and to have forced them, by a ſhameful flight, to abandon Italy. But framing delays, he privately carried on a correſpondence with the enemy's generals, till, by intercourſe of meſſengers, he agreed with them upon articles of his treachery. In the mean time, arrived at Verona the ſeventh legion, named Claudiana, under the command of Vipſtanus Meſſala, a man of a moſt illuſtrious family, and the only one who engaged in the war upon worthy deſigns. The ſeventh legion was ſoon after followed by the third and eighth; and then it was judged proper to draw an intrenchment round Verona. In the mean time, the fleet at Ravenna, revolting from Vitellius, tore his images, and openly eſpouſed the cauſe of Veſpaſian; which Cæcina no ſooner underſtood, than aſſembling all the principal centurions and ſome of the common ſoldiers, he repreſented to them the deplorable condition of Vitellius's affairs, exhorted them to gain betimes the favour of the new prince, and then forthwith gave them the oath to Veſpaſian. Thoſe who were his accomplices ſetting an example, the reſt, aſtoniſhed at ſo ſudden an event, took it after them. At the ſame inſtant, the images of Vitellius were pulled down and defaced, and meſſengers diſpatched to acquaint Antonius Primus with the whole. But as ſoon as news of the defection was ſpread through the camp, the ſoldiers flocked to the quarter where the images of Veſpaſian were ſet up, and with the utmoſt indignation, flung them down, and replaced thoſe of Vitellius; then chuſing for their leaders Fabius Fabullus, commander of the fifth legion, and Caſſius Longus, prefect of the camp, they put Cæcina in irons, cutting in pieces certain marines, who by chance fell in their way, abandoned their camp, and breaking down the bridge, bridge, marched back to Hoſtilia, and thence to Cremona, to rejoin there the firſt legion named Italica, and the one-and-twentieth, ſurnamed Rapax [k].

The fleet at Ravenna declares for Veſpaſian.

Cæcina revolts, and is by his troops put in irons.

THESE tranſactions were no ſooner known to Primus, than he reſolved to attack the enemy, thus divided in their affections, ere the leaders had recovered their authority, the ſoldiers their diſcipline and obedience, or the legions their former ſpirit and boldneſs. He imagined, that Fabius Valens, who was inviolably attached to Vitellius, and a commander of great experience, had ere now left Rome, and would upon learning the deſertion of Cæcina, travel with great expedition. With his whole army therefore he marched from Verona, and the next evening encamped at Bedriacum. The day following he ſent out his auxiliaries to forage in the territories of Cremona, and marched himſelf at the head of eight thouſand horſe to ſupport them. When he advanced about eight miles from Bedriacum, news was brought him, that the enemy approached. While Primus was conſulting what meaſures to take, Arrius Varus ruſhed out with a party of the moſt reſolute horſe, and put the enemy's van-guard in confuſion; but many advancing to ſupport their comrades, the fortune of the encounter changed, and Arrius was put to flight. This haſty ſtep had been taken without the approbation of Primus, who judged, that the iſſue would be ſuch as it proved. He now exhorted thoſe about him to prepare for battle; to the legions he diſpatched orders to arm, and notice to the auxiliaries ſpread over the country, to quit their pillage, and haſten by the ſeveral neareſt ways to the combat. In the mean time, Arrius's routed troops arriving, communicated their dread to the reſt; inſomuch that the whole body of horſe under the command of Primus betook themſelves to a ſhameful flight. During this conſternation, Primus, diſcharging the duty of an experienced commander and a moſt courageous ſoldier, ſtrove to animate ſuch as were diſmayed, to ſtop ſuch as were flying, readily aſſiſting here with his counſel and orders, there with his ſword, where-ever the greateſt efforts were required, where-ever any hope was preſented. With his javelin he pierced a ſtandard-bearer who was flying, and ſeizing the ſtandard, turned it againſt the enemy. Hereupon an hundred horſe, aſhamed to deſert their general, Arrius Varus put to flight by the troops of Vitellius.

The gallant conduct of Primus.

[k] Idem, c. 7——14.

general, returned to the fight. With theſe drawn up in cloſe ranks, he ſuſtained the onſet, till the reſt of his men, finding the bridge behind them broken and their flight interrupted, returned to the charge. Hereupon conſternation and diſmay ſeized the enemy; they began to give ground, and at laſt, Primus preſſing them with freſh vigour, betook themſelves to a diſorderly flight. The conquerors purſued them within four miles of Cremona, where they met, attacked, and routed two legions, that called Rapax and that named Italica, who were advancing to the relief of their cavalry. Primus forbore purſuing them, mindful of the condition of his men and horſes, quite ſpent with the fatigue of the day. In the cloſe of the evening arrived the reſt of Primus's forces; and as they marched over heaps of ſlain, they concluded from thence, that the war was ended, and demanded to be led directly to Cremona, being well appriſed, that by ſtorming the town in the dark, they ſhould have a greater latitude for plundering; whereas if they waited the return of day, ſupplications would be offered, and terms granted: by which means the wealth of Cremona would accrue to the commanders of the legions and principal officers; for the plunder of a town taken by ſtorm belonged to the ſoldiers, but to the leaders when gained by ſurrender. It was with the utmoſt difficulty, that Primus (for they utterly ſlighted the other commanders) prevailed upon them to delay the attack for one night. In the mean time, ſome horſe-men, who had advanced cloſe to the walls of Cremona, having ſeized ſome ſtragglers from thence, learnt of them, that ſix legions of Vitellius, and the whole army that had encamped at Hoſtilia, having that day marched thirty miles, were juſt approaching in battle-array. Hereupon Primus immediately drew up his men according to the nature of the ground, and made the neceſſary preparations to receive the enemy, who, as they wanted a leader of experience, inſtead of reſting at Cremona, attacked, ſpent as they were with a long march and faſting, Primus's forces, and began the engagement at the third hour of the night; that is, about nine in the evening. The combat laſted the whole night, fortune ſometimes favouring one ſide, ſometimes another. As they fought in the dark, and the watch-word of each, by being frequently aſked and repeated, became known to the other, they could not diſcern friend from foe. In this dreadful confuſion, the ſeventh legion, called Galbiana, was ſorely beſet. Out of it ſix centurions

Vitellius's cavalry routed.

The battle of Cremona.

of principal rank were ſlain, and ſome of the enſigns taken. The eagle, however, was preſerved by Atilius Varus, the chief centurion, who, in defending it, ſlew heaps of the enemy, and at laſt fell himſelf. Primus's men were chiefly annoyed by a baliſta of amazing bulk, which, being placed upon the ridge of the highway, ſwept away whole ranks, by diſcharging againſt them great, maſſy ſtones; but at length two common ſoldiers, paſſing undiſcoved through the midſt of the enemy, cut the ſprings of the engine, and by that means, at the expence of their own lives, (for they were immediately cut in pieces) ſaved part of the army from utter deſtruction. To neither ſide was fortune yet leaning, when the night being near ſpent, the moon riſing diſcovered the two armies to each other. More favourable, however, ſhe proved to that of Veſpaſian, as ſhe ſhone upon their backs, and full in the enemy's faces. Primus, now that he could diſtinguiſh his own men and be by them diſtinguiſhed, applied himſelf to animate them, ſome by ſhame and reproof, others by applauſe and exhortation, all by hopes and promiſes. There enſued from every quarter cries and ſhoutings; and juſt then the third legion, according to the cuſtom in Syria, where they had been long quartered, paid their adoration to the riſing ſun. This incident gave birth to a report, which flew in an inſtant through the whole army, and reached the enemy, that Mucianus was arrived, and between his forces and the third legion mutual ſalutations had paſſed. This diſheartened the troops of Vitellius; which Primus perceiving, made a laſt effort, puſhed them with great vigour, and utterly broke their ranks; which they attempted indeed to reſtore, but in vain, being embaraſſed by their own carriages and engines.

Vitellius's army defeated.

Being therefore no longer able to keep their ground, they betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, and ſtrove to gain Cremona, Primus's men purſuing them with great ſlaughter. Vitellius is ſaid to have loſt, what in the engagement, what in the flight, about thirty thouſand men. But the ſight of ſo many dead bodies lying together in heaps, and covering the fields and ways, did not occaſion ſo much horror, as the death of a father ſlaughtered by his own ſon. The fact is thus related by our hiſtorian, upon the authority of Vipſtanus Meſſala, who, in this engagement, commanded the ſeventh legion, named Claudiana: Julius Manſuetus, a native of Spain, liſting in the legion called Rapax, left behind him him a ſon, then a boy, who afterwards, being under Galba inrolled in the ſeventh legion called Galbiana, happened in this battle to engage his father and killed him; but being known by his parent juſt expiring, as he was rifling him, and knowing him again, he embraced with a flood of tears his pale corſe; charged with a ſad and doleful voice the public with the crime of parricide; and lifting up the body digged a grave, and, under the utmoſt affliction, diſcharged towards his parent the laſt duty. Thoſe who were neareſt obſerved what had paſſed, and in a moment the tragical accident was divulged throughout the whole army, with many lamentations and bitter execrations upon a war thus unnatural and barbarous; yet they continued to butcher and ſpoil their kinſmen, their relations, nay, their brethren, at the ſame time relating what a crying iniquity had been committed, and committing it themſelves [1].

A father killed in the battle by his ſon.

As the conquerors approached Cremona, they found the enemy encamped quite round the walls, and defended by a deep ditch, which had been dug in the war againſt Otho, and ſince ſtrengthened with freſh works. To proceed to the aſſault with an army already weary with the continued toil of a day and a night, ſeemed to the leaders an enterprize full of danger and difficulty; but the ſoldiers more apt to brave perils than bear delays, demanded to be forthwith led on to the attack; and Primus yielding to this humour, ordered them in the form of a ring, to inveſt the intrenchments, and begin the aſſault; which they did with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, raiſing their ſhields over their heads, and thence forming a teſtudo, under the ſhelter of which they advanced to the foot of the ramparts. But Vitellius's men, by hurling down upon them huge ſtones, looſened the teſtudo, beat to the ground the men beneath, and made a dreadful havock of them, thus naked, and expoſed to vollies of ſtones and arrows. The onſet began to ſlacken, when the leaders, finding their men exhauſted and unmoved by exhortations, pointed to Cremona as the price of their victory. Thus encouraged, they renewed the aſſault, all obſtinately combined to ſucceed or die: regardleſs of wounds and blood, they ſtrove to demoliſh the rampart, battered the gates, ſtood upon the ſhoulders of one another, and upon the teſtudo now reſtored, and thence ſeized the weapons pons in the hands of the enemy, and the hands too which held them; ſo that the hale and the maimed, ſuch as were half-dead, and ſuch as were juſt expiring, tumbled headlong together and periſhed. When Vitellius's men were no longer able to ſuſtain the ſhock, and found that all the diſcharges from the baliſta were rendered ineffectual by the teſtudo below, they at laſt hurled down the engine itſelf, huge and ponderous as it was, which failed not to cruſh thoſe upon whom it fell; but at the ſame time, drew with it the battlements, the upper part of the rampart,

They attack the enemy's camp.

[1] Idem, c. 15—25. Dio, l. lxv. p. 740.

And forceit. and the adjoining tower. In this confuſion, Caius Voluſius, a ſoldier of the third legion, having mounted the rampart, puſhed down all who reſiſted, and cried aloud, That the camp was taken. The reſt then having broke the gate with their ſwords and axes, burſt in, Vitellius's men being utterly diſmayed, and leaping with great fury from the battlements. The whole ſpace between the camp and Cremona, whither the enemy retired, was covered with dead bodies. And here again was preſented a new ſcene of difficulties, the walls of the city very high, ſtrong towers of ſtone, the gates ſecured with vaſt bars of iron, the garriſon numerous, the inhabitants devoted to the party of Vitellius, and at this time a great part of Italy aſſembled in the town on occaſion of a fair. Primus ordered fire to be immediately ſet to the moſt ſumptuous and beautiful buildings in the neighbourhood of the city, hoping by that means to oblige the people of Cremona to Cremona attacked. abandon the party of Vitellius. At the ſame time, he conveyed all his braveſt men into ſuch houſes as ſtood near the walls, from whence, with vollies of darts, arrows, and ſtones they drove away all who made oppoſition, while the legions, forming a teſtudo, advanced to the foot of the walls. Vitellius's men ſuſtained the attack with great intrepidity, till their officers, fearing that, were the city taken by ſtorm, all the fury of the conquerors would vent itſelf upon them, began to deliberate about ſurrendering. Having therefore agreed to throw themſelves upon the mercy of the conquering army, they razed the name and defaced the images of Vitellius; then diſcharging Cæcina from his bonds, beſought him to plead in their behalf. Thus were ſo many brave men reduced at length to im-
It ſurrenders. plore the aid and protection of a traitor. At his requeſt Primus granted them their lives, ordering them to ſurrender their arms and march out of the town; which they did did accordingly, Cæcina, who was then conſul, walking before them, attended by his lictors, and arrayed with the enſigns of the conſular dignity. This the conquerors could not bear; they upbraided him in bitter terms with his pride, with his cruelty, nay, and with his treaſon, and would have proceeded to violence, had not Primus checked them, and furniſhing Cæcina with a guard, ſent him away to Veſpaſian [m]. For the city of Cremona; as it had, even in the war againſt Otho, ſupported the cauſe of Vitellius, and ever ſhewed a paſſionate zeal for his intereſt, both Primus and his army were highly incenſed againſt it; but nevertheleſs the general did not think it adviſeable to deliver it immediately up to be plundered, great part of the wealth of Italy being at this time lodged in it on occaſion of the fair. In a ſpeech therefore which he made to his ſoldiers after the ſurrender of the place, he commended their bravery, exhorted them to uſe mercy towards their fellow-ſoldiers, who had ſubmitted; but purpoſely avoided making any mention of the city, or its inhabitants. Having ended his ſpeech, and diſmiſſed the troops, he went to a bath to waſh off the blood with which he was ſtill ſtained; for he had during the ſeveral engagements and attacks, commanded as a general, and fought like a common ſoldier. In the bath he happened to drop a word, which was remarked and quickly divulged; for finding the water ſomewhat too cool, he complained of it, adding, It will ſoon prove abundantly hot. This ſaying, though pleaſantly uttered to his ſlaves, was inſtantly ſpread all over the camp, and by the ſoldiery, greedy of plunder, interpreted as the watch-word for ſetting fire to Cremona. Accordingly forty thouſand ſoldiers ruſhing into it, and a greater number of ſervants and retainers to the camp, more abandoned to acts of cruelty and licentiouſneſs than the ſoldiers themſelves, pillaged, murdered, raviſhed, &c. without reſtraining for four days together, and then ſetting fire to the empty houſes, reduced them to aſhes. Such was the end of Cremona, two hundred and eighty-ſix years after its foundation (W). Primus, aſhamed of the barbarities

Is pillaged and burnt.

[m] Tacit. c. 16—31.

(W) Cremona was founded, according to Tacitus (58), Polybius (59), and Livy (60), in the conſulſhip of Tiberius Sempronius and barbarities committed by his ſoldiers, iſſued an order, that no one ſhould preſume to hold captive any citizen of Cremona. Hereupon ſuch as had any, began to murder them; which inhumanity obliged their relations to redeem them. Soon after, ſuch of the inhabitants as had outlived the general maſſacre, returned to Cremona, and rebuilt the city, being therein countenanced by Veſpaſian. Joſephus tells us, that of Vitellius's men there fell in the battle thirty thouſand and two hundred, and four thouſand five hundred on Primus's ſide [n]; and Xiphilinus writes, that, what in the field, what in the city of Cremona, there periſhed fifty thouſand perſons. The conquerors, not able to bear the ſtench of the putrified carcaſes, having lodged one night on the ruins in which the city was buried, retired the next day three miles from thence. The ſoldiers of Vitellius, ſcattered and diſperſed over the country, were aſſembled again, placed under their former banners, and, as the war ſtill ſubſiſted, ſent into Illyricum. Meſſengers were immediately diſpatched into Britain and both Spains, to acquaint the troops there with the victory, as was Julius Calenus, a tribune, into Gaul, and Alpinus Montanus, commander of a cohort, into Germany, two officers choſen for oſtentation, as the latter was of Treves, the former an Æduan, and both partizans of Vitellius. At the ſame time, guards were poſted upon the paſſes of the Alps, to cut off all communication between Germany and Italy; for it was reported, that the Germans were arming with a deſign to aſſiſt the vanquiſhed party [o]. Let us now return to Vitellius.

(58) Tacit. c. 3. Liv. epit. l. xii. (59) Polyb. l. iii. c. 40. (60)

Vitellius reſigns himſelf up to voluptuouſneſs.

HAVING diſmiſſed Cæcina in the manner we have related, and a few days after ordered Fabius Valens to take the field, he buried himſelf in the bowers and alleys of his gardens, ſtriving to ſmother all his cares in voluptuouſneſs and all and Publius Cornelius, when Hannibal was ready to invade Italy, as a barrier againſt the Gauls on the other ſide of the Po, or any other power meditating an irruption from beyond the Alps. It grew and flouriſhed by the convenience of rivers, the richneſs of its territory, and affinities with other nations of Italy. In no foreign war it had ever been hurt, but in the civil diſſenſions, ſuffered more than any other city.

[n] Joſeph. bell. l. iv. c. 41. [o] Tacit. c. 35, 36.

all manner of exceſſes. From Rome he retired to the grove at Aricinum, where, while he paſſed his time entirely reſigned to ſloth and gluttony, he was alarmed with tidings of the defection of the fleet at Ravenna. Soon after came another melancholy account, yet blended with joy, that Cæcina had revolted, but was by the army put in irons. Hereupon he returned to the city, and in a full aſſembly extolled the fidelity of the ſoldiery; but ordered Publius Sabinus, captain of the prætorian guards, to be caſt into bonds, on account of his intimacy with Cæcina, and named in his room Alphenus Varus. The ſenate, informed of the deſertion of Cæcina, inveighed againſt him in a ſtyle of indignation well ſtudied; for not a man dropped a bitter expreſſion againſt the leaders of the oppoſite party, and all with great circumſpection avoided mentioning Veſpaſian. Tho' one day only remained of Cæcina's conſulſhip, he was depoſed, and Roſcius Regulus named in his room, who, upon the laſt day of October, began his magiſtracy, and with the day ended it. In the mean time Valens, who was upon his march to join the troops at Hoſtilia and Cremona, being informed that the fleet at Ravenna had revolted to the enemy, inſtead of quickening his march, halted, and wrote to Vitellius for ſuccours. The emperor immediately diſpatched after him three cohorts, with the ſquadron of horſe from Britain. Theſe Valens ſent forward to Ariminum; but he himſelf turning aſide bent his courſe to Umbria, and from thence to Hetruria. Having there learnt the iſſue of the battle at Cremona, he conceived a deſign, which, had it been put in execution, would have been attended with very dreadful conſequences. He propoſed to embark for Narbonne Gaul, and landing upon any part of that coaſt, rouſe thoſe powerful provinces and all the Roman forces there, as alſo the ſeveral nations of Germany, and thence renew the war. With this deſign he embarked in the port of Piſa; but was by contrary winds, forced to land at Monaco, where he was kindly received by Marius Maturus, procurator of the maritime Alps, who, though all the country round eſpouſed the oppoſite party, had never ſwerved from his allegiance. By him Valens was informed, that Valerius Paulinus, procurator of Narbonne Gaul, an officer of known bravery and Veſpaſian's intimate friend, had declared for him, and held with a ſtrong garriſon the city of Foroju-

Valens returns to Hetruria.

Deſigns to raiſe Gaul,

Forojulium, now Frejus, which commanded all access from the sea. Upon this intelligence Valens returned directly to his vessels, with four soldiers of the prætorian guards, three friends, and as many centurions, leaving to Maturus and the rest full liberty to stay, and swear, if they pleased, fidelity to Vespasian. As he roamed about, hovering on the coasts of Gaul, he was by contrary winds, driven upon the Stæchades, islands near Marseilles, and there by some galleys belonging to Paulinus taken prisoner; which was no sooner known, than first the neighbouring, and soon after the more distant provinces, espoused, without hesitation, the cause of the conqueror. In Spain, the first legion, named Adjutrix, which had served under Otho, declared for Vespasian, and drew over with it the tenth and the sixth. In Britain the second legion, which Vespasian had commanded there in the reign of Claudius, acceded to his party, though not without some opposition from the other legions, in which many centurions and many soldiers had been promoted by Vitellius. However, they were all brought at length to acknowledge Vespasian [p].

Is taken prisoner.

Gaul, Spain, and Britain, declare for Vespasian.

In the mean time, the dismal tidings of the overthrow at Cremona reaching Rome, Vitellius, instead of deliberating with his friends about the most proper measures in so critical a juncture, with a stupid dissimulation, smothered the news of the calamity, feigning that all his proceedings prospered, and by such false representations leaving his condition quite desperate. About his person was observed a wonderful silence concerning the war; and through the city all discourses about it were prohibited, which for this very cause grew more frequent. However, he privately sent persons, in whom he could confide, to view the enemy's camp; but upon their return, when he had secretly examined them, he caused them all to be murdered, that they might not divulge what they had seen. Julius Agrestis, a centurion, having attempted in vain to awaken the emperor out of his lethargy, at last prevailed with him, that he himself might be sent to survey the forces of the enemy, and to learn the transactions at Cremona. Agrestis did not assume the behaviour of a spy, nor attempted to escape the notice of Primus; but declaring to him the instructions from the emperor and his own own design, he demanded to view the whole in person. Primus readily sent certain persons with him to shew him the field of battle, the desolation and remains of Cremona, and the legions taken prisoners. Agrestis having carefully examined the whole, returned to Rome; but as Vitellius gave no credit to his accounts, nay accused him of corruption and infidelity; since then, said he, some remarkable confirmation is necessary, and since neither my life nor my death can avail you, I will furnish you with an evidence which you may credit. Having thus spoken, he left his presence, and fell upon his own sword at the gates of the palace [q]. In the mean time, some of Vespasian's troops, under the conduct of Cornelius Fuscus, advancing as far as Ariminum, besieged that place, and possessed themselves of the plains of Umbria and the territories of Picenum, all along the Adriatic sea. Thus between Vespasian and Vitellius all Italy was shared, and the ridges of the Apennine become a common boundary. As winter approached and the plains were flooded by the overflowing of the Po, Primus sent the legions back to Verona with the aged and wounded; and passing the Po at the head of the auxiliary cohorts and cavalry, advanced as far as the temple of Fortune, at present a city on the Adriatic gulph, known by the name of Fano. There he halted, upon intelligence, that the prætorian cohorts had already left Rome, and that guards were posted upon the Apennine to oppose his passage. And truly Vitellius, roused at length, as it were, out of a profound sleep, had ordered Julius Priscus and Alphenus Varus, with fourteen prætorian cohorts, a legion of marines, and other forces, to seize the passes of the Apennine. They were all chosen men, and able to have made an offensive war, had they been under the command of a different general. They encamped at Mevania, now Bevagna, in the neighbourhood of Toligno; but Vitellius, without departing in the least from his wonted course of debauchery, continued at Rome, where he settled a succession of consuls for ten years, discharged some nations from all tribute, conferred upon others fresh immunities, and, in short, without any regard to futurity, rent and exhausted the empire with such wild bounties, as could neither be granted nor accepted by men of sense, but were highly applauded by the unthinking

Vitellius smothers all bad tidings.

[p] Tacit. c. 41.——45.

A remarkable instance of the fidelity of Julius Agrestis.

Vitellius sends an army to secure the passes of the Apennine.

[q] Idem, c. 54.

He arrives at the camp.

unthinking herd. At length, moved by the repeated solicitations of the army, he left Rome, and repaired to the camp of Mevania, attended by a great number of senators, which only served to expose him to public contempt and derision (X). For as he was quite unacquainted with the military art, he was continually applying for information how to draw up the army, how to procure intelligence, by what measures he might defeat the designs of the foe, &c. Upon every flying report of the approach of the enemy, he was sure to betray great fear, and never failed to get drunk. In the end, surfeited with the camp and learning the revolt of the fleet at Misenum, he returned to Rome in the utmost consternation. The fleet was drawn to revolt by Claudius Faventius, who was only a centurion, and had been degraded by Galba with marks of ignominy. By forging letters from Vespasian, and in his name tempting the officers with great rewards, he prevailed upon them to change their allegiance. To reclaim them, Vitellius made choice of Claudius Julianus, who had lately commanded the fleet, and was highly esteemed by the marines. But he, without hesitation, went over to the party of Vespasian; and, putting himself at their head, took the city of Terracina. Hereupon Vitellius dispatched messengers to the army, with orders to retire from Mevania, and drawing nearer Rome, to encamp at Narnia, now Narni. From it he detached six cohorts and five hundred horse, whom he sent under the command of his brother Lucius, to make head against the soldiers of the fleet. He himself remained at Rome, where he assembled the people by their tribes, and to all, who desired to be listed, administered the oath of fidelity. As he moved compassion by his sad countenance, his doleful expressions, and

The fleet at Misenum revolts.

(X) Tacitus says, that while he was discoursing to an assembly of the soldiers soon after his arrival in the camp, there flew over his head a flock of ravenous birds, so numerous, that, like a black cloud, they darkened the day. He adds, that a bull escaped from the altar; and overturning the utensils for the sacrifice, was at last slain at a distance from thence, and not in the place where it was customary to kill the victims. This the superstitious pagans looked upon as the worst of omens (61).

(61) Tacit. c. 56.

and many tears, and was liberal, nay extravagant, in his promiſes, vaſt multitudes gave in their names; and to this daſtardly crowd, only daring in words, he gave the awful name of legions. To himſelf he aſſumed, at this juncture, the title of Cæſar, which he had hitherto rejected, as if the Cæſars alone were deſtined to hold the ſovereign power [r]. Vitellius takes the title of Cæſar.

THE army no ſooner left Mevania, than the Samnites, the Pelignians, and the Marſians embraced the cauſe of Veſpaſian. At the ſame time, Primus, informed of the enemy's motions, haſtened to paſs the Apennine, where, while his troops were ſorely annoyed with the cold, and ſtruggling with difficulty out of the deep ſnow, he conſidered what dangers he muſt have undergone, had not Vitellius's army abandoned their poſt. Primus, having paſt the Apennine, encamped at Carſulæ, between Mevania and Narnia, and there waited the arrival of the legions from Cremona, which were in full march to join him. As the forces of Vitellius were only ten miles diſtant, the troops which Primus had with him were for attacking them before the legions arrived, whom they conſidered rather as ſharers in the prey, than partakers in the peril. But Primus found means to calm their fury, and in the mean time the legions arrived, and ſoon after their arrival poſſeſſed themſelves of Interamna, now Terni; which ſo terrified Vitellius's army, that they began to fly over to the enemy in whole companies and troops, being encouraged thereunto by their tribunes and centurions. However, ſome of the common ſoldiers perſiſted inflexible in their adherence to Vitellius; and a report was induſtriouſly ſpread all over the camp, that Valens had eſcaped into Germany, and was there aſſembling a mighty army. To confute this rumour, and prevent their cheriſhing any farther hopes, Valens was put to death at Urbinum, where he was detained in priſon, and his head ſent to the camp, and diſplayed to the view of Vitellius's troops. At this ſight, they ſunk into utter deſpair; and ſeeing themſelves on all ſides bereft of hope, paſſed over in a body to the party of Veſpaſian. Upon this general defection, Primus and Varus neglected not, by repeated meſſages, to make offers to Vitellius of ſafety to his perſon, of revenues, of any private Primus paſſes the Apennine. Valens put to death. The whole army paſſes over to Veſpaſian.

[r] Idem, c. 55---58.

private retirement in Campania, or elſewere, if he would reſign the ſovereignty and ſubmit to Veſpaſian. Mucianus likewiſe ſent him letters with the like offers; to which he would have yielded, had he not been diſſuaded by his friends from ever leading a private life, after he had been emperor. To him now remained only the city of Rome, which Flavius Sabinus might have eaſily raiſed againſt him; but he, either out of a natural abhorrence to the ſpilling of blood, or becauſe he envied the grandeur of his brother's fortune, neglected to act with any warmth or alacrity. It is true, he often conferred with Vitellius about the means of reſtoring public peace; but could not be prevailed upon to uſe violence. In one of theſe conferences, he agreed to reſign the empire on certain conditions; which Sabinus aſſured him ſhould be ratified by his brother Veſpaſian; which was no ſooner known, than his followers exerted their utmoſt efforts to divert him from his reſolution; repreſenting to him, how ignominious, how inſecure the terms of peace were, ſince the performing them entirely depended upon the wanton humour of the conqueror. But, notwithſtanding all their endeavours to rouſe him to ſome attempt daring and brave, having learnt on the eighteenth of December the defection of his army at Narnia, he went forth from the palace in deep mourning, attended by his domeſtics, with his little ſon, an helpleſs infant; and paſſing in this forlorn condition through the ſtreets of the city, arrived at the place where the people uſed to aſſemble; and there to the multitude, which had flocked from all quarters, declared his reſolution in few words, ſuch as ſuited his preſent condition, that he voluntarily withdrew for the ſake of the public peace and the good of the commonwealth; and that he only deſired they would remember him, and to his brother, to his wife, and to his innocent and tender children, ſhew compaſſion and mercy. At the ſame time, extending his arms, with his little ſon in them, he recommended him, now to one, now to another, then to all. At laſt, burſting into tears, he ungirt his ſword from his ſide, and preſented it to the conſul Cæcilius Simplex, who ſtood juſt by him, as thus reſigning the power of life and death over the citizens. As the conſul refuſed to receive it, and the aſſembly with loud clamours oppoſed his reſignation, he departed, declaring, that he intended to deveſt himſelf of the badges of the imperial dignity in the temple temple of Concord, and thence to ſeek a private retirement in his brother's houſe. But the people, ſenſibly affected with this doleful ſcene, declared with one voice againſt his withdrawing to a private dwelling, called him back to the palace, and even ſhut up every other way. Hereupon, not knowing what to do, nor how to proceed, he returned to the palace [s]. But as the rumour had already flown all over the city, that Vitellius had abdicated the empire; all the principal ſenators, great numbers of knights, with the city guards and thoſe of the night-watch, crowded to the houſe of Flavius Sabinus. Thither news was brought them, that Vitellius, encouraged by the people and his German guards, was retired to the palace. As Sabinus had advanced too far to retreat, all who were about him adviſed him to take arms, and force Vitellius to ſtand to the treaty he had made. Sabinus, though of himſelf heſitating and backward (Y), yielded to their advice; but ſome

Vitellius deſigns to abdicate.

But is not permitted.

Flavius Sabinus takes arms, but is defeated.

[s] Tacit. c. 60—69. Suet. c. 15. Dio, l. lxv. p. 740.

(Y) The nobility of Rome did all that lay in their power to rouſe Flavius Sabinus, and encourage him to ſhare with the other generals of the party the glory of placing his brother upon the throne. As he was governor of Rome, the cohorts there immediately depended upon him, and conſequently would not fail to join; moſt of the ſenators offered to aſſiſt him with their ſlaves. The cohorts remaining with Vitellius were few, and thoſe quite diſheartened with diſmal tidings from all quarters. The populace were wavering; and from them, if he once preſented himſelf as their head, he would find the ſame flattery and zeal, which they had ſhewn for Vitellius, inſtantly turned upon Veſpaſian. With theſe and the like reaſonings, the grandees of Rome ſtrove to rouſe Sabinus, but could not by any means prevail upon him to take arms; and hence ſome entertained private ſuſpicions againſt him, as if through malignity and emulation he ſtudied to thwart the deſigns formed in behalf of his brother. For Flavius Sabinus was both elder than Veſpaſian, and greatly ſurpaſſed him in wealth and reputation. He was even believed to have upheld his brother's credit otherwiſe ſinking, and for the money lent him to have received in pledge his houſe and poſſeſſions. Hence, though between them an appearance of unanimity ſubſiſted, private grudges were apprehended to remain. But our hiſtorian is ſome of the boldeſt of Vitellius's men, meeting him as he advanced to the palace, attacked with great reſolution, and put him to flight. Sabinus under this diſtreſs had no other reſource but to ſhut himſelf up in the capitol; which he did accordingly, with a ſmall number of ſoldiers, ſome ſenators, and a few Roman knights. The ſoldiers of Vitellius immediately inveſted the capitol, but with ſtations ſo looſe and ill-guarded, that Sabinus, during the dead of the night, found means to acquaint Primus with his danger, and to cauſe his own children Sabinus and Clemens, and his brother's ſon Domitian, to be brought to him. The next morning, as ſoon as day began to dawn, before hoſtilities were commited on either ſide, Sabinus ſent Cornelius Martialis, a centurion of the firſt rank, to put Vitellius in mind of the treaty, and expoſtulate with him about thus violating ſuch ſolemn ſtipulations. Vitellius threw the whole fault upon the ſoldiers, whoſe ardour, he ſaid, it was not in his power to reſtrain. He even warned Martialis to retire by a private way, that he might not be aſſaſſinated by the ſoldiers, as the mediator of a peace which they abhorred. He was ſcarce returned to the capitol, when Vitellius's ſoldiers approached, and began the attack with great fury. The beſieged, with ſhowers of ſtones and tiles, ſtrove to overwhelm the aggreſſors; but the latter, advancing boldly to the very gates of the citadel, ſet fire to them, and muſt have entered, had not Sabinus pulled down the ſtatues on all hands, and, with theſe glorious monuments of antiquity, raiſed in the very entrance a new wall. Then they ſtrove to force a the oppoſite avenues of the capitol, climbing over the contiguous buildings, which, during a long peace, had been ſuffered to be raiſed to the height of the foundations of the capitol. Here the aſſault was cloſe and fierce; and the adjoining roofs being ſet on fire, whether by the aſſailant or the beſieged is uncertain, the flame ſpread from thence

He retires to the capitol.

The capitol beſieged.

is of opinion, that Sabinus, naturally merciful and gentle, a horred all ſlaughter and ſpilling of blood; and therefore fr quently conferred with Vitellius about the means of reſtori public peace, and laying down arms by mutual agreement a treaty (62).

(62) Idem, c. 64.

to the porticos of the capitol; and being there nouriſhed by the timber, which was very old, ſpread every way with terrible impetuoſity; nor did the conflagration ceaſe, till that glorious and ſtately edifice was burnt to the ground and laid in aſhes; the moſt deplorable misfortune, ſays Tacitus, that had happened ſince the founding of the city, and to the Roman people the moſt reproachful, ſince by them, and not by a foreign enemy, the ſacred ſeat of the great Jupiter, reared by their anceſtors with ſolemn benedictions and auſpices, as the pledge and centre of future empire, was thus impiouſly profaned and reduced to aſhes [t]. And burnt to the ground

WHILE the capitol was yet burning, Vitellius's bands, burſting in, put all who oppoſed them to the ſword: of theſe the moſt ſignal were Cornelius Martialis, Æmilius Pacenſis, Caſperius Niger, and Didius Scæva. Flavius Sabinus and Quinctius Atticus the conſul were taken and loaded with irons. The reſt, by divers ſtratagems, eſcaped, having learnt the word by which the ſoldiers of Vitellius were diſtinguiſhed by one another. Young Domitian was ſaved by the contrivance of one of his freed-men, under the diſguiſe of a linen robe, as if he had belonged to the tribe of the prieſts who offered ſacrifices in the capitol (Z). Sabinus and Atticus were carried to Vitellius, who did all that lay in his power to appeaſe the fury of the populace and ſoldiery, crying aloud for their execution. They were chiefly incenſed againſt Sabinus; and therefore, inſtead of hearkening to the emperor's entreaties, they ran Sabinus taken priſoner.

[t] Tacit. c. 70—72.

(Z) Domitian paſſing among the ſacrifices undiſcovered to the houſe of Cornelius Primus, a dependent of his fathers, near the place called Velabrum, lay there concealed, till Rome was taken by Primus. He afterwards, in the reign of his father, demoliſhed the houſe where he had lain concealed, and raiſed upon the place a ſmall chapel dedicated to Jupiter the protector, with an altar, and the account of his adventure engraved upon marble. When he arrived at the ſovereignty, he erected a vaſt temple ſacred to Jupiter the guardian, with himſelf held in the arms of the god (63).

(63) Idem, c. 74.

him through in his preſence; then cutting off his head, dragged his trunk through the ſtreets to the Scalæ Gemoniæ, where the bodies of malefactors were uſually expoſed. He had, for the ſpace of five-and-thirty years, carried arms for the commonwealth, and governed Mœſia ſeven years, and Rome twelve, bearing both in peace and war a ſignal reputation. The only failing, which even his enemies could object to him, was his talkativeneſs. As to the innocence of his life and juſtice of his actions, he was altogether blameleſs. All agree, that before Veſpaſian became emperor, Sabinus was looked upon as the chief ornament of the Flavian family, and the ſupport of Veſpaſian himſelf, who was his younger brother. When the people demanded the doom of the conſul Atticus, Vitellius perſiſted in oppoſing them, being entirely reconciled to him, in regard of his openly confeſſing, that he had ſet fire to the capitol; and by thus aſſuming the odium of the crime, though the whole was by ſome thought a fiction, acquitted as innocent the party of Vitellius. About the ſame time, Lucius Vitellius, the emperor's brother, defeated in Campania the marines, who had declared for Veſpaſian, and retook Terracina. Six ſmall galleys eſcaped, and in one of them Apollinaris commander of the fleet. All the other veſſels were ſeized by the ſhore, or, ſurcharged by the flying crowd, ſunk to the bottom. Julianus, who had been ſent by Vitellius to reclaim the fleet, and had gone over to Veſpaſian, was taken priſoner, and by Lucius's orders firſt inhumanly ſcourged and then executed. Had Vitellius's men, now elated with ſucceſs, proceeded directly to Rome, a dreadful ſtruggle muſt have enſued; nor could it have been decided without the deſtruction of the city. But while Lucius was deliberating, whether he ſhould return forthwith to Rome, or purſue the reduction of Campania, the troops of Primus, informed of the danger of Sabinus, haſtened to his relief. Petilius Cerealis, one nearly allied to Veſpaſian and a commander of no mean character, upon the firſt news that the capitol was beſieged, was ſent forward with a thouſand horſe, and ordered to croſs the Sabine territories, and enter Rome through the Salarian way. Primus himſelf advanced along the great Flaminian road, and when the night was far ſpent, arrived at a place called the Red Rocks. There he received diſmal tidings, that Sabinus was murdered, the capitol reduced to aſhes, the city under dreadful conſternation, the populace and ſlaves

And murdered.

Lucius Vitellius takes Terracina.

Primus marches to Rome.

ſlaves all under arms for Vitellius, &c. (A). Petilius Cerealis, meeting not far from the city a party of the enemy, attacked them briſkly, but was by them received with equal reſolution, and after a long and bloody conteſt, put to flight and purſued as far as Fidenæ. This ſucceſs heightened the zeal and partiality of the people for Vitellius; they betook themſelves to arms, moſt of them ſnatching up whatever fell firſt in their way, and, thus armed, demanded to be led out againſt the enemy. Vitellius commended their zeal, but at the ſame time ſent embaſſadors both to Cerealis and Primus to renew the former treaty. The ſoldiers of Cerealis inſulted the deputies, and even wounded the prætor Arulenus Ruſticus, a man of great merit and diſtinction, and ſlew his principal lictor, for daring to open a paſſage through the crowd. Thoſe who went to Primus were better received. They were attended by Vitellius ſends embaſſadors to treat of an accommodation.

(A) Primus's forces might have reached Rome before the capitol was beſieged; but, inſtead of purſuing their march to the city after they had left Narnia, they diverted themſelves at Ocriculum now Otricoli, in celebrating the annual feaſt of Saturn, which laſted many days There were not wanting ſome, who on this occaſion entertained ſuſpicions of Primus, and charged him, as if, through treachery, he thus lingered in conſequence of the letters ſecretly ſent him from Vitellius, with offers of the conſulſhip and of his daughter then marriageable, and with her a mighty fortune, as the rewards of revolting from Veſpaſian. Others alledged, that this charge was no more than a fiction, and that it was a reſolution concerted amongſt all the leaders, rather to terrify the city with a terrible diſplay of war, than to carry the war thither, ſince the chief ſtrength of the prætorian bands had already deſerted Vitellius, who was likewiſe precluded from receiving any reinforcements; ſo that it was preſumed he would quietly yield up the empire. But the true cauſe of ſo prepoſterous delay was, according to our hiſtorian, their waiting the coming of Mucianus, who was advancing full march with the forces of the eaſt, and by frequent letters retarded the motion of the conquering army, being ſtung with envy at the ſucceſs of Primus, and thinking that he ſhould be deprived of all ſhare in the glory of the war, were he not preſent at the entry into Rome. But the news, that the capitol was beſieged, rouſed Primus, and put the whole army in motion (74).

(74) Idem, c. 78.

the Veſtal virgins, who brought letters from Vitellius to Primus, wherein the emperor deſired, that the battle, which was to be the laſt, might be ſuſpended for one day, ſince during that interval, all things might be eaſily accommodated. Primus diſmiſſed the virgins with all demonſtrations of honour; but to Vitellius returned anſwer, that, by the murder of Sabinus and the burning of the capitol, all means of ending the war by treaty were cut off (B). The embaſſadors were ſcarce gone, when the whole army moved, advancing in three bodies to the walls of Rome, where the forces of Vitellius expected them, divided likewiſe in three bodies. The weak and unwarlike populace was routed at the firſt onſet; but Vitellius's other troops, ſallying out againſt the enemy as they approached the walls of the city, attacked them with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. Primus's men ſtood their ground with equal reſolution and intrepidity; ſo that the moſt cruel and bloody battle enſued that the Romans had ever ſuſtained. The conflict laſted ſeveral hours with various ſucceſs; but in the end proved favourable to Primus's men, as ſuperior in the abilities of their leaders. The Vitellians were with great ſlaughter driven into the city, where they aſſembled again; and, though vanquiſhed and routed, renewed the battle with freſh vigour, and continued it to the cloſe of the day. The people gathered about the combatans as ſpectators; and as if they had been only attending the repreſentation of a fight exhibited for public amuſement, they ſometimes favoured one party, ſometimes another, with theatrical ſhouts and clappings: nay, as often as either ſide turned their backs, or particulars fled into houſes, or concealed themſelves in ſhops, they inſiſted upon their being dragged out and ſlain. The people, as Tacitus obſerves, were Primus's anſwer.

Vitellius's men driven into the city

(B) Muſonius Rufus, by rank a Roman knight, by profeſſion a Stoic, joining himſelf to the embaſſadors, endeavoured, by philoſophical diſcourſes about the advantages of peace and the dangers attending war, to quell the fury of men in arms; but was derided by ſome, outrageouſly inſulted by others, and at laſt, partly by menaces, partly by perſuaſions of the more moderate, prevailed upon to forbear his unreaſonable leſſons of wiſdom (75).

(75) Idem, c. 81.

were so little affected with this tragical spectacle, that at the same time were seen in one place cruel conflicts and bleeding wounds; in another luxurious banqueting and voluptuous revellings; every-where streams of blood and heaps of carcases; and hard by wanton debauches and lewd harlots: in short, all the abominations of a most dissolute and riotous peace, and all the barbarities of a most dreadful and cruel captivity. Primus's men having in the end prevailed and made themselves masters of the city, marched in the next place to storm the camp of the prætorian guards, whither the most determined amongst the enemy had retired. As they considered the camp as their last hope and resource, they exerted they utmost efforts in defending it; and, though in number inferior, often repulsed the aggressors; and at length, when the gates in spite of all opposition, were burst open, uniting together, they made a last effort; but being overpowered by numbers, they all fell, facing the enemy and wounded only before [a].

Which is taken with the camp.

Vitellius abandons the palace, but returns to it.

Vitellius, seeing the city taken, caused himself to be conveyed in a chair through the back part of the palace to his wife's house upon mount Aventine, with a design to lie there concealed during the day, and fly by night to his brother, then at Terracina. But as to one who is under dread and fears all things, the present affairs seem most dangerous, he soon changed his mind and returned to the palace. Suetonius writes, that he altered his resolution upon a groundless and uncertain report, that a treaty and a peace was concluded. Be that as it will, he found the palace now quite desolate and abandoned; all his slaves and domestics having slipped away, or carefully avoiding to meet him. Terrified with the dismal solitude and silence, he tried to enter several apartments; but finding them all shut, and being at last weary with such miserable and solitary wandering to and fro, he thrust himself into the porter's lodge, and concealed himself behind the bed. In the mean time, a party of Primus's men entering the place, searched all places and corners, till at last they discovered the emperor and dragged him out. As they knew him not, they enquired who he was, and whether he could acquaint them where what was become of Vitellius. He deceived them at first but being ſoon known by Julius Placidus, tribune of a prætorian band, he pretended to have matters of the utmoſt importance to impart to Veſpaſian, and with great earneſtneſs begged to be kept, though it were in priſon, till his arrival. But the tribune and ſoldiers, deaf to all entreaties, tied forthwith his hands behind him, threw a halter about his neck, rent all his apparel, and dragged him half-naked into the forum through the great ſtreet called the Sacred Way, forcing him, with their ſwords pointed at his throat, to hold up his head, and preſent his face to the indignities offered him by the rabble, who now reviled him in a moſt outrageous manner. They forced him to behold his own ſtatues thrown down, and to view the place where Galba had been murdered. While he was thus haled along, a German ſoldier meeting him, drew his ſword and diſcharged a violent blow, whether at Vitellius to revenge ſome former injury, or at the tribune, or to releaſe the emperor from inſults and deriſion, is uncertain. The tribune's ear he actually cut off, and was himſelf inſtantly ſlain. Vitellius they puſhed forward, the populace the whole time upbraiding him with his gluttony, his target of Minerva, his lewdneſs, and even the imperfections of his body; for he was enormouſly tall, corpulent, and ſomewhat lame, having been hurt by a chariot, while he was attending Caligula at the races in the circus. He bore all the inſults and indignities offered him without uttering a ſingle word, except to the tribune, to whom, while he treated him in a manner altogether unbecoming, he anſwered, that nevertheleſs he had been his emperor. They dragged him at laſt to the Gemoniæ, the common charnel of malefactors, where the body of Flavius Sabinus had lain expoſed, and there with many wounds put an end to his unhappy life. His head was cut off, and carried on a pole through the chief ſtreets of the city. His body was dragged with a hook, and with all poſſible ignominy thrown into the Tiber, but afterwards buried by his widow Galeria Fundana. Thus died Aulus Vitellius, the ninth emperor of Rome, according to ſome in the fifty-fourth, according to others in the fifty-eighth, year of his age, after having reigned a year, wanting ten or twelve days, from the time he was proclaimed emperor at Cologn, and eight months, and a few days after the death of Otho. He was raiſed to the firſt dignities in the ſtate by no parts or merit; merit of his own, but in regard to the luſtre of his family, which was one of the moſt conſpicuous in Rome. By his extravagant bounties and largeſſes, he gained the affections both of the ſoldiery and people. Of the former, many adhered to him with unſhaken fidelity to the laſt, tho', in the opinion of our hiſtorian, he had not one good quality to recommend him to ſuch as wiſhed well to the republic, having been ſtained, even from his tender years, with all manner of crimes and moſt infamous and abominable iniquities [w]. The day being already far ſpent, the ſenate could not be aſſembled, the ſenators and magiſtrates having either privately withdrawn from the city, or concealed themſelves in the houſes of their dependents. Domitian, apprehending now no further danger, preſented himſelf to the leaders of the party, and was by the ſoldiers thronging about him ſaluted Cæſar, and by them conducted in a kind of triumph to his father's houſe.

[a] Idem, c. 73—84. Dio, l. lxv. p. 742. Suet. c. [illegible] Joseph. bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 42.

Inſulted by the populace.

And executed.

Domitian ſaluted Cæſar.

In the mean time, Lucius Vitellius was with his cohorts advancing from Terracina to the relief of his brother. The cavalry was therefore ſent forward to Aricia, and the legions ordered to advance to Bovillæ. But Lucius was no ſooner informed of the unhappy doom of the emperor, than he ſurrendered himſelf and his bands to the pleaſure of the conquerors. The ſoldiers were diſarmed and led through the city, guarded on each ſide by files of armed men, without betraying a ſuppliant look, or dropping a mean expreſſion, though outrageouſly inſulted by the mocking and petulant vulgar. They were all committed to priſon, but ſoon after releaſed. As for Vitellius, he was put to death; a puniſhment which he well deſerved, being no leſs addicted to all kinds of vices than his brother. But, for all his vices, he wanted neither courage nor activity, and ſupported the cauſe with great reſolution and vigilance [x]. By the death of the emperor and his brother, war was rather ſeen to ceaſe, than peace to commence; for the conquerors, continuing in arms, haunted all over the city after the conquered, filling with carnage and mangled bodies the ſtreets, and places of public reſort, the temples, and even the private houſes, which they burſt open and pillaged, pretending, that there ſome Vitellians Lucius Vitellius ſurrenders himſelf and his troops, and is put to death.

[w] Tacit. c. 85, 86. Suet. c. 4, 5, 15, 18. Dio, p. 743. [x] Tacit. l. iv. c. 2.

ans were concealed. The indigent part of the populace failed not to join the ſoldiers in the general violence and ſpoil; ſo that on all hands nothing was heard but diſmal complaints and outcries, and nothing ſeen but the dreadful calamities of a city ſtormed and ſacked. Domitian who already enjoyed the name and reſidence of Cæſar, inſtead of ſtriving to check the inſolence of the ſoldiery, attended his infamous pleaſures, and only by his diſſolute life ſhewed himſelf the ſon of an emperor. Primus, in whoſe hands the whole power was lodged, made uſe of it only to plunder more freely, being wholly taken up in conveying from the palace treaſure, moveables, and domeſtic ſlaves, as if he were ſtill ſeizing the ſpoil of Cremona. When the fury of the ſoldiers began to abate, the ſenate met, and confirmed the ſovereignty of Veſpaſian, decreeing to him with great alacrity, all the titles and prerogatives ever inveſted in former princes. They declared him conſul, giving him his ſon Titus for collegue in that dignity: Domitian they honoured with the prætorſhip and conſular authority: they preſented Primus with the conſular ornaments, and Cornelius Fuſcus and Arrius Varus with thoſe of the prætorſhip. All theſe decrees were paſſed at the motion of Valerius Aſiaticus, conſul elect [y].

The miſerable condition of the city.

The ſovereignty of Veſpaſian acknowledged by the ſenate.

During theſe commotions in Italy, the Batavians revolted under the conduct of the celebrated Claudius Civilis; but of the cauſes and events of this war, which continued long, we ſhall ſpeak in the following reign. The people of Dacia too roſe up in arms; a people never well-affected to the Romans, and then by no forces reſtrained, ſince the army was withdrawn out of Mœſia. They ſtormed the winter quarters of the auxiliary cohorts, paſſed the Danube, and were proceeding to demoliſh the entrenchments of the legions, when Mucianus happened to march through Mœſia, with the forces of the eaſt. As that commander was already appriſed of the victory at Cremona, he detached the ſixth legion to oppoſe the barbarians, and appointed Fonteius Agrippa governor of Mœſia, with part of the troops which had ſurrendered at Cremona, and which it was thought adviſeable to engage in a foreign war, that they might not diſturb domeſtic peace. Agrippa obliged the enemy to repaſs the Danube; and, to prevent prevent any farther attempts of the like nature, built a great number of forts on the banks of the Danube, and ſtrengthened them with numerous garriſons. In Pontus likewiſe great diſturbances were raiſed by one Anicetus, formerly freed-man to king Polemon, under him in great power, and commander of the royal navy. As he was highly provoked againſt the Romans, for changing the kingdom into a province, which happened in the reign of Nero, and by that means depriving him of all his authority, he led hold of the preſent opportunity, and, levying forces under colour of aſſiſting Vitellius, ſeized the city of Trebizond, burnt the fleet which guarded the coaſts, and, entering into an alliance with the neighbouring barbarians, ſcoured the ſea with ſcorn and inſult, and committed dreadful ravages on the coaſts of Aſia. Againſt him Veſpaſian ſent a choice body of legionaries, under the command of Virdius Geminus, an officer diſtinguiſhed in war; who, attacking the enemy while they were roving about in queſt of booty, drove them into their veſſels; then, with ſome galleys built with great expedition, chaced Anicetus into the mouth of the river Chobus, where he relied upon the protection of Sedochus king of the Lazians, a people of Colchis. That prince ſeemed at firſt determined to defend his ally; but, as ſoon as a reward for his treachery was propoſed and a war threatened, he betrayed Anicetus and all his followers to the conqueror. Thus ended that ſervile war; and Veſpaſian received an account of the ſucceſs which had attended his arms, a few days before the joyful tidings were brought him of the great victory gained by his forces at Cremona [z].

The Dacians in arms are quelled by Mucianus.

[y] Idem, ibid.

Diſturbances in Pontus.

Anicetus' taken.

[z] Tacit. c. l. iii. c. 46, 47, 48.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIX.

From the death of Vitellius, to the death of Domitian, the laſt of the twelve Cæſars, in whom ended the Flavian family.

The deſcent birth, and actions of Veſpaſian, before he attained the ſovereignty.

THE Flavian family, now raiſed to the higheſt pitch of grandeur, was no-ways conſpicuous, either for its luſtre or antiquity. Titus Flavius, the emperor's grandfather, was a citizen of Reate, now Rieti, in the country of the Sabines; and in the civil wars between Cæſar and Pompey, ſerved under the latter in quality of centurion, but returned home after the battle of Pharſalia; and, having obtained his pardon, betook himſelf to the mean employment of collecting taxes, under the farmers of the public revenue. His ſon, Titus Flavius Sabinus, followed the ſame profeſſion, and acquitted himſelf in it with ſuch integrity, that by ſeveral cities in Aſia, where he was collector of the tax called quadrageſima, ſtatues were erected to him, with this inſcription, To the honeſt publican. Afterwards he withdrew into the country of the Helvetii, where he acquired a conſiderable fortune by lending money upon intereſt. He married Veſpaſia Polla, whoſe father had been military tribune and prefect of the camp; and had by her two children, Sabinus, of whom we have ſpoken above, and Veſpaſian, who was born on the ſeventeenth of November of the ninth year of the common chriſtian æra; that is, five years before the death of Auguſtus; ſo that he was raiſed to the empire in the ſixtieth year of his age. He was, amongſt many other new men choſen from the municipal towns, from the colonies, and even from the provinces, admitted into the ſenate by the emperor Caligula. He indeed, at firſt declined that dignity, but was at laſt, in a manner conſtrained by his mother to accept it. He afterwards ſerved in quality of military tribune in Thrace, was quæſtor of the provinces of Cyrene and Crete, ædile, and prætor. He attended the emperor Claudius into Britain, where he diſtinguiſhed guiſhed himſelf, though only tribune of a legion, in a very eminent manner, as we have related in the reign of that prince. He was conſul during the two laſt months of the eleventh year of Claudius's reign, and by Nero appointed governor of Africa in quality of pro-conſul. He married Flavia Domitilla, a native of Africa, at firſt ſlave to Statilius Capella, but afterwards manumiſed and made free of the city. By her he had two ſons, Titus and Domitian, who reigned after him, and one daughter, named Domitilla, who died, as did alſo her mother, before his acceſſion to the empire. Veſpaſian was, as Tacitus obſerves, of all the emperors the only one by power changed for the better. While he was in a private ſtation, he uſed to court the favour of the princes by the meaneſt flattery. During his prætorſhip he begged leave to exhibit extraordinary ſports in honour of Caligula, on account of the pretended victory in Germany. He was one of the few ſycophants who were of opinion, that thoſe who were ſaid to have conſpired againſt that prince ſhould be publicly executed, and that their bodies ſhould be left unburied. In the preſence of the whole ſenate he returned Caligula thanks for having done him the honour of inviting him to his table. He was chiefly indebted to Narciſſus, the freed-man of Claudius, for the conſulſhip, and the two ſacerdotal dignities which he enjoyed; what dignities theſe were, we are no where told. After the death of Narciſſus, his great patron, he withdrew and led a private life, dreading the violent ſpirit of Agrippina, who bore an irreconcileable hatred to that miniſter and all his friends. It was therefore probably after her death, that he was by Nero appointed proconſul of Africa, in which government he acquitted himſelf, according to Suetonius [a], with honour and integrity; according to Tacitus [b], with ignominy and public hatred. The former acknowledges, that during a ſedition at Adrumetum, he was outrageouſly inſulted by the populace; and on the other hand, it was well known that no province eſpouſed the cauſe of Vitellius, and oppoſed the preferment of Veſpaſian, with more ardour than that of Africa; a manifeſt proof that his government had not been popular. Soon after his return from Africa, his affairs being in a bad condition and his credit at ſtake, he was obliged to mortgage his houſe and poſſeſſions to his brother Sabinus, and in the mean mean time to ſupport himſelf and his family with the mean gain he earned by ſelling and changing horſes, nay, and by other means ſtill more unworthy; for he was convicted of having extorted from a young knight the ſum of two hundred thouſand ſeſterces, for employing his intereſt in procuring him a place in the ſenate againſt the inclination and expreſs will of his father. He attended Nero into Achaia, where he incurred that prince's diſpleaſure, and was forbid the court, for his inattention while the emperor was ſinging; a crime which had nigh coſt him his life at Rome, as we have related elſewhere. Hereupon he withdrew into the country, and there led a life altogether private and retired, expecting every moment his laſt doom, when he was, contrary to his expectation, named by Nero to command in the war againſt the Jews, as a perſon of great military abilities, and one who, on account of his mean extraction, gave him no umbrage. He was therefore ſent into Judæa, with three legions, eight ſquadrons of horſe, and ten auxiliary cohorts, his ſon Titus ſerving under him in quality of his lieutenant. In the courſe of that war, which proved ſo fatal to the Jewiſh nation, Veſpaſian, acquired ſignal reputation. In every duty incumbent upon a leader, or even a ſoldier, he was indefatigable: it was he who always led the march; he who always choſe the ground for encamping. Upon conſultations and diſpatches he ſpent nights and days, and was ever ready upon any exigency to encounter the enemy hand to hand. His diet was ſuch as chance preſented. In his garb and dreſs he varied little from a common ſoldier. In ſhort had he been exempt from avarice, he would have equalled the moſt famous commanders of antient times. With that vice he is charged by moſt writers; among the reſt by Tacitus, who owed to him his firſt promotion in the ſtate, but nevertheleſs declares, as becomes an impartial hiſtorian, againſt admitting perſonal hatred or affection in the characters of men. After the death of Nero and Galba, while Otho and Vitellius were contending for the ſovereignty, he began to cheriſh hopes of obtaining it himſelf, relying on ſeveral prodigies, prophecies, and propitious reſponſes or oracles (C). Of the many predictions,

[a] Suet in Veſp. c. 4. [b] Tacit. l. ii. c. 97.

His character as a general.

(C) The antients take notice of many prodigies preſaging his future grandeur. In his grounds ſays Tacitus (10), while he was in

(10) Tacit. l. ii. c. 78.

dictions, that of Josephus the historian is the most famous, who saluted Vespasian with the title of emperor, even in Nero's reign, and assured him, he should be soon invested with the sovereign power. His prediction is mentioned not only by himself [c], but likewise by Suetonius [d], who tells us, that Josephus, being by Vespasian's orders put in irons, boldly affirmed, that in a short time he should by him be set at liberty; but that he should be emperor first. However, that the empire was by the dark laws of fate, by predictions, and prophecies, foretold and ordained to Vespasian and his sons, was, says Tacitus, what we believed, after we had seen them emperors [e]. Vespasian, being encouraged in the bloom of his age, a cypress-tree, signally tall, fell suddenly; but the day following rose again, and resumed fresh growth and verdure; which was, according to the concurring testimonies of the soothsayers, an omen of extraordinary grandeur in the state; yet at first the whole presage seemed to have been literally fulfilled by his being honoured with the triumphal ornaments, which he acquired by his conduct in Britain; by his bearing the dignity of consul, and by his renown in vanquishing the Jews. But when he had passed through these honours, he began to believe, that the empire was the thing presaged. He was confirmed in this belief by the answer returned him by Basilides, priest of the god Carmel, so called from mount Carmel, on which stood the altar of that deity; a deity, as Tacitus observes, not distinguished by any statue or temple, but only by an altar. As Vespasian offered sacrifice there, and was entertaining great hopes and views, Basilides the priest, having diligently surveyed the entrails, addressed him thus: Whatever design it is which you meditate, O Vespasian, whether to build a house, or extend your domains, or to enlarge your train of slaves, to you is granted a mighty and large settlement, infinite bounds, and multitudes of of men. These mysterious words were immediately spread abroad by fame, and all explained as presaging the empire to Vespasian. Many responses of oracles and prodigies of the like nature, are related by Suetonius (11) and Dion Cassius (12); but we shall not trespass upon the patience of our readers with a detail of them.

[c] Joseph. bell. Jud. l. v. c. 12. [d] Suet. c. 5. [e] Tacit. l. i. c. 86. & l. ii. c. 78.

(11) Suet. in Vesp. c. 5, (12) Dio, l. lxvi p. 744.

couraged by Mucianus, governor of Syria, by Tiberius Alexander, governor of Egypt, and by all his officers, not to neglect the present opportunity, while two competitors, of all men the most unworthy, were contending for the empire, he at length yielded, as we have already related, and was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the first of July of the sixty-ninth year of the christian æra; on the third of the same month in Judæa, where he then was; on the fifteenth in Syria; and a few days after in all the provinces of the east. He was not in himself any ways changed by so sudden and so mighty a turn of fortune: no loftiness appeared in his aspect, no arrogance, nor any new behaviour under his new character. He immediately rewarded his friends, raising some to military commands, others to be governors of provinces, several to the rank of senators, most of them men of signal merit and renown, and who afterwards acquired the highest honours in the state. As he thought it below him to court the soldiers by largesses, he promised them no greater donative in the heat of the civil war, than had been given them by others during full peace. In the council which he established at Berytus for the direction of all momentous affairs, it was resolved that Titus should pursue the war against the Jews, and Mucianus march with part of the forces against Vitellius. But Titus undertook nothing till the next year; and Antonius Primus, with the Illyrian army, defeated the troops of Vitellius before the arrival of Mucianus, made himself master of Rome and all Italy, and caused the unhappy emperor to be publicly executed as a common criminal: all which transactions we have already related at length. In the mean time, Vespasian, having passed some time at Antioch, the capitol of Syria, proceeded from thence to Egypt, where he received the joyful tidings of the victory gained by Primus at Cremona. Hereupon he hastened to Alexandria, with a design to distress Rome by famine, since from Egypt chiefly the city was supplied with corn. He was at the same time preparing to invade Africa by sea and land, in order to bring upon the enemy, by intercepting their provisions, the calamity of hunger, with that of dissension. But, in the mean time, many persons of all ranks and degrees arrived from Italy, to acquaint him with the fate and fall of Vitellius; which were no sooner known, than multitudes flocked from all quarters, notwithstanding it was then winter, to court

Is acknowledged emperor in the eastern provinces.

Receives news of the fate of Vitellius.

court the favour of the new emperor; insomuch, that Alexandria, the greatest city of the empire after Rome, proved too small for the vast numbers of embassadors, deputies, noblemen, officers, &c. who flocked thither. Among the rest, embassadors arrived from Vologeses king of Parthia, who offered to assist him with forty thousand Parthian horse. Vespasian returned him thanks, and desiring he would send embassadors to the senate, acquainted him, that the commonwealth was re-established in peace[f]. The news of the death of Vitellius made Vespasian alter his measures; for instead of distressing the city, which had already proclaimed him emperor, with famine, he dispatched thither a great number of vessels laden with corn; which arrived very seasonably, there not being at that time remaining in all the public stores above ten days provisions of grain[g]. As the winter-season was far advanced, Vespasian continued some months at Alexandria, waiting a safe passage from the gentle weather returning with the summer.

Mucianus arrives at Rome. His character.

In the mean time, Mucianus arrived at Rome, according to Josephus[h], the day after the death of Vitellius, and in a moment drew to himself, as he had been invested by Vespasian with an uncontrouled power, the whole sway. Licinius Mucianus was, according to the character which Tacitus has drawn of him, a man remarkable for a strange combination of good and bad qualities; luxury and vigilance, haughtiness and complaisance; when unemployed, excessively voluptuous; of infinite abilities and activity, when business required them. Hence his equal share of praise and reproach; as a public minister admired, as a private voluptuary condemned. He was a great minister in the several arts of engaging, an able orator, well versed in civil affairs, prompt in foreseeing events, dextrous at concerting schemes, mighty in credit with those who were above him, under him, or in equal authority with him; in short, such a man as could easier create an emperor than be one. Vespasian, as he was chiefly indebted to him for for the empire, upon his departure for Italy, inveſted him with an unlimited power, and is even ſaid to have truſted him with his ſignet, as if he had been his partner in the ſovereignty. Hence, upon his arrival at Rome, he was by all looked upon and revered, rather as the emperor's colleague, than as a ſubordinate miniſter. Quite ſunk was the power of Antonius Primus and Arrius Varus, whom Veſpaſian had already appointed captain of the prætorian guards.

[f] Idem, l. iv. c. 51. Joseph. ibid. l. iv. c. 42. [g] Dio, Val. p. 702. Tacit. ibid. [h] Joseph. bell. l. iv. c. 42.

He bears univerſal ſway.

As Mucianus could not well diſſemble his animoſity towards them, the city immediately turned her back upon her late favourites, and devoted herſelf to the new minion. To him alone court was paid, to him all addreſſes were made: neither was he wanting to his own grandeur; for he never appeared in public but encompaſſed with guards, and attended with an equipage becoming a ſovereign. He forbore indeed the name, but performed all the functions of ſovereignty. Soon after his arrival, he cauſed Aſiaticus, the late emperor's freed-man, to attone for his late wicked ſway, by ſuffering the death of a ſlave. His doom was by every one expected and even wiſhed for; but the death of Calpurnius Galerianus occaſioned a mighty and general dread in the city. He was the ſon of Caius Piſo, who, in the reign of Nero, had aſpired at the ſovereignty; but had himſelf no ſhare in that conſpiracy, nor had ever offered to diſturb the ſtate. However, as he was of an illuſtrious family, of a graceful perſon, and greatly beloved by the people, he was, by order of Mucianus, committed to the cuſtody of a band of ſoldiers, ſent forty miles from Rome, and there put to death by having his veins opened [1].

He cauſes Calpurnius Galerianus to be murdered.

WHILE Mucianus was thus ruling with abſolute ſway in Rome, the Batavians were carrying on the war againſt the Romans with ſtupendous ſucceſs in Lower Germany. Of that war we ſhall here, as in its proper place, (for it was happily concluded this year, the firſt of Veſpaſian's reign) briefly recount the cauſes and events. The Batavians, originally the ſame people with the Cattans, who dwelt beyond the Rhine, being driven thence by a domeſtic inſurrection, ſettled at the extreme borders of Gaul, in an iſland formed by the mouths of the Rhine and the Ocean. According to this deſcription, the Batavians poſſeſſed South Holland, part of the country of Utrecht, and the

The Batavians revolt from the Romans, under the conduct of Claudius Civilis.

[1] Tacit. l. iv. c. 11. Joſeph. l. v. c. 4.

the iſland of Betaw, in the dukedom of Guelderland. They were not ſubjects, but allies, of the Romans, being obliged to aſſiſt them only with troops commanded by men of the firſt rank amongſt them. They had at this time eight cohorts, men thoroughly exerciſed in the wars of Germany and Britain. Theſe Vitellius had gained over to his party, and a great ſhare they had in the victory at Bedriacum; but proving afterwards refractory and ungovernable, the emperor thought it adviſeable to remand them back to their own country. Julius Paulus and Claudius Civilis, both men of royal deſcent, greatly ſurpaſſed the reſt in credit and quality. The former was ſlain by Fonteius Capito, who falſly charged him with rebellion. The latter was put in irons and ſent to Nero; but by Galba declared innocent, and ſet at liberty. Under Vitellius he was again in danger of his life, being charged with treaſon: and hence his hatred to the Romans, which prompted him to arm his countrymen againſt them. However, as he was a man of great addreſs, leſt the Romans ſhould look upon him as a public enemy, if he once appeared to have revolted from them, in the beginning of the war between Vitellius and Veſpaſian, he pretended an attachment to the latter, and was, by letters from Antonius Primus, ordered to ſtop and drive back the forces ſummoned to ſuccour Vitellius. Civilis therefore, determined to revolt, but, concealing for the preſent his main drift, contented himſelf with diverting the Batavian youth from liſting themſelves, purſuant to the orders of Vitellius. Soon after, pretending only to celebrate a banquet, he aſſembled the chiefs of the nation and the moſt daring amongſt the populace, in a ſacred grave, where, when they had carouſed till far in the night, and were warmed and bold, he acquainted them with his real deſign, diſplayed the praiſes and renown of their nation, enumerated the inſults they had ſuffered, the oppreſſion they groaned under, and all the miſeries attending upon a ſtate of ſervitude. As he was heard with great applauſe, he bound them all with many barbarous ceremonies in a combination. He then diſpatched meſſengers to the Caninefates, who inhabited part of the iſland, to engage them in the ſame cauſe and aſſociation. The Caninefates fell readily into his meaſures; and chuſing for their leader one Brinno, famous for brutal bravery, took the field; and being joined by the Friſians, marched to attack the Romans, who, under the conduct of Aquilius, had retired to the upper part of the iſland. The conflict was ſcarce begun, when a band of Tungrians, who ſerved under the Romans, went over to the enemy. At the ſame time, the Roman fleet, conſiſting of twenty-four veſſels, the rowers being for the moſt part natives of Batavia, rowed away directly to the enemy's ſhore. By this means the Roman forces were eaſily defeated, put to flight, and inhumanly butchered, both by the enemy and their own companions. Upon the news of this victory, the Germans immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to Civilis, with offers of ſuccours. On the other hand, Hordeonius Flaccus, who commanded in Upper Germany, ordered Memmius Lupercus to march out forthwith againſt the enemy with two legions, and the cavalry of the Ubians and Treverians, and a ſquadron of Batavian horſe, men long ſince debauched in their fidelity to the Romans, but feigning great zeal for their cauſe, purpoſely to betray them in the very heat of the fight. Accordingly the two armies having joined battle, the Batavian cavalry, deſerting the legions while they were fighting with great bravery, fled over to Civilis; then inſtantly, like enemies, turned upon the Romans. Yet the legionaries, though preſſed on all ſides, ſtill kept their ranks and ſtood their ground, till the auxiliary Ubians and Treverians betook themſelves to a ſcandalous flight, diſperſing all over the fields. Againſt them the Batavians bent their fury and purſuit; which gave the legions an opportunity of retiring with ſafety to the old camp, which, as we have obſerved in the reign of Tiberius, is placed by moſt geographers near the preſent city of Stanten in the duchy of Cleves. About the ſame time, the eight Batavian cohorts, which, in obedience to the orders of Vitellius, were upon their march to Rome, being informed of the revolt of their countrymen and the advantages by them already gained, returned, and took their rout towards Lower Germany, there to join Civilis. Herennius Gallus, who then governed Bonna, now Bonn, attempted to oppoſe the paſſage of the Batavians at the head of three thouſand legionaries and ſome cohorts haſtily raiſed; but was by them defeated with great ſlaughter. The conquerors, avoiding Cologn, purſued their march, without committing any hoſtilities, and joined Civilis, who ſeeing himſelf now at the head of a regular army, but ſtill dreading the formidable power of the Romans, obliged all who were with him to ſwear allegiance to Veſpaſian, and diſpatched embaſſadors to the two legions in the old camp, requiring them

Civilis is joined by the Caninefates and Friſians.

Puts the Romans to flight.

Eight Batavian cohorts go over to Civilis.

to

to take the ſame oath. The anſwer they returned was, That they would not follow the counſels of a known traitor, nor thoſe of a public enemy: and that a Batavian fugitive muſt not interfere in the affairs of the Roman ſtate, but prepare to meet the doom due to his enormous crimes. Civilis, highly provoked at this anſwer, rouſed to arms the whole Batavian nation, and, being joined by the Bructerans and Tenƈterans, attacked the camp with a numberleſs multitude and a fury hardly to be expreſſed. But the Romans, though ſcarce five thouſand men, made ſo vigorous a defence, that Civilis, deſpairing of ſucceſs by the method of force and ſtorming, changed his meaſures, and blocked them up on all ſides, not doubting, but they would be ſoon conſtrained by famine to capitulate. In the mean time, Hordeonius Flaccus, underſtanding that the camp was beſieged, immediately diſpatched Dillius Vocula, commander of the eighteenth legion, and Herennius Gallus, with powerful ſuccours to the relief of the two legions. But while theſe two commanders were ſtill encamped at Gelduba, upon the Rhine, now Gelnub, a ſmall village near Ordingen, in the territory of Cologn, news was brought him of the defeat of Vitellius at Cremona; whereupon the officers immediately declared for Veſpaſian, forced the ſoldiers to ſwear allegiance to him, and ſent Alpinus Montanus to acquaint Civilis with the victory, and deſire him to lay down his arms and diſband his troops, if with them he meant to aſſiſt Veſpaſian, ſince they all had already acknowledged him emperor. But Civilis had ſomething elſe in view, and therefore openly declared, that he would never ſheath his ſword, till he had redeemed both his own country and Gaul from the tyrannical yoke of the Romans; and that inſtant diſpatched againſt Vocula the veteran cohorts and the flower of his German forces, under the command of Julius Maximus and Claudius Victor, huſband to his ſiſter. Theſe coming upon the Romans quite unprepared, put them to flight and made a dreadful havock of them. But, in the mean time, ſome Gaſcon bands, lately raiſed by Galba, arriving at Gelduba, fell upon the enemy in the rear, whilſt earneſtly purſuing the defeat, filled them with diſmay, and inſpired the Romans with freſh courage; ſo that they returned to the charge, and, with the aſſiſtance of their allies, put the enemy in their turn to flight, and gave them a total overthrow. All the braveſt men of the Batavian Civilis beſieges the old camp.

Defeats Vocula the Roman commander, and is defeated by the Vaſcones.

infantry were cut off; but their horſe eſcaped with the Roman ſtandards and priſoners taken in the beginning of the encounter. Vocula, encouraged with this ſucceſs, marched againſt the enemy beſieging the old camp, and, after a moſt bloody conflict, forced them to abandon the enterprize. In the heat of the engagement, Civilis, being thrown by the fall of his horſe, was throughout both armies believed to have been dageroufly wounded, or ſlain: and to this report chiefly was owing the victory gained by the Romans. Vocula, inſtead of purſuing the enemy, when broken and in diſorder, applied himſelf to fortify the old camp; and, having ſtrengthened it with ſome new works, returned to Gelduba, and thence proceeded to Noveſium, now Nuys, where Hordeonius Flaccus lay encamped with part of the army. But Vocula was ſcarce gone, when Civilis again laid ſiege to the old camp, and advancing with a ſtrong detachment to Gelduba, made himſelf maſter of that place; but was put to flight by the Roman cavalry near Noveſium. But, in the mean time, the ſoldiers began to mutiny, and claim preſent payment of their donative; for they had learnt, that the money was already ſent thither by Vitellius. Hordeonius immediately complied with their demand; but diſtributed the money in the name of Veſpaſian. The ſoldiers no ſooner received it, than they abandoned themſelves without controul to debauchery and good chear, to nocturnal revellings and cabals; and, when intoxicated with wine, renewed their antient fury and rage againſt Hordeonius, who was by them ſuſpected of favouring Civilis, becauſe, from a mind well-diſpoſed towards Veſpaſian, he had not oppoſed his attempts. As none of the general officers dared to check or reprimand them, in the height of their rage they violently burſt into the bed-chamber of their general, dragged him out, and then butchered him. Vocula would have undergone the ſame fate, had he not made his eſcape in the diſguiſe of a ſlave. They then reſtored the images of Vitellius, tore thoſe of Veſpaſian, and committed, during that night, innumerable diſorders. But their rage being appeaſed upon the return of the day, dread and conſciouſneſs took place; the firſt, the fourteenth, and the eighteenth legions were eaſily reclaimed by Vocula, and led by him, after they had again taken the oath to Veſpaſian, againſt Civilis, who had laid ſiege to Magontiacum, now Mentz. Before their arrival the beſiegers were withdrawn; but the Romans

The Roman ſoldiers mutiny.

Murder Hordeonius Flaccus their general.

Romans coming up with them, as they marched careleſly and appriſed of no danger, fell upon them ſword in hand, and made a dreadful havock of the diſperſed and diſorderly multitude [k].

In the mean time, the death of Vitellius, the murder of Hordeonius, and the burning of the capitol, being divulged through Germany and Gaul, both theſe nations ruſhed into open hoſtilities againſt the Roman people. A motly multitude of Cattans, Uſipians, Mattiacians, and other German nations, joined Civilis. The Gauls too, laying hold of the preſent opportunity, while the Romans were weakened and broken by ſuch ſucceſſive civil wars, combined to attempt the recovery of their antient liberty, being ſtrongly moved by the burning of the capitol to believe, that the diſſolution of the empire was at hand. The city, they ſaid, had of old been taken by the Gauls; but the manſion of Jupiter having eſcaped, the empire had thence continued to ſubſiſt. The Druids too animated them with vain oracles, that to nations beyond the Alps the empire of the world was portended. The chief ſway among the Gauls was borne at this time by Claſſicus, Julius Tutor, and Julius Sabinus; the two former Treverians, and the latter a native of Langres. Theſe three, having in private conferences ſounded the minds of the reſt, and engaged in their deſigns ſuch as they judged proper, came at length to a reſolution of throwing off all diſguiſes, and openly declaring againſt Rome. The only heſitation which occurred was, how to diſpoſe of the Roman forces then in Gaul. Some were for maſſacring them all, others for putting to the ſword only their commanders, ſince the common herd, bereft of their leaders, would be eaſily led into a confederacy. The latter opinion prevailed; and this was the ſubſtance of their firſt conſultation. The conſpirators then diſpatched incendiaries into all the regions of Gaul, to rouſe them to war; but in the mean time, feigned great obſequiouſneſs and reſpect to Vocula, who was well appriſed of their deſigns; but thought proper, as he wanted force to thwart them, to diſſemble in his turn, and to purſue the ſame artifices which were purſued againſt him. With this view he repaired to Cologn; but Claſſicus and Tutor, who were both commanders of the Treverian horſe, encamping by themſelves and ſeparating the firſt time from the legions, he returned back, and with the legions alone proceeded to Noveſium, a numerous body of Gauls having pitched in the open fields about two miles from that place. To the camp of the Gauls, as hoſtilities were not yet begun on either ſide, daily reſorted great numbers of Roman ſoldiers; and there, as they found themſelves ſurrounded with terrors on all ſides, they agreed to purchaſe their own ſafety, by committing an iniquity till then unknown among the Romans, which was to ſwear allegiance to the Gauls, and promiſe either to murder or deliver up in chains their officers. Vocula was not unapprifed of what paſſed in the camp of the Gauls; but, judging it beneath him to fly, aſſembled the ſoldiery, and having in vain attempted to divert them from ſo monſtrous an iniquity, he retired with a deſign to put an end to his life; but being reſtrained by his freed-men and ſlaves, he was ſoon after murdered by Æmilius Longinus, a deſerter from the firſt legion, ſent by Claſſicus for that purpoſe. His lieutetenants, Herennius and Numiſius, were only put in irons. After this, Claſſicus, aſſuming the badges of a Roman magiſtrate, entered the camp, and adminiſtered the new oath to the legions there, every one ſwearing allegiance to the ſovereignty and empire of the Gauls. Between Tutor and Claſſicus was ſhared the charge of managing the war. The former laid ſiege to Cologn, and forced the inhabitants to take the ſame oath, as he did all the ſoldiers who lay farther up the Rhine. Claſſicus ſtrove to gain over by fair promiſes the two legions that were ſhut up in the antient camp, and were obliged, for want of proviſions, after having conſumed in food their horſes and other beaſts of burden, to ſupport themſelves by plucking ſhrubs and plants, and picking the herbs which ſprouted amongſt the ſtones of the walls. But at length, upon ſo much glory and patience, they brought a foul ſtain, by ſending deputies to Civilis to beg their lives. Neither were their ſupplications received, till they had ſworn homage and fidelity to the Gauls. Then he granted them their lives; but reſerved the plunder of the camp to himſelf, appointing guards to ſecure the money, ſlaves, and baggage, and others to convoy the ſoldiers thus departing deveſted of all. When they had marched about five miles, the Germans

The Gauls revolt.

[k] Tacit. l. iv. c. 12—36.

The Roman legions murder Vocula, and ſwear allegiance to the Gauls.

Cologn and other cities take the ſame oath.

ruſhed

ruſhed upon them out of an ambuſh, and cut the greater part of them in pieces. The remainder fled back to the camp; which the Germans, by throwing in fire-brands, ſet on fire, ſo that ſuch of the unhappy Romans, as had ſurvived the late ſlaughter, were now all to a man conſumed by the flames. Civilis, elated with the ſucceſs of his arms, ſoon reduced all the neighbouring cities, ſome of them being willing to follow his fortune, and others awed by his power [1].

In the mean time, Julius Sabinus, having pulled down and broken the public tables containing the confederacy with Rome, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Cæſar; and, leading an huge hoſt of his countrymen the Lingones, ſuddenly invaded the adjacent ſtate of the Sequanians, who continued faithful to the Romans; but being by them put to flight, in order to raiſe a report that he had periſhed, he ſet on fire the country-dwelling whither he had fled, and by that means ſaved his life yet for nine years. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of him in the ſequel of this hiſtory. By this victory of the Sequanians the fury of the war was ſtayed in Gaul. The ſeveral ſtates began by degrees to recover coolneſs and judgment, the reſt following the example of the people of Rheims, who publiſhed all over the provinces of Gaul an invitation for aſſembling their ſeveral deputies, to conſult which conduced moſt to the good of the whole, war or peace. The aſſembly was held at Rheims, where Tullius Valentinus, one of the embaſſadors of the Treverians, with great vehemence promoted the war; but was oppoſed by Julius Auſpex, one of the chiefs in the ſtate of Rheims, who diſplayed at length the power of the Romans and the bleſſings of peace. They extolled the courage and reſolution of Valentinus, but followed the counſel of Auſpex, moſt of them being deterred from purſuing a general confederacy, by the mutual jealouſy and competition of the ſeveral provinces. It was aſked, Where muſt be the head of the war? whither muſt they recur for ſupreme authority? and, ſhould all their purſuits proſper, what place would they chuſe for the ſeat of empire? Some boaſted their alliances, ſome their wealth and forces, others their antiquity; and from all theſe, each claimed ſuperior prerogative and rule. At length, after long and warm debates, they agreed to acquieſce in their preſent condition.

Julius Sabinus defeated.

The Gauls reſolve upon peace.

[1] Tacit. c. 67. Joſeph. l. vii. c. 11.

condition. To the Treverians letters were immediately diſpatched in the name of the ſtates of Gaul, adviſing them to lay down their arms, while their pardon was yet to be procured, and their friends were ready to intercede for them, if they ſhewed remorſe. But Valentinus, a better ſpeaker than commander, oppoſed this counſel, and ſhut the ears of the nation againſt it. What chiefly diſpoſed the Gauls to peace was, the news they received, that an army was advancing full march againſt them, conſiſting of four legions from Italy, two from Spain, and one from Britain, under the conduct of two ſignal commanders, Annius Gallus and Petilius Cerealis, whom Mucianus had diſpatched from Rome to put a ſtop to the further conqueſts of Civilis and Claſſicus. Sextilius Felix arrived before them, having at the head of ſome auxiliary cohorts forced a paſſage through Rhœtia. To him joined themſelves the twenty-firſt legion, and the ſquadron of horſe ſurnamed the Singular, commanded by Julius Briganticus, nephew to Civilis; but hated by his uncle, and hating him. With theſe forces Felix attacked and routed the Treverians commanded by Tutor near Bingium, now Bingen, and in a few days obliged the Tribocians, the Vangiones, the Cercatians, and the Nemetians, to deſert their countrymen, and return to the Romans. After he had thus made himſelf maſter of the countries bordering on the Rhine, from Mentz to the preſent city of Baſle, the legions, who had revolted to the Gauls, renewed of their own accord the oath of allegiance to Veſpaſian; and leaving Treves, where they were then quartered, retired to Mets, a city confederate with the Romans. In the mean time, Petilius Cerealis arriving at Magontiacum, and being informed there, that Valentinus was poſted at Rigodulum, now Rigol, with a numerous band of Treverians, he drew into one body whatever ſoldiers he found at Magontiacum with the forces he had brought over the Alps; and, having reached Rigodulum in three marches, attacked the enemy's entrenchments, tho' incloſed by the mountains and the river Moſelle, and ſtrengthened with deep trenches and barricades of huge ſtone. The Treverians fought for ſome time with great reſolution; but were in the end forced to abandon their camp, and ſave themſelves by flight over the mountains. The Romans purſued them, and in the purſuit took many perſons of great diſtinction, and amongſt them Valentinus their general. The next day Cerealis entered

The Treverians routed by Sextilius Felix;

And by Cerealis, who takes Valentinus their general.

tered Treves; which city the ſoldiers were paſſionate for razing, as the birth-place of Claſſicus and Tutor; but Cerealis, dreading to inure his ſoldiers to licentiouſneſs and cruelty, checked their rage; for ſince the civil wars had ceaſed, the ſoldiery was more tractable in ſuch as were foreign. Their attention was likewiſe diverted by another object, the arrival of the legions which had ſworn allegiance to the empire of the Gauls. They appeared ſad and dejected, keeping their eyes immoveably fixed upon the ground, and imploring their pardon by ſilence and weeping, till Cerealis comforted them, aſcribing their deſertion to the inevitable operations of fate, and aſſuring them, that neither he nor the emperor would remember their paſt offences. At the ſame time, he cauſed an order to be publiſhed throughout the camp, that no one ſhould, upon any diſpute, reproach his fellow ſoldier with mutiny or deſertion [m].

The return of the legions which had ſworn allegiance to the empire of the Gauls.

In the mean time, Civilis, Tutor, and Claſſicus, having from different quarters aſſembled all their forces, attacked unexpectedly the entrenchments of the legions now at the very gates of Treves, forced them, put the cavalry to flight, and ſeized the bridge of communication over the Moſelle in the midſt of the city. News of this general rout and havock being brought to Cerealis, while yet in his chamber, nay, in his bed, (for he paſſed not the night in the camp) he ſtarted up, and, undaunted by all this confuſion and diſtreſs, ſtrove with his own hand to ſtop the fugitives; animated them, tho' void of armour, with his own example; and heading ſuch as were remarkably brave, recovered the bridge, and ſecured it by a guard of armed men. Then haſtening to the camp, and there rallying the diſperſed legions, he not only drove out the enemy, but the ſame day forced their entrenchments, and recovered the city of Cologn, where he found the wife and ſiſter of Civilis with the ſon of Claſſicus [o]. Civilis, having after this unhappy fight recruited his forces with incredible expedition, poſted himſelf in the old camp, where he was attacked by Cerealis, reinforced by the acceſſion of three legions. But as the fields round about were naturally marſhy, and Civilis had by a great dam diverted the courſe of the Rhine, which thence flooded all the neighbouring grounds, the Romans were eaſily repulſed, and their cavalry put to flight by ſome German ſquadrons ſallying

The Roman entrenchments ſurpriſed and taken.

The gallant conduct of Cerealis.

[m] Tacit. c. 71——77. [o] Tacit. c. 78.

ſallying out againſt them. By the iſſue of this encounter, both the leaders were prompted, tho' from different motives, to put the whole to the iſſue of a general battle; Civilis eager to purſue his good fortune, Cerealis to cancel his diſhonour. Accordingly, the next day both armies appeared early in the field, and engaged with equal fury and reſolution. After the conflict had laſted many hours, the Germans were in the end put to flight, and the war had been finiſhed that day, had not the conquerors been prevented, by night approaching and a ſudden ſtorm, from purſuing the flying foe. After this overthrow, Civilis withdrew to the iſland of the Batavians: Claſſicus, Tutor, and an hundred and thirteen ſenators of Treves croſſed the Rhine to raiſe new forces; wherein they were attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that ſoon after they returned with a vaſt multitude, and at the ſame time, made a fourfold aſſault upon the Roman forces, poſted at Avenacum, Vada, Grinnes, and Batavodurum, now Arnhem, Wageningen, Rhenen, and Duerſtede. They were every-where repulſed with great ſlaughter, and forced to caſt themſelves precipitately into the river. Notwithſtanding this diſappointment and defeat, Civilis, a few days after, entered in the dead of the night, the camp of Cerealis, upon the bank of the Rhine, made a dreadful havock of the Roman ſoldiers, while, appriſed of no danger, they were repoſing in their tents, and carried off a great number of captives. The general, half awake and almoſt naked, eſcaped through a miſtake of the enemy; for they had carried off the admiral's ſhip, diſtinguiſhed by its flag, from a belief that Cerealis was in it. But he had paſſed that night elſewhere, as many believed, in the embraces of Claudia Sacrata, a native of Cologn. The centinels borrowed an excuſe for their negligence from the diſhonour of their general, alledging, that they were enjoined to keep ſilence for fear of interrupting his repoſe; ſo that, as ſpeaking was reſtrained, they had dropped aſleep. But, notwithſtanding this advantage, Civilis was in the end obliged even to abandon his own iſland, and retire beyond the Rhine. Cerealis committed dreadful ravages all over the iſland of the Batavians; but, through policy uſual to generals, left all the lands and dwellings of Civilis untouched, tempting at the ſame time the Batavians with an offer of peace, and Civilis with a promiſe of pardon, which he reſolved to accept, finding his countrymen tired of the war, and inclined Civilis receives a total overthrow.

He ſurpriſes the Romans in their camp;

He is obliged in the end to abandon his own iſland, and ſubmit to the Romans.

clined to prevent the deſolation and ruin of the whole nation, by devoting him to puniſhment. Having therefore deſired a conference, the bridge upon the river Wahal was broke down in the middle; and the two generals ſtepping forwards on each ſide, ſtood upon the oppoſite extremities. The iſſue of this conference was, as we learn from Joſephus, the reſt of Tacitus's hiſtory being loſt, an entire ſubmiſſion on one ſide, and an unreſerved pardon on the other. The Batavians remained in the ſame condition they were in before the war broke out, that is, exempt from all manner of tributes, and only obliged to ſupply the Romans with troops when required; a condition this, bordering upon liberty [p].

DURING theſe tranſactions in Germany, Veſpaſian and Titus commenced conſuls, the former the ſecond time, and both abſent. The ſenate was therefore aſſembled on the firſt of January by Julius Frontinus, city-prætor, when they decreed, that public thanks ſhould be returned to the general officers, to the armies, and to the confederate kings, for having eſpouſed with ſo much zeal the cauſe of Veſpaſian. From Tertius Julianus they took away the prætorſhip, for having forſaken his legion, when it was about to declare for Veſpaſian, and transferred that dignity to Plotius Griphus. Upon Hormus, Veſpaſian's freed-man, they conferred the equeſtrian dignity. Soon after, Frontinus reſigned, for what motive we are nowhere told, his office, which was aſſumed by Domitian, whoſe name was prefixed to all letters and edicts, but the whole ſway remained in Mucianus. The young prince, however, boldly exerted many acts of power, at the inſtigation of his intimates, or his own wanton will [q]. Nay, Suetonius tells us, that in one day he diſpoſed of above twenty offices in the city and provinces; and adds, that he was on that account gently rebuked by the emperor, who, in a letter to his ſon, returned him thanks for not having diſplaced him too, and ſent one to ſucceed him. But Antonius Primus and Arrius Varus gave Mucianus far greater umbrage: they were both renowned for their late famous exploits in war, in great credit with the ſoldiery, and beloved by the populace. Antonius was beſides reported to have ſolicited Scribonianus Craſſus, the brother of Piſo whom whom Galba had adopted, to aſſume the ſovereignty. Mucianus therefore, ſeeing he could not openly cruſh Primus, pretending a great friendſhip and value for him, heaped publicly mighty praiſes upon him in the ſenate, made him great promiſes in private, put him in hopes of the government of Hither Spain, void by the departure of Cluvius Rufus, &c. Having thus entirely gained him, he diſmiſſed the ſeventh legion, which was inviolably attached to him, to their winter quarters, at a great diſtance from Rome; and at the ſame time ſent the third legion back into Syria, and the reſt of the forces into Germany, to ſerve there under Cerealis. Having by this means quite broken the power of Primus, and diſburdened the city of thoſe who were apt to raiſe tumults and diſorder, Rome returned to her former tranquillity, the laws reſumed their force, and the magiſtrates their wonted functions [r].

[p] Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 11.

[q] Tacit. l. iv. c. 39.

Domitian goes the firſt time to the ſenate.

DOMITIAN, appearing now for the firſt time in the ſenate, ſpoke, in few words and with great modeſty, of the abſence of his father and that of his brother, and alſo concerning his own youth and inſufficiency. Then he propoſed, that all the honours which had been beſtowed on Galba, but afterwards abrogated by Otho, ſhould be reſtored. Curtius Montanus moved, that ſome public honour ſhould be likewiſe paid to the memory of Piſo. The fathers ordained both, but of what regarded Piſo nothing was executed. In the next place were drawn by lot commiſſioners, who were to cauſe reſtitution to be made of whatever had been uſurped by violence during the war, and to reſtrain the public expences. To Tertius Julianus, as ſoon as it was known that he had fled to Veſpaſian, the office of prætor was reſtored; but Gripus ſtill retained the enſigns of that dignity. Before the aſſembly broke up, one of the ſenators by name Junius Mauricus, made ſuit to Domitian, that he would impart to the ſenate the regiſters of the late emperors, that they might thence diſcover who had been ſollicited to be admitted accuſers, and againſt whom. But the young prince judiciouſly replied, that in an affair of this ſort the ſentiments of the emperor muſt be firſt learnt. Mucianus ſpeaks in behalf of the accuſers.

However, P. Egnatius Celer, the accuſer of the celebrated Soranus Borea, was condemned; but Mucianus haranguing in behalf of the informers, and exhorting the fathers to obliterate all the impreſſions of reſentment, and forget the grievances grievances arising from the necessity of the late times, all further prosecutions were dropt [s]. This year Mucianus ordered the son of Vitellius to be put to death, pretending that civil discord would never cease, unless the seeds of war were utterly extinguished. He treated Antonius Primus with such haughtiness, that he forced him to retire from Rome and recur to Vespasian, by whom he was received without any great marks of friendship or disfavour, the emperor's mind being under a conflict, on one side swayed by the great services of that commander, by whose conduct the war was accomplished, on the other by letters from Mucianus. The other courtiers at the same time combined to disgrace him, charging him with arrogance, over-bearing and heightening the charge with the enormities of his former life. Neither failed he to raise to himself new enemies by his haughty carriage; for with excessive ostentation he used to recount his own exploits and deserts, treating the other commanders with the utmost contempt, especially Cæcina, whom he used to revile as a captive, and a man of no spirit, who had tamely submitted. Hence by degrees he sunk in his character; but from the emperor retained to the last some appearance of favour. Of him we find no further mention made by the antient writers. Mucianus likewise displaced Arrius Varus, commander of the prætorian guards; and to make him some amends for the loss of this employment, bestowed upon him another, that of supplying the city with grain, which had been formerly discharged by persons of the first quality. To soften Domitian, who had a great kindness for Varus, he bestowed the command of the guards upon Arretinus Clemens, who was nearly allied to the house of Vespasian, and very dear to Domitian. The father of Arretinus had discharged the same trust with great credit under Caligula, whence his name was well-pleasing to the soldiery. The guards had been hitherto commanded by a Roman knight; but Arretinus was, as Tacitus informs us, by rank a senator [t].

[r] Idem, c. 11.

Antonius Primus repairs to Vespasian.

VESPASIAN, in the mean time, continued at Alexandria, where he is said to have worked some miracles. A blind man, commonly known at Alexandria, prostrating himself at his feet, implored a cure for his want of sight, telling the emperor, that he had been warned by the god Serapis to recur Vespasian works some miracles.

[s] Idem, c. 40—44. [t] Idem, c. 68.

recur to him, and beſeech him, that with his ſpittle he would condeſcend to waſh his cheeks and the balls of his eyes. Another lame in his hand, by the direction of the ſame god, prayed him to tread upon it. Veſpaſian at firſt derided them; but, as they continued to importune him, he began to waver, fearing on one ſide the imputation of vanity, and on the other drawn into hopes, through the entreaties of the ſuppliants and the arguments of flatterers. At length, conſidering himſelf as an inſtrument choſen by the gods to accompliſh the cure, he undertook the taſk with a chearful countenance, before a vaſt multitude intent upon the iſſue. Inſtantly the lame hand recovered full ſtrength, and upon the eyes of the blind light broke in. Tacitus aſſures us, that even in his time both theſe events continued to be recounted and averred by thoſe who had been eye-witneſſes of them, and could reap no advantage from their flattery. Veſpaſian was hence ſeized with an eager deſire of viſiting the reſidence of the deity, in order to conſult him about the ſtate and fortune of the empire. He therefore commanded all to retire from the temple, and then entered himſelf. While he was there, he ſuddenly perceived one of the grandees of Egypt, named Baſilides, ſtanding by him, tho' he knew him to be then at a great diſtance from Alexandria and confined by ſickneſs. However he examined the prieſts, whether Baſilides had that day entered the temple; aſked ſuch as he met, whether he had been ſeen in the city; then by horſemen purpoſely diſpatched, he fully learnt, that Baſilides was at that inſtant eighty miles from thence [u]. St. Auſtin, without queſtioning the truth of theſe facts, atteſted by ſeveral writers of great authority, obſerves, that Veſpaſian, according to Tacitus's account, ordered the phyſicians to examine firſt, whether ſuch lameneſs and blindneſs were curable by human aid; who reported, that in the one the power of ſight was not wholly extinct, but would return, were the obſtacles removed; and in the other the joints were only diſtorted, and might be reſtored with regular preſſure. Hence St. Auſtin concludes, that ſuch cures were not above the power of men, and much leſs above that of the evil ſpirits, endowed with a ſuperior knowledge, and on this occaſion exerting exerting it, to eclipse, if possible, the miracles wrought by the apostles and their disciples [w]. As for the vision in the temple, it might well have been the effect of a warm and strong imagination.

[u] Tacit. l. iv. c. 81. Dio, l. lxvi. p. 748. Suet. in Veſp. c. 7.

VESPASIAN, embarking at last in the port of Alexandria, sailed for Italy; and, having visited in his passage the island of Rhodes and several cities of Asia Minor, landed, according to Josephus, on the south-side of the promontory of Iapygia or Otranto. At Brundusium he was met by Mucianus and a great number of senators and Roman knights; and at Beneventum by his son Domitian. On his rout to Rome, he was received every-where with loud shouts of joy, with applauses, and acclamations; for every one entertained a mighty opinion of his virtues, and looked upon him as one sent by the gods to restore the empire to its former lustre and tranquillity. As he drew near the city, the far greater part of the inhabitants flocked out to welcome him, and conduct him in a kind of triumph to the capitol, the streets through which he passed being strewed with flowers, and the whole city, like a temple, filled with precious odours and perfumes. Altars were every where raised and victims slain, with supplications to the gods, that Vespasian might rule the empire many years, and his son Titus after him; that the sovereignty might for ever remain in his family, and Rome flourish under them [x]. Arrives in Italy. How received at Rome.

GREAT things were expected of Vespasian by all ranks of men, and no one was disappointed in his expectation: for he made it his whole business to re-establish the commonwealth, and restore the empire to its former grandeur; to conform to the laws, and to see that all others conformed to them; to consult the good of the whole and of particulars; to prevent oppression, and to punish it; to promote virtue, and reward it; to enforce the observance of the laws by his example, as well as by his judgments; and to merit the affections and fidelity of the people by his faithful care of them. His first care was, to revive the antient discipline in the army; for the soldiery had abandoned themselves to all manner of licentiousness, and committed innumerable disorders, not only Revives the antient discipline.

[w] S. Aug. civit. Dei, l. x. c. 16. l. vii. c. 20.

[x] Joseph. ibid.

only in the colonies and municipal towns, but in Rome itſelf. He therefore diſcharged great numbers of them, eſpecially of ſuch as had ſerved under Vitellius, and had been long inured to rapine and licentiouſneſs; in the others he puniſhed the leaſt tranſgreſſions with the utmoſt ſeverity, not ſparing even thoſe to whoſe valour he owed the empire, nor omitting any opportunity of reforming the antient diſcipline; of which Suetonius gives us the following inſtance: a young nobleman, to whom he had given a conſiderable command, waiting upon him to return him thanks, and ſmelling fragrantly of rich oils and perfumes, the emperor, with a voice expreſſing his indignation, told him, that "he had rather he had ſmelt of garlick," and took away the commiſſion, which he had given him a few days before. He was no leſs ſevere with the marines, who were appointed to carry letters and diſpatches from Puteoli and Oſtia to Rome; for upon their petitioning him to have ſome allowance, beſides their uſual pay, for ſhoes, inſtead of complying with their requeſt, he ordered, that for the future they ſhould diſcharge their duty bare-foot, and cauſed this ordinance to be immediately put in execution [y]. He ſcarce ever failed to aſſiſt at the debates and deliberations of the ſenate, without aſſuming to himſelf any authority above the other ſenators, whom he frequently exhorted to ſpeak their ſentiments with freedom, telling them, that he had called them not blindly to approve what was his will and pleaſure, but to receive their counſel, to truſt to, and follow, it. Having taken upon him, ſoon after his arrival at Rome, the office of cenſor, he degraded ſuch of the ſenators and knights as he found unworthy of their dignities; and ſupplied their places with ſuch perſons, either from the colonies or provinces, as were recommended to him by men of known integrity. By this means he encreaſed the number of ſenators to a thouſand, which by infinite maſſacres had been exhauſted and reduced to two hundred [z]. He likewiſe ſtrictly examined into all the courts of judicature, and there reformed innumerable abuſes and grievances, appointed new judges, and cauſed the laws to be reduced and digeſted into a far leſs compaſs. He frequently adminiſtered juſtice himſelf in the forum, with great impartiality and univerſal applauſe. As Rome had loſt

His conduct towards the ſenate.

[y] Suet. c. 8.

[z] Idem, c. 9. Dio, l. vi. p. 666.

loſt much of its ſplendor by the late conflagration, and many houſes lay ſtill in ruins, he ordered the proprietors of the ground to rebuild them in a limited time, allowing any one to take poſſeſſion of the ground, if the edifices were not raiſed within that term to a certain height. The capitol he had ordered to be re-built before he left Alexandria, and appointed Lucius Veſtinus, a Roman knight, to direct and overſee the work. By him were aſſembled the ſoothſayers, who declared, that the remains of the former temple, ſhould be removed into the marſhes; that upon the ſame foundations the new one ſhould be raiſed; and that to the temple nothing new, except height, ſhould be added. With this variation alone, the new temple was raiſed in a ſhort time; and this alone was judged wanting to the magnificence of the former. As the late fire had deſtroyed many public records, he reſtored three thouſand tables of braſs, which had been burnt, having with indefatigable pains found out their true copies. In theſe were recorded all the decrees of the ſenate, all the ordinances of the people, all treaties, alliances, and privileges granted to any perſon or city, and all remarkable occurrences from the foundation of the city. In theſe and the like works, he expended vaſt ſums. He was ſo far from ſeeking the deſtruction of any man, that he could not behold, without many ſighs and tears, even the greateſt criminals led to execution. To all he was courteous and affable, allowing perſons of every rank to accoſt him with freedom, the gates of the palace being kept conſtantly open. He was ſo far from concealing the meanneſs of his former condition, that he frequently diſcourſed of it himſelf, and uſed to deride thoſe who, to flatter him, undertook to derive his pedigree from the founders of Reate and the companions of Hercules. He deſpiſed titles, and with much ado was prevailed upon to accept that of "the father of his country;" a title to which no one had ever a better claim. The king of Parthia having wrote to him thus; Arſaces, king of kings, to Flavius Veſpaſianus; he, without finding fault with the title, or reſenting it as an affront, directed his anſwer thus; Flavius Veſpaſianus to Arſaces, king of kings; ſhewing thereby in what contempt he had ſuch titles. He was ſo far from taking delight in public honours, that when he triumphed with his ſon Titus over the Jews, being quite Imbelliſhes the city.

His clemency, good nature, and other commendable qualities.

tired with the length of that ceremony, he was heard to say, that he deservedly suffered for having at his age desired a triumph, as if such an honour had ever been due to his ancestors, or hoped for by himself. He bore with incredible patience the many lampoons, that were dispersed all over the town, reflecting upon his avarice; and the invectives of the philosophers, whom he had banished the city. One of these, by profession a Cynic, by name Demetrius, meeting him one day out of town, reviled him in a most outrageous manner; but the good emperor, instead of chastising him for his insolent behaviour, contented himself with telling him, that he was a Cynic indeed! He gave no ear to whisperers, nor ever put any one to death, whose crimes were not notorious and plainly proved. His friends having one day admonished him to beware of Metius Pomposianus, who was born, they said, under a constellation that promised him the empire, he immediately named him consul, adding pleasantly, "When he is invested of the sovereignty, he will, I hope, remember this good turn and requite it." Tho' several conspiracies were formed against him, yet he could never be prevailed upon to punish the conspirators with death, saying, that they deserved rather pity than punishment, since they knew not what a weight and burden the empire was. He took the daughter of Vitellius, his inveterate enemy, under his protection, married her into a noble family, and allowed her a rich dower. He never sought to revenge the affronts which he had suffered in the reign of Nero, but generously forgave all who had injured or reviled him. Being in that prince's reign forbid the court, and not knowing what to do, he had recourse to Phæbus, the emperor's freed-man, asking him, whither he should go. Phæbus returned him no other answer, but that he might go hang himself, and thrust him out of the room. The freed-man coming to beg his pardon after he was made emperor, Vespasian was provoked no farther than to bid him be gone in the same terms. Tho' Mucianus assumed far greater authority than was suitable to the rank of a private man, and behaved with great haughtiness towards the emperor himself, bragging, that in his own hands he had had the empire, but freely bestowed it upon Vespasian; yet the emperor never rebuked him but in private; and having once complained of him to a common friend, he ended his complaints with these

He forgets injuries.

theſe remarkable words; "Yet I myſelf am but a man, and conſequently not free from blame [a]."

Is generally charged with avarice.

THE only fault with which he is charged by the antients is, his immoderate love of money, which he was not aſhamed to procure by means altogether unworthy of an emperor. He not only revived the old impoſitions and taxes, which had been ſuppreſſed by Galba; but loaded the provinces with new tributes, bought commodities, that he might ſell them to advantage, and deſcended to ſome very low and unuſual impoſts, laying one even upon urine, which gave occaſion to his ſon Titus to remonſtrate to him the meanneſs of ſuch an impoſition; but he preſenting to his ſon the firſt money that thence accrued to him, aſked him, whether the ſmell offended him? Neither did he ſcruple the ſelling of any office, nor pardoning any criminal, however enormous his crimes were, provided he could with a ſum of money redeem himſelf from the deſerved puniſhment. He is ſaid to have preferred to the moſt profitable employments ſuch of his officers as were noted for their avarice and rapaciouſneſs, and to have made uſe of them as ſponges, "by wetting them when they were dry, and ſqueezing them when they were wet [b]." He often ſtrove to diſguiſe his ſhameful avarice by ſome humourous joke. Thus certain embaſſadors having acquainted him, that by the council of their nation a conſiderable ſum of money was decreed for erecting him a ſtatue in the form of a coloſſus, Here is the baſis, ſaid he, ſtretching out his hand; lay the money down here, and the ſtatue is reared. One of his chief favourites having one day begged of him the ſuperintendence of his houſhold for one, whom he pretended to be his brother, the emperor put him off for the preſent; and ſending afterwards for the perſon whom he had recommended, he received of him the ſum which was to have beeen paid to the other for his intereſt, and beſtowed on him the employment. When the favourite returned to ſolicit in behalf of his pretended brother, You muſt find out another brother, anſwered the emperor; for the perſon, whom you recommended, proves in the end to be my brother, and not yours. One day while he was travelling in a litter, the muleteer ſtopped, under pretence of having his mules ſhoed, but in reality to give an opportunity to one of accoſting the emperor and craving

Several inſtances of it.

[a] Suet. c. 8, 9, 11, 12, 14. [b] Suet. c. 16.

ing ſome favour. Of this Veſpaſian was appriſed, and therefore having pleaſantly aſked the muleteer what he had received for ſhoeing his mules, he obliged him to pay to him half the ſum [c]. Some writers think, that he was covetous by nature, and tell us, that he was upbraided with avarice by an old herdſman, who earneſtly entreating the emperor, upon his acceſſion to the empire, to grant him his liberty without ranſom, and being denied it, cried out ſo as to be heard by the whole multitude, "The wolf may change his hair, but not his qualities." But other authors excuſe him on account of the urgent neceſſities of the ſtate, and the emptineſs of the exchequer when he firſt came to the government; for he then publicly declared in the ſenate, that the republic could not poſſibly ſubſiſt without a ſupply of an hundred and forty millions of ſeſterces. This is by the generality of writers thought the moſt probable opinion, becauſe he always employed his revenue to great and noble purpoſes, and laid it out with uncommon generoſity. His public works and edifices were very expenſive; his preſents and penſions numerous; his feaſts and entertainments frequent and magnificent, &c. He ſupported a great number of poor ſenators; allowed five hundred ſeſterces a year to every decayed conſular; reſtored to their former luſtre a great many towns, that had been ruined by fire or earthquakes; repaired the public roads and aqueducts, &c. He was likewiſe a great encourager of learning, and the firſt who ſettled ſalaries upon the profeſſors of rhetoric both Greek and Latin, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer. He invited to Rome, with great allowances, not only the moſt celebrated poets, but ſuch artificers and workmen as were famous in any part of the world. Of the latter, one, well ſkilled in mechanics, having offered to convey certain columns of vaſt weight into the capitol, at a very ſmall charge, the emperor rewarded him for his invention; but would not employ him, ſaying, We muſt not debar the common people from earning their livelihood [d]. Such was in general the conduct of Veſpaſian. We ſhall now proceed to the moſt remarkable actions of his reign, digeſted according to the order of time.

Is by many cleared from that blame.

Inſtances of his generoſity.

THO'

[c] Idem, ibid. [d] Idem, c. 17, 18.

THO' Veſpaſian had, during his firſt conſulſhip, reſtored Rome to her former tranquillity, yet he did not reſign the faſces on the firſt of January; but, chuſing for his collegue M. Cocceius Nerva afterwards emperor, continued to diſcharge that office till the calends of March, when he was ſucceeded by his ſon Domitian, as was Nerva by Q. Pedius Caſtus. This year Titus, having, by the taking of Jeruſalem, quite reduced the Jewiſh nation, returned to Rome, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and ſoon after honoured with a triumph, which was decreed by the ſenate both to him and his father; for Veſpaſian had begun that war with great ſucceſs. They both triumphed about the latter end of April, diſplaying on that occaſion all the wealth of the Jewiſh nation. To Titus was likewiſe decreed a triumphal arch, deſcribing his noble exploits; which continues to this day almoſt entire, as a laſting monument of his victories over the Jews. The triumph was no ſooner over, than Veſpaſian commanded the temple of Janus to be ſhut, a profound peace now reigning in every part of the empire. Soon after the temple of Peace was begun, but not finiſhed, or at leaſt not conſecrated, till four years after; that is, till the year 75 of the chriſtian æra, when the rich ſpoils of the temple of Jeruſalem were depoſited there. Titus, before his arrival at Rome, had been by his father honoured with the title of emperor, and taken for his collegue in the tribunitial power; ſo that being, in a manner, his partner in the empire, he diſcharged all the functions of ſovereignty. He even took upon him the command of the prætorian guards, by which means that office became, as Aurelius Victor obſerves, the moſt honourable employment in the whole empire. It appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, that Veſpaſian this year built ſome aqueducts, repaired the ſtreets of Rome, and at a vaſt charge made high-ways in Spain [c].

Triumphs over the Jews with his ſon Titus.

To whom he imparts the tribunitial power.

THE following year, Ceſennius Pætus, whom Veſpaſian had appointed governor of Syria, in the room of Mucianus, having wrote to the emperor, that Antiochus king of Comagene, and his ſon Epiphanes, had held private conferences with Vologeſes king of the Parthians, and were diſpoſed to revolt from the Romans, the emperor, without examining the charge, which Joſephus ſuſpects to have been quite groundleſs, allowed Pætus to take what meaſures he thought moſt proper. Hereupon Pætus, who bore ſome private grudge to Antiochus, entered his dominions in an hoſtile manner; and, being joined by Ariſtobulus king of Chalcis, and Sohemus king of Emeſus, ſeized Samoſata, the metropolis of Comagene, defeated Epiphanes and Callinicus, the two ſons of Antiochus, and obliged the king himſelf to take ſhelter in Cilicia, where he poſſeſſed ſome domains. The young princes found a ſafe aſylum at the court of Vologeſes, who entertained them in a manner ſuitable to their rank; but Antiochus was by Pætus's orders ſeized in Cilicia, and loaded with chains; which Veſpaſian no ſooner knew, than he commanded him to be ſet at liberty. His kingdom, however, was reduced to a Roman province, known by the name of Auguſteuphrateſiana, or Euphrateſiana, becauſe it extended along the Euphrates. Antiochus was allowed to retire to Lacedæmon, whence he removed ſoon after to Rome, where both he and his two ſons, whom Veſpaſian took under his protection, at the recommendation of the Parthian king, were ſupported ſuitable to their rank at the public charge[f].

[c] Vorburg. hiſt. Rom. Germ. p. 350. Onuph. in faſt. p. 297.

Comagene reduced to a Roman province.

The Alani invade Media and Armenia.

The ſame year, the Alani, a people dwelling between the river Tanais and the Palus Mæotis, made a ſudden irruption into the territories of the Medes and Armenians. Tiridates king of Armenia narrowly eſcaped being taken, while he attempted to oppoſe them; and Pacorus king of the Medes was obliged to abandon his kingdom to the mercy of the barbarians, who carried off an immenſe booty and a great number of captives; among the reſt the wife of Pacorus. Vologeſes king of the Parthians, alarmed at this ſudden irruption, wrote to Veſpaſian, begging ſuccours againſt ſo formidable an enemy, and deſiring one of the emperor's ſons to command them. Domitian earneſtly ſolicited his father for that command; but the emperor did not think it adviſeable to ſuccour the Parthians, who rivalled the Romans themſelves in power; and the barbarians retired of their own accord, without offering to invade the Parthian dominions. However, the refuſal of the emperor occaſioned ſome miſunderſtanding between the two powers; powers; and on this occaſion it was, without all doubt, that Vologeſes wrote to Veſpaſian, ſtyling himſelf king of kings, as we have hinted above; without deigning to give Veſpaſian even the title of emperor [g].

[f] Joſeph. l. vii. c. 9. & l. vi. c. 29. Suet. c. 8. Chron. Alex. p. 587.

THE following year, Domitian being conſul, the ſecond time, with Valerius Meſſalinus, Veſpaſian reduced Greece, which Nero had declared free, and likewiſe Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, Samos, Thrace, and Cilicia, to Roman provinces, alledging, that they were no longer capable of liberty, ſince they only made uſe of it to undo themſelves by their inteſtine diſſenſions. Pauſanias ſeems to acknowledge the truth of this charge [h]. Rhodes, Samos, and the other iſlands were made one province, called, The province of the iſlands, or, of the Cyclades, of which the city of Rhodes was the metropolis. Euſebius ſpeaks of a ſedition, which, according to him, was raiſed at Alexandria, in the beginning of this year, by ſome Jews, who had fled from Jeruſalem. Veſpaſian treated the authors of it with great mildneſs; but ordered Lupus, governor of Egypt, to demoliſh the temple, which the Jews had built in the territory of Heliopolis [i]. This ſame year, Veſpaſian condemned to baniſhment the celebrated Helvidius Priſcus. He was a native of Terracina, and the ſon of a centurion; but, by his bright and ſignal parts, ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Rome. When he was yet very young, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy, not, as many did in thoſe days, to diſguiſe indolence under a pompous name, but in order to engage in the public adminiſtration with a mind thoroughly fortified againſt all diſaſters. Ere he had riſen higher than the quæſtorſhip, he was choſen by the famous Thraſea Pætus for a huſband to his daughter. From the character of his wife's father he copied nothing ſo ſtudiouſly, as his undaunted liberty in ſpeaking his ſentiments, never to be ſhaken by fear, and ever unmoveable in what he judged conducing to the public welfare. When Thraſea was condemned, he was driven into exile, but recalled by Galba, and honoured by Veſpaſian in the firſt year of his reign with the prætorſhip. As he was a zealous ſtickler for liberty, he ſpoke with great freedom in the ſenate againſt the Veſpaſian reduces Greece, Lycia, &c. to Roman provinces.

Helvidius Priſcus baniſhed.

[g] Joſeph. l. vii. c. 29. Dio, l. lxvi. p. 757. [h] Pauſ. in Achaic. p. 222. [i] Euſeb. in chron.

the arbitrary proceedings of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius; neither did he spare Vespasian, but inveighed against him with as much bitterness as his father-in-law had ever done against Nero. The emperor, however, patiently bore with him, till he began openly to solemnize the birth-day of Brutus and that of Cassius, and to encourage the people to follow their example, and attempt the recovery of their antient liverty; then Vespasian caused him to be seized, but soon after dismissed him untouched, contrary to the opinion of all his friends. Helvidius, forgetful of the kindness the emperor had shewn him, pursued his former course; and was thereupon again accused and condemned to banishment. As he could not refrain, even in the place of his exile, from inveighing with great bitterness against the emperor, he was at length by the senate sentenced to death. Vespasian strove to save him, and sent to countermand the executioners; but his orders came too late, Mucianus, having detained the messengers, under various pretences, till the sentence was put in execution [i]. Helvidius, notwithstanding this unaccountable behaviour, is greatly cried up by Tacitus [k], Pliny the younger [l], and Juvenal [m]. As many other philosophers, following the example of Helvidius, strove to stir up the populace to sedition, they were all driven out of Rome [n].

His strange behaviour.

The last census.

THE following year, Vespasian was consul the fifth time, and Titus the third. Nothing memorable happened during their administration, except the census, which was performed by them in quality of censors, the emperor having assumed his son for his collegue in that dignity. This is the last census we find mentioned in history [o]. They both retained the fasces till the calends of April of the following year, when Vespasian resigned them to Domitian, and Titus to Mucianus. This year the emperor consecrated the temple of Peace, and raised a colossus of brass one hundred and ten feet high, which had been designed for Nero; but instead of his head, that of Titus was placed upon it, or,

as

[i] Dio in excerpt. Val, p. 705. col. 66. p. 750. Suet. c. 15. Juvenal. satir. 5. Plin. l. vii. ep. 19.
[k] Tacit. l. iv. c. 4.
[l] Plin. l. iv. ep. 21.
[m] Juvenal. sat. 5.
[n] Suet. c. 8. Dio, l. lxvi. 751.
[o] Censorinus de die natali. Plin. l. vii. c. 43. Onuph. in fast. p. 208.

as others will have it, the figure of the ſun [p]. The two following years, Veſpaſian being conſul the ſeventh and eighth time, and Titus the fifth and ſixth, nothing happened at Rome, or in any part of the empire, which authors have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. We read indeed in the chronicle of Alexandria, that in the eighth conſulſhip of Veſpaſian, a woman, by name Alcippe, was delivered at Rome of an elephant; and in the chronicle of Euſebius, that a plague raged in the city with ſuch violence for ſome time, as to ſweep away twenty thouſand perſons a day. But neither of that extraordinary birth, nor ſo dreadful a plague, any notice is taken by the antients, nor even by Pliny the elder, who flouriſhed under Veſpaſian and was in great favour with him.

Julius Agricola ſent into Britain.

THE next year, L. Ceionius Commodus and D. Novius Priſcus being conſuls, the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola was ſent into Britain to govern that province in the room of Julius Frontinus. As we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak of this renowned commander, we ſhall here briefly recount his courſe of life and purſuits, before he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his mighty exploits in this iſland. He was born in the colony of Forojulium, now Frejus, in Narbonne Gaul; and both his grandfathers were procurators to the emperors; a dignity peculiar to the equeſtrian order. His father, Julius Græcinus, was a ſenator, famous for his eloquence and philoſophy, but put to death by Caligula, for refuſing to accuſe Marcus Silanus. His mother, Julia Procilla, a woman noted for her modeſty, brought him up in his tender years, under her eye and with great care. In his early youth he ſtudied philoſophy and law in the city of Marſeilles, with more avidity, as he himſelf uſed to declare, than became a Roman and a ſenator, till the diſcretion of his mother, checked his ardour. Reaſon and age afterwards qualified his heat; ſo that he contented himſelf with a limited meaſure of philoſophy. He learnt the firſt rudiments of war in Britain, under Suetonius Paullinus, one of the greateſt commanders of his age, by whom he was diſtinguiſhed with particular marks of friendſhip and eſteem. He was not one of thoſe young men who turn warfare into riot, but ſtudied to acquaint himſelf with the province, to be known to the army, to learn of ſuch as had experience, to follow ſuch as were worthy and brave, to ſeek for no exploits out of oſtentation, to refuſe none through fear. He would not aſſume the title and office of tribune, till he thought thought himſelf well qualified for that command: neither did he make uſe of it, as many did in thoſe days, to indulge his pleaſures with more liberty, or to abſent himſelf from duty; but to encourage others, by his example, to bear with patience the toils attending the profeſſion of arms. As Paullinus was engaged in a mighty war with the Britons, of which we have ſpoken in the reign of Nero, Agricola had an opportunity of improving himſelf in the knowledge of military affairs under ſo great a maſter. Departing from Britain to Rome, to enter there upon the public offices, he was firſt ſent into Aſia as quæſtor, where he had Salvius Titianus for proconſul. But neither the province, in itſelf very rich, nor Titianus, though bent upon all acts of rapine, and ready upon the ſmalleſt encouragement, to have purchaſed a mutual connivance in iniquity, corrupted his probity. He was afterwards created tribune of the people, but paſſed the year of his tribuneſhip in repoſe and inactivity, being well appriſed, that under Nero ſloth and heavineſs ſerved for wiſdom. With the like indolence he held the prætorſhip, exhibiting, however, as was incumbent upon the prætors, public ſports, according to the meaſure of his wealth, and in a manner no-ways favouring of prodigality, but ſtill deſerving popular applauſe. Being afterwards appointed by Galba to ſurvey the gifts and oblations belonging to the temples, by a diligent ſearch he procured full reſtitution of all, ſave what had been ſacrilegiouſly taken away by Nero. The year following, his mother was killed by the ſoldiers of Otho, upon her eſtate at Intemelium, now Vintimiglia; and the eſtate itſelf plundered, with great part of her treaſure, which had proved the cauſe of the murder. As Agricola haſtened from Rome, to pay her the laſt duty and ſolemnize her funeral, he had tidings upon the road, that Veſpaſian had aſſumed the title of emperor, and inſtantly eſpouſed his party. Upon his return from Intemelium, he was employed by Mucianus to levy forces; and ſoon after, as he diſcharged that truſt with great uprightneſs and fidelity, preferred to the command of the twentieth legion, then in Britain, their own commander being found void of authority to controul them and keep them to their duty. Vettius Bolanus was at that time governor of Britain; but as he ruled with great gentleneſs, Agricola had no opportunity of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by any military exploits. Bolanus was ſucceeded by Petilius Cerealis, who at his firſt entrance attacked the Brigantes, reckoned the moſt powerful people of the whole iſland; and, after many encounters, ſome of which proved very bloody, held moſt part of their country as his conqueſt, or continued to ravage it by war. Under him Agricola had room to diſplay his valour and abilities. For trial of his ſkill and courage, Cerealis often committed to his conduct part of the army; and ſometimes according to the meaſure of his ſucceſs, ſet him at the head of forces ſtill larger, ſharing with him both the dangers and the glory. But Agricola was ſo far from vaunting his own exploits, that, on the contrary, he aſcribed to his general, as to the author of all, his ſucceſs and good fortune [q].

His birth, education, &c.

[p] Suet. c. 19. Plin. l. xxxiv. c. 7. Dio, ibid.

His preferments.

was

Upon his return from Britain, where he had commanded a legion, he was by Veſpaſian raiſed to the rank of a patrician, and afterwards appointed governor of Aquitain; which truſt he diſcharged with great uprightneſs and general ſatisfaction. He was after three years recalled, and honoured with the conſulſhip; which office he diſcharged during the two laſt months of the preceding year. While he was conſul, it was generally ſaid, that for his province Britain would be aſſigned him, from no words that had dropped from him about it, but becauſe he was deemed equal to that office: and common fame, as Tacitus well obſerves, does not always err, but often directs the public choice. Before he ended his conſulſhip, he contracted his daughter to Tacitus the hiſtorian, who was yet very young, and gave her to him in marriage as ſoon as he had reſigned the faſces. He was then forthwith promoted to the government of Britain, and at the ſame time honoured with the pontifical dignity [r]. He ſucceeded Julius Frontinus, who had not only maintained the conqueſts made by Petilius Cerealis, his predeceſſor, but had himſelf fought with great ſucceſs, having entirely reduced the warlike nation of the Silures, though, beſides the bravery of the enemy, he had been likewiſe obliged to ſtruggle with the difficulties of places and ſituation. Agricola arrived in Britain about the middle of ſummer, when the Roman ſoldiers, ſuppoſing the ſervice of the ſeaſon to be concluded, were bent upon inaction and repoſe, as were the enemy upon an opportunity to [q] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 4—9.

[r] Idem ibid. c. 9.

to haraſs the Romans. The Ordovices, that is, the inhabitants of North-Wales, had, not long before his arrival, cut in pieces a band of horſe ſtationed upon their confines, and by ſo notable an eſſay rouſed to arms the whole province. The ſummer was already near over; the Roman rtoops were ſevered, and lay diſperſed over the province; and the ſoldiers had aſſured themſelves of reſt for the remaining part of the year. But, notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements, and the remonſtrances of ſome, who judged it better only to guard the places that were threatened, Agricola reſolved to march againſt the enemy without delay. Having therefore drawn together the flower of the legions and a ſmall body of auxiliaries, he led them againſt the Ordovices. But, as the enemy kept themſelves upon the ridges of the mountains, and dared not deſcend into equal ground, Agricola, in order to inſpire his men with equal courage, by ſharing with them equal danger, marched in perſon at the head of his army, and led them to the encounter upon the aſcent. The ſoldiers, animated by the example of their general, attacked the enemy with great reſolution, put them to flight, and made ſuch a dreadful havock of them, that almoſt the whole nation was cut off. Animated with this ſucceſs, in order to maintain the fame he acquired by this action, and to ſtrike the enemy at once with general terror, he reſolved to reduce the iſland of Angleſey, which had been formerly conquered by Paullinus, but loſt again by the general revolt of Britain. As this counſel was ſuddenly concerted, and conſequently ſhips were wanting, he detached a choſen body of auxiliaries, ſuch as knew the fords, and, according to the uſage of their country, were dextrous at ſwimming and able to manage in the water themſelves, their horſes and arms. Theſe, unincumbered with baggage, made deſcent and onſet ſo ſudden, that the enemy were quite ſtruck with conſternation, as they apprehended nothing but a fleet and tranſports, and believed no enterpriſe difficult or unſurmountable to men, who began the war with ſuch reſolution. Thus they ſued for peace, and immediately ſurrendered the iſland to Agricola, whom they already conſidered as a renowned commander, ſince at his firſt entrance into the province, a time which other governors were wont to ſpend in ſhew and parade, he had atchieved ſuch feats, and under ſo much toil and danger, with amaz-

His exploits in Britain during his firſt campaign.

Recovers the iſland of Angleſey.

mazing ſucceſs. Agricola was ſo far from being elated with this conqueſt, that he would not ſo much as beſtow upon it the title of victory, nor by letters acquaint the emperor with the good fortune that had attended his arms, in the recovery of an iſland which had been formerly ſubject to Rome. But, by thus ſuppreſſing the fame of his actions, he acquired a far greater reputation, than if he had ſtudied to divulge them, every one conſidering how vaſt muſt his views be, ſince he thus ſmothered in ſilence ſuch great exploits already performed. As he was well acquainted with the temper of the people in his province, and had alſo learnt from the conduct of others, how little arms avail to ſettle a province, if victory is followed by grievances and oppreſſions, he reſolved to cut off all the cauſes of war. Beginning therefore with himſelf and thoſe about him, he regulated his own houſhold; a taſk which to many proves no leſs difficult than that of governing a province. By none of his domeſtics was tranſacted any thing concerning the public. In preferring the ſoldiers to an higher rank, he was ſwayed by no perſonal intereſt or partiality, nor by the recommendations of centurions, but by his own opinion and knowledge. He would know all that paſſed; but would not puniſh all that was amiſs. He readily pardoned ſmall faults; but ſuch as were great, he puniſhed with proportionable ſeverity. In conferring offices and employments, he rather choſe men who would not tranſgreſs, than ſuch as he muſt afterwards condemn for tranſgreſſing. Tho' the tribute had been augmented, yet he ſoftened it by a juſt and equal diſtribution of all public burdens, and utterly aboliſhed whatever exactions had been deviſed for the gain of particulars, and were therefore borne with more regret than the tribute itſelf. For the publicans uſed, under colour of ſecuring the tribute, to ſeize all the corn of the inhabitants, lock up their barns, and oblige them to purchaſe their own grain at a high price, and afterwards ſell it back again to them at a low rate: beſides, the unhappy people were enjoined to take long journies, and carry grain croſs the ſeveral countries to places extremely diſtant; inſomuch, that ſeveral communities, inſtead of ſupplying the winter-quarters, which lay adjoining, were obliged to furniſh ſuch as were remote, unleſs they redeemed themſelves from that trouble with conſiderable ſums. All theſe grievances were utterly ſuppreſſed by Agricola in his firſt year; by which means the Britons began to be reconciled ciled to the Roman government, and to live in a ſtate of peace; a ſtate which, through the neglect and connivance of former governors, had been till then no leſs dreaded than that of war [i]. The other exploits of Agricola in this iſland, we ſhall relate in their proper places.

Redreſſes the grievances complained of by the Britons.

Reconciles them to the Roman government.

THE following year, Veſpaſian being conſul the ninth time, and Titus the ſeventh, Julius Sabinus, who, as we have related above, had ſtirred up the Gauls, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Cæſar, was at length diſcovered, ſeized, and put to death. After his defeat, he had fled to his country-dwelling, and ſet it on fire, in order to raiſe a report, that he had periſhed: and truly he was there believed to have ſuffered a voluntary death; but, in the mean time, lay concealed with his treaſures (for he was immenſely rich) in a cave which he had cauſed to be dug in a ſolitary place, and which was known only to two of his freed-men, upon whoſe fidelity he could depend. He might have eaſily withdrawn into Germany; but could not prevail upon himſelf to abandon his wife, whom he tenderly loved. She is called by Dion Caſſius, Peponilla; by Tacitus, Epponina; and by Plutarch, Empona; which name, according to that writer, in the antient language of the Gauls, ſignified a heroine. Sabinus, that no one might doubt of his death, did not for ſome time even undeceive his wife, who ſolemnized his exequies with great pomp, bewailed him with many tears, and at laſt, no longer able to bear the loſs of an huſband whom ſhe ſo tenderly loved, reſolved not to outlive him, and began to abſtain from all food. Hereupon Sabinus, by means of Martialis, one of his freed-men, informed her, that he was was ſtill alive, and acquainted her with the place where he lay concealed, warning her at the ſame time to ſuppreſs her joy, leſt the ſecret might be thence betrayed. Empona, tho' in the utmoſt tranſports of joy, continued to bewail him as dead; but, in the mean time, paſſed great part of the night with him, and ſometimes whole weeks, pretending buſineſs in the country. She had even two children by him, who were born and brought up in the cave, Empona concealing the whole with exemplary fidelity and wonderful addreſs; nay, ſhe found means even to convey him to Rome, upon what motive we know not, and from thence thence back to his cave, ſo well diſguiſed, that he was by no one known. But, after he had paſſed nine years in this condition, he was at length diſcovered by ſome perſons, who narrowly watched his wife, upon her frequently abſenting herſelf from her own houſe, and followed her to the cave, without being diſcovered. Sabinus was immediately ſeized and ſent to Rome, loaded with chains, together with his wife, who throwing herſelf at the emperor's feet, and preſenting to him her two tender children, ſtrove with her tears and entreaties to move him to compaſſion. Veſpaſian could not forbear weeping at ſo moving an object; but nevertheleſs, condemned both her and her huſband, and cauſed them to be ſoon after executed. The two childern were ſaved, and with great care brought up at the public expence. One of them died ſome time after in Egypt; and Plutarch tells us, that he ſaw the other, named Sabinus, at Delphos, while he was writing his book of love, in which he has inſerted this adventure [k]. That writer tells us, that nothing more tragical, nothing more diſpleaſing to the public, happened during the whole reign of Veſpaſian, than the death of Sabinus and his wife; nay, to this his unſeaſonable ſeverity, he aſcribes all the misfortunes which afterwards befel him and his family. What diverted the emperor from exerting his uſual clemency and good-nature, when he might have done it with general applauſe and univerſal ſatisfaction, we are no-where told.

The adventures of Julius Sabinus.

[i] Idem, c. 10——20.

He is diſcovered.

And put to death, with his wife.

Not long after the execution of Sabinus, Alienus Cæcina, of whom we often ſpoke in the reign of Vitellius, and Eprius Marcellus, an abandoned accuſer in the reign of Nero, entered into a conſpiracy againſt the emperor, and drew into it great numbers of the prætorian guards. But, before the conſpiracy was ripe for execution, one of the conſpirators betrayed the whole to Titus, and even delivered to him a copy of the ſpeech, which Cæcina was to pronounce to the ſoldiers after the aſſaſſination, written with his own hand. This was ſufficient evidence; and therefore Titus, the night after this diſcovery, having invited Cæcina to ſup with him, cauſed him, without any farther enquiry or trial, to be murdered in the banqueting-Cæcina and Marcellus conſpire again Veſpaſian, but are put to death.

[k] Tacit. hiſt. l. iv. c. 67. Dio, l. lxvi. p. 752. Plut. amat.

banquetting-room. As for Marcellus, he was tried and condemned by the ſenate; but prevented the execution of the ſentence, by cutting his throat with a razor [1]. Before Veſpaſian reſigned the conſulſhip, he was ſeized with a pain in his bowels, which obliged him to repair from Campania, where he then was, to Rome; and from thence to Cutyliæ, his paternal eſtate, in the neighbourhood of Reate, which he uſually viſited every ſummer, in order to drink certain waters, in great requeſt on account of their extreme coolneſs. Here he was ſeized firſt with a fever, and afterwards with a flux, occaſioned by the immoderate uſe of the cold waters, which brought him to ſuch weakneſs, that all about him began to deſpair of his recovery. However, he ſtill attended the diſpatch of buſineſs, received embaſſadors, and gave audience to his miniſters. Once, as he found himſelf ready to faint away. If I am not miſtaken, he cried out, I am going to be a god, ridiculing the cuſtom of the Romans, who placed their emperors, after their death, in the number of their gods, and honoured them with divine worſhip. Upon the approach of death, he cried out again with his uſual bravery and reſolution, An emperor ought to die ſtanding: but, while he endeavoured to riſe, he expired in the hands of thoſe who ſuſtained him. His death happened on the twenty-fourth of June, in the ſeventy-eighth year of the Chriſtian æra, after he had lived ſixty-nine years, ſeven months and ſeven days, and reigned ten years wanting ſix days, from the time he was proclaimed emperor in the city of Alexandria. His death was univerſally lamented; and his memory gratefully preſerved, by ſuch as were true friends to their country. In war he was next to Julius Cæſar, and to Auguſtus in peace; and ſeemed to have been by providence raiſed on purpoſe to preſerve ſo vaſt an empire from utter deſtruction. Greatneſs and majeſty, ſays Pliny, worked no alteration in him, ſave that of making his power of doing good anſwerable to his will. He was the ſecond Roman emperor, if not the firſt, who died a natural death; and the firſt who was ſucceeded by his ſon. And here we cannot help obſerving the raſhneſs of ſome blind zealots, in aſcribing to divine vengeance the fate of ſuch as ſlew Cæſar the dictator. Not one of the aſſaſſins, they cry, died a natural death. But neither did Cæſar who deſtroyed the ſtate, nor any of his ſucceſſors, except Auguſtus, of whom it is alſo doubted, to the preſent emperor. Tiberius was ſmothered by Macro his favourite, Caligula was ſlain by the officers of his guards, Claudius was poiſoned by his wife Agrippina, Nero ſtabbed himſelf, Galba was murdered by the ſoldiers, Otho fell by his own hand, and Vitellius was executed like a common malefactor. Auguſtus was thought to have been poiſoned by his wife Livia [w]. Such was the end of theſe uſurpers; and may the like doom overtake all who tread in their footſteps! Veſpaſian is ſaid to have been ſo confident, that the empire was by the laws of fate deſtined to him and his poſterity, that he affirmed in the ſenate, he ſhould in ſpite of all plots and conſpiracies, retain the ſovereignty to his death, and be ſucceeded in it by his two ſons. His obſequies were performed with extraordinary pomp by Titus. The Romans were at this time ſo prepoſterouſly fond of mimics and farces, that they were exhibited even at the funerals of perſons of quality, when the pantomimes uſed to perſonate the deceaſed, counterfeit their ſpeech, and imitate their actions. At the obſequies of Veſpaſian, a celebrated pantomime, by name Favor, perſonating the deceaſed emperor, demanded aloud, what the whole expence of the ceremony amounted to; and being told, to one hundred thouſand ſeſterces, Give me the money, ſaid he, ſtretching out his hand and counterfeiting the emperor's ſpeech, and throw my carcaſe, if you pleaſe, into the Tyber [x]. Veſpaſian founded various colonies in different parts of the empire, viz. one at Emmaus, about ſixty furlongs from Jeruſalem, to which place he gave the name of Nicopolis, or the city of victory; one at Cæſarea, which was from him called Flaviana, with the addition of Prima, as being the firſt in dignity of all the cities in Paleſtine. Develte, or as ſome call it Deülte, in Thrace, Sinope in Pontus, and Flaviobriga in Spain, now Bilboa, are by ſome writers reckoned among the colonies founded by Veſpaſian [y]. Neapolis in Samaria, called formerly Sychem; Samoſata, the capital of Comagene, Tripolis in Phœnicia, Chalcis and Philadelphia in Syria, Cyrene in Libya, Critia in Bithynia, and Eumenea in Phrygia, bore each the name of Flaviana; whence ſome writers conclude Roman colonies to have been ſettled in all theſe cities, either by Veſpaſian himſelf, or one of his children [z]. Several

The death of Veſpaſian.

His character.

[1] Suet. in Tit. c. 6. Dio, l. lxvi. p. 752. Tacit. iv. c. 6.

His colonies.

[w] Vide Tacit. annal. i. ſub. init. & Dio, l. lvii. c. 19. [x] Suet. [y] Vide Spanh. l. vii. & Baud. p. 291. [z] Vide Baud. p. 769. & Noris de epoch. Syro-Macedon.

ral writers flouriſhed in Veſpaſian's time, but of them we ſhall ſpeak in our notes (D).

VESPASIAN

(D) Theſe were, Suetonius Paulinus, of whoſe warlike exploits we have ſpoken in the reign of Nero when he governed Britain. He likewiſe diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the war between Otho and Vitellius, and was without all doubt one of the beſt commanders of his age. He left behind him an account of an expedition, which he undertook beyond mount Atlas, in the year 41, of the Chriſtian æra, and the laſt of Caligula's reign, againſt the Moors, who took up arms to revenge the death of Ptolemy their prince, murdered by Caligula, as we have related in the reign of that prince. This account has not reached our times, but is quoted by Pliny (9). He outlived Otho, whoſe cauſe he had eſpouſed; but from Pliny it appears, he was dead in the year 77, that is, in the eighth year of Veſpaſian's reign (10). Some writers, through a ſtrange miſtake, have confounded Suetonius Paulinus with Suetonius Lenis, the father of Suetonius the hiſtorian, who ſerved only as military tribune in the army of Otho, which Suetonius Paulinus commanded in quality of general (11). Licinius Mucianus who is often quoted by Pliny in what relates to the hiſtory and geography of the eaſtern countries (12). In the year 75, the ſeventh of Veſpaſian's reign, he was buſy in collecting the diſcourſes and letters of the antient Romans, and had already publiſhed eleven volumes of ſpeeches, and three of letters (13). He is ſuppoſed to have died in the eighth year of Veſpaſian's reign. Pliny tells us, that he always carried about him a living fly, which he ſuperſtitiouſly looked upon as a preſervative of the ſight (14). Julius Secundus, who is one of the perſons introduced in the dialogue of orators, commonly aſcribed to Tacitus, wrote the life of one Julius Aſiaticus, and promiſed the lives of other illuſtrious perſons. He likewiſe publiſhed ſome ſpeeches or orations highly commended by Quintilian (15). In the ſame dialogue, Vipſanius Meſſala acts the chief part. He was tribune of the ſeventh legion, ſprung from an illuſtrious family, and the only one, as Tacitus informs us, who engaged in the civil war between Veſpaſian and Vitellius upon worthy deſigns. He pleaded with great eloquence in the ſenate, tho' not yet arrived at the age of a ſenator, in behalf of his

(9) Plin l v. c. 1. (10) Idem ibid. (11) Vide Voſſ hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 26. (12) Plin. l. v. c. 27. (13) Tacit. orat. c. 37. (14) Plin. l. 28. c. 2. (15) Quinct. l. x. c. 1.

VESPASIAN was ſucceeded in the empire by his eldeſt ſon Titus, who was born the thirtieth of December, about the time of the death of Caligula, that is, in the year 40 of the Chriſtian æra; ſo that he was now thirty-nine years of age. He was brought up with Britannicus in the court of Nero, and is ſaid to have taſted the poiſon which Titus declared emperor.

was

his brother Aquilius Regulus, charged as the accuſer and deſtroyer of many illuſtrious citizens in the reign of Nero (16). He wrote, as appears from Tacitus (17), an account of the war between Vitellius and Veſpaſian; and is ſuppoſed to have publiſhed ſome other hiſtories (18). Modycratus, the Pythagoric, a native of Cadiz, lived about this time, and publiſhed ſeveral philoſophical tracts (19). St. Jerom commends him on account of his eloquence (20); and Origen, if Porphyrius is to be credited (21), peruſed with attention his writings, and improved by them. Curiatius Maternus, a famous civilian and poet, flouriſhed under Veſpaſian, and wrote ſeveral tragedies; one of which, intitled Cato, made a great noiſe, and would have given great offence to any of the emperors who preceded Veſpaſian: He is introduced in the dialogue of orators, ſpeaking in defence of poetry (22). Saleius Beſſus wrote ſeveral poems in the reign of Veſpaſian, which were highly eſteemed by Quintilian, and Veſpaſian himſelf, who countenanced, and with great generoſity rewarded, the poet (23). Cluvius wrote the hiſtory of Nero's reign, and of the civil wars preceding that of Veſpaſian (24), and is frequently quoted by Tacitus. Moſt writers take him to be the ſame perſon with Marcus Cluvius Rufus, who governed Spain in the reign of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Of him Tacitus obſerves, that he was in great favour with Nero, and acquired mighty wealth, without injuring any man either in his life or fortune (25). He was, as the ſame writer obſerves, an eloquent man, and well qualified for affairs in time of peace, but void of experience in war (26). None of the writings of theſe authors have reached our times, except ſome ſentences quoted by the antient grammarians.

(16) Tacit. l. iv. c. 42. (17) Tacit. orat. c. 14. (18) Voſſ. hiſt Lat. l. i. c. 28. (19) Jonſius de ſcript. hiſt. philoſoph. c. 5. (20) Euſeb. chron. (21) Idem hiſt. eccleſ. l. vi. c. 19. (22) Tacit. orat. c. 2. 3. 11. (23) Tacit. ibid. c. 5. Quintil. l. x. c. 1. (24) Tacit. annal. xiii. c. 20. (25) Tacit. l. iv. c. 49. (26) Idem, l. i. c. 8.

was given to the young prince at the emperor's table. We are told, that an aſtrologer being conſulted by Narciſſus, the celebrated freed-man of Claudius, about the lot of Britannicus, returned anſwer, that by the laws of fate the empire was not deſtined to him, but to Titus, who happened to ſtand by him. He lived in great friendſhip with Britannicus; whence, ſoon after his acceſſion to the empire, he erected two ſtatues to his memory, one of gold in the palace, and another of ivory, which was by his orders publicly carried among other ſtatues at the Circenſian games. Titus, from his tender years, attended with great application the ſtudy of rhetoric and poetry, and made great progreſs in both, being commended by the antients as an excellent poet, and an eloquent ſpeaker upon any ſubject whatever, and without premeditation. He ſerved firſt in quality of tribune in Germany, and afterwards in Britain; and in both provinces gained no leſs reputation by his modeſt and engaging behaviour, than by his courage. Upon his return from Britain, he betook himſelf to the bar, and pleaded ſome cauſes of great importance with uncommon applauſe. While he was yet very young, he married Arricidia Tertulla, whoſe father was only a Roman knight, but had been captain of the prætorian guards. Upon her death, he married Martia Furnilla, deſcended of an illuſtrious family, but divorced her after he had one daughter by her, named Julia Sabina. After his quæſtorſhip, which he diſcharged with great applauſe, he was advanced to the command of a legion, and attended his father into Judæa in quality of his lieutenant. In that war, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, as appears from Joſephus, in a very eminent manner; reduced, while he ſerved under his father, ſome ſtrong holds; and gained the reputation both of a brave and prudent leader. Being ſent by Veſpaſian to congratulate Galba upon his acceſſion to the empire, and to receive his directions concerning the proſecution of the war againſt the Jews, it was rumoured abroad by the populace at Rome, that Galba had ſent for him in order to adopt him. Ground for this report was adminiſtered, as Tacitus obſerves, by the condition of the emperor, antient and childleſs, and the great character of Titus, who was judged equal to any degree of fortune, however elevated. But having received at Corinth certain advice of the murder of Galba, he returned to his father, and reconciled to him Mucianus governor of Syria; for between Veſpaſian and

His education ſtudies, &c. before his acceſſion to the empire.

and him, as the one ruled over Judæa and the other over Syria, great animosities reigned, occasioned by their governing two neighbouring provinces [a]. He was left by his father in Judæa to prosecute the war against the Jews. Upon their parting, Titus gave a signal instance of his good-nature and affection towards his brother Domitian. For the emperor, being informed that Domitian had already abandoned himself to all manner of debauchery, and assumed more authority than was suitable to a son only, was highly incensed against him. Titus therefore, upon the departure of his father for Italy, pleaded with great affection and earnestness in favour of his brother, warning the emperor to beware of being rashly incensed by intelligence from such as brought criminal representations. "To your own son, said he, it is but just you should bear a spirit of gentleness, free from all prejudice. Not from fleets, not from legions, are such powerful bulwarks found for the support of the imperial dignity, as from a numerous issue in the imperial house. The number of our friends is diminished with time; they often desert us to follow fortune; or because we cannot gratify their desires. But from our own blood we may always promise ourselves ready assistance, and unshaken fidelity. In our good fortune many will partake with us, but our nearest in kindred alone will bear us company in our adversities. Even between brothers, added he, concord and unanimity will not prove lasting, if their common parent sets them not first an example." Vespasian, who by this reasoning was not so much reconciled to Domitian, as charmed with the tender affection of Titus, desired him to be of good chear, and to study how to aggrandise the commonwealth by war and the exercise of arms; adding, that it should be his task to insure the public peace, and that of his family [b]. Of the conduct and warlike atchievements of Titus, during the war which he carried on with stupendous success against the Jews, we have spoken at length in our history of that nation. After the reduction of Jerusalem, instead of returning to Rome, he went to Alexandria, where he assisted at the consecration of the ox Apis, wearing a diadem; which together with his putting off from time to time his journey for Italy, and his giving a private audience at Zeugma to the embaſſadors of the Parthian king, occaſioned a report, as if he deſigned to revolt from his father, and make himſelf emperor of the eaſt. This rumour obliged him to haſten his departure for Rome, where he was received with loud ſhouts of joy, and a few days after honoured with one of the moſt magnificent triumphs the city had ever beheld. He was dignified by the ſenate with the title of Cæſar, and by his father taken, in a manner, for his collegue in the empire; for with him he exerciſed the cenſorſhip, the tribunitial power, ſeven conſulſhips, and managed all the affairs of the empire, writing even letters, and drawing up all edicts in his father's name. Tacitus tells us, that he was more ſtrict and reſerved in his own reign, than in that of his father; and Suetonius charges him with pride, cruelty, and even avarice. When any one, ſays the latter writer, gave him by his unguarded conduct, the leaſt umbrage, he hired people to demand his doom in the theatre, and in the camp of the prætorian guards, and then condemned him without further proof or trial. In adminiſtering juſtice, he was eaſily biaſſed by preſents, ſold ſeveral employments of great truſt unknown to his father, and indulged himſelf in feſtivity and pleaſures, ſpending great part of the night in riotous banquets, with the moſt diſſolute of the Roman youth, with young eunuchs, and a numerous herd of catamites and proſtitutes. His paſſion for Berenice, the daughter of Agrippa the great and ſiſter of Agrippa II. king of Ituræa, was highly cenſured by the Roman people, who looked upon him as a ſecond Nero; ſo that ſcarce ever any man arrived at the empire with a more ſullied reputation, or more abhorred by the populace[a]. But, upon his acceſſion to the empire, all theſe accuſations turned to his praiſe and advantage, no prince having ever governed with greater moderation, humanity, and good-nature. Soon after his father's death, he diſmiſſed the beautiful queen Berenice, who had followed him to Rome with her father Agrippa, the laſt king of Judæa; and obliged her not only to withdraw from the city, but from Italy, tho' he was paſſionately fond of her; and this merely out of complaiſance to the ſenate and people, who were diſpleaſed to ſee their emperor thus captivated with the charms of Returns to Rome, and triumphs.

Is left by his father to carry on the war against the Jews.

His kindness to his brother Domitian.

[a] Tacit. hist. l. ii. c. 77. Suet. in Tit. c. 1, 2, 3, 5. Philostr. in vit. Apoll. Ty. l. vii. c. 3. Joseph. bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 29. [b] Tacit. l. iv. c. 52.

Is charged while yet a private man, with pride, cruelty and avarice.

Governs with great moderation.

[a] Suet. c. 6, 7. Tacit. ibid.

of a foreign woman [d]. Tho' his brother Domitian pretended to an equal ſhare in the government, and raiſed great diſturbances in the city, by giving out and arrogantly maintaining, that his father had left him partner in the empire, but that his will had been falſified; yet he could not prevail upon himſelf either to puniſh or baniſh him, but on the contrary treated him as his collegue in the empire, conjuring him often in private, with tears in his eyes, not to hate a brother, who bore him a ſincere and tender affection, and was willing to allow him a due ſhare in the adminiſtration [e]. Pliny obſerves, that Julius Baſſus dreaded Titus on account of his intimacy with Domitian; but that he received no injury at the hands of the former, whereas he was baniſhed by the latter. The emperors, ever ſince the reign of Tiberius, had paid no regard to the ordinances of their predeceſſors granting to cities, or particular perſons, privileges, immunities or exemptions, till ſuch grants were confirmed by themſelves; which they did with great reſerve, cauſing the charters to be firſt carefully examined, as if they had been firſt granted by themſelves. But Titus, without ſuffering any one to apply to him, confirmed them all by one general edict; and his example was followed by moſt of his ſucceſſors. He could not prevail upon himſelf to diſmiſs any who applied to him diſſatisfied, or without ſome hopes of ſucceſs; whereupon, being admoniſhed by ſome of his friends, that he promiſed more than he could well perform, he replied, that no man ſhould depart diſſatisfied from the preſence of a prince. It is well known, that being told one night that he beſtowed no favour that day, he expreſſed his diſſatisfaction and regret, with that memorable ſaying, "My friends, I have loſt a day." He treated the people with extraordinary kindneſs and complaiſance: having deſigned to exhibit a ſhew of gladiators, he ſignified by a proclamation, that it ſhould be exhibited, not according to his own taſte and pleaſure, but that of the people; and was ſo far from refuſing what they deſired, that he earneſtly ſolicited them to declare what they liked beſt, complying with their taſte, tho' diſagreeing with his own. He allowed free acceſs to him, even while he was bathing, and received all with great affability and condeſcenſion, yet ſo as to maintain the dignity of his rank and the majeſty of an emperor.

His conduct towards his brother.

Confirms all the grants of his predeceſſors.

His complaiſance to the people.

No

[d] Suet. c. 7. [e] Idem in Dom. c. 2. & 3.

No man's property he ever coveted; nay, he often refuſed the uſual preſents and ſuch contributions as were due to him: and nevertheleſs, of all his predeceſſors, none was more generous than he, nor expended larger ſums in private bounties, in ſhews, in buildings, &c. After he dedicated the famous amphitheatre, and finiſhed with incredible expedition certain baths cloſe to it, he exhibited, at an immenſe charge, a ſhew of gladiators, a naval battle in the old naumachia, and brought into the arena five thouſand wild beaſts of all kinds. When he entered upon the office of chief pontiff, he ſolemnly declared, that he took upon him that dignity in order to preſerve his hands undefiled, and pure from the ſhedding of blood; and truly from that time he never was acceſſory to any man's death, though he might have exerted his revenge with great juſtice: but, however provoked, he ſpared the criminals, declaring, that he had rather die himſelf, than put another to death. Of this his great clemency he gave the following inſtance: two patricians having conſpired againſt him, were diſcovered, convicted, and ſentenced to death by the ſenate. But the good-natured emperor freely forgave them, admoniſhing them only in private, that in vain they aſpired to the empire, which was given by deſtiny, exhorting them to be ſatisfied with the rank in which by providence they had been placed, and offering them any thing elſe which it was in his power to grant. At the ſame time he diſpatched a meſſenger to the mother of one of them, who was then at a great diſtance, and under great concern about the fate of her ſon, to aſſure her, that her ſon was not only alive, but out of danger. He invited them the ſame night to his table, and having the next day placed them by him at a ſhew of gladiators, when the weapons of the combatans were, according to cuſtom, preſented to him, he deſired them to ſurvey them [e]. The law of majeſty he utterly abrogated, and would not ſuffer any perſon to be proſecuted for ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of himſelf, or the other emperors his predeceſſors, ſaying, If they blacken my character undeſervedly, they ought rather to be pitied than puniſhed; if deſervedly, it would be a crying piece of injuſtice to puniſh them for ſpeaking truth. As for my predeceſſors, if they are truly gods, they are in a condition to revenge when they think fit, the injuries

His clemency

Aboliſhes the law of majeſty.

[e] Suet. c. 9.

juries done them, and ſtand in no need of my aſſiſtance and power [f]. The accuſers were the only perſons againſt whom he proceeded with unrelenting ſeverity, cauſing them to be publicly whipt, to be expoſed to public view, and to the inſults of the populace in the forum, the amphitheatre, and the circus, and then to be either ſold for ſlaves, or baniſhed to deſert iſlands [g]. In ſhort he was a prince, according to Suetonius, in whom all virtues centred, without the allay of one ſingle vice.

His ſeverity towards the informers.

TOWARDS the end of the year 79 of the chriſtian æra, and firſt of Titus's reign, Campania was alarmed with a moſt dreadful and almoſt incredible eruption of mount Veſuvius, which laid waſte the country to a great diſtance, and utterly conſumed a great many cities with their inhabitants, and among the reſt Pompeii and Herculanum. The former had ſuffered much by an earthquake in the year 63 of the chriſtian æra; but had been rebuilt and embelliſhed with ſeveral ſtately edifices, eſpecially a theatre, in which the people were aſſembled, and intent upon the public ſhews, when the city was ſwallowed up by an earthquake, which attended the eruption of the flames from the mountain. The cities of Puteoli and Cumæ were greatly damaged, what by the earthquake, what by the burning aſhes; which, if the antients are to be credited, reached Africa, Egypt, and Syria, and at Rome turned ſuddenly, to the great terror of the inhabitants, day into night. Pliny the elder, who was then at Miſenum, where he commanded the fleet riding there, having diſcovered this cloud on the firſt of November, and not yet knowing whence it iſſued, went immediately on board one of the galleys, and ſailed towards mount Veſuvius. He was ſoon met by great numbers of perſons, who, in ſmall boats, were flying from the dreadful conflagration; but nevertheleſs, prompted by his curioſity, he purſued his courſe, tho' ſtones, aſhes, and earth began already to ſhower down upon his veſſel; nay, we are told, that, to his great ſurprize, he found a new cape formed by the earth and huge ſtones, thrown out by the mountain. However, he proceeded with great intrepidity, and reaching Stabiæ between Pompeii and Surrentum, tho' the inhabitants had all abandoned the place, paſſed the night there, the better to obſerve, during the darkneſs, the mountain, which ſeemed all on a blaze. The ſame night a dread-a dreadful earthquake happened at Stabiæ, and such an huge quantity of stones fell, that Pliny resolved to put to sea, but was prevented by contrary winds. At length the fire approaching, he attempted to save himself by flight; but, tho' supported by two of his domestics, he soon fell, suffocated, as is supposed, by the thickness of the air and the insupportable stench of sulphur. His body was found three days after, and interred by his nephew Pliny the younger, who was then at Misenum, and narrowly escaped the same fate, as he himself relates at length in his epistles [h]. On this occasion the poet Cesius Bassus was consumed, with his house, by the flames; and likewise Agrippa, the son of Claudius Felix, formerly governor of Judæa, and of Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa, the last king of the Jews [i]. This is the first eruption of mount Vesuvius we find mentioned in history.

A dreadful eruption of mount Veſuvius.

[f] Dio, l. lviii. p. 354. [g] Suet. c. 10.

The death of Pliny the elder.

Agricola's second campaign in Britain.

THE same year, Titus assumed the title of emperor with the usual solemnity, on account of the advantages which the brave Agricola had gained in Britain, during his second campaign in that island; for having applied himself in the winter with great care to the redressing of the grievances, of which the Britons but too justly complained, in the beginning of the summer he assembled his army, and marched farther into the country, commending such of his men as in marching observed duty and rank, and checking such as were loose and straggling. He himself always chose the ground for encamping; the friths and woods he himself always first examined; and to the enemy, in the mean time, allowed not a moment's quiet, but was ever harassing them with sudden incursions. Then having sufficiently alarmed and terrified them, he used to spare them, in order to tempt and allure them with the sweets of peace. By this conduct several communities, which till that day held out upon equal terms, and maintained themselves in a state of independency, came to lay down their arms, gave hostages, and suffered fortresses to be erected in their territories; which was done with so much care and skill, that no part of Britain conquered by the Romans till that time escaped being annoyed by them [k]. This is the account which Tacitus gives us of what Agricola performed in the second summer's expedition; but as he speaks Several communities submit and give hostages.

[h] Plin. l. vi. epist. 16, 20.
[i] Joseph. antiq. l. xx. c. 5.
[k] Tacit. vit. Agric. c. 20, 21.

ſpeaks in general, without naming any particular place, it is no eaſy matter to determine through what part of Britain Agricola marched his army, and how far into the country; what friths he paſſed over, what communities ſubmitted and gave hoſtages, and in what places the fortreſſes were erected which Tacitus mentions. However, a modern writer [l], whom our readers may conſult, endeavours by many learned conjectures to prove, that Agricola in his ſecond campaign marched directly from Angleſey into Scotland, and penetrated as far as the frith of Edinburgh; that he bent his rout through the county of Annandale and the adjacent counties, where remains of antient Roman camps are ſtill to be ſeen, ſome of which the learned antiquarian concludes, from Tacitus's account of them, to have been made by Agricola; that the friths he paſſed were thoſe of Dee, Ribble, Liverpool, and Solloway; and finally, that the communities or cities, which ſuffered themſelves to be begirt, as Tacitus expreſſes it, with garriſons and fortreſſes, were thoſe on the Iſthmus between Clyde and Forth. We refer our readers to the above-mentioned writer for a more diſtinct explanation of theſe particulars.

Through what part of Britain he marched.

THE following year, Titus, now conſul the eighth time, with his brother Domitian the ſeventh, gave many remarkable inſtances of his humanity and good-nature, in repairing, at his own expence, the loſſes which the unhappy inhabitants of Campania had ſuffered by the late eruption of mount Veſuvius. He ſent into Campania two conſulars with large ſums, to be employed in rebuilding the cities which had been overturned, and applied to the relief of the poor ſufferers the goods and eſtates of ſuch, as had periſhed on this occaſion and left no heirs; nay, went in perſon into Campania, and with his own hand diſtributed immenſe ſums among thoſe who ſeemed moſt worthy of his compaſſion [m]. While he was in Campania, a dreadful fire broke out in Rome, which laſted three days and as many nights, and reduced to aſhes a great many private and public buildings, the library of Auguſtus, with all the books lodged in it, great part of the capitol, the theatre of Pompey, &c. Titus was no ſooner informed of this calamity, than he haſtened back to the city, and publicly declared, that the whole loſs ſhould fall upon him,

Titus repairs the damages done by the eruption of mount Veſuvius.

And by a fire at Rome.

[l] Gordon. itiner. ſeptentrion. [m] Suet. c. 8.

him, and that at his own charge, he would repair the damage ſuffered by particulars. He was as good as his word; for tho' many cities and foreign princes, by whom he was no leſs beloved than by Romans, offered to bear their ſhare in the expence, he could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept their offers, as Nero had done on the like occaſion; but choſe rather to ſell even the ornaments and furniture of his own palace and country-houſes, in order to raiſe money wherewithal to defray the immenſe charges he was at in rebuilding the temples, the public edifices, and the dwellings of particulars. This conflagration was followed by the moſt dreadful plague that had ever raged in Rome. Dion Caſſius aſcribes its riſe to the aſhes of mount Veſuvius, which had covered the country all round to a great diſtance [n]. Tacitus left no remedy, human or divine, unattempted, to abate the malignity of the diſtemper, exerting at the ſame time all the care and regard of a prince, all the tenderneſs and compaſſion of a father, comforting the diſtreſſed multitude with his edicts, and relieving them with large and daily bounties [o].

Exerts his good nature during a plague at Rome.

Towards the end of this year he finiſhed the famous amphitheatre, which is elegantly deſcribed by Martial [p], who likewiſe mentions the baths that were ended about the ſame time. The amphitheatre, whereof the ſtately remains are ſtill to be ſeen, had been begun by Veſpaſian, and ſtood, as we learn from Dion Caſſius, in the midſt of the city, tho' its ruins lie in the outſkirts of modern Rome. Titus, when he dedicated, according to cuſtom, that noble and ſtately edifice, exhibited moſt magnificent ſhews, which laſted an hundred days, and raiſed the ſpirits of the people, ready to ſink under the calamities they had ſuffered [q].

Finiſhes the amphitheatre.

In the mean time, Agricola employed his ſecond winter in meaſures extremely advantageous and ſalutary; for to the end that the people, wild and diſperſed over the country, and thence eaſily ſtirred up to war, might, by a taſte of pleaſures, be reconciled to inactivity and repoſe, he firſt privately exhorted, and then publicly aſſiſted, them, to build temples, houſes, and places of public reſort, reprimanding ſuch as were ſlow, and commending thoſe who were aſſiduous

Agricola brings the Britons to love the Roman cuſtoms.

[n] Dio, l. lvi. p. 756. [o] Idem ibid, Suet. c. 8. [p] Mart. lib. de ſpect. epigr. 1. [q] Dio, p. 757. & Marc. Velſer. monument. Auguſt. lapid. 35.

duous and forward in ſuch purſuits. He took care to have the ſons of the chiefs inſtructed in the liberal ſciences, finding their genius ſuperior to that of their neighbours the Gauls; and ſuch was his ſucceſs, that thoſe, who had lately ſcorned to learn the Roman language, were now become fond of its elegancies: thence they began to aſſume the Roman apparel, and the uſe of the gown grew frequent amongſt them. Thus by degrees they proceeded to the charms and allurements of vice and effeminacy, to magnificent galleries, ſumptuous bagnios, elegant entertainments, &c. all which things were, as Tacitus judiciouſly obſerves, by the unexperienced, ſtyled politeneſs, but at the bottom were nothing but baits of ſlavery. In the beginning of the ſummer, Agricola took the field again, and in purſuit of his conqueſts diſcovered new people, and continued his devaſtations through the ſeveral nations quite to the mouth of the Taus or Tay. Whence ſuch terror ſeized the enemy, that they durſt not attack him, though his troops were ſorely haraſſed by terrible tempeſts; ſo that he had time to ſecure the places he had conquered by erecting forts. It was obſerved of Agricola by men of experience, that no commander ever choſe his poſts with more ſkill, in regard of their ſituation and convenience, and that no place of ſtrength founded by him, was ever taken by ſtorm, or abandoned as not defenſible. From theſe ſtrong-holds frequent excurſions were made; and, as they were ſupplied with proviſions for a year, the Romans paſſed the winter in them without the leaſt apprehenſion, every ſingle fort defending itſelf; ſo that the enemy, in all their attempts upon them, were baffled, and thence reduced to deſpair, not being able, as formerly, to repair by their ſucceſs in the winter, the loſſes they had ſuſtained in the ſummer. In theſe expeditions Agricola never aſſumed to himſelf the glory of exploits performed by others; but to each commander, to each centurion, yielded the praiſe which was due to his atchievements. By ſome he is ſaid to have been too ſevere and ſharp in rebuking; and truly, as he abounded in courteſy towards thoſe who readily complied with their duty, ſo to the ſlothful and negligent he appeared ſtern and ſevere. But his anger was eaſily appeaſed: he harboured no rancour in his heart, thinking it more honourable to give open offence, than to foſter ſecret hatred[r]. The emperor Titus, in his eighth

He extends his conqueſts to the Taus or Tay.

[r] Tacit. vit. Agri. c. 22.

eighth conſulſhip, and conſequently this year, repaired ſome antient aqueducts, and at a vaſt expence paved with large ſtones the road from Rome to Ariminum croſs the Apennines, where is ſtill to be ſeen, not far from the preſent city of Foſſombrone, an huge rock cut throqugh on this occaſion [s].

THE next conſuls were Sex. Annius Silvanus and T. Annius Verus Pollio. The latter is by ſome writers ſuppoſed to be the grandfather of the emperor M. Aurelius, who was, according to Capitolinus, raiſed by Veſpaſian to the rank of a patrician, diſcharged twice the office of conſulſhip, and governed Rome with general ſatisfaction.

He employs the fourth ſummer in ſecuring the places already conquered.

This ſummer, the fourth ſince Agricola's arrival in Britain, was by him employed in ſettling and ſecuring the places which he had already conquered, viz. all the countries on this ſide of the Glota and Bodotria, now the Clyde and Forth, into which rivers the tide from the oppoſite ſeas flows ſo far up the country, that their heads are parted only by a narrow neck of land, not above twenty miles over. This iſthmus the Romans ſecured with forts and garriſons, and penned up the inhabitants, as it were, in another iſland; ſo that they might have made the two rivers Glota and Bodotria the boundaries of their conqueſts, and ſuffered the nations beyond them to live undiſturbed [t]. But the ambition of the Romans, which they diſguiſed under the ſpecious name of glory, knew no bounds; hence Agricola purſued his conqueſts the next and the following ſummers, as we ſhall relate according to the order of time. In the eaſt, one Terentius Maximus, paſſing himſelf upon the people for Nero, raiſed great diſturbances in that province, and likewiſe in the countries bordering upon the Euphrates; but, being purſued by the Roman troops, he took refuge in the territories of the Parthians, where he was entertained by king Artabanes, who was then at variance with the Romans; but nevertheleſs, upon the approach of their army, thought it adviſeable to abandon the cauſe of the impoſtor [u].

New honours conferred upon Titus.

THIS year, the ſenate, not out of flattery, but a ſenſe of gratitude, conferred new honours upon Titus. What honours theſe were, we are no-where told; but the good emperor lived not to enjoy them, being ſuddenly ſnatched away away, to the inexpreſſible grief of the Roman people. Suetonius tells us, that he exhibited certain ſhews, during which he ſhed many tears in the preſence of the multitude, and retired, as ſoon as they were over, into the country of the Sabines, greatly grieved, becauſe the victim, while he was ſacrificing, had broke looſe, and a dreadful clap of thunder had been heard, though the day was quite bright, and not a cloud to be ſeen. The firſt night he lay out of Rome, he was ſeized with a burning fever; but nevertheleſs purſued his journey in a litter, being deſirous to end his days in the ſame houſe where his father died. We are told, that finding himſelf on the road greatly indiſpoſed, and not doubting but his end approached, he lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven, complaining, that he was thus to be cut off in the vigour of his age, when, during the whole courſe of his life, he had been guilty of one action only, which ſeemed to require repentance. What action that was, he did not declare; but Dion Caſſius is of opinion, that it was his freely forgiving his brother Domitian, who had conſpired againſt him, when, by inflicting upon him the deſerved puniſhment, he might have prevented the many evils and calamities, which the excellent emperor was well appriſed his brother, when inveſted with the ſovereignty, would bring upon the ſtate [w]. Others think, that the criminal converſation he was ſaid to have had with his brother's wife, occurred then to his memory. But Suetonius clears him from this aſperſion, upon the ſolemn proteſtation of Domitia herſelf, who, had the charge been true, would have rather glorified in it, as ſhe did in all other crimes, than denied it [x]. Titus having with much-ado reached Cutyliæ, his paternal eſtate, expired there ſoon after his arrival, on the thirteenth of September, in the forty-firſt year of his age, after having reigned two years, two months, and twenty days. Philoſtratus tells us, that he was poiſoned by his brother Domitian [y]. Plutarch aſcribes his death to the immoderate uſe of baths [z], and adds, that one Regulus, who, out of complaiſance, uſed to bathe with him, died of an apoplexy. Suetonius writes, that Domitian,

[s] Onuph. in faſt. p. 210. Goltz. p. 56. [t] Tacit. ibid. c. 23. [u] Zonar. p. 195.

Is taken ill, and leaves Rome.

His death.

[w] Dio, l. lxvi. p. 758. [x] Suet. c. 10. [y] Philoſtrat. vit. Apol. Ty. l. vi. c. 14. [z] Plut. de ſanit. p. 2. 4.

Domitian, who had ever fought the deſtruction of his brother, cauſed the room to be cleared before he was dead, ordering all thoſe who could afford him any aſſiſtance to withdraw; but that writer does not charge Domitian with any other kind of violence [a]. He far excelled, in the opinion of the antients, all his predeceſſors, even Veſpaſian himſelf, in every virtue becoming a prince, and was equalled by few of his ſucceſſors. He knew no purpoſe of being higher than others but to do good to all. He was a ſtranger to all parade and oſtentation, chuſing to live with his people rather as a father with his children, than a prince with ſubjects; whence he was deſervedly ſtyled, the love and delight of mankind. What pity that ſuch princes, ſuch friends to the world, and protectors of men, ſhould ever die! His death was no ſooner known than a general ſadneſs, an univerſal conſternation, appeared in Rome, which in a ſhort time ſpread all over the provinces to the moſt diſtant bounds of the empire. The ſenators, without being ſummoned according to cuſtom, haſtened to the palace, and having cauſed the doors of the chapel, where they met, to be ſhut for a while, in order to indulge their grief, they opened them again, and in the preſence of the multitude heaped more praiſes upon him after his death, than they had ever done while he lived amongſt them; a plain proof of the ſincerity of their eſteem and affection. Domitian cauſed him to be ranked among the gods, and was the firſt who paid him divine honours; but at the ſame time, ſtudied both in private and in public to revile his memory, and leſſen the eſteem and veneration, which all orders of men had for ſo worthy and deſerving a prince [b]. Titus left only one daughter, named Julia Sabina, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the following reign.

His character.

Is univerſally lamented.

Titus was ſucceeded by his brother Domitian, who, without the leaſt oppoſition or contradiction, was immediately acknowledged emperor, notwithſtanding the bad opinion which many entertained of him. He was born on the twenty-fourth of October of the year 51 of the chriſtian æra, his father being then conſul elect, and appointed to diſcharge that office the month following. He is ſtyled on ſeveral medals, which have reached our times

Domitian acknowledged emperor.

Tit

[a] Suet. in Domit. [b] Idem, ibid.

Titus Flavius Sabinus Domitianus [c]. He paſſed his youth in great poverty, and is ſaid to have been a pathic to Nerva, who ſucceeded him, for hire, and likewiſe to one Clodius Pollio, formerly prætor, who kept a note under Domitian's own hand, by which he bound himſelf, for a ſum of money, to comply, when required, with his lewd and unnatural deſires. He did not apply himſelf from his tender years to the ſtudy of hiſtory, poetry, eloquence, or any other liberal art or ſcience; hence in all his ſpeeches and harangues he made uſe of the eloquence of others. He took great delight in archery, in which he was ſo wonderfully expert, that he was frequently ſeen to ſhoot a great number of arrows between the fingers of one of his domeſtics, whom he placed at a great diſtance with his hand expanded, telling before between which fingers the arrow would paſs, and never miſſing his aim [d]. He was naturally cruel, ſuſpicious, and addicted to revenge; greedy of honours, but impatient of the leaſt toil or labour; affected the reputation of a brave commander, but carefully avoided expoſing himſelf to any danger. Suetonius thinks, that his cruelty was chiefly occaſioned by his timoroſneſs, and no-ways natural to him. Being at Rome when his father aſſumed the title of emperor, Vitellius placed guards about him; but he might nevertheleſs have eaſily eſcaped, ſeveral meſſengers having, by various diſguiſes and ſhifts, reached him from Antonius Primus, and ſhewed him from what place he might fly, and upon what guard and ſecurity depend; nay, even thoſe who guarded him, offered themſelves for companions of his flight; but he, apprehending from thence that they deſigned to betray him, could not by any means be prevailed upon to make his eſcape [e]. Upon the burning of the capitol, whither he had retired with his uncle Sabinus, he concealed himſelf in the room of one of the miniſters of the temple, and the next morning was conveyed by his freed-man beyond the Tiber, in the diſguiſe of one of the prieſts of Iſis. When Primus had made himſelf maſter of the city, and all apprehenſions of hoſtility had ceaſed, he diſcovered himſelf to his father's generals, and was by the ſoldiers thronging about him ſaluted Cæſar [f]; which title was confirmed to him the day following by the ſenate. From that time to the arrival of his father, he bore the chief ſway in Rome; but gave no attention to the cares of government, abandoning himſelf to all manner of voluptuouſneſs, and making uſe of his power only to indulge his vicious inclinations with more liberty. He took Domitia Longina, the daughter of the famous Domitius Corbulo, from her huſband L. Ælius Lamia, married her ſome time after, and had a ſon by her, who was honoured with the title of Cæſar, but died an infant, and was by Domitian ranked among the gods [g]. That he had other children, though not mentioned by any hiſtorian, appears from the epitaph of one Pierius, ſtill to be ſeen at Rome, who is ſtiled the emperor's freed-man, and preceptor to his children. The monument was raiſed by Flavia Nicea, wife to Pierius, with the permiſſion, as is expreſſed in the inſcription, of Hermas, the chief freed-man of Domitia Auguſta; for with this title Domitius honoured his wife Domitia Longina in the ſecond year of his reign [h]. In the beginning of his father's reign, being jealous of the glory which his brother had acquired in the Jewiſh war, he reſolved to go into Gaul, and take upon him the command of the army which was employed againſt Civilis. Mucianus did all that lay in his power to divert him, as he was quite unexperienced in military affairs, from ſuch a reſolution; but Domitian continuing obſtinately bent upon that expedition, Mucianus reſolved to attend him, in order to check his ardour, leſt, following the impetuoſity of his age and inſtigated by evil counſellors, were he once maſter of an army, he might diſconcert all meaſures, whether for peace or war. After many procraſtinations and delays, they both ſet out at length; but received, ere they reached the Alps, tidings of the defeat of the Treverians. Hereupon Mucianus communicated, as no more than his own ſentiments upon the preſent occaſion, what he had long propoſed and concealed, viz. that ſince, by the favour of the gods, the forces of the enemy were broken, with an ill grace would Domitian proceed, now the war was nigh concluded, and rob another of the whole glory. He added, that were the empire threatened with danger, it behoved the emperor's ſon to venture his perſon in battle; but

[c] Goltz. p. 58. Suet. c. 1. [d] Suet. c. 19. [e] Tacit. hiſt. l. iii. c. 59. [f] Idem, c. 74.

He reſolves to head the army againſt Civilis.

to

[g] Suet. c. iii. Spanh. p. 650. & Suet. c. 3.

[h] Vide Spanh. p. 1

to contend with the Caninefates and Batavians, was beneath him. Let Domitian, continued he, retire to Lions, and from thence diſplay the power and fortune of the empire at hand, neither engaging in ſmall hazards, nor failing to meet ſuch as are greater. Thus Mucianus prevailed upon him to retire to Lions. From thence Domitian was believed by inter-agents to corrupt the fidelity of Cerealis, and to have propoſed, whether he would commit to him the army and the empire, if he came in perſon. It remained uncertain what deſigns he foſtered, whether he meditated a war againſt his father, or intended to arm himſelf with power and forces againſt his brother; for Cerealis, by ſeveral evaſions, eluded his ſuit, as that of one, who, with a childiſh fondneſs, longed for things to which he was not equal. Domitian perceiving, that Cerealis deſpiſed his youth, relinquiſhed all functions of government, even the ſmalleſt; and burying himſelf in ſolitude, feigned a zeal for learning, eſpecially for poetry, thence to conceal his ambition and other paſſions, and to eſcape the jealouſy of his brother [i]. Some writers tell us, that on this occaſion he applied himſelf in earneſt to the ſtudy of poetry, and with wonderful ſucceſs. Pliny the elder ſeems to have admired his poetical compoſitions [k], and likewiſe Quintilian [l]; for both cry them up, not through flattery, ſays Voſſius, as is manifeſt from the tranſlation of Aratus, which has reached us, and was, without all doubt, done by Domitian [m]. Lactantius aſcribes to him the learned comment on that tranſlation [n]; but Voſſius is of a different opinion [o]. Valerius Flaccus the poet, who flouriſhed under Veſpaſian, ſpeaks of a poem written by Domitian on the taking of Jeruſalem by Titus [p]. He likewiſe wrote a book in proſe about the means of preſerving the hair, which is quoted by Suetonius [q]. But while he pretended to place his whole delight in theſe ſtudies, and affected a fondneſs for ſolitude, the king of the Parthians having demanded ſuccours againſt the Alani, as we have hinted above, he earneſtly ſolicited his father for the command of thoſe troops; and when he found the emperor no-ways inclined to aſſiſt the Parthians, he applied to the eaſtern princes, ſoliciting them with promiſes and preſents to deſire ſupplies, and himſelf to lead them. But Veſpaſian was too well acquainted with his views and temper, to truſt him with the command of an army. Upon the death of his father, he deliberated a long time with himſelf, whether he ſhould openly revolt, and tempt the fidelity of the prætorian guards, by offering them a larger donative than his brother had promiſed them; but his courage failing him, he bore no other title, during the reign of Titus, but that of Cæſar, "prince of the Roman youth;" a title now peculiar to the preſumptive heir to the empire[r]. His brother no ſooner expired, than he haſtened to Rome; and repairing to the camp of the prætorian guards, was there by the ſoldiery, after having promiſed them the uſual donative, ſaluted emperor. At the ſame time he aſſumed, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, all the other titles annexed to the ſovereignty, which other emperors had taken ſucceſſively[s]. Some medals, which have reached our times, give us room to ſuppoſe, that, in the firſt year of his reign, he took upon him the title of Germanicus, probably on account of his journey to Lions during the revolt of the Gauls and Batavians; for we know of no other expedition which could give him, however vain and ambitious, the leaſt colour for aſſuming that ſurname or title[t].

He attempt to corrupt Cerealis.

Retires, and feigns a love for learning and poetry.

[i] Tacit. l. iv. c. 86. [k] Plin. in præfat. [l] Quintil. l. x. c. 1. [m] Voſſ. poet. Lat. c. 3. [n] Lact. l. i. c. 22. [o] Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. p. 115. [p] Val. Flac. l. ii, ver. 12. [q] Suet. c. 18.

His ſome thoughts of revolting.

DOMITIAN, now inveſted with the ſovereign power, which he had long and impatiently coveted, performed in the firſt place the obſequies of the deceaſed emperor, and pronounced himſelf his funeral oration, with an affected concern, bewailing the loſs of a brother ſo dear to him, and by whom he was ſo tenderly beloved; but that his grief was only aſſumed, he made ſoon appear, by publicly reviling the memory of that excellent prince, by blaming his conduct, and perſecuting all thoſe whom he had diſtinguiſhed with particular marks of his favour; nay, he openly declared in the ſenate, that to him both his father and brother were indebted for the empire, and that they had only reſtored to him what was his own gift. However, in the beginning of his reign, he ſtudied to gain the affections of his people, by a conduct worthy of a great prince, diſguiſing his vices, and affecting the oppoſite virtues. He ſhewed ſuch an abhorrence to all manner of cruelty, that he once reſolved, by an expreſs edict, to

He reviles the memory of his brother.

His conduct in the beginning of his reign.

[r] Idem, c. 2. Onuph. in faſt. p. 210. [s] Idem. ibid.
[t] Vide Birägi numiſ. p. 131, 132.

to forbid the ſacrificing of oxen, or any living creature. He was ſo far from betraying any bias to avarice, that on the contrary, he gave daily inſtances of a temper truly princely and munificent, preſenting his officers and miniſters with large ſums, in order to raiſe them above the temptation of accumulating wealth by methods ſordid and mean. He could not be prevailed upon to accept ſuch inheritances as were left him by perſons who had children; and becauſe one Ruſcius Cæpio, by his will, obliged his heir to pay a certain ſum to every new ſenator, he declared the will void, and would not ſuffer it to be executed to the prejudice of his own children. All debts above five years ſtanding, which were owing to the exchequer, he freely forgave; and after the diviſion of lands amongſt the veterans, reſtored the remainder to the antient proprietors, tho' he might, after the example of other emperors, have appropriated it to himſelf. He forbad, on pain of baniſhment, all the officers of the treaſury to ſue any one for debts, that were not clear and undoubted [u]. He confirmed at once, as Titus had done, all the grants made by his predeceſſors, encreaſed the pay of the ſoldiers, and finiſhed, at an immenſe charge, all the public buildings, which had been begun by Titus. Plutarch tells us, that he expended above twelve twouſand talents only in the gilding of the capitol; and that nevertheleſs each hall and gallery of his own palace far excelled that ſtately temple in magnificence [w]. To the antient edifices, which he either repaired or rebuilt, he added an incredible number of new ones, having a great paſſion for building, and ſeeming deſirous as Plutarch expreſſes it [x], to change every thing into ſtones and gold. He was aſſiduous and quite unbiaſſed in the adminiſtration of juſtice, puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity ſuch judges as were convicted of having received bribes, and kept the magiſtrates of the city, as well as the governors of the provinces, in ſuch awe, that they were never known to have behaved with ſo much modeſty as in his time, tho' after his death, many of them abandoned themſelves, as Suetonius informs us, to all manner of rapine and extortion [y]. Tho', after his acceſſion to the empire, he utterly neglected all kind of literature, and was never known to

His magnificence in public buildings.

[u] Suet. c. 9.
[w] Plut. vit. Public.
[x] Idem, ibid.
[y] Suet. c. 8.

Repairs the public libraries.

have perused any book, except the memoirs of Tiberius, yet he repaired the libraries which had been burnt in his brother's reign, procuring copies of such as had been consumed in the flames, and sending persons to Alexandria to transcribe those that were lodged in that famous library [z]. Authors observe, as a thing very remarkable in Domitian, that, in the beginning of his reign, he used to retire every day for some time into his room, where his whole employment was to catch flies, and pierce them with a sharp bodkin; which custom gave occasion to Vibius Priscus, when he was asked, whether any body was with the emperor, to answer pleasantly, Not so much as a fly [a].

Domitian, in the first year of his reign, took upon him, as other emperors had done, the consular dignity, and chose for his collegue Titus Flavius Sabinus, his cousin-german, the son of Flavius Sabinus governor of Rome, who was put to death in the reign of Vitellius, as we have related above. The emperor resigned the fasces on the thirteenth of January; but to whom, we are no-where told, and assumed the title of censor; which office he discharged with great applause, restraining, with several edicts, the licentiousness, which generally prevailed amongst all ranks of men. He enacted severe laws against the authors of such writings as any ways reflected on persons of distinction; degraded a senator, by name Cæcilius Rufinus, for no other reason, but because he took great delight in dancing. From such women as led scandalous lives, he took away the privilege of being carried in litters, and declared them incapable of enjoying legacies or inheritances. He struck a Roman knight out of the list of judges, for taking his wife again after he had divorced her for adultery. One of his freed-men having erected a monument for his son, with the stones which were designed for the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, he caused it to be demolished, and the bones and ashes of the deceased to be thrown into the sea. He would not suffer the comedians and Pantomimes to act on the public stage; but confined them to private houses and gardens. Many persons of both sexes convicted of adultery, he punished with death, &c [b].

Enacts several wholsome laws.

These

[z] Idem, c. 20. [a] Idem, c. 3. Aur. Vict. Dio, l. lxvii p. 766. [b] Suet. c. 7, 8. Dio, p. 765. Plin. panegyr Zonar. p. 197.

Theſe regulations and acts of juſtice were received with great applauſe; but the death of Flavius Sabinus, which happened in the end of this, or the beginning of the following, year, cauſed an univerſal dread in the city; for the emperor, without any regard for his own blood, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated, for no crime of his own, but only becauſe the public crier had, by miſtake, inſtead of conſul, proclaimed him emperor in the aſſembly of the people [c]. Sabinus had married Julia, the daughter of the emperor Titus; which marriage proved the ſource of Domitian's jealouſy, if Philoſtratus is to be credited [d], and the chief cauſe of Sabinus's death. In the mean time, the brave Agricola vigorouſly purſued his enterprizes in Britain. In the firſt year of Domitian's reign and the fifth of the Britiſh war, he paſſed the frith himſelf in the firſt ſhip that landed, ſubdued in many ſucceſsful encounters nations till that time unknown, and placed forces in that part of Britain which fronts Ireland, not that he apprehended any danger from the inhabitants of that iſland, but becauſe he already entertained thoughts of reducing it; for as it lies between Britain and Spain, and is capable of an eaſy communication with the coaſt of Gaul, Agricola conſidered, that it would prove of infinite uſe in linking together thoſe powerful members of the empire. A petty king of the country, expelled by domeſtic diſſention, was already received into protection by Agricola, and, under the appearance of friendſhip, reſerved for a proper occaſion *. For theſe conqueſts Domitian aſſumed the title of imperator the fourth time, having taken it three times before [e], for what victories we find no-where recorded.

Puts Flavius Sabinus to death.

Agricola purſues his conqueſts in Britain.

The following year, Domitian entered upon his ninth conſulſhip, having Q. Petilius Rufus for his collegue, whom Onuphrius calls Verginius Rufus, and takes for the celebrated Verginius Rufus, who ſo often refuſed the empire offered him by the ſoldiery [f]. But Phlegon, ſpeaking of a woman, who was, according to him, delivered of ſeveral ſerpents at Trent, tells us, that this happened during the ninth conſulſhip of Domitian, and the ſecond of Petilius Rufus [g]. He is likewiſe ſtiled Petilius Rufus in an antient inſcription in Greek diſcovered at Smyrna in the year 1679, and from thence thence conveyed to Rome [h]. This year Domitian enacted a law, forbidding under ſevere penalties, the caſtrating of children, and regulating the price of ſuch as were eunuchs already; for they were all ſlaves and brought from foreign countries [i]. Philoſtratus tells us, that Domitian was chiefly prompted to enact this law by a ſecret envy to the memory of Titus, who was greatly addicted to eunuchs, and had conſtantly many of them about him. Be that as it will, the law was generally applauded, and continued in force in the time of Juſtin the martyr [k].

[c] Suet. c. 10. [d] Philoſtrat. vit. Apoll. Ty. l. vii. c. 3.
* Tacit. vit. Agric. c. 24. [e] Goltz. p. 58. [f] Onuph. in faſt. p. 211, [g] Phleg. mir. c. 24.

Domitian enacts otheir excellent laws.

Puniſhes ſome veſtals convicted of inceſt.

The ſame year, according to Euſebius [l], he puniſhed four veſtals convicted of inceſt, viz. two ſiſters of the family of the Ocellates, Varonilla, and Cornelia. The three former he allowed to chuſe the manner of their death; but Cornelia, who had been pardoned before, he cauſed to be buried alive, and her accomplices to be whipt to death in the midſt of the comitium. Thoſe who had debauched the other three were only condemned to baniſhment [m].

Agricola's further conqueſts in Britain.

In the mean time, Agricola continued his conqueſts in Britain, or rather Caledonia. On the ſummer which began the ſixth year of his adminiſtration, as it was apprehended, that the nations beyond Bodotria, or the frith of Edinburgh, would all take arms, and that all the ways and paſſages were beſet with the enemy's forces, his firſt ſtep was to coaſt, and examine by means of his fleet, the large communities beyond the frith, probably thoſe of the counties of Fife, Angus, Merns, and Aberdeen, which lie beyond Edinburgh frith. As the fleet conſtantly attended the army, the ſame camp often contained the foot and horſe and the marines, all intermixed, and ſeverally magnifying their own feats, hazards, and adventures. The ſoldiers boaſted their laborious marches over ſteep mountains and thick foreſts; the ſailors their dangers amidſt the tempeſts and waves, all vying together according to the uſual vaunts and oſtentation of ſoldiers. As for the Britons, upon the ſight of the fleet, they were ſeized, as from the captives was learnt, with conſternation and diſmay, finding the receſſes of the ſea now diſcovered, and the laſt refuge of the vanquiſhed cut off. The ſeveral people therefore inhabiting Caledonia had immediate recourſe to arms, and advancing with great parade, [h] Norris. epiſt. conſul. p. 55, 56.

[i] Suet. c. 7
[k] Juſtin. apol. ii. p. 71.
[l] Euſeb. in chron.
[m] Suet c. 8.

rade, ſtill made greater by common report, boldly attacked the Roman forts, and cauſed no ſmall terror and alarm amongſt the ſoldiers; inſomuch, that there were ſome, who, covering real cowardice under the appearance of prudence, adviſed Agricola to return to this ſide of Bodotria, ſeeing it was leſs ſhameful to retire back of their own accord, than to be repulſed and driven by force. As Agricola was informed, that the enemy deſigned to attack him in different bodies, he divided his army into three parts, and thus marched to prevent their furrounding him; for they ſurpaſſed him in numbers and in the knowledge of the country. Hereupon the Caledonians changed their meaſures, and in one body fell upon the ninth legion, as the weakeſt of all. As the attack was in the night, they ſlew the guards, entered the trenches, and were already purſuing the ſlaughter in the camp itſelf, when Agricola, having learnt from his ſcouts what rout the enemy had taken, and following their track, commanded the lighteſt of his foot and cavalry to charge them, while yet engaged, in the rear, and the whole army to give a mighty ſhout. Thus the Caledonians were diſmayed with double diſtreſs, and to the Romans their courage returned; ſo that they fell upon the enemy with great reſolution, and drove them to the gates of the camp, where a bloody encounter enſued, the Romans who were come to the relief of their companions preſſing them in the rear, and thoſe who were in the camp in the front, and both exerting their whole might, the former to ſhew that they brought relief, the latter to appear not to have wanted it. At laſt the Caledonians were routed; and had not the bogs and woods covered their flight, by this victory the war had been ended. This battle, in the opinion of the writer whom we have quoted above [n], was fought in the county of Fife; for Agricola's army was at that time, as is evident from Tacitus, on the north ſide of Bodotria, or the frith of Edinburgh; and the remains of a Roman camp are ſtill to be ſeen in that country, at a place called Lochore. To the ſouth of the camp is a large moraſs, in which are daily dug up roots of different trees; whence the above-mentioned writer concludes it to have been formerly a great wood, and thence ſtrengthens his conjecture, that the ninth

The Caledonians attack the ninth legion, but are repulſed.

[n] Gordon. itin. ſeptent. p. 36.

ninth legion was attacked there; for Tacitus tells us, that if the bogs and woods had not ſerved for ſhelter to the fugitives, that victory would have put an end to the war.

The Roman ſoldiers demand to be led into the heart of Caledonia.

The Roman ſoldiers, elated with theis ſucceſs, and thinking nothing could now prove unſurmountable to their bravery, demanded to be led into the heart of Caledonia, and to the utmoſt limits of Britain, which they hoped to find out by a conſtant courſe of victories. Thus thoſe, who a little before had been ſo wary and ſo wiſe, were now, after victory, full of boaſts and intrepidity. Inſtead of returning to this ſide of Bodotria, they were for penetrating to the utmoſt bounds of Britain. On the other hand, the Caledonians, aſcribing the victory gained by the Romans, not to their ſuperior courage, but to the ſkill and addreſs of their general, loſt nothing of their ſpirit and reſolution, but armed their youth, removed their wives and children into places of ſecurity, and, in general aſſemblies of their ſeveral communities, engaged them in a league, which they ratified by ſolemn ſacrifices. And thus they mutually retired for the winter, with minds on both ſides equally irritated and bent upon war and revenge [o]. The ſame ſummer a cohort of Uſipians, levied by the Romans in Germany, and thence tranſported to Britain, having ſlain the centurion and ſome Roman ſoldiers, placed among them to teach them the diſcipline, embarqued in three veſſels, with a deſign to return to their own country, forcing the pilots to conduct them. But one of theſe forſaking them and making his eſcape, or bringing them back, as we read in Dion Caſſius, to Britain, they ſuſpected, and therefore killed the other two, and abandoned themſelves to the mercy of the winds and waves; which, after having long toſſed them hither and thither, carried them quite round about Britain; inſomuch, that, departing, Britain diſcovered to be an iſland.

according to Dion, from the eaſtern, they returned to the weſtern, coaſt, where the Roman army was then encamped [p]. Tacitus tells us, that having ſailed quite round the iſland, they were driven on the coaſts of Germany, where, their veſſels being loſt, they were ſeized as pirates by the Suevians and Friſians; and being ſold for ſlaves ſome of them by change of maſters were brought over to the Roman ſide of the Rhine, where they became famous by relating ſuch an extraordinary adventure, an by diſcovering, that Britain was an iſland. Their proviſions had ſoon failed them; ſo that they were obliged to make frequent deſcents, and engage with ſeveral of the Britiſh nations, in which conflicts they often proved victorious, and were ſometimes defeated. They were at length reduced to ſuch ſtreights, as to feed upon one another, firſt upon the weakeſt, then upon whomſoever the lot fell. This happened in the eighty-third year of the chriſtian æra, and the ſecond of Domitian's reign. The ſame year, the emperor undertook an expedition againſt the Cattans, whom Tacitus deſcribes as the moſt polite and moſt warlike nation in Germany. Domitian attacked them, without the leaſt provocation, and while they were quite unprepared for war; laid waſte part of their country, took a ſmall number of peaſants priſoners; and then, upon advice that the enemy were drawing their forces together, haſtened back, and returned to Rome with all the pomp and parade of a conqueror [q]. The ſenate, for this pretended victory, decreed him a triumph, in which were led before his chariot great numbers of ſlaves by him bought, and attired like Germans. On occaſion of this mock victory, he promiſed to encreaſe the pay of the ſoldiers; but, not having wherewithal to diſcharge his promiſe, and at the ſame time ſupply his other extravagancies, he ſoon after betook himſelf to all manner of rapine and violence. From this time forward, Domitian conſtantly wore in the ſenate, and at all public aſſemblies, the triumphal robe [r], Domitian attacks the Cattans, and for his mock victory is honoured with a triumph.

[o] Tacit. ibid. c. 24. [p] Dio, l. lxvi. p. 754.

The following year, Domitian being conſul the tenth time, with Appius, or, as others call him, Oppius Sabinus, the brave Agricola purſued his conqueſts in Caledonia with wonderful ſucceſs. In the beginning of the ſummer, he loſt, to his great grief, his ſon, about a year old; a misfortune which he neither bore with an oſtentation of firmneſs and conſtancy, like many other great men, nor with lamentations and tears, worthy only of women. Againſt this affiction war proved his chief remedy. Having therefore ſent forward his navy, in order to ſpread a mighty terror, by committing devaſtations in ſeveral places, he put himſelf at the head of his army lightly equipped; and to it added ſome of the braveſt Britons, whoſe fidelity had been well approved by long experience experience in peace. Thus he arrived at the Grampian hills, upon which the enemy were already encamped. For the Caledonians, nothing daunted by the iſſue of the late battle, and boldly waiting, either to take revenge or to ſuffer bondage, had, by embaſſies and confederacies, drawn together the forces of all their communities, to the number of thirty thouſand; and their youth from every quarter were ſtill continuing to flock in, as were alſo ſuch of their elderly men as were yet vigorous, and had ſignalized themſelves in war, carrying with them their ſeveral enſigns of honour formerly gained in the field. Upon the approach of the Roman army, the Caledonians with great eagerneſs prepared for battle; and Galgacus, who ſurpaſſed all their other leaders both in valour and deſcent, is ſaid to have encouraged them with the following ſpeech, which the learned Lipſius looks upon as one of the fineſt pieces of eloquence ever committed to the Roman language[s].

[q] Idem, l. lxvii. p. 760, Zonar. p. 196.

[r] Idem ibid. Suet. c. 12.

The Caledonians draw together thirty thousand men.

Galgacus's ſpeech to them.

" When I conſider the cauſes of the war and the ne-
" ceſſity to which we are reduced, great is my confi" dence, that this day and this your union will give a " happy beginning to the liberty of the whole iſland:
" Bondage we have never borne; and we are ſo beſet;
" that beyond us there is no further land, or any ſecu-
" rity left us from the ſea, while the Roman fleet is ho" vering upon our coaſts. Thus what brave men covet " for glory, is to cowards become the ſafeſt expedient of " all others, I mean preſent recourſe to battle and arms.
" The other Britons, in their former conflicts with the " Romans, had ſtill a remaining ſource of hope and ſuccour
" in this our nation: for of all the people of Britain, we " are the moſt noble, placed in its remoteſt regions, and " at a great diſtance from thoſe nations that are held in bon" dage by the enemy; ſo that our eyes are yet unpolluted
" with the ſight of lawleſs and uſurped power. To us, " who are the utmoſt inhabitants of the earth and the " laſt who enjoy liberty, this extremity of the globe, this " remoteſt receſs, unknown even to common fame, has " proved the only protection and defence. At preſent,
" the utmoſt boundary of Britain is laid open; beyond " us no more people are found, nor aught but ſeas and " rocks; and already the Romans have advanced into the " heart of our country. Againſt their pride and ambition
" you

[s] Lipſ. in vit. Agr. c. 31. not. 46.

" you will in vain ſeek a remedy or refuge from any " obſequiouſneſs or humble behaviour. Theſe plunderers of " the earth, theſe ravagers of the univerſe, finding coun" tries to fail them, endeavour to rifle the wide ſeas and
" the ocean. If the enemy be wealthy, he inflames their " avarice; if poor, their ambition. Neither the eaſtern
" world, nor the weſtern, vaſt as they are, can ſatiate
" theſe general robbers. Of all men, they alone thirſt
" after acquiſitions, both poor and rich, with equal a" vidity and paſſion. Devaſtations, murders, and univer-" ſal deſtruction, they by a lying name ſtyle empire and " government; and when they have ſpread a general de-" vaſtation, they call it peace. Deareſt to every man,
" by the inſtinct of nature, are his children and kindred.
" Theſe are ſnatched from us to ſupply their armies, and " doomed to bondage in other parts of the earth. Our " wives, daughters, and ſiſters, however they eſcape vio" lence from them as from open enemies, are debauched
" under the appearance of friendſhip. Our goods are " their tribute, our corn their proviſion, our bodies and " limbs their tools for the drudgery of making cuts through " woods and drains in bogs, under continual blows and " outrages. Our ſlaves, whom nature and fortune have " deſtined to ſervitude, are but once ſold, and thence-" forward nouriſhed by their lords. The Britons are daily " paying for their ſervitude, are daily maintaining and " feeding their imperious lords and oppreſſors. Moreover,
" as in a tribe of domeſtic ſlaves, he who comes laſt
" is ſcoffed by his fellows, and ſerves for ſport to them;
" ſo in this antient ſtate of ſlavery, to which the world is " reduced, we, as the lateſt ſlaves, and thence held the moſt " contemptible, are now deſtined to deſtruction. For we " have no fields to manure, no mines to dig, no ports
" to make; works for which they might be tempted to " reſerve us. Beſides, magnanimity and a daring ſpirit,
" in ſubdued nations, is always diſtaſteful to jealous and " arbitrary rulers. And truly our ſituation, ſo ſolitary
" and remote, the more ſecurity it affords to us, the " greater jealouſy it raiſes in them. Since therefore you " are thus bereft of all hopes of mercy, rouſe your " courage in defence both of your lives and glory. The " Brigantes, even under the conduct of a woman, burnt " their colony, ſtormed their entrenchments, and, had " not ſuch auſpicious beginnings degenerated into ſloth,

" might

" might have with eaſe caſt off the yoke and recovered
" their former liberty. Let us, who are yet unſubdued,
" who ſtill preſerve our forces entire, and want not to " acquire, but only to ſecure, liberty, ſhew at once,
" in the very firſt encounter, what kind of men Ca" ledonia has reſerved for her own vindication and de" fence. Do you believe the Romans to be equally brave
" in war, as they are vicious and diſſolute in peace!
" No; not from their valour they have derived their re" nown, but from our quarrels and diviſions, which they " have dextrouſly converted to the glory of their own " army; an army compounded of a motly multitude of " different nations, which by ſucceſs alone are held toge" ther, and conſequently cannot fail to diſſolve upon any " misfortune or diſaſter: unleſs you ſuppoſe the Gauls
" and Germans, and many of the Britons, whom with " ſhame I mention, to be attached to them with any real " affection: they have been all longer their enemies than " their friends; and what reſtrains them at preſent is,
" nothing but awe and terror; which being once re" moved, thoſe who ceaſe to fear will immediately begin " to give proofs of their hatred. Whatever can incite men to " victory, is found on our ſide. The Romans have no
" wives to encourage and urge them: they have here no
" fathers or mothers to upbraid them for flying. In " number they are but few, ignorant of the country,
" and thence ſtruck with dread, whilſt whatever they
" behold around them is wild and ſtrange, even the air " and the ſky, with the woods and the ſea; ſo that the " gods ſeem to have delivered them up incloſed and " fettered into our hands. Let not the vain ſhew and " glare of gold and ſilver terrify us; this is what can " neither wound nor ſave. In the very army of the ene" my we ſhall find many of our own ſide: the Britons
" will own and eſpouſe their own cauſe, and abandon
" one foreign and unnatural to them: the Gauls will " remember their former liberty: what the Uſipians have " lately done, the other Germans will do, and abandon " the Romans. And what elſe have we to fear? their " forts are ungariſoned; their colonies peopled with the " aged and infirm; the municipal cities are weakened
" and rent into parties and factions, while the people are " averſe to obedience, and the magiſtrates rule with in" juſtice. Here you ſee a general, here an army; there
" tribut

" tributes and mines, with a long train of calamities " and curſes, ever attending a ſtate of ſlavery. Whether " all theſe are to be for ever impoſed and borne, or we " forthwith avenge ourſelves for the attempt, this very " day muſt determine. As therefore you advance to battle, " look back upon your anceſtors, who lived in the happy " ſtate of liberty; look forward to your poſterity, who, " unleſs you exert your valour in this very field, muſt " live for ever in a miſerable ſtate of ſervitude [t]." This ſpeech was received with ſongs, according to the cuſtom which then prevailed among the Caledonians, with joyful ſhouts, and a terrible din. Already their bands moved, and the glare of their arms appeared, while the moſt reſolute were running to the front. As the army was forming in battle array, Agricola, tho' he ſaw his men full of alacrity and hardly to be reſtrained, yet choſe to diſcourſe them in the following ſtrain. " It is now the eighth " year, my fellow ſoldiers, ſince, through the auſpicious " fortune of the Roman empire and by your own valour, " you have been purſuing the conqueſt of Britain. In " ſo many marches, in ſo many battles, you have had " conſtant occaſion to exert your bravery againſt the " enemy, or your patience againſt the obſtacles of nature. " During all theſe ſtruggles, we have found no cauſe of " mutual regret, I to have conducted ſuch ſoldiers, or you " to have followed ſuch a captain. We have both paſſed " the limits which we found, I thoſe known to antient " governors, you thoſe of former armies. The utmoſt " bound of Britain is found, not by fame only and report; " but we poſſeſs it with our arms and camps. Britain is " entirely diſcovered, and entirely ſubdued. While we " were marching, and fatigued with paſſing mountains, " rivers, and bogs, I have often heard every man remarkably brave cry out, When ſhall we ſee the enemy? " when be led to battle? Already they are come, " rouſed from their faſtneſſes and lurking-holes. Here " you ſee the end of all your wiſhes; here is room for " all your valour, and all things promiſing and propitious, " if you conquer; but equally diſaſtrous, ſhould you be " overcome. To have thus marched over a tract of " country ſo immenſe, to have paſſed through thick and " gloomy foreſts, to have croſſed arms of the ſea, is mat- " ter

Agricola's ſpeech to his men.

[t] Tacit. ibid. c. 30—32.

" ter of great glory and applauſe, while we advance a-" gainſt the enemy; but if we fly from them, what" ever is now moſt to our advantage, will prove moſt to " our diſadvantage and ruin. We are not ſo well ſkilled
" in the country as the enemy; nor have we the like
" ſtore of proviſions; but we have hands and weapons,
" and in theſe all things. For myſelf, I have been long
" ſince convinced, that neither for the ſoldiers, nor for " the general, is there any ſafety in turning their backs
" upon the foe. Hence an honourable death is far prefer" able to a life with reproach; and ſecurity is inſeparable
" from renown. Neither would it be a fate void of " glory to fall in this utmoſt verge of the world and na" ture. Were people unknown to you now arrayed a-" gainſt you, were you to engage men never before tried,
" I would animate you by the examples of other armies.
" At preſent only recollect and enumerate your own ex" ploits, only aſk and conſult your own eyes. Theſe are " the ſame men, who, but the laſt year, truſting to the " darkneſs of the night, attacked by ſtealth a ſingle le" gion, and were by the terror of your ſhouting utterly " overthrown. Theſe, of all the Britons, are the moſt " timorous and moſt prone to flight; and therefore have " thus ſurvived all the reſt. As in foreſts and woods,
" beaſts of the greateſt ſtrength are driven thence by ſupe-
" rior force, and the timorous and ſpiritleſs are ſcared
" even at the cry of the purſuers; ſo all the braveſt Britons
" are long ſince fallen by the ſword, and only the moſt
" fearful and daſtardly remain, whom at length you have " found, not becauſe they intended to ſtay and make head
" againſt you, but becauſe they are overtaken and ſur-" priſed. They ſtand in the field, ſtruck with dread and " bereft of all ſpirit; whence you may without much " danger gain over them a moſt glorious and memorable " victory. Here conclude your warfare; here complete " your expeditions and efforts, and put an end to a " ſtruggle of fifty years, with one great and important
" day; ſo that the army may not be charged either " with protracting the war, or with any cauſe for re" viving it [u]." Agricola had ſcarce ended his ſpeech, when the ſoldiers, tranſported with joy, flew to their arms. Agricola, ſeeing them ſufficiently animated and inflamed, drew

He engages the Caledonians under thecommand of Galgacus.

[u] Idem ibid. c. 33, 34.

drew them up in battle array, placing the auxiliary foot, to the number of eight thousand men, in the centre, and three thousand auxiliary horse in the wings. The legions he would not suffer to advance, but commanded them to stand in battle-array close to the entrenchments; for the victory, he thought, would be the more glorious, were it, by sparing them, gained without spilling any Roman blood; and, on the other hand, they were still a sure succour, should the rest be repulsed. The Caledonians were ranged upon the rising grounds in such manner, that the first band stood upon the plain, and the rest rose successively on the brows of the hills, one rank close above the other, as if they had been linked together. The enemy's chariots of war and cavalry filled the interjacent field. Then Agricola fearing, as the enemy far surpassed him in number, lest he should be attacked at once in the front and on each flank, opened and extended his front. As thence his ranks proved more weak, many advised him to bring on the legions; but he, in all difficulties more prone to hope than to fear, without hearkening to their advice, dismissed his horse, and advanced on foot before the ensigns. The onset was begun at a distance, wherein the Britons displayed great courage and equal skill, eluding, with their huge swords and small bucklers, the missive weapons of the Romans, whilst of their own they poured a torrent upon them, till Agricola encouraged three Batavian cohorts and two of the Tungrians, to close with the enemy, and bring them to an engagement hand to hand, as what to the veteran soldiers by a long practice was become familiar, but proved to the enemy very uneasy and embarrassing, as they were armed with little targets and with swords of enormous size; for the swords of the Britons, as they were blunt at the end, were quite unfit for a close encounter. Hence the Batavians doubled their blows, wounded the enemy with the iron bosses of their bucklers, mangled their faces, and beating down all who withstood them in the plain, were already carrying the attack up to the hills; insomuch, that the other cohorts, encouraged by their example, fell upon the enemy with equal ardour, and made a dreadful havock of all who opposed them; nay, such was the hurry of the conquerors, that they left many of the enemy behind them but half dead, and others not so much as wounded. In the mean time, their cavalry betook themselves to flight, and their chariots of war, mixing with the battalions of foot, and entangled with the unevenneſs of the place, occaſioned in the plain a general diſorder and confuſion. The engagement had not the leaſt appearance of a combat of cavalry; for ſtanding ſo obſtinately foot to foot, they preſſed to overthrow each other by the weight and bodies of their horſes. Beſides, the chariots, abandoned and ſtraggling, and likewiſe the horſes deſtitute of managers, and thence wild and affrighted, were running to and fro juſt as the next fright drove them; inſomuch, that all of their own ſide who met them, or croſſed their way, were beaten down by them. In the mean time, the Britons, who were lodged upon the ridges of the hills, and had hitherto no ſhare in the encounter, looking with ſcorn upon the ſmall number of the Roman forces, began to deſcend ſlowly, and to ſurround them in the rear, while they were purſuing their victory. But Agricola, who had apprehended this very deſign, detached againſt them four ſquadrons of horſe, which he had reſerved near him for the ſudden exigencies of the field. Theſe falling upon the enemy, with great vigour and intrepidity, obliged them to retire, and put them in great diſorder: then, turning againſt the Caledonians their own devices, they wheeled about, and attacked the enemy in the rear. Hereupon the Caledonians began to retire in great confuſion, and nothing was to be ſeen all over the open fields but purſuits, wounds, and captivity, and the preſent captives always ſlaughtered when others occurred to be taken. Some of the enemy fled in large troops, with all their arms, before a ſmaller number who purſued them; others quite unarmed, ruſhing into danger, offered themſelves through deſpair to inſtant death. On all ſides lay ſcattered arms, and carcaſes, and mangled limbs; and the ground was dyed with blood. Some bands of the vanquiſhed ſtill fought with incredible reſolution and bravery; and when they drew near the wood, they rallied and ſurrounded the foremoſt purſuers, who, without knowing the country, had ventured too far: whence the conquerors muſt have ſuffered ſome notable diſaſter, had not Agricola, who was conſtantly flying from one quarter to another, ordered the braveſt cohorts lightly equipped to inveſt the enemy on all ſides, and ſome of the cavalry to diſmount and enter the narrow paſſes, while the reſt of the horſe advanced into the more open and paſſable parts of the wood. The Caledonians, perceiving the Romans to continue the purſuit, with with regular and cloſe ranks, betook themſelves to flight, not in united bodies, as before, but quite ſcattered, no man regarding or awaiting another, but all in the utmoſt confuſion making towards the deſerts and in the moſt remote places. The Romans followed them cloſe; and the purſuit was not ended, but with night and a ſatiety of ſlaughter. Of the enemy, ten thouſand were ſlain; of the Roman army, three hundred and forty, among whom was Aulus Atticus, commander of a cohort, who, by his own youthful heat and alſo by a fiery horſe, was hurried into the midſt of the enemy [w] (E).

The Caledonians are utterly routed.

And purſued by the Romans with great ſlaughter.

THE

[w] Idem, c. 35——38.

(E) We will not take upon us to aſcertain the preciſe place of this memorable action, our antiquaries being greatly divided in their opinions about it. However, we cannot help obſerving, that the chief argument, which the author of the Itinerarium Septentrionale makes uſe of to confute the opinions of other antiquaries, equally concludes againſt his own. For he approves of no place, but where ſome veſtiges are ſtill to be ſeen of a Roman camp capable of containing the army which Agricola had with him at this battle. Hence he rejects the opinions of thoſe who pretend, that the battle was fought in the Mearns, or at the Blair of Athol, becauſe no remains of a Roman camp are to be ſeen in either of theſe places. Againſt ſuch as maintain Ardoch in Strathallan and Innerpeffery to be the ſpot on which the fate of Caledonia was determined, he alledges, that the camps, which are to be ſeen there, were not capable of containing the army which Agricola led out againſt the Caledonians. Having thus confuted the opinions of other antiquaries, he offers his own, which is, that the real place, where the battle was fought, is in Strathern, half a mile ſouth of the kirk of Comerie, there being ſtill to be ſeen in that place a Roman encampment, divided into two partitions or ſquares which are joined together, with a vaſt rampart of ſtone and earth. Our learned antiquary tells us, that having calculated the number of men contained in the ſouthmoſt camp, according to the allowance of ground made by Polybius for every foot ſoldier, he was moſt agreeably ſurpriſed to find it contained the preciſe number of foot which Tacitus ſays Agricola had along with him at the battle of Mons Grampius, viz. eight thouſand auxiliaries; and that the other ſquare, where he ſuppoſes the horſe lay, contained exactly three thouſand horſemen. For Tacitus, ſays he, plainly informs us of the number of Agricola's

The following night proved a night of great joy to the conquerors, both from victory and ſpoil. But the Caledonians, both men and women, crying and howling, wandered in deſpair: ſome dragged away their wounded; others were heard calling their loſt friends; all abandoned their army at that battle; for, ſpeaking of his diſpoſing of the troops, he ſays thus; Inſtinctos ruenteſque ita diſpoſuit, ut peditum auxilia, quæ octo millia erant, mediam aciem firmarent, equitum tria millia cornibus affunderentur: that is, Thus encouraged and ruſhing forward, Agricola formed them ſo, that the body of auxiliary foot, who were eight thouſand men, compoſed the centre, and three thouſand horſe were placed in the wings. But were theſe eight thouſand auxiliary foot, and three thouſand horſe all the troops, Agricola had with him at this battle? Does not Tacitus to the words we have juſt quoted ſubjoin, Legiones pro vallo ſtetere, ingens victoriæ decus citra Romanum ſanguinem bellanti, & auxilium, ſi pellerentur: that is, The legions ſtood juſt without the intrenchments, that the victory might be the more glorious, were it gained without Roman blood; and that the legions might be ready to ſuccour the auxiliaries, if repulſed. Hence it is evident, that Agricola, beſides the eight thouſand auxiliary foot and three thouſand horſe, had ſome legions with him, for which there was no room, according to our antiquary's own calculation, in the above-mentioned camp. If therefore his chief argument has any force, it confutes, without leaving room to any reply, his own opinion, as muſt evidently appear to every reader. Beſides, to us it ſeems quite abſurd to ſuppoſe, as that writer does, that ſome veſtiges muſt ſtill remain of all the Roman camps in this iſland, and indeed elſewhere, notwithſtanding the innumerable changes and alterations that muſt have happened, unknown to us, in the courſe of ſo many ages. How many camps were made by the Romans in Germany, Gaul, and Italy, of which no traces remain in our days! Great cities have been overturned and utterly deſtroyed, by the devourer of all things, time; inſomuch, that antiquaries are at a loſs about the places where they ſtood. But, admitting our authors ſuppoſition, it is evident from his own arguments, that the battle was not fought in the place for which he contends, the camp there being capable of containing only eight thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe; beſides which, Agricola had with him ſeveral legions, as is plain from the words of Tacitus (18).

(18) Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 35.

their houſes, and ſome in rage, even ſet fire to them: not knowing where to ſhelter themſelves, they fled from one lurking-hole to another; then met to conſult, and from their counſels gathered ſome hope; ſometimes, at the ſight of their deareſt pledges of nature, they were moved to pity, ſometimes to reſolution and fury: nay, ſome, out of compaſſion and tenderneſs, murdered their children and wives. The next day diſplayed more fully the greatneſs of the victory; on all ſides a profound ſilence, ſolitary hills, a thick ſmoke riſing from the houſes on fire, and not a living ſoul to be found by the ſcouts. When from theſe, who had been diſpatched out into all quarters, it was learnt, that no certain traces could be diſcovered whither the enemy had fled, and that they had no-where rallied in bodies, Agricola conſidering that the ſummer was already far ſpent, and conſequently that he could not purſue the operations of the war, led his army into the country of the Horeſtians, that is, as is commonly ſuppoſed, into Angus. Having there received hoſtages, he ordered the admiral of the fleet to ſail round Britain, furniſhing him with proper forces for that expedition, which he happily accompliſhed; and thence proved Britain to be, as it was thought before, an iſland. On this occaſion were diſcovered and ſubdued the iſles of Orkney, till then unknown. Thule, now called Iſeland, or, as others will have it, Shetland, was likewiſe found, hitherto hid, to uſe the expreſſion of Tacitus, by winter, under eternal ſnow. In the mean time Agricola himſelf led on the foot and horſe with a ſlow pace, that the minds of theſe new conquered nations might be awed and diſmayed by prolonging his march through them. He then put his army into winter quarters. Soon after the fleet having ſailed round the iſland, returned with great fame to the port whence it had departed. That port is called by Tacitus, Trutulenſis, which is utterly unknown. Some; inſtead of Trutulenſis, read Rhutupenſis, ſuppoſed to be Sandwich haven. But from Tacitus it is manifeſt, that the fleet at that time attended Agricola in Caledonia or Scotland; and conſequently muſt have ſailed from ſome part of that kingdom. Thus, after many ſtruggles and conteſts, Britain was at length entirely reduced; but the Romans did not long continue maſters, at leaſt of Caledonia, what Agricola won being ſoon after loſt by Domitian. The poet Juvenal ſpeaks of a Britiſh king, by name Arviragus, who was at war with the Romans in Domitian's reign [x]; and all the Scotch hiſtorians

He orders his fleet to ſail round the iſland.

He puts his troops into winter quarters.

Britain entirely reduced.

[x] Juven. ſatir. iv. v. 38.

tell us, that, upon the departure of Agricola, the Caledonians poſſeſſed themſelves of the caſtles and forts raiſed by him in their country. As for the Roman hiſtorians, they ſcarce take any notice of the Britiſh affairs till the reign of the emperor Hadrian, who came over into Britain, where he built a wall eighty miles in length, in order to ſeparate the Romans from the barbarians, as Spartianus ſtyles themy.

AGRICOLA immediately acquainted Domitian by letters with the ſucceſs that had attended his arms in Britain, and the ſituation of affairs there. The account he conveyed to him was plain and modeſt, without all oſtentation, or any pomp of words. The emperor received it with joy in his countenance, but with anguiſh in his heart, being well appriſed, that his late mock triumph over the Germans was held in public deriſion; whereas now a true and mighty victory, gained by the ſlaughter of ſo many thouſands of the enemy, was every-where ſounded by the voice of fame, and received with univerſal applauſe. He could not brook that the name of a private man ſhould be exalted above that of the prince: to the emperor alone, he thought, properly appertained the glory and renown of being a great general. Tortured with theſe anxious thoughts, and indulging his humour of being ſhut up in ſecret, a certain indication that he was meditating ſome bloody deſign, he at laſt judged it the beſt courſe upon this occaſion, to ſmother his rancour, till the fame of theſe conqueſts, and the affection of the army to Agricola, were ſomewhat abated. To him, therefore, he cauſed to be decreed by the ſenate the triumphal ornaments, a ſtatue crowned with laurel, and whatever elſe is beſtowed inſtead of a real triumph, heightening theſe honours with many expreſſions full of eſteem and reſpect. But in the mean time, he reſolved to recal him; and that this might not be aſcribed to jealouſy or envy, he cauſed a report to be ſpread abroad, that to Agricola was deſtined the province of Syria, a government then vacant by the death of Atilius Rufus, a man of conſular dignity, ſince the fame was reſerved only for men of the firſt rank. There were many who believed, that an imperial freed-man, one much truſted with the ſecret deſigns Domitian is ſtung with envy at the news of his conqueſts.

Yet cauſes triumphal honours to be decreed to him.

He recalls him.

y Spart. in vit. Hadriani.

ſigns of his maſter, was by him diſpatched to carry the inſtrument appointing Agricola governor of Syria, with orders to deliver it to him, were he ſtill in Britain, for he had already named him a ſucceſſor; that the freed-man met Agricola croſſing the chanel, and, without ſo much as ſpeaking to him, returned directly to Domitian. Whether this account be true, or only a fiction, framed in conformity to the character and genius of Domitian, is, according to Tacitus, uncertain. Agricola had already ſurrendered to his ſucceſſor, probably Salluſtius Secundus, the province, now ſettled in perfect peace and tranquillity. To avoid all popular diſtinction and concourſe of people to meet him, he entered Rome by night, and by night went, as he was directed, to the palace, where he was received by the emperor with a ſhort embrace, without a word ſaid, and then paſſed undiſtinguiſhed amongſt the crowd of courtiers. From this time forward, to leſſen the reputation he had acquired of a military man and a gallant commander, a name very diſtaſteful to thoſe who live themſelves in idleneſs, he reſigned himſelf entirely to inactivity and repoſe. In his dreſs he was modeſt; in his converſation affable and free, and never found accompanied by more than one, or at moſt two, of his friends: inſomuch, that many, eſpecially ſuch as judge of great men from their retinue and parade, when they beheld and obſerved Agricola, could not conceive, whence proceeded his mighty fame; and indeed, few there were, who could account for the motives of his conduct. Notwithſtanding the retired life he led, he was frequently accuſed in his abſence before Domitian, and as often in his abſence acquitted. What threatened his life was no crime of his, nor complaint of any particular for injuries received, nor any thing elſe, ſave the glorious character of the man, and the perverſe diſpoſition of the emperor, hating all excellence and every virtue. With theſe cauſes concurred the worſt ſort of enemies, ſuch as extolled him in order to deſtroy him. Beſides, ſuch times afterwards enſued, as would not ſuffer the name of Agricola to remain unmentioned; ſo that he was in conſtant danger of being ſacrificed to the jealouſy of the emperor, but nevertheleſs lived nine years longer [z]; whence we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of him again in the courſe of this reign.

Agricola leads a retired life.

THE

[z] Tacit. ibid. c. 38—42.

THE ſame year, Cariomerus, king of the Cheruſcans, a German nation, being driven out by the Cattans, becauſe he had ſubmitted to the Romans, and delivered hoſtages to them, had recourſe to Domitian for aſſiſtance. But the emperor, not caring to engage in a war with that fierce nation, contented himſelf with conveying to his friend and ally a ſum of money, inſtead of troops, which, he ſaid, he could not at that juncture well ſpare [a]. About the ſame time, one Ganda, a German virgin and propheteſs, and revered in Germany as a deity, arrived at Rome; and being there well received by Domitian, after ſome private conferences with him, returned to her own country [b].

THE year following, Domitian was conſul the eleventh time, and had for his collegue one Fulvius, whom Onuphrius takes to be T. Aurelius Fulvius, or Fulvus, the grandfather of Titus Antoninus. He was a native of Niſme, twice conſul and governor of Rome. This year Domitian took the title of emperor four times, but for what victories we find no-where recorded. We read indeed in Dion Caſſius, that the Suevians and Lygians, whom that writer places in Mœſia, ſolicited Domitian for ſuccours, who ſent them only an hundred horſemen; which ſo provoked the Suevians, that joining the Iazygians, a people of Sarmatia, they advanced with a deſign to paſs the Danube, and lay waſte the Roman territories [c]. Dion Caſſius does not acquaint us with the iſſue of this bold undertaking; but Tacitus, having told us in one place, that the Sarmatians and Suevians entered into an alliance againſt Rome [d], adds in another [e], that, ſoon after the return of Agricola out of Britain, the Romans loſt entire armies in Mœſia, in Dacia, in Germany, and in Pannonia, all by the bad conduct of their generals, either altogether cowardly or fool-hardy. From ſeveral medals it appears, that Domitian returned this year to Rome, from ſome expedition, of which not the leaſt mention is made by the hiſtorians: perhaps he marched in perſon againſt the Suevians and Iazygians; at leaſt ſeveral medals were ſtamped this year in memory of a ſignal nal victory, real or pretended, gained over the Germans. The emperor, after his return to Rome, abandoning himſelf to all manner of cruelty, cauſed the nativity to be caſt of all the illuſtrious perſons in the city, and put ſuch of them to death, as were ſaid by the aſtrologers to be deſtined to the empire. Metius Pompoſianus, againſt whom ſome ill-deſigning perſons had on the ſame account endeavoured in vain to ſtir up the emperor Veſpaſian, was on this occaſion baniſhed Italy, and confined to the iſland of Corſica, where he was ſoon after by Domitian's order put to death. Nerva, who ſucceeded him in the empire, would have ſuffered the ſame doom, had not an aſtrologer aſſured the emperor, that he had no reaſon to be afraid of Nerva, who could not live many days. He encouraged informers more than any other prince had done, tho' in the beginning of his reign he had treated them with great ſeverity, and ſolemnly declared, that he would never give ear to their informations. Amongſt theſe, the moſt famous were Metius Carus, Catullus Meſſalinus, and Bebius Maſſa, three robbers, as Pliny calls them [g], who enriched themſelves and the emperor, with ſpoils of many thouſand illuſtrious and innocent perſons. Carus is often mentioned by the poet Juvenal and Martial, and by Pliny, againſt whom he preſented a memorial to Domitian [h]. Catullus Meſſalinus was blind, but nevertheleſs one of the moſt miſchievous informers who frequented the court: he died about the latter end of Domitian's reign; whence it is plain, that Catanæus was miſtaken in ſuppoſing him to be the ſame perſon with Catullus, governor of Cyrene, who died according to Joſephus, in the reign of Veſpaſian [i]. Authors obſerve, that this year multitudes of ſenators and knights were accuſed of treaſon, and either ſentenced to death by the ſenate, or ordered by Domitian to diſpatch themſelves. Of theſe the moſt illuſtrious were, Ælius Lama, whom he cauſed to be publicly executed only for a jeſt; for the emperor, who, as we have obſerved above, had taken away his wife, commending one day his voice, Lamia anſwered, Yet, alas! I muſt be ſilent.

The Suevians invade the Roman territories.

[a] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 760. [b] Idem, p. 761. [c] Idem, ibid. [d] Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 2. [e] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 41.

Domitian puts many perſons of diſtinction to death.

[f] Vide Birag. numiſm. p. 134 & Noris. ep. conſul. p. 175.
[g] Plin. panegyr.
[h] Idem, l. iii. ep. 4.
[i] Vide Catan. in not. ad Plin. jun. & Joſeph. de bell Jud. l. vii. c. 39.

ſilent. Civicus Cerealis was murdered during his proconſulſhip of Aſia, under colour, that he deſigned to raiſe diſturbances in the ſtate, but in reality becauſe he had accepted the government of Aſia, which had fallen to him by lot. Hence Agricola, when to his lot the pro-conſulſhip of Aſia or Africa was to fall, declined the employment, and preſented a petition to the emperor, begging to be excuſed. Domitian not only granted him his requeſt, but ſuffered himſelf to be on that account preſented with formal thanks. Neither to Agricola did he give the ſalary which was wont to be paid to pro-conſuls, and which he himſelf had continued to ſome. Salvius Cocceianus was put to death for celebrating the birth-day of the emperor Otho, who was his uncle by the father's ſide; Salluſtius Lucullus, who had ſucceeded Agricola in the government of Britain, for ſuffering a new kind of lances to be called after his own name; Junius Ruſticus for publiſhing a writing in commendation of the celebrated Thraſea and of Helvidius Priſcus; Maternus, a renowned philoſopher, for having declaimed in public againſt tyranny and tyrants. All the profeſſors of philoſophy and every laudable ſcience, ſays Tacitus, were expelled and driven into exile: and that nothing which was worthy and honeſt might anywhere be ſeen, not only againſt perſons, but againſt books commending virtue or patriotiſm, a new kind of cruelty was exerted; for in the forum the works of men famous for their genius and parts were publicly burnt [k]. Every thing gave the jealous tyrant fear and offence. Was a man nobly born and popular? he withdrew the affections of the people, rivalled the prince, and threatened a civil war. Was he afraid of popularity and lived retired? he gained fame by ſhunning it, was ſtill an eye-ſore, and his beſt fate was to leave his country. Was he virtuous and his life and morals without blame? he was another Brutus, and by the purity of his manners upbraided the vicious behaviour of the emperor. If a man ſeemed dull and unactive, he only put on the diſguiſe of ſtupidity and ſloth, till he found room for ſome bloody purpoſe. If he had a different character, and was a lively and active man, then it was plain he did not ſo much as feign a deſire of private life and receſs, but avowed a buſtling republican ſpirit.

The deplorable condition of Rome.

[k] Suet. c. 20. Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 2.

he was rich, he was too wealthy for a ſubject; and great wealth in private hands boded ill to princes: if he was poor, he was thence the more enterpriſing and deſperate. In ſhort, no man could poſſeſs any advantage or quality that rendered him acceptable to his fellow-citizens, and a bleſſing to his country, to his friends, or to himſelf, but ſuch quality and advantage was ſure to awaken the jealouſy and vengeance of the tyrant, and procure his doom. Hence Tacitus, ſpeaking of theſe unhappy times; Mighty, ſays he, was the teſtimony which we gave of our patience; for, as our forefathers had beheld the ultimate perfection of liberty, ſo did we of bondage; ſince, through dread of informers, we were bereft of the common intercourſe of ſpeech. Nay, with our utterance we had likewiſe loſt our memory, had it been equally in our power to forget as to be ſilent [l]. Againſt the defence of innocence accuſed, againſt the moſt evident truth and juſtice, the ears of the emperor were ever ſhut; but calumny whiſpered by any informer had equal weight with real crimes proved by authentic witneſſes. Falſhood and flattery, ſays Dion Caſſius, envy and rapaciouſneſs, paſſed for evidence; juſtice was converted into cruelty, and judgment into rage; the tribunals, erected for juſtice and preſervation of life and property, were turned into ſhambles; and what had the names of pains and penalties was in truth robbery and aſſaſſination. The perſons of the accuſers were conſidered as ſacred and inviolable; the more they were deteſted by the public, the more they were protected by the emperor; and, in proportion as they deſerved death and ignominy, had countenance and preferment. Their vileſt forgeries, convicted and owned againſt the lives and fortunes of the greateſt men, drew down no puniſhment upon them [m]. In the midſt of his cruelties, he abandoned himſelf to all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery, and was on that ſcore no leſs infamous, than the moſt vicious of his predeceſſors. His avarice was equal to his lewdneſs and cruelty; not that he had any natural biaſs to that vice, ſays Suetonius; but having exhauſted his treaſury by the many buildings he raiſed, by the magnificent ſports and ſhews which he exhibited, by encreaſing the pay of the ſoldiers, and by other wild and extravagant expences, he betook himſelf to all ſorts Encourages informers.

Abandons himſelf to all manner of lewdneſs.

[l] Tacit. ibid. [m] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 759.

His avarice and extortions.

sorts of rapine and extortion, seizing, upon the least information, the estates of the most wealthy citizens: the least action or word against the majesty of the prince, was made use of as a pretence for stripping them of whatever they possessed. He confiscated inheritances, appropriating to himself all the effects of persons whom he never knew, if he could find but one witness to depose, that he had ever heard the deceased say, that Cæsar was his heir. With these and such-like artificial contrivances, he reduced to beggary the most opulent persons, not only in Rome and Italy, but in all the provinces of the Roman empire. His officers and procurators exacted the tributes and taxes with the greatest rigor and severity imaginable; but above all, he oppressed the Jews in a most cruel manner, not excepting even such of them as had renounced their religion; and with the like severity treated those, says Suetonius, meaning, no doubt, the Christians, who lived in Rome after the manner of the Jews, and seemed to profess the same superstition [n]. The heavy tributes, and the rigor used by the officers in exacting them, occasioned great disorders and frequent revolts in the distant provinces. In Africa, the Nasamonians, whom most geographers place in the province of Cyrenaica, no longer able to bear the heavy imposts with which they were loaded, and the insults and extortions of the collectors, rose up in arms this year, defeated Flaccus governor of Numidia, stormed his camp, and put great numbers of his men to the sword. But Flaccus was soon revenged on them; for being informed, that, elated with their success, they had abandoned themselves to jollity and carousing, he rallied his men, and coming unexpectedly upon them, while they were intoxicated with the wine they had found in the Roman camp, he cut them all off to a man.

The Nasamonians revolt.

But are utterly cut off.

Zonaras seems to insinuate, that he extirpated the whole nation, without any regard to sex or age [o]; and Aristides tells us, that by an order from one of the emperors, the whole race of the Nasamonians was cut off [p]. However, that some of that race out-lived this dreadful slaughter, is evident from Ptolemy the geographer, who places them, as a people still in being, to the south of Libya Marmarica [q]. Domitian, puffed up with the victory gained by his lieutenant

[n] Suet. c. 12. [o] Zonar. p. 197. [p] Arist. P 494. [q] Ptol. l. iv. c. 5.

nant over the Naſamonians, bragged in the ſenate, that he had cut off the whole nation; for to himſelf he aſcribed, as Dion Caſſius obſerves [r], all the advantages gained by his officers, tho' he bore not the leaſt ſhare in them, and to others every miſcarriage, however occaſioned by a ſtrict obſervance of his orders. As he hated and ſuſpected every man of parts, eſpecially ſuch as had acquired any military renown, the commanders of the armies, to recommend themſelves to his favour, carefully avoided ſignalizing themſelves by any military exploits, chuſing rather to bear the inſults of the enemy, than to expoſe themſelves to the dangers ariſing from the jealouſy of the prince [s]. The ſame year he firſt aſſumed, according to Euſebius, the title of Lord and that of God, not being aſhamed, in dictating an ordinance to one of his ſecretaries, to begin it thus; Our Lord and our God orders and commands, &c. About the ſame time he enacted a law, obliging all to pay him divine worſhip; and from that time forward no man dared to call him by any other name but that of Lord and of God [t]; nay, ſome writers [u] tell us, that by an expreſs law, all other titles, either in ſpeaking or writing to him, were to be ſuppreſſed. Of this impious flattery we have many inſtances in the poets Juvenal and Martial. Pliny complains, that all the ſtreets leading to the capitol were conſtantly crouded with droves of victims to be ſacrificed before his ſtatues [w]. He pretended to be, and would be called, the ſon of Minerva, for which goddeſs he profeſſed a particular veneration. He would not ſuffer any ſtatues to be erected to him in the capitol, but ſuch as were of pure gold or ſilver, and of a fixt weight. He filled the city with triumphal gates and arches, and by an immenſe number of monuments, raiſed at a vaſt charge, endeavoured to tranſmit to poſterity the memories of his pretended victories [x]. He was the firſt who was ever known to have been ſeventeen times conſul. Not ſatisfied to have aſſumed the title of Germanicus, on account of his pretended victory over the Cattans, he cauſed the month of September to be diſtinguiſhed with the ſame name, and the month of October with that of Domitian; becauſe in the Domitian aſſumes the title of Lord, and that of God.

The ſhameful flattery of the Romans.

[r] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 709.
[s] Plin. l. viii. epiſt. 14.
[t] Suet. c. 13.
[u] Aur. Vict. & Oroſ. l. vii. c. 10.
[w] Plin. Paneg p. 99.
[x] Suet. c. 13.

the latter he was born, and in the former declared emperor. In ſhort, before the end of the fourth year of his reign, he ſurpaſſed, if Dion Caſſius is to be credited, all his predeceſſors, Nero not excepted, in pride, cruelty, rapaciouſneſs, and all other vices, which complete the character of an accompliſhed tyrant y.

The inſtitution of the Capitoline ſports.

THE following year, Domitian entered upon his twelfth conſulſhip, having Servius Cornelius Dolabella for his colegue. This year were inſtituted the Capitoline ſports, ſo much ſpoken of by the writers of thoſe days, according to whom they were to be exhibited once in five, but, according to our way of reckoning, once in four years; for they were celebrated, as the olympic ſports, at the end of four years complete, and in the beginning of the fifth. As they were exhibited in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus, the emperor preſided at them in perſon, attended by the prieſt of Jupiter, and the college of the Flavian prieſts z. To this year Euſebius fixes the war with the Dacians, the moſt bloody and dangerous which the Romans ſuſtained, during the reign of Domitian. The Dacians were looked upon by the Romans as the moſt warlike nation they were then acquainted with. They were not only men for the moſt part of great ſtrength, but of equal courage, deſpiſing death, which they conſidered as the end of a tranſitory, and the beginning of a happy and laſting, life; whence with great intrepidity they braved the greateſt dangers. This doctrine they had learnt of an antient philoſopher, by name Zamolxis, whom ſome ſuppoſe to have been the diſciple of Pythagoras; others to have flouriſhed long before his time a.

Some account of the Dacians.

Dion Caſſius obſerves, that theſe people were by ſome Greek writers called Getæ; but by the Romans Daci, which was their proper appellation; for the Getæ dwelt beyond mount Hæmus, near the mouth of the Danube and the Euxine ſea; but the Dacians more to the weſt and nearer Germany, that is, according to the opinion of moſt modern geographers, in the countries now known by the names of Moldavia, Valachia, and Tranſilvania. But the emperor Aurelian, having afterwards placed them on this ſide of the Danube, (we ſpeak with reſpect to Rome) they gave their name to that y Dio, ibid. p. 710. z Suet. c. 4. a Strabo l. vii. p. 297. Suid. Phot. c. 166.

that part of Illyricum which they poſſeſſed; and this is the province, which, in the fourth and fifth centuries, was known by the name of Dacia. As for the antient Dacia, it was then held by the Goths, whom Jornandes throughout his hiſtory confounds with the Dacians [b]. At this time one Duras ruled over the Dacians; but after having for ſome time held the ſovereignty, by an inſtance of moderation hardly to be matched in hiſtory, reſigned it of his own accord to one Decebalus, whom he judged better qualified for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt than himſelf; for Decebalus was a man of great proweſs and experience in war, and equally ſkilled in affairs of ſtate [c]. He is by Jornandes [d] and Oroſius [e] called Dorpanæus and Diurpanæus; for a prince of that name reigned, according to them, in Dacia, when the defeat of Fuſcus happened, of which we ſhall ſpeak anon; and, on the other hand, we are told by Dion Caſſius, that Fuſcus was overthrown in battle by Decebalus. As to the iſſue of the war which he maintained againſt Rome, Tacitus ſpeaks thus, without deſcending to any particulars: In the commonwealth there enſued ſuch times, as would not permit the name of Agricola, lately returned from Britain, to remain unmentioned; ſo many were the armies we had loſt in Mœſia, Dacia, Germany, and Pannonia, all by the miſconduct of our generals. The queſtion and conteſt was not now about maintaining the limits of the empire, and guarding the rivers which ſerved for its boundaries, but about defending the ſtanding encampments of the legions, and preſerving our own territories. Thus, when public calamities were following one another, and each year was become ſignal for ſlaughters and misfortunes, Agricola was, by the common voice of the populace, required for the command of our armies; for all men were comparing his vigor, his reſolution, and experience in war, with the ſloth and timidity of the others. The beſt of Domitian's freed-men adviſed and preſſed him to this choice out of pure affection and duty, as did the worſt, out of virulence and envy, hoping by that means to compaſs the deſtruction

They make war upon the Romans.

[b] Vide Lloyd. dict. hiſtoric. p. 405. Baul. p. 237. Jornand. Got. c. 12, 13, &c. [c] Dio, ibid. p. 709—761. [d] Jornand. c. 13. [e] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 20.

Domitian jealous of Agricola.

truction of Agricola. But that jealous and diſtruſtful prince dreaded nothing ſo much, as to ſee a man of courage and reputation at the head of an army [f]. Thus much Tacitus in general of the war with the Dacians, in which he Romans, according to that hiſtorian, ſuſtained great loſſes, and had many armies ſlaughtered, many brave officers killed, and many taken priſoners. For a more partic ular and diſtinct account of this deſtructive war, we muſt recur to, and depend upon, Jornandes. According to him, the Dacians, dreading the effects of the emperor's avarice, broke the alliance which they had made with his predeceſſors, croſſed the Danube, drove away the troops ſtationed on the banks of that river; and falling upon Appius, or Oppius, Sabinus, governor of Mœſia, defeated and killed him, committing every-where moſt dreadful devaſtations, and ſeizing all the forts and caſtles raiſed in their neighbourhood by the Romans. Hereupon Domitian, having with all poſſible expedition raiſed a formidable army, marched himſelf at the head of it into Illyricum. Upon his approach, Decebalus diſpatched embaſſadors to him, declaring, that he was ready to put an end to the war, and renew the former treaties. But Domitian, inſtead of returning any anſwer to the deputies, ordered the flower of his forces to advance againſt the Dacians, under the conduct of Cornelius Fuſcus, captain of the prætorian guards. He was, according to Tacitus [g], of an illuſtrious deſcent, and had in his early youth, from a paſſion for ſolitude and repoſe, deveſted himſelf of the ſenatorial dignity. Upon the death of Nero, he declared for Galba, by whom he was created procurator of Illyricum. Afterwards he embraced the party of Veſpaſian againſt Vitellius, and to the flame of war added, to uſe the expreſſion of Tacitus, freſh fuel; for he took not ſo much delight in the rewards of perils, as in the perils themſelves. He was ſecond in the command of the forces under the famous Antonius Primus, and honoured by the ſenate, after the death of Vitellius, with the ornaments of the prætorſhip. Domitian conferred upon him the command of the prætorian guards. But after all, he was not, if Juvenal is to be credited [h], ſufficiently qualified for the chief command of an army. Hence Decebalus, deſpiſing ſuch

The Romans defeated by the Dacians, and their general killed.

[f] Tacit. vit. Agric. c. 41.

[g] Tacit. hiſt. l. ii. c. 86.

[h] Juven. ſat. iv. ver. 112.

such a general, sent a fresh embassy to Domitian, offering to conclude a peace with him upon condition that each Roman paid him yearly two oboli; threatening, if they rejected his proposal, to pursue the war with vigor, and destroy their territories with fire and sword. The Romans were so provoked with the insolence of this proposal, that they demanded to be led forthwith against the enemy. Accordingly Fuscus, having caused his army to pass the Danube on a bridge of boats, entered the Dacian territories, where, after several skirmishes, Decebalus and Fuscus agreed to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement. Both armies fought with equal bravery and resolution, and the victory continued long doubtful; but in the end the Romans were utterly routed, and Fuscus himself slain. The Dacians took one eagle, a great quantity of arms, all the engines of war, and a vast number of captives, who were afterwards found in the enemy's castles, and released by the emperor Trajan [i]. They are defeated a second time.

THE news of this defeat alarmed Domitian, who was already returned to Rome, where he made a no less dreadful havock of the senate and people, than the Dacians had done of the soldiery. He strove at first to smother the dismal tidings; but finding they were by common fame divulged all over the city, and even magnified, he left Rome a second time, giving out, that he would head the army in person. But arriving in Mœsia, he stopped in a city of that province, and sent forward his generals against the enemy. Many bloody battles were fought with various success, fortune being sometimes favourable to the Romans, sometimes to the Dacians [k]. Julianus, one of the Roman commanders, gained a signal victory, by obliging his soldiers to write their names on their bucklers, that he might by that means the more effectually encourage or upbraid each particular [l]. On this occasion Vezinas, who among the Dacians was next in authority to Decebalus, finding no other means to make his escape, concealed himself among the dead, and in the night retired undiscovered. Decebalus apprehending the Romans might, The Dacians receive a great overthrow.

[i] Jornand. de reb. Goth. c. 13. Oros. l. vii. c. 8. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 773. Juv. sat. iv. ver. 111. [k] Tacit. hist. l. 1. c. 2. [l] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 762. & in excerpt. Val. p. 709.

after their victory, lay ſiege to his capital, felled, during the night, a great number of trees in the neighbouring wood, covered the trunks of them with armour, and, by that contrivance, prevented the Romans, who miſtook them for ſoldiers, from purſuing the advantages of their victory. However, Decebalus was at length reduced to great ſtreights, and obliged to ſue for peace; which Domitian would not grant him upon any terms whatſoever. But, inſtead of purſuing the war with vigor, and forcing him, as he might eaſily have done, to ſubmit at diſcretion, he turned his arms againſt the Quadians and Marcomanians, becauſe they had ſent him no ſuccours during the war with the Dacians. Theſe two nations, though ſignal in force and renown, declining to involve their reſpective countries in an unſucceſsful war, ſent deputies to the emperor, begging him to forbear hoſtilities, which they were not conſcious to themſelves to have provoked. But Domitian, inſtead of hearkening to their entreaties, cauſed their embaſſadors, in defiance of the right of nations, to be murdered; which ſo provoked thoſe warlike people, that drawing together all their youth, they took the field, engaged Domitian, and put him to flight. Then the cowardly prince, now no leſs dejected upon his defeat, than lately elated with his victory, diſpatched embaſſadors to Decebalus, with offers of peace, upon very advantageous terms; which the Dacian thought it adviſeable to accept, ſince his army had been greatly weakened by the many battles he had fought. However, he refuſed to go in perſon to Domitian; but ſent his brother to treat with the emperor, whom Domitian received with particular marks of friendſhip and eſteem, delivering to him a diadem for Decebalus, and by that means acknowledging him for king. Beſides the diadem, he preſented him with large ſums, ſent to him, at his requeſt, a great number of artificers and workmen of all profeſſions, and engaged to pay him yearly a certain ſum, which, to the reign of Trajan, was punctually conveyed to him; but that prince would not ſubmit to the payment of ſo ſhameful a tribute, ſaying, That he had never been overcome by Decebalus [m]. Domitian, upon the concluſion of ſuch an opprobrious peace, acquainted the ſenate by letters that he Domitian defeated by the Marcomanians.

Concludes a diſhonourable peace with the Dacians.

[m] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 762. & l. lxviii. 771. Mart. l. v. epigr. 3.

he had at length obliged the Dacians to ſubmit to the Roman yoke; and at the ſame time diſpatched to Rome the embaſſadors of Decebalus, with a letter written to him by that prince, or, as was moſt commonly believed, feigned by the emperor himſelf, wherein the Dacian owned himſelf conquered, and no longer able to withſtand the gallantry of the Roman troops, led on by ſo brave and valiant a commander as Domitian. Hereupon the ſenate decreed him a triumph, which he enjoyed upon his return, triumphing at the ſame time over the Dacians, of whom he had with an annual tribute purchaſed a peace, and over the Quadians and Marcomanians, by whom he had been utterly defeated and driven out of the field [n]; for his triumphs, ſays Pliny [o], were ever certain proofs of ſignal advantages gained by the enemy. However, the poets, who flouriſhed under him, extol theſe mock victories, and compare them to thoſe gained by the Scipios and Cæſars. Domitian, before he left Dacia, cauſed a ſtately monument to be erected to the memory of Cornelius Fuſcus [p]. Pliny complains that Domitian, in his marches and journeys, behaved more like an enemy than a prince, exacting immenſe ſums from the inhabitants of the countries through which he paſſed, pillaging their houſes, laying waſte their fields, and obliging them to ſupply, at a vaſt charge, with all manner of proviſions both him and his numerous retinue [q].

But is honoured with a triumph.

THE following year, Domitian was conſul the thirteenth time with L. Saturninus; but nothing happened, during their adminiſtration, which authors have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. But the following year, when Domitian was conſul the fourteenth time with L. Minucius Rufus, is remarkable for the celebration of the ſecular games, ſo called, becauſe they were to be ſolemnized once in an age. They had been celebrated but forty-one years before by Claudius; but Domitian computed the time from their being exhibited by Auguſtus [r]. They ended, as appears from ſeveral medals which have reached our age, ſome time after the ides of September in the eighth year of Domitian's reign [s], while Tacitus the hiſtorian was

He celebrates the ſecular games.

[n] Dio, p. 761. Suet. c. 6. Euſeb. in chron. [o] Plin. paneg. p. 21. [p] Mart. l. vi. p. 76. [q] Plin. ibid. p. 35, 56. [r] Suet. c. 4. [s] Onuph. lud.

prætor [t]. Domitian, purſuing this year the carnage he had begun, before he left Rome to wage war with the Dacians, filled the city with funerals, putting all thoſe to death, who, on account of their birth or virtue, gave him the leaſt umbrage [u]. This general ſlaughter was in all likelihood produced by the revolt of L. Antonius, which happened this year. L. Antonius was governor of Upper Germany, where he had two legions under his command. Being provoked with the cruelties and tyrannical conduct of the emperor, and depending upon the fidelity of his ſoldiers, whoſe affections he had gained by his mild and obliging behaviour, he at once took upon him the title of emperor, and as ſuch was acknowledged by the forces he commanded, and likewiſe by moſt of the German nations, who promiſed him powerful ſuccours, not from any eſteem or kindneſs they had for him, but through hatred to Domitian. The news of this revolt no ſooner reached Rome, than Domitian, quitting the city, haſtened to ſuppreſs it, leading with him the prætorian guards and the flower of the troops quartered in Italy, all the ſenators, and the greater part of the Roman knights, even ſuch as had abſented themſelves from the city and long led a retired life, leſt they ſhould be afterwards accuſed of having abandoned the emperor in time of danger; a charge which might have coſt them their lives. But he had not proceeded far on his march, ere he received a certain account of the total overthrow of Antonius, whoſe army was entirely cut off, and he himſelf ſlain by L. Maximus, according to ſome writers, or, as others will have it, by Appius Norbanus [w]. Perhaps theſe four names belonged to one and the ſame perſon; at leaſt a letter written by Domitian to L. Appius Maximus has reached our times [x]; and one Appius Maximus is ſaid in an antient inſcription to have happily ended the war in Germany [y]. While the armies of Antonius and Maximus were engaged on the banks of the Rhine, the River ſwelled all on a ſudden to ſuch an height that the Germans, who came to the aſſiſtance of Antonius, could not croſs it; ſo that his army was entirely cut off. Antonius himſelf being killed in the battle, his head was cut off and ſent to Rome [z]. Suetonius tells us, that the

The revolt of L. Antonius.

Who is defeated and killed.

[t] Tacit. annal. xi. c. 12. [u] Euſeb. in chron. [w] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 764. Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 709. Plut. in vit. Æmil. [x] Vide Onuph. in faſt. p. 216. [y] Idem ibid.
[z] Suet. c. 6. Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 709.

the very day on which the battle was fought, an eagle, placing herself on one of the emperor's statues at Rome, covered it with her wings, making a noise which expressed a kind of joy; and that at the same time a report prevailed all over the city, that Antonius was overcome, and utterly defeated; nay, that he was killed, and that his head was brought to Rome, which several persons affirmed they had seen [a]. Maximus on this occasion displayed no less prudence after the victory, than he had done courage in gaining it; for upon the death of Antonius, he seized and burnt all his papers, that the emperor might not make use of them to the prejudice of any man. Domitian, however, made a diligent search after his accomplices, torturing in a most cruel manner persons of all ranks and conditions, upon the least suspicion of their having been privy to the conspiracy, or having lived in friendship and intimacy with Antonius. On this occasion great numbers of persons were executed or banished, and their estates seized. Of the many who were accused, two persons only escaped unpunished, viz. a tribune of senatorial dignity, and a centurion, who saved their lives at the expence of their reputation, by making it appear, that they had been pathics, and consequently incapable of engaging in any hazardous enterprize, or having an interest in matters of this nature, either with the general or the army [b]. After this revolt, Domitian would not suffer two legions to be quartered in the same camp during the winter; but kept them all separate and at some distance from each other, lest, depending upon their strength, they should form dangerous designs, and raise new disturbances [c]. This year another counterfeit Nero appeared in Asia; and having, with a great multitude of followers, struck terror into the neighbouring provinces, retired to the court of the Parthian king, who received him with great marks of distinction, supplied him with a chosen body of troops, and seemed inclined to quarrel on his account with the Romans. But in the end he was prevailed upon by Domitian to deliver him up to the governor of Syria [d]. This, without all doubt, is what gave occasion to the poet Silius to celebrate the emperor's triumph, and extol his victories over the Great numbers of persons executed.

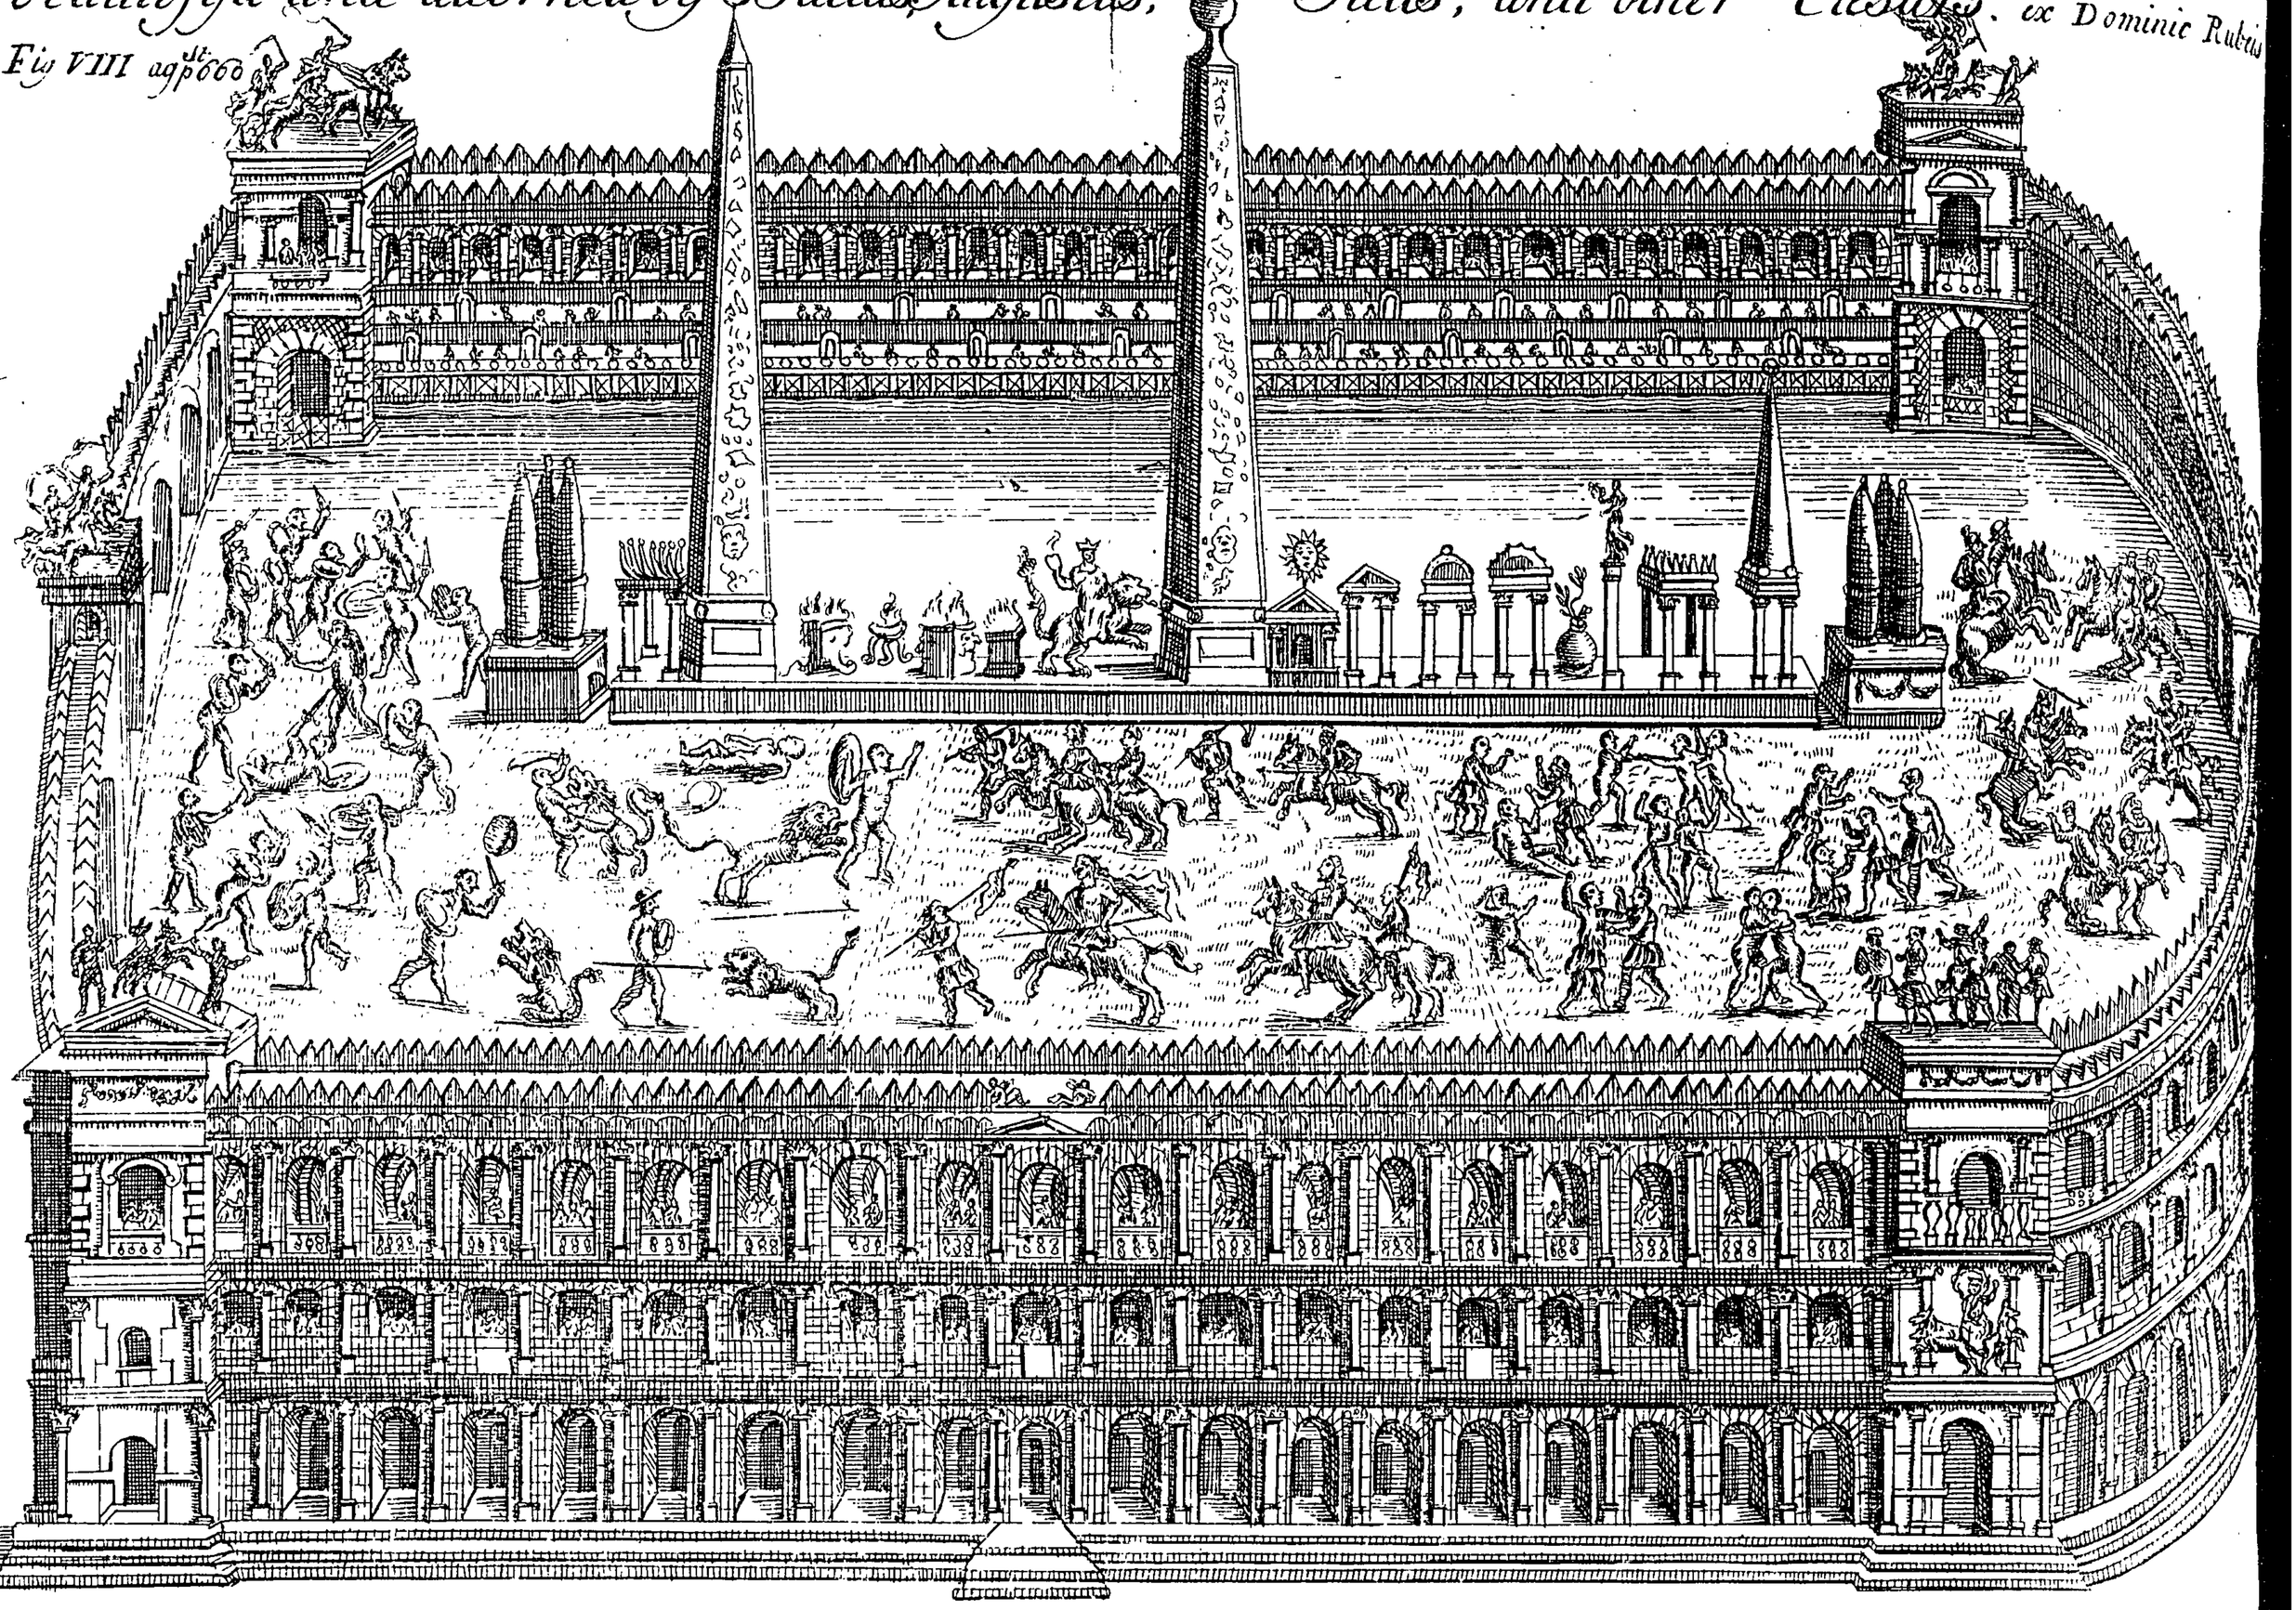
A counterfeit Nero in Asia.

[a] Plut. in Æmil. p. 489. Suet. ibid. [b] Suet. c. 10. [c] Dio, p. 764. Tacit. l. i. c. 2. Suet. c. 6.

Ganges, the Bactrians, and, in ſhort, over all the countries of the eaſt [e].



THE following year, T. Aurelius Fulvius and L. Atratinus being conſuls, Domitian took the title of emperor three times; but for what exploits we know not. Some writers, and amongſt the reſt the learned cardinal Noris, are of opinion, that Domitian this year undertook a ſecond expedition againſt the Germans [f], the more becauſe the poet Statius ſuppoſes the Germans to have been by Domitian twice conquered [g]. But theſe triumphs were in all likelihood only for pretended victories and real overthrows. Thus we have ſeen him triumph over the Dacians, of whom he had purchaſed a peace, by engaging to pay them an annual tribute, and over the Marcomanians and Quadians, by whom he had been ſhamefully put to flight. The next conſuls were Domitian, the fifteenth time, and M. Cocceius Nerva, who was afterwards raiſed to the empire, the ſecond time; for he had been conſul in the ſecond year of Veſpaſian's reign. Some modern writers [h] tell us, that having been baniſhed by Domitian the year before, in this he was recalled, and honoured with the conſulſhip. They quote Dion Caſſius; but in that writer we find no ſuch account. Philoſtratus indeed writes, that Nerva, who ſucceeded Domitian, was baniſhed to Tarentum; but from his words it is manifeſt, that Nerva did not incur the diſpleaſure of Domitian, till he had finiſhed his ſecond conſulſhip [i]. Nothing happened this year, either at Rome or in the provinces, which the few hiſtorians, who have written of theſe times, and whoſe works have reached us, thought worth recording. The conſuls of the following year were M. Ulpius Trajanus, who ſucceeded Nerva in the empire, and Acilius Glabrio. As Glabrio was a man of great ſtrength and activity, the emperor obliged him to fight in the arena with an huge lion, whom he overcame and killed. The people with loud ſhouts applauded his victory; which roufed the jealouſy of the emperor, who thereupon, under colour of ſome crime or other, baniſhed him, and ſoon after cauſed him to be murdered in the place of his exile, as if he had attempted to raiſe diſturbances in the ſtate [k]. A modern writer would fain perſuade us, that he was put to Acilius Glabrio put to death.

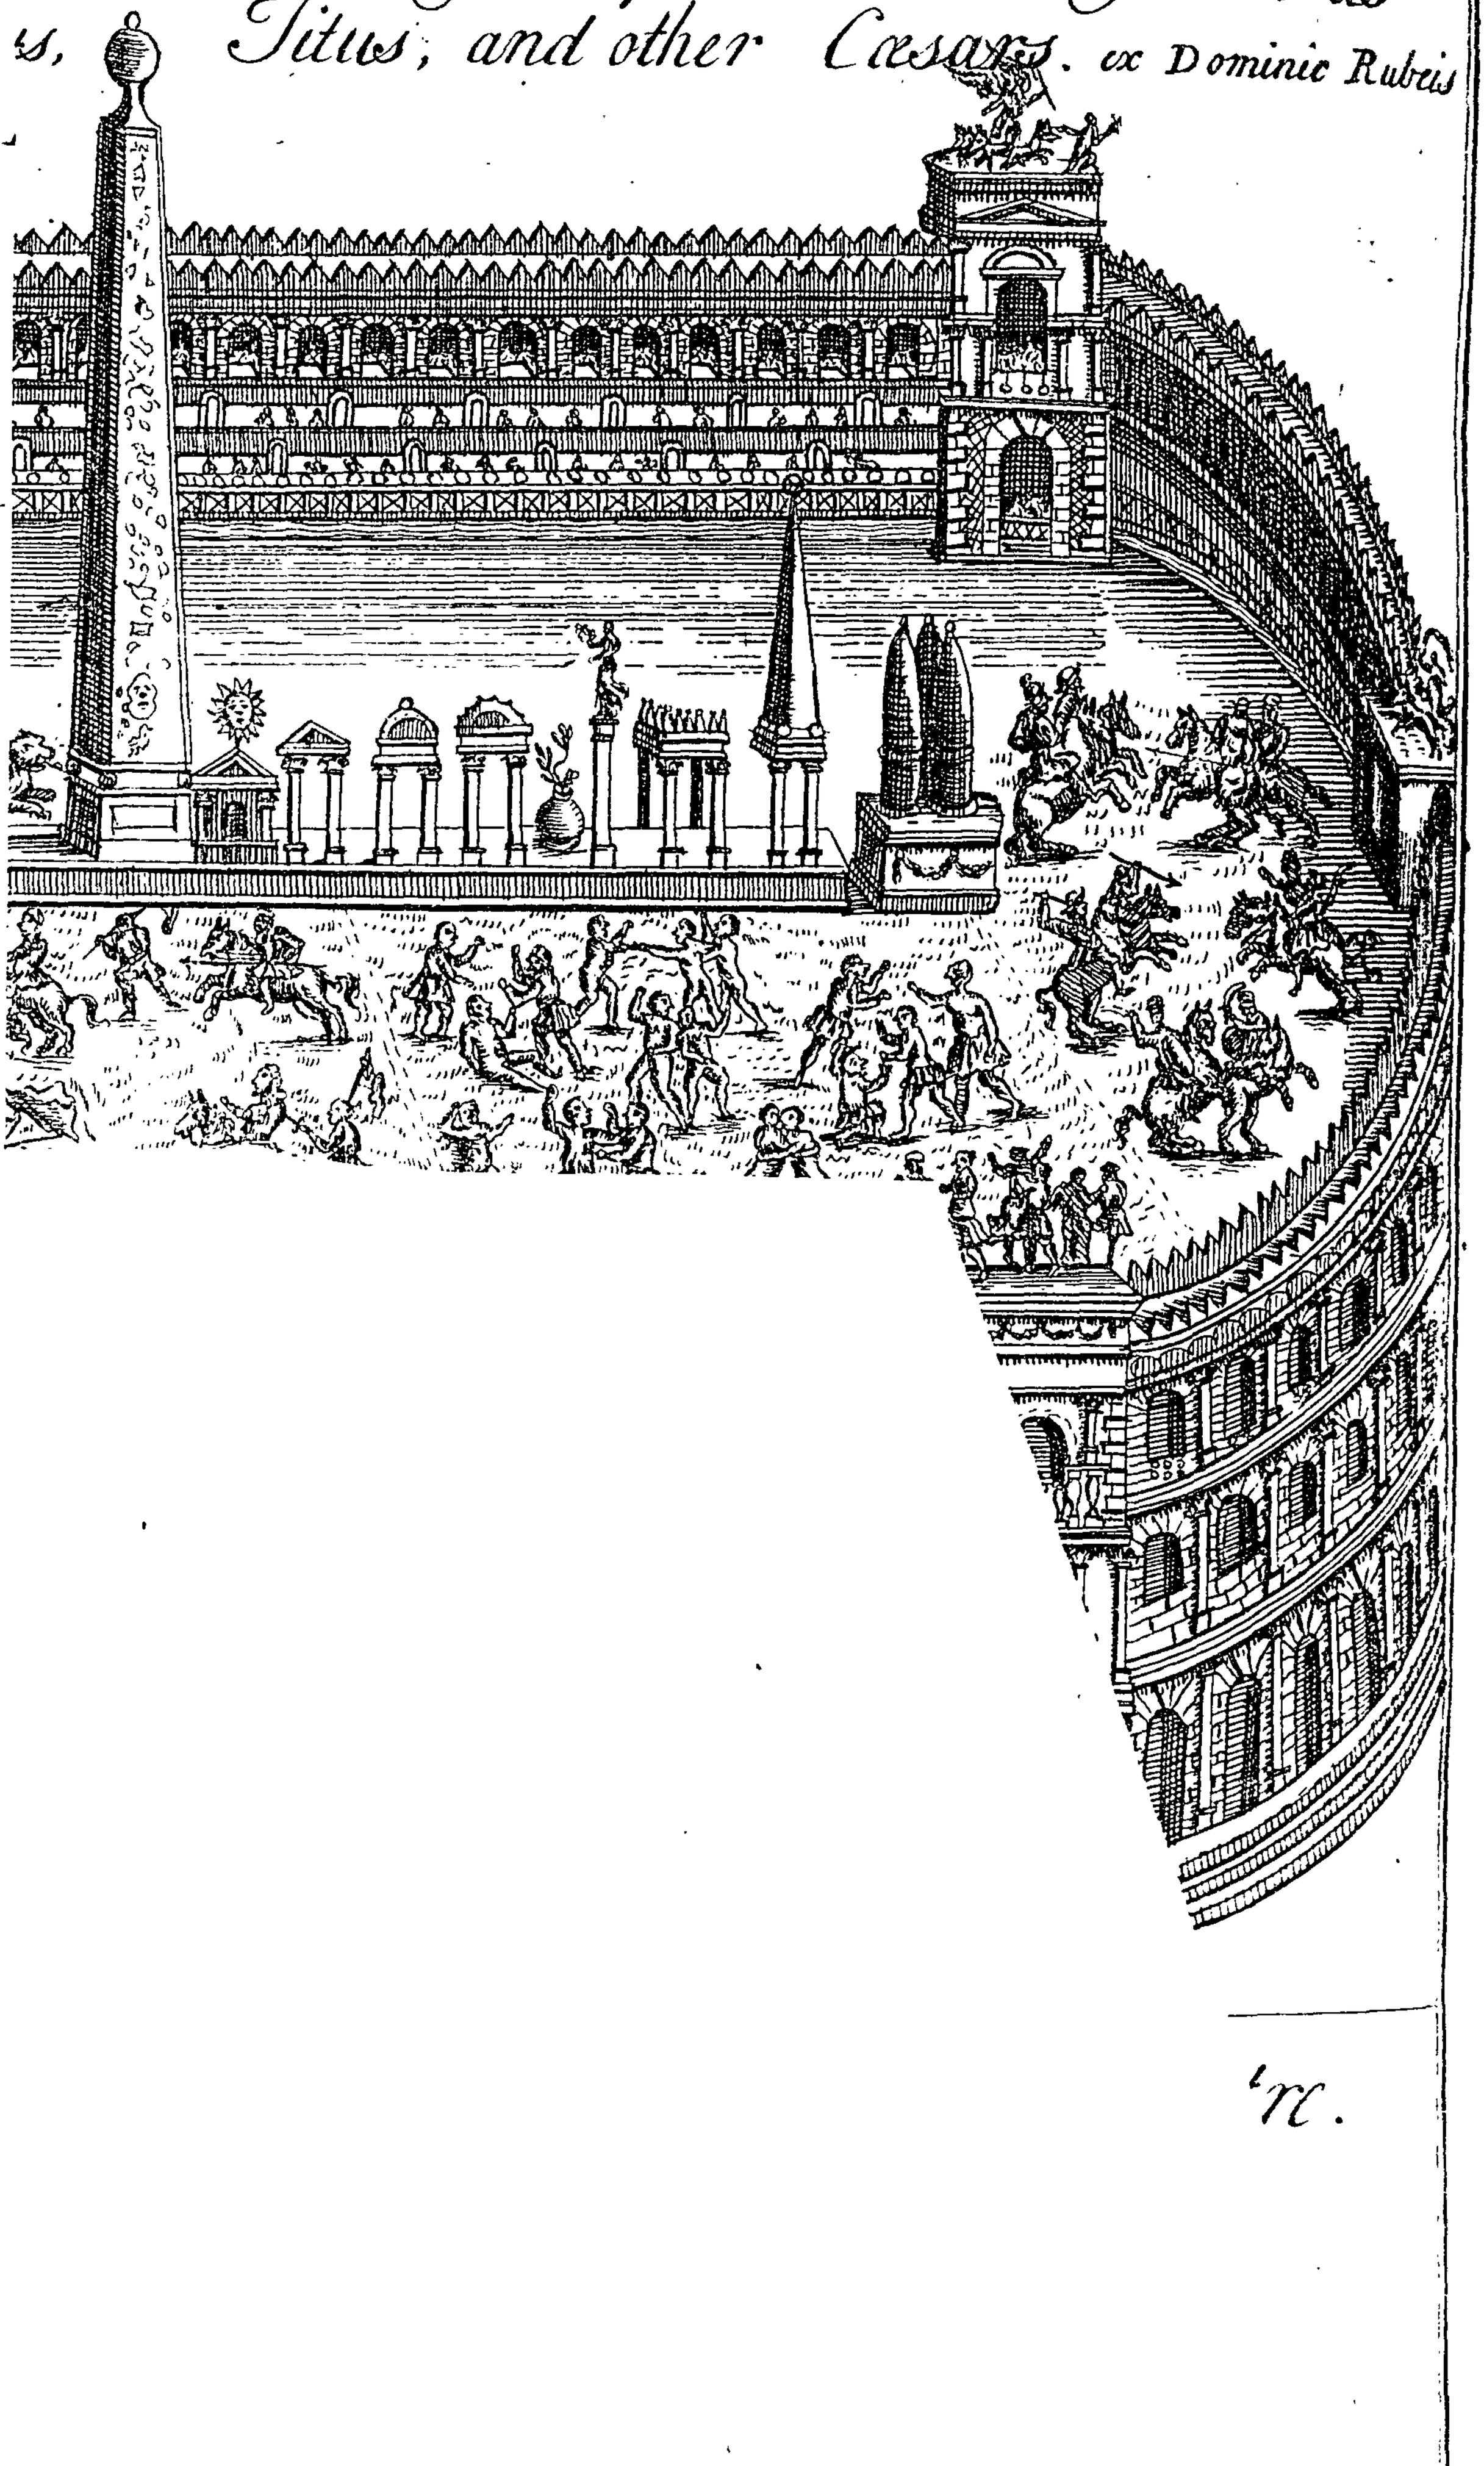
[e] Sil. l. iii. p. 51. Theb. l. i. ver. 19. [f] Noris. ep. conſ. p. 175. [g] Stat. [h] Petav. chron. & Calviſ. [i] Phi. loſt. vit. Apol. Ty. l. vii. c. 3. [k] Dio, p. 766. Suet. c. 10.

The Great Circus, begun by Romulus and Finished by Tarquin; as it was afterwards beautifyd and adorned by Julius, Augustus, Titus, and other Cæsars. ex Dominic Rubeis

Fig VIII ag.p660



Domitian's Naumachia or Naval Amphi-theatre.

J. Davison Sc.

d Finished by Tarquin; as it was afterwards

s, Titus, and other Cæsars. ex Dominic Rubris

'rc.

to death for profeſſing the chriſtian religion [1]; but the arguments which he makes uſe of are deſtitute of all ſolidity and quite trifling. This year Domitian exhibited a great many ſhews, both in the amphitheatre and the circus, which are celebrated by the writers of thoſe times, as the moſt coſtly and magnificent that Rome had ever beheld. Near the Tiber he cauſed a vaſt lake to be dug, in which a ſea-fight was repreſented with ſuch numbers of ſhips as amounted to complete fleets. In the combats of gladiators, not only men, but women, entered the liſts. In the amphitheatre two great combats were exhibited, one of horſe, the other of foot: with the former, which was quite new, the populace were ſo taken, that, forgetting the emperor's cruelties, they beſtowed upon him higher encomiums, than they had ever given either to Veſpaſian or Titus. During the ſea-fight a violent ſhower fell; but nevertheleſs the emperor continued till the fight was ended, often changing his cloaths, and would not ſuffer any of the ſpectators to retire; whence, as the ſhower laſted ſome hours, many were ſeized with diſtempers, and ſome even died [o]. Dion Caſſius deſcribes at length an entertainment, to which the emperor invited the principal men among the ſenators and knights; an entertainment, ſays that writer, which more than any thing elſe diſplays his tyrannical temper, and how wantonly he abuſed his power. At the entrance of the palace, the gueſts were received with great ceremony, and conducted to a ſpacious hall hung round with black, and illuminated with a few melancholy lamps, which were only ſufficient to diſcover the horror of the place, and the ſeveral coffins, upon which were written in capitals the names of the ſeveral ſenators and knights invited. Great was their fright and conſternation at the ſight of ſo diſmal a ſcene; for the emperor had often publicly declared, that he could not think himſelf ſafe ſo long as one ſenator was left alive, and that among the knights there were few whom he did not look upon as his enemies. After they had long waited, expecting every moment their laſt doom, the doors were at length all on a ſudden burſt open, when a great number of naked perſons, having their bodies all over died black, entered the hall, with drawn ſwords in one hand, and flaming torches in the other. The gueſts, at this dreadful appearance, giving themſelves

Domitian exhibits magnificent ſhews.

He terrifies the ſenators and chief knights by a cruel device.

[1] Baron. ad ann. 74. 762, 763.

[o] Suet. c. 4. Dio, l.

ſelves up for loſt, already felt all the agonies of death; but thoſe whom they looked upon as their executioners, having for ſome time danced round them, ſet at once open the doors, and acquainted them, that the emperor gave the company leave to withdraw. Thus did Domitian inſult theſe two illuſtrious orders, ſhewing, ſays Dion Caſſius, how little he feared them, and at the ſame time with how much reaſon they might dread his reſentment, ſince it was in his power to cut them all off, without expoſing himſelf to the leaſt danger [p].

His edict againſt planting vines.

THE next conſuls were Domitian, the ſixteenth time, and Q. Voluſius Saturninus. This year, the emperor obſerving a great plenty of wine and as great a ſcarcity of corn, concluded from thence, that the huſbandmen neglected the tillage of the earth to attend the cultivating of their vines. To prevent therefore this inconvenience for the future, he publiſhed an edict, forbidding any more vines to be planted in Italy, and commanding half the vines in the provinces to be immediately rooted up. Hereupon the cities of Aſia ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to him, begging he would ſuſpend the execution of the edict with reſpect to their lands, ſince their chief revenues accrued from wine, and the neighbouring provinces abounded with corn. At the head of this embaſſy was Scopelianus, profeſſor of eloquence at Smyrna, who, inſinuating himſelf with wonderful addreſs into the emperor's favour, prevailed upon him, if Philoſtratus is to be credited [q], to repeal the edict, and allow all nations ſubject to Rome full liberty of planting and cultivating what vines they pleaſed. Suetonius tells us, that to this he was prompted chiefly by the general diſcontent, which his edict produced amongſt perſons of all ranks, both in the city and the provinces, where many lampoons were publiſhed, one among the reſt, importing, that, in ſpite of all edicts, wine would not be wanting for the ſacrificing of Cæſar [r]. But after all, Eutropius [s] and Vopiſcus [t] ſpeak of this edict as continuing in full force in moſt provinces of the empire, till the reign of the emperor Probus, that is, for the ſpace of almoſt two hundred years. From ſeveral medals it appears, that the city of Chalcis in Syria began its æra in the autumn of this year, the 92d after the birth of Chriſt, according to the common method of computing, and the eleventh of Domitian's reign; whence

The ſmall kingdom of Chalcis united to the empire.

ſome

[p] Dio, ibid. p. 769. [q] Philoſtr. ibid. c. 17. [r] Suet. c. 14. [s] Eutrop. p. 246. [t] Vopiſ. p. 245.

ſome learned chronologers conclude, that this ſmall kingdom, formerly poſſeſſed by the brother, and afterwards by the ſon, of Agrippa, the laſt king of the Jews, was then by Domitian united to the empire [u]. It was in all likelihood on this account, that the city of Chalcis took the name of Flavia, which we ſuppoſe to have happened after the death of Ariſtobulus, who reigned at Chalcis in the year 72. of the chriſtian æra [w].

THE following year, Pompeius Collega and D. Priſcus were conſuls. Pliny names the former among the conſulars who were ſtill living in the reign of Trajan [x]. From an antient inſcription it appears, that both conſuls reſigned the faſces on the thirteenth of July, the former to M. Lollius Paulinus Valerius Aſiaticus, and the latter to C. Antius Julius Quadratus. This year was remarkable for the death of the celebrated Agricola. His end proved afflicting to his family, ſays Tacitus, ſorrowful to his friends, and matter of trouble even to foreigners and ſuch as knew him not. The common people, during his ſickneſs, were not only frequent in their viſits to his houſe; but in all public places, in all private companies, made him the ſubject of their converſation: nor, when his death was divulged, was there a ſoul found, who did not lament it as a public misfortune. What heightened the general concern was, a prevailing rumour, that he was diſpatched by poiſon. That there was any proof of this, Tacitus, his ſon-in-law, will not take upon him to aver. However, he tells us, that, during the whole courſe of his illneſs, Domitian cauſed frequent viſits to be made him, indeed much more frequent than princes are wont to make, both by his favourite freedmen and his moſt truſty phyſicians; whether from real concern for his health, or eagerneſs to learn the probability of his death, our hiſtorian will not determine. It is certain, that on the day in which he expired, continual accounts were by meſſengers, purpoſely placed, every inſtant tranſmitted to the emperor, informing him how faſt his end was approaching; and no one believed he would have been thus eager to hear tidings, had he been to feel any ſorrow from hearing them. However, upon the news of his death, he affected to ſhew in his countenance ſome grief and concern; for being now ſecure againſt the object of his hatred, he

The death of Agricola.

Domitian ſuſpected of having cauſed him to be poiſoned.

[u] Noris. de epoch. Syro-Macedonum. [w] Joſeph. bell. Jud. c. 28. [x] Plin. l. ii. epiſt. 11.

he could more eaſily diſſemble his preſent joy, than lately his fear. It is incredible, how great was the ſatisfaction which he expreſſed, when upon reading the laſt will of Agricola, he found himſelf left joint heir with his excellent wife and tender daughter. This he took to have been done out of judgment and choice; ſo blinded he was by continual flattery, as not to know, that to no prince, but a tyrant, did ever any good father bequeath his fortune[y]. Agricola was born, according to Tacitus, on the thirteenth of June, during the third conſulſhip of the emperor Caligula, and died on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, during the conſulſhip of Collega and Priſcus, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, the ninety-third of the Chriſtian æra, and twelfth of Domitian's reign. But as to the time of his birth, ſome miſtake has certainly crept into the text of Tacitus, there being but fifty-three years, two months, and ſome days, from the thirteenth of June of the year of the Chriſtian æra 40, when Caligula was the third time conſul, to the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, in the year 93. Agricola therefore either died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, or was born in the ſecond conſulſhip of Caligula, that is, in the year 33 of the Chriſtian æra. Tacitus delivers the following glorious and affecting character of him. If poſterity deſires to know his make and perſon, he was rather genteel and well-proportioned than tall: in his aſpect there was nothing terrible; his looks were extremely gracious and pleaſing, a good man you would have readily believed him, and been glad to have found that he was a great man. Tho' he was ſnatched away, while his age was yet in full vigor; yet, if his life be meaſured by his glory, he attained to a great length of days. For every true felicity, namely ſuch as ariſes from virtue, he had already enjoyed to the full. As he had been likewiſe diſtinguiſhed with the conſular and triumphal honours, what more could fortune add to his luſtre or renown? Exceſſive wealth he coveted not; an honourable ſhare he poſſeſſed. As behind him he left ſurviving his daughter and his wife, he may be even accounted happy, ſince by dying while his credit was no-ways ſtained, while his fame was in its full ſplendor, and his relations and friends in a ſtate of ſecurity, he eſcaped the evils to come and the miſery of the latter times. We ſhall cloſe our account of this great commander,

His character

[y] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 44.

commander, this virtuous citizen, with the tender and affecting words of Tacitus, who thus addreſſes him after his death. Happy therefore art thou, Agricola; not only as thy life was glorious, but as thy death was ſeaſonable! Thou didſt, as I am informed by thoſe who heard thy laſt words, accept thy fate chearfully and with firmneſs; as if, for thy part, thou wouldſt have ſaved the credit of the prince. But to myſelf and thy daughter, beſides the grief of having our father ſnatched from us, it proves a further acceſſion of ſorrow, that we had not an opportunity of attending thee in thy ſickneſs, of cheriſhing thy drooping ſpirits, and pleaſing ourſelves with ſeeing and embracing thee. We ſhould greedily have received thy inſtructions and precepts, and engraved them for ever in our hearts. This is our grief, this our unſpeakable misfortune, that, by our long abſence from thee, thou waſt already loſt to us four years before thy death. Thou waſt, no doubt, abundantly ſupplied with whatever thy condition required, by thy loving wife, the beſt of mothers, who attended thee. Yet fewer tears were ſhed at thy funeral, and at thy laſt hour ſomewhat was wanting to ſatisfy thine eyes. If for the manes of good men any place be allotted; if, as philoſophers hold, the ſpirits of great men periſh not with their bodies; pleaſing be thy repoſe! Recal us, thy family, from this our weakneſs in bewailing thee, to the contemplation of thy virtues, for which it were unjuſt to lament or to mourn. Let us rather adorn thy memory with immortal praiſes, and by following, as far as our weakneſs will allow, and adopting thy excellencies. This is true honour, this is the duty incumbent upon every near relation. Thus I would have thy daughter and wife to reverence the memory of a father and huſband, and to be ever ruminating upon all his doings and ſayings; and rather to adore the image of his mind, than that of his perſon. Not that I mean to condemn the uſe of ſtatues in marble or braſs; but as the perſons of men are frail and periſhing, ſo are likewiſe the images of them: the form of the mind is eternal, and cannot be repreſented or preſerved by art or materials foreign to its nature, nor otherwiſe but by a conformity of manners. What we loved in Agricola, what we admired, remains, and will for ever remain, imprinted in the minds of men, and conveyed through a continual ſucceſſion of ages, by the voice of fame to the lateſt poſterity. Many of the antients lie buried ried in an obſcure and inglorious oblivion; but Agricola ſhall live recommended to future ages, and his fame continue for ever [z]. Thus far Tacitus, who wrote the life of Agricola, in the reign of the emperor Trajan, without which, and a ſhort paſſage in Dion Caſſius, the memory and exploits of one of the greateſt commanders and beſt citizens Rome ever bred, would have been buried in oblivion. Tacitus, as he himſelf informs us, had, together with his wife, been four years abſent from Rome when his father-in-law died; but where, or on what account, we are no-where told. Some writers, without the leaſt foundation, ſuppoſe him to have been baniſhed by Domitian; but Lipſius is of opinion, that he retired of his own accord from the city, not being able, as he was a man of a virtuous and humane ſpirit, to behold the ſufferings of the Romans under ſo cruel and bloody a tyrant [a].

Tacitus's affecting addreſs to him after his death.

Bebius Maſſa a noted accuſer, arraigned.

THE ſame year, Bebius Maſſa, an infamous accuſer, was himſelf accuſed of extortion by the Bithynians, whom he had plundered and oppreſſed, in a moſt tyrannical manner, while he governed that province. The ſenate appointed Pliny the younger and Herennius Senecio, originally a Bithynian and formerly quæſtor in the ſame province, to plead the cauſe of the Bithynians; which they did ſo effectually, that Bebius was condemned by the ſenate, and the conſuls were ordered to ſeize his eſtate and effects. But as they, taken up with more preſſing affairs, put off from day to day the execution of the judgment, Senecio fearing the delinquent might in the mean time privately convey away part of his goods, reſolved to apply to them for an immediate execution of the ſentence, and begged Pliny to act therein in concert with him. Pliny at firſt declined engaging in an affair which he thought foreign to the profeſſion of a pleader; but, Senecio continuing obſtinate in his reſolution, he at length conſented to ſolicit jointly with him the conſuls to ſeize without delay the effects of Bebius, that reparation might thence be made of the loſſes ſuſtained by the Bithynians. Accordingly they went together to the conſuls, where they found Bebius, who, upon hearing their ſuit, was ſo provoked againſt Senecio, that he ſummoned him before the emperor, as guilty ty of treaſon. The very name of treaſon ſtruck the whole aſſembly with terror. But Pliny, without betraying the leaſt fear, addreſſing Bebius, told him, he was ſorry he did not charge him with the ſame crime, ſince by his not accuſing him, as well as Senecio, of treaſon, men might believe that he had not acted againſt him with equal zeal, and that he ſhould be grieved if he knew that any one entertained of him ſo bad an opinion. This firmneſs and intrepidity in Pliny, was by all highly applauded; and Nerva, who was at that time in exile at Tarentum, congratulated him by letters upon his ſteady conduct. Pliny himſelf wrote to Tacitus, acquainting him with what had paſſed, and begging him to inſert it in his hiſtory, which he looked upon as a work that would never die; but the letter of Pliny has outlived that part of Tacitus's hiſtory [b]. This year Domitian undertook an expedition againſt the Sarmatians, who had cut in pieces a whole legion with the officer who commanded them [c]: but as to the iſſue of this war, we are quite in the dark: all we know is, that on this occaſion he quarrelled likewiſe with the Marcomanians, and on his return aſſumed the title of emperor, for the twenty-ſecond and laſt time. He returned to Rome in the month of January, and, inſtead of triumphing, contented himſelf with preſenting a crown of laurel to Jupiter Capitolinus [d]. Statius [e] and Martial [f] make frequent mention of this war, extolling with their uſual flattery, the ſuppoſed exploits and pretended victories of their hero.

[z] Idem, ibid. c. 45, 46. [a] Lipſ. vit. Tacit.

The conſtancy and firmneſs of Pliny.

THE following year, L. Nonnius Aſprenas and Sextilius Lateranus being conſuls, Domitian began to rend the commonwealth with cruelties without all reſpite, as Tacitus expreſſes [g], and to put in execution the deſign, which he had long ſince formed, of utterly extirpating the ſenate, and deſtroying all who were any-ways conſiderable, either for their birth or virtue. That hiſtorian deſcribes the miſeries of theſe calamitous times in general terms thus: The iſlands were peopled with exiles; the rocks contaminated with murder and blood. But more hideous ſtill were the ravages of cruelty at Rome. It was treaſonable

The calamity of the times.

[b] Plin. l. vii. epiſt. 33. & l. iii. epiſt. 4 [c] Suet. c. 6. [d] Idem, ibid. [e] Stat. ſyl. l. 3. p. 398, &c. [f] Mart. l. vii. epigr. 1, 4, 7. & l. viii. epigr. 8, 15, &c. [g] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 44.

able to be noble; capital to be rich; criminal to have borne honours, criminal to have declined them; and the reward of worth and virtue was quick and inevitable deſtruction. Nor were the iniquities of the informers more ſhocking, than their great and diſtinguiſhing rewards; for upon ſome were beſtowed, as the ſpoils of the ſtate, the pontifical dignities and thoſe of the counſulſhip; others were ſent with the character of procurators into the provinces; ſome were made prime miniſters and confidents at home; and, in every ſtation exerting all their terrors and purſuing their hatred, they controuled and confounded all things. Slaves were ſuborned againſt their maſters, freed-men againſt their patrons; and ſuch as had no enemies were betrayed and undone by their friends. The age, however, continues our hiſtorian, was not ſo utterly deſtitute of all virtue, as not to afford commendable examples of friendſhip and magnanimity. There were mothers who accompanied their baniſhed ſons; wives who followed their huſbands into exile; in relations were found reſolution and ſuccour; in ſons-in-law conſtancy and duty; in ſlaves ſuch fidelity as baffled all the menaces and horrors of the torture; illuſtrious men ſtruggling under the greateſt diſtreſs, ſupporting it with conſtancy, and diſplaying a fortitude in death equal to that in the moſt celebrated antients [h]. The ſame writer, after having recounted the death of Agricola; He ſaw not, adds he, the court of the ſenate beſieged, nor the ſenate encloſed with armed men, nor the butchery of ſo many perſons of conſular dignity, nor the flight and exile of ſo many women of the prime nobility, all effected in one continued havock. Even Nero with-held his eyes from ſcenes of cruelty: he indeed ordered murders to be perpetrated, but ſaw them not. The principal part of our miſeries under Domitian was, to be obliged to ſee him, and be ſeen by him, at a time when all our ſighs and ſorrows were watched and marked down for condemnation; when that cruel countenance of his, always covered with a ſettled red, whence he hardened himſelf againſt ſhame and bluſhing, ſerved him to obſerve all the pale horrors at once poſſeſſing ſo many illuſtrious men [i]. Thus Tacitus deſcribes in general terms the calamities of thoſe unhappy times.

[h] Tacit hiſt. l. i. c. 2. [i] Idem, vit. Agr. c. 44.

times. The perſons whom he mentions in particular to have been this year put to death by Domitian, are Helvidius, Ruſticus, and Senecio. Helvidius was the ſon of the celebrated Helvidius Priſcus, of whom we have ſpoken above. He had been raiſed to the conſulſhip, in what year we know not; and was, on account of his extraordinary virtue, abilities, and accompliſhments, in great credit with perſons of all ranks, though he endeavoured, through fear of giving the emperor umbrage, to ſhun the applauſes of the multitude, and conceal his talents in ſolitude and retirement. However, he was accuſed of treaſon, and it was pretended, that in a poem, by him compoſed, he had, under the borrowed names of Paris and Œnone, reflected on the emperor for divorcing his wife Domitia. When the accuſed appeared to plead his cauſe before the ſenate, one of the judges, by name Publicius Certus, formerly prætor, ſeized him with the aſſiſtance of ſome other ſenators, and, without allowing him to ſpeak in his own defence, dragged him to priſon, where he was by the emperor's orders ſoon after executed [k]. As for Certus, he was named for the conſulſhip, which he ſeems to have diſcharged four years after, that is, in the ſecond year of Nerva's reign, when Pliny demanded leave of the ſenate to arraign him as a criminal, in order to clear his friend Helvidius, and make his innocence appear, at leaſt after his death, ſince no one had been allowed to ſpeak in his favour while living. The ſenate put a ſtop to all proſecutions of this nature, but yet degraded Certus, and deprived him of the conſular dignity; whence he died a few days after in great agonies and terror, imagining, as he himſelf owned, that Pliny purſued him with a drawn ſword. Pliny publiſhed the ſpeech which he pronounced againſt him in the ſenate; but it has been long ſince loſt [l]. Herennius Senecio was, as we have related above, accuſed of treaſon by Bæbius Maſſa, whom he had accuſed of extortion at the ſuit of the Bithynians. The charge alledged againſt him was, that he had written the life of Helvidius Priſcus, at the requeſt of Fannia his widow, and made uſe of the memoirs with which ſhe had furniſhed him. Tho' Senecio had with all poſſible care avoided ſuch expreſſions as Helvidius, Senecio, and Ruſticus put to death.

[k] Suet. c. 10. Plin. ix. epiſt. 13.

[l] Plin. l. ix. epiſt. 13. & l. vii. epiſt. 33.

as might ſeem in the leaſt to reflect on the emperor, yet, becauſe he could not help commending a man whom the prince had condemned, Domitian cauſed him to be ſentenced to death, and the ſentence to be without delay put in execution. Fannia owned of her own accord, that ſhe had perſuaded Senecio to write the life of her huſband, and ſupplied him with materials for it. For this crime ſhe was, by a decree of the ſenate, confined to a deſert iſland, whither ſhe carried with her, as her only comfort, the hiſtory of her huſband's actions, which had been the cauſe of her baniſhment, tho' it was declared capital to read or keep it. Arria, her mother, the widow of the famous Pætus Thraſea, was likewiſe baniſhed; but they were both called home in the beginning of the reign of Nerva [m]. The emperor, as Tacitus informs us [n], did not content himſelf with condemning Senecio for celebrating the praiſes of Helvidius Priſcus, and Arulenus Ruſticus, of whom anon, for thoſe of Pætus Thraſea; but ordered the magiſtrates to commit their books to the flames, imagining, that in the ſame fire he ſhould aboliſh the voice and utterance of the Roman people, with the liberty of the ſenate, and all the ideas and memory of mankind. The third perſon, mentioned by Tacitus to have been ſacrificed by Domitian this year, was Lucius Junius Arulenus Ruſticus. He profeſſed the philoſophy of the Stoics, was tribune of the people when Pætus Thraſea was condemned by a decree of the ſenate in the reign of Nero, and as ſuch would have interpoſed againſt it, had not Thraſea himſelf reſtrained him [o]. He was prætor in the ſhort reign of Vitellius, by whom he was ſent to Petilius Cerealis, one of Veſpaſian's commanders, to mediate an accommodation. On which occaſion he was wounded by the ſoldiery, who ſternly rejected all terms of peace; and, notwithſtanding the character of an embaſſador, altogether ſacred, would have been maſſacred, had it not been for the protection of a guard appointed by Cerealis [p]. The crime laid to his charge by Domitian was, his having, in a book publiſhed by him, commended Thraſea, and likewiſe Helvidius Priſcus, as men of honour and integrity. He Fannia, the wife of Senecio, and her mother Arria baniſhed.

[m] Plin. l. vii. epiſt. 19. & l. ix. epiſt. 13. Dio, l. lxvii. p. 765. Suet. c. 10. [n] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 2. [o] Tacit. annal. l. xvi. c. 26. [p] Idem, hiſtor. l. iii. c. 80.

He was accuſed by one Marcus Regulus, who even publiſhed a book filled with moſt bitter invectives againſt him [q]. Pliny ſeems to have entertained a mighty opinion of his accompliſhments and integrity [r], as does likewiſe Plutarch, who tells us, that he was by Domitian's orders put to death for no crime of his own, but merely to remove from the emperors ſight one who, with his exemplary life, ſeemed to reproach him with his debaucheries. That writer adds, that while he himſelf was one day declaiming in public, a ſoldier, entering the aſſembly, preſented to Ruſticus, who was hearkening to him with great attention, a letter from the emperor. Hereupon he immediately interrupted his diſcourſe; but Ruſticus, putting the letter, without even opening it, into his boſom, deſired him to purſue his ſpeech, and would not open the letter till Plutarch had done [s]. Dion Caſſius writes, that Domitian, not long before he was killed, dreamt that Ruſticus was purſuing him with a drawn ſword [t]. Junius Mauricus, the brother of Ruſticus, who is highly commended by Pliny [u], was baniſhed, as was likewiſe Pomponia Gratilla, the wife of Ruſticus; but they were both recalled by the emperor Nerva [w]. At the ſame time was executed by the emperor's orders one Hermogenes of Tarſus, being accuſed of ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of the emperor, under borrowed names, in a hiſtory which he compoſed: all thoſe, who were concerned in tranſcribing or ſelling it, were condemned to be crucified [x]. The ſame year, and chiefly out of hatred to Ruſticus, who, as we have hinted above, profeſſed the philoſophy of the Stoics, all philoſophers were, by a decree of the ſenate, driven out of Rome, and every laudable ſcience expelled Italy, that nothing which was worthy and honeſt, ſays Tacitus, might any where be ſeen [y]. Epictetus, the famous Stoic, was, in virtue of this decree, obliged to abandon the city [z]. Lucius Teleſinus, who had been conſul in the reign of Nero, choſe rather to retire from his native country, as a philoſopher, than to maintain his dignity there by renouncing the profeſſion [a]. Pliny beſtows mighty encomiums upon the philoſopher Artemidorus, who, on this occaſion, left Rome. He had contracted great debts, but for laudable purpoſes, ſays Pliny, who ſupplied him with money to diſcharge them, when his other friends, tho' poſſeſſed of great wealth, abandoned him in his diſtreſs. The philoſopher would afterwards have reimburſed Pliny; but he generouſly preſented him with the ſum which was owing to him[b]. Pliny went frequently to viſit him in the place of his retirement; by which means he expoſed himſelf to no ſmall danger, his actions and conduct being the more narrowly obſerved, as he was at that time prætor. He was himſelf well appriſed, that Domitian ſuſpected him, as he had lived in great intimacy with Senecio, Helvidius and Ruſticus. And truly, had not Domitian been ſeaſonably cut off, Pliny would have undergone the ſame doom which moſt of his friends had ſuffered: for after the emperor's death, a memorial was found among his papers, preſented to him againſt Pliny by the celebrated informer Metius Carus[c]. Some abandoning Italy, fled to the moſt weſtern coaſts of Gaul; and others to the deſerts of Libya and Scythia. Dion Chryſoſtomus, a celebrated ſophiſt, took ſhelter in the country of the Getæ, where he earned a livelihood by tilling the ground, and carrying water, having always with him, to comfort him in his diſtreſs, a treatiſe of Plato and an oration Demoſthenes[d]. In the height of his perſecution, Apollonius Tyaneus came to Rome, if Philoſtratus is to be credited[e], and was there received with great marks of eſteem and veneration by Caſperius Ælianus, commander of the prætorian guards. He had not been long in the city, ere he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Nerva, Rufus, and Salvidienus Orfitus, whom he ſollicited to conſpire againſt Domitian, and to deliver the world from ſo bloody a tyrant. The author of his life tells us, that the conſpiracy was actually formed; but that the conſpirators putting off, for want of courage, the execution of it, the emperor, in the mean time, ſuſpecting their deſign, accuſed them of treaſon before the ſenate: the charge was not proved; but nevertheleſs Rufus and Orfitus were confined to the iſlands, and Nerva to the city of Tarentum[f]. Orfitus was ſoon after put Pliny ſuſpected by Domitian.

Several illuſtrious perſons baniſhed.

All philoſophers driven out of Rome.

[q] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 2. Suet. c. 10. Dio, l. lxvii. p. 765. Plin. l. i. epiſt. 5. [r] Plin. l. i. epiſt. 14. [s] Plut. curioſ. p. 927. [t] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767. [u] Plin. l. i. epiſt. 14. [w] Plin. l. i. epiſt. 14. & l. v. epiſt 13. [x] Suet. c. 10. [y] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 2. [z] Gell. noct. Attic. l. xv. c. 11. [a] Philoſtrat. ibid. l. vii. c. 5.

Apollonius of Tyaneus comes to Rome.

Encourages Nerva and others to conſpire againſt the emperor.

[b] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 11. [c] Plin. l. vii. epiſt. 27.
[d] Philoſ. ibid. l. vii. c. 2. [e] Idem ibid. l. vii. c. 4. [f] Idem ibid. c. 3. 4.

put to death [g] in the place of his exile. Of Rufus we find no farther mention made by the writers of thoſe times. As for Nerva, if he was baniſhed, as Philoſtratus writes, he returned home the ſame, or the following, year; for he was at Rome, as is plain from Dion Caſſius [h], when Domitian was murdered: nay, that writer takes no notice of the baniſhment of Nerva, which makes us ſuſpect the truth of what Philoſtratus writes, who is often guilty of very conſiderable miſtakes. Sulpicia, a Roman lady of great diſtinction, wrote a poem upon the expulſion of the philoſophers, wherein ſhe inveighs with great bitterneſs againſt Domitian, and even threatens him with death. She is highly commended by Martial for the purity of her manners and the elegance of her compoſition [i]; for ſhe publiſhed ſeveral other pieces, but was not, as ſhe ſeems to boaſt, the firſt Roman of her ſex known to the muſes [k].

THE following year, Domitian entered upon his ſeventeenth and laſt conſulſhip, having for his collegue Flavius Clemens of whom we ſhall ſpeak anon. This conſulate of Domitian is the ſubject of one of the poet Statius's poems [l]. In the beginning of the year was diſcovered a dangerous conſpiracy againſt the emperor; at the head of which was Juvenius Celſus, whom ſome writers take to be the celebrated civilian Publius Jubenius Celſus, who was prætor in the reign of Trajan and conſul in that of Adrian, and is highly commended by Pliny [m]. Be that as it will, Celſus, finding himſelf betrayed, begged and obtained a private audience of the emperor; in which throwing himſelf at his feet, and accoſting him as a deity with the titles of Lord and of God, he proteſted, that as to himſelf, he was quite innocent of the crime laid to his charge; but would, provided he was allowed a ſhort reſpite, diſcover all thoſe who were concerned in the plot, and produce undeniable proofs of their guilt. Hereupon the emperor diſmiſſed him untouched; but Celſus, putting off, under various pretences, from time to time, the promiſed diſcovery, eſcaped by the death of Domitian, which happened the following year, the danger that threatened him [n].

The conſpiracy of Juvenius Celſus.

[g] Suet. c. 10.
[h] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767.
[i] Mart. l. x. epig. 35.
[k] Vide Voſſ. poet. Lat. c. 2, 3.
[l] Stat. ſyl. l. iv. c 1.
[m] Plin, l. vi. epiſt. 5.
[n] Dio, ibid. p. 765.

Dion Caſſius obſerves, that Domitian about this time cauſed the road to be paved leading from Sinueſſa to Puteoli [o]; and Statius ſpeaks of another road by him repaired at a vaſt expence, that, as we conjecture from the poet's words, which led from Rome to Baiæ [p]. This year the fourteenth of Domitian's reign and 95th of the Chriſtian æra, is remarkable for the cruel perſecution, which was by the bloody tyrant raiſed againſt the Chriſtians, of whom infinite numbers were put to death both at Rome and in the provinces, the emperor having diſpatched letters and edicts into the moſt remote provinces of the empire, commanding all thoſe who profeſſed that religion to be treated as declared enemies to the ſtate [q]. This perſecution is taken notice of by Suetonius, who tells us, that he obliged thoſe who lived at Rome after the manner of the Jews, to pay the ſame taxes as if they were really Jews, and treated them with no leſs rigor and ſeverity [r]. That Suetonius meant the Chriſtians, is evident; for all the pagan hiſtorians, whether Greek or Latin, conſtantly ſpeak of them as reſembling the Jews in their manners, tho' not originally of that nation. Among the many illuſtrious perſons, who ſuffered for ſo good a cauſe, we may deſervedly reckon the emperor's own relations; viz. Flavius Clemens, his couſin german and collegue in the conſulſhip, and the two Flaviæ Domitillæ, the one the wife, the other the niece, of Flavius Clemens. He was the ſon of Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Veſpaſian, who was killed by the ſoldiers of Vitellius, while he was governor of Rome, as we have related above. His eldeſt ſon, named likewiſe Flavius Sabinus, was conſul with Domitian in the firſt year of his reign, and, ſoon after, by the emperor's orders, put to death. Flavius Clemens married, in compliance with the emperor's deſire, Flavia Domitilla, who was nearly related to Domitian, but not his ſiſter, as Philoſtratus writes [s]; Domitilla, his only ſiſter, being dead before Veſpaſian was raiſed to the empire [t]. Flavia Domitilla was, as appears pretty plain from Dion Caſſius [u] and Quintilian [w], the daughter of Domitilla, and the niece of Domitian. By her Clemens had two ſons, to

The ſecond general perſecution.

The death of Flavius Clemens.

Some account of that illuſtrious perſon.

[o] Idem, p. 766. [p] Stat. ſyl. iv. c. 3. [q] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 10. Tertull. apol. c. 5. Lactan. perſ. c. 3. Euſeb. chron. c. 17. [r] Suet. c. 12. [s] Philoſtrat. ibid. l. viii. c. 10. [t] Suet. vit. Veſp. c. 3. [u] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 766. [w] Quintilian. l. iv. p. 105.

to whom Domitian as he had no iſſue of his own, reſolved to leave the empire; and therefore changed their names, cauſing one of them to be called Veſpaſian, and the other Domitian. Quintilian [x] tells us, that he was charged with the care of inſtructing and educating the two grandſons of the emperor's ſiſter; which is a convincing proof, that Flavia Domitilla, the wife of Clemens, was daughter to Domitilla the emperor's ſiſter; for theſe two youths were, without all doubt, the ſons of Clemens by Flavia Domitilla [x]. Clemens was this year conſul; but had ſcarce reſigned the faſces, when he was, upon a ſlight and groundleſs ſuſpicion, ſays Suetonius [y], cut off by the emperor's orders. Dion Caſſius tells us, that he was accuſed of impiety or atheiſm; a crime ſays that writer, for which many others were at that time condemned, who had adopted the manners of the Jews [z]. Thus the Chriſtians are conſtantly deſcribed by the Pagan writers, as is evident from Origen and other Chriſtian writers of the primitive times [a]. As for the crime of impiety or atheiſm, this was one of the charges commonly brought againſt the chriſtians, on account of their refuſing to pay any worſhip to the pretended deities of the gentiles [b]. Suetonius, ſpeaking of Flavius Clemens, ſays, he was no-ways to be feared, in reſpect of his ſloth and inactivity; which was another charge, as Tertullian obſerves [c], brought againſt the Chriſtians, on account of the retired life they led, and their deſpiſing the dignities, which by others were ſo ambitiouſly coveted. It is therefore, in our opinion pretty plain, that the only crime alledged againſt Flavius Clemens was, his profeſſing the Chriſtian religion; and conſequently that he ought to be ranked among thoſe illuſtrious heroes, who have ſealed their faith with their blood. A modern writer of great note ſuppoſes St. Clement, who at this time was biſhop of Rome, to have been of the imperial family [d]; but therein confounds him, as we conjecture, with Clement the conſul, aſcribing to the former, what he muſt have read of the latter. Flavia Domitilla, wife to Flavius Clemens, was likewiſe arraigned of impiety; and, beſides, refuſed to comply with the orders of the emperor commanding her to marry another perſon a few days after the death of her huſband [e]. She was therefore baniſhed to the iſland of Pandataria, in the bay of Puteoli, now known by the name of Santa Maria. Euſebius mentions another Flavia Domitilla, confined at the ſame time and for the ſame cauſe, to the iſland of Pontia, near that of Pandataria; and ſuppoſes her to have been the daughter of Clemens's ſiſter [f]. Scaliger takes this Domitilla to be the ſame with the wife of Flavius Clemens, not aware that Euſebius follows therein and quotes a Roman hiſtorian, by name Brutius, who flouriſhed in thoſe times, and whom ſome writers take to be Præſens, named alſo Brutius, to whom one of Pliny's letters is inſcribed [g]. To theſe two illuſtrious women Tacitus perhaps alluded, when he wrote, that Domitian towards the latter end of his reign, drove into exile ſeveral ladies of the prime nobility [h]. St. Jerom mentions Domitilla in particular, whom he honours with the title of ſaint, and tells us, that ſhe ſuffered a long martyrdom in the iſland of Pontia, to which ſhe was confined by Domitian for profeſſing the Chriſtian religion [i]. As to Clemens's two ſons, to whom Domitian deſigned, as we have obſerved above, to bequeath the empire, we find no farther mention made of them by the antient hiſtorians; but we ſuppoſe, that if they were not put to death by Domitian, the excellent princes Nerva and Trajan, who were enemies to all bloodſhed and ſlaughter, ſuffered them to live unmoleſted. Gruter proves from an antient inſcription, that Clemens had likewiſe a daughter, named Flavia Domitilla, who was married to one T. Flavius Oneſimus [k]; but no hiſtorian ſpeaks either of her or her huſband. Trebellius Pollio, in his hiſtory of the thirty tyrants, under the emperor Gallienus, mentions a celebrated commander, by name, Domitian, deſcended from Flavius Clemens and the niece of the emperor Domitian [l]; whence it is plain, that the children of Clemens had iſſue. During this perſecution, St. John was confined to the iſland of Patmos in the Archipelago, where he wrote the Apocalypſe; and a great many illuſtrious champions of the Chriſtian faith, mentioned by the eccleſiaſtic writers, ſuffered for the ſame glorious Flavia Domitilla baniſhed.

[x] Dio, ibid. [y] Suet. c. 15. [z] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 760. [a] Origen. in Celſ. l. i. p. 5. [b] Vide Juſt. apol. i. p. 56. [c] Tertull. apolog. c. 42. [d] Pearſon. epiſc. Ceſtrien. annal. Paulin. p. 215.

Another heroine of the ſame name baniſhed.

Many Chriſtians put to death or baniſhed.

[e] Philoſtrat. ibid. l. viii. c. 10. [f] Euſeb. in Chron. p. 250. [g] Plin. l. vii. epiſt. 3. Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii. p. 698 Scal. in chron. p. 205. [h] Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 45. [i] Hier. epiſt. xxvii. c. 1. [k] Gruter, p. 245. [l] Treb. Poll. hiſt. trig. tyr. c. 11. p. 191. edit. Pariſ.

glorious cauſe death or baniſhment, with a conſtancy and firmneſs worthy of the religion which they profeſſed. Lactantius will have this cruel perſecution to have ended with Domitian's life, and not before; for then all his acts were annulled by the ſenate, and conſequently the edicts which he had enacted againſt the Chriſtians [m]. But two of the moſt antient eccleſiaſtic writers, viz. Hegeſippus, quoted by Euſebius [n], and Tertullian [o], tell us in expreſs terms, that Domitian, before his death, put a ſtop to the perſecution which he had raiſed againſt the church, and recalled all thoſe whom he had baniſhed on the ſcore of their religion. This ſame year, Domitian cauſed Epaphroditus, formerly freed-man and ſecretary to Nero, to be put to death for having aided that prince in diſpatching himſelf, when he ought to have defended him. By this inſtance of ſeverity he hoped to deter his own men from any attempts upon his life; and this, as Dion Caſſius obſerves, was the only motive which prompted him to exert ſuch rigor againſt one whom he had admitted to his confidence, and honoured with the ſame employment which he had enjoyed under Nero [p]. This is, as is commonly believed, the Epaphroditus, to whom Joſephus inſcribed, at leaſt three years before, his antiquities; a plain proof, that he was then in great favour with the emperor.

THE next conſuls were Caius Fabius Valens and Caius Antiſtius Vetus, of whom the former was ninety years old when he entered upon his conſulſhip, and ſeems to have died before it expired [q]. Many prodigies are ſaid to have happened this year, at Rome and in the provinces. The city was for eight months together almoſt daily alarmed with dreadful claps of thunder, and flaſhes of lightning; the capitol, the temple of the Flavian family, and the emperor's own chamber were thunder-ſtruck; the inſcription upon one of the emperor's triumphal ſtatues was beaten off, and, by the violence of the ſtorm, carried into a neighbouring monument; the tree, which had been thrown down in Veſpaſian's time, as we have related above, and roſe up again, fell down the ſecond time; the oracle at Præneſte, which had always returned favourable anſwers, and

The death of Domitian foretold by ſeveral prodigies.

[m] Lact. perſ. c. 3: [n] Euſeb. l. 3. c. 20. [o] Tert. apol. c. 5. [p] Dio. p. 766. Plin. panegyr. Suet. c. 14. [q] Dio, p. 766. Onuph. p. 313. Idat. in faſt, &c.

and promiſed him good fortune and ſucceſs at the beginning of each year, preſaged nothing now but calamities and ſlaughter; Domitian himſelf dreamt, that Minerva, to whom, as his tutelar deity, he paid a particular worſhip, and whoſe feaſt he annually celebrated on the Alban mount, had withdrawn herſelf from the chapel which he had conſecrated to her, telling him, that Jupiter had diſarmed her, and that ſhe could protect him no longer. But nothing terrified him ſo much as the anſwer of an aſtrologer, by name Aſcletarion, and what enſued thereupon; for he being accuſed of having foretold the death of the emperor, and not denying the charge, Domitian aſked him, Whether he knew what would be his own doom? The aſtrologer anſwered, He was to be, and that in a ſhort time he ſhould be, devoured by dogs. Hereupon the emperor, to convince the world of the falſehood of his art, ordered him to be immediately put to death, and his body to be burnt. The firſt part of the ſentence was put in execution; but before the body was half conſumed by the flames, it was blown down, together with the funeral pile, by a violent ſtorm, and devoured, purſuant to the prediction, by the dogs [q]. Another aſtrologer, by name Larginus Proculus, foretold publicly in Germany, that the eighteenth of September would prove the laſt day of Domitian's life. Hereupon he was apprehended by the governor of the province, and ſent to the emperor, in whoſe preſence he maintained the truth of his prediction, and was on that account condemned to be executed on the nineteenth of the aforeſaid month; but Domitian being murdered the day before, as Proculus had foretold, he was not only diſmiſſed unhurt, but preſented by Nerva with a large ſum, and ever after had in great eſteem [r]. No wonder, therefore, that Domitian, terrified with theſe predictions and prodigies, and moreover alarmed by his own guilty conſcience, lived in continual diſquiet: there was no accident ſo trivial, no perſon ſo contemptible, as not to diſmay him, and put him upon ſanguinary precautions. Of the eminent perſons, either of the ſenatorial or equeſtrian order, he was under perpetual apprehenſions, and making daily victims: their wealth

He lives in continual agonies and apprehenſions.

[q] Suet. c. 5. Dio, p. 767. Chron. Alexand. p. 599.
[r] Dio, ibid. Suet. c. 16.

wealth and race, their poverty, names, and quality, frightened him; he feared friends and enemies; thoſe who adviſed him in council, thoſe who diverted him at his leiſure hours, his moſt intimate friends and confidents, were all martyrs to his jealouſy and fury: he dreaded all men and every thing, ſeveral of his freed-men he put to death, depoſed the commander of the prætorian guards, diſcharged great numbers of officers, &c. But the more he made others ſuffer, the faſter he multiplied his own torments. At length he would not ſuffer any criminal, however loaded with chains, to plead before him, till he had firſt ſecured their chains in his hands [s]. A young child, with whom he uſed to divert himſelf, having one day, while the emperor was aſleep, taken a paper from under his head to play with it, the empreſs happening to meet him, deſired to ſee it; when, to her great ſurpriſe, ſhe found it contained the names of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons deſtined to ſlaughter, and her own name at the head of them, with thoſe of Norbanus, of Petronius Secundus, captains of the prætorian guards, and of Parthenius, the emperor's chamberlain. To theſe Domitia immediately communicated the whole, and by them a reſolution was, without further deliberation, taken to diſpatch the tyrant, before he had time to put his bloody deſign in execution [t]. Of this Suetonius takes no notice; but nevertheleſs tells us, that Domitian periſhed by a conſpiracy of his friends and freed-men, not without the privity of his wife [u]. The death of Clemens haſtened, according to the ſame writer, his own ruin [w], either becauſe the cruelty he exerciſed towards thoſe of his own family occaſioned a general dread and deſpair, or becauſe it provoked Stephanus, who was a freed-man and procurator to Domitilla, the wife of Clemens, and beſides was at that time accuſed of having embezzled part of her effects [x]. Be that as it will, Stephanus not only joined the conſpirators, but, as he was a man of great ſtrength, took upon him to diſpatch the tyrant [y]. Domitian had, if Suetonius is to be credited, long before an apprehenſion, not only of the year and day, but of the hour and manner of his death, having been forewarned of what in the end befel him, when he was but a child. One night his father Veſpaſian,

A conſpiracy formed againſt him.

[s] Dio, p. 766. [t] Idem, ibid. [u] Suet. c. 14. [w] Idem, c. 15. [x] Philoſt. ibid. l. vii. c. 10. [y] Dio, ibid. Suet. c. 17.

Veſpaſian, who gave great credit to the predictions of aſtrologers, and retained one of them, by name Seleucus, conſtantly about him, obſerving that Domitian at ſupper abſtained from muſhrooms, derided him as one ignorant of his own fate, ſince he ſeemed to be under greater apprehenſion of poiſon, than of the ſword. This Domitian ever after remembered, and was thence ſtrangely affected by the bare ſight of a drawn ſword or any other weapon. From this diffidence and fear it was, that, however ambitious, he refuſed the new and extraordinary honour that was decreed for him, namely, that as often as he was conſul, a certain number of Roman knights, choſen by lot, ſhould walk before him amongſt his lictors in their robes, with lances in their hands. When the time which he chiefly dreaded and ſuſpected drew near, his jealouſy encreaſed to ſuch a degree, that he cauſed the gallery, in which he uſually walked, to be ſet round with a certain ſtone called phengites, by which images were reflected as in a looking-glaſs; ſo that he could diſcover what was done behind him [z]. The day before he was murdered, he ordered ſome choice fruit, which were preſented to him, to be reſerved againſt the next day, adding, If it be my fortune to uſe them: then turning to thoſe about him, To morrow, ſaid he, the moon will appear bloody in Aquarius, and ſomething will happen which will be much talked of. About midnight he was ſo terrified, that he leaped out of his bed. However, he went the next morning to the forum to adminiſter juſtice, and returned to the palace an hour before mid-day, the time which he chiefly dreaded. Having therefore aſked, what time of the day it was, one of the conſpirators, on purpoſe to deceive him, told him, it was noon. Whereupon overjoyed, as if he had happily eſcaped all danger, he thought of nothing but abandoning himſelf to mirth and jollity. As he was going to bathe, according to the Roman faſhion, before dinner, Parthenus, his chief chamberlain, accoſting him, told him, he had ſomething of great importance to impart to him, and ſuch as could not be deferred. Hereupon the emperor, ordering all his attendants to withdraw, retired to his chamber, where Parthenius introduced Stephanus to him, who the better to diſguiſe his deſign, had appeared for ſome days with his left left arm wrapt up and in a ſling, as if he had received ſome hurt. He preſented to Domitian a memorial, wherein he pretended to diſcover a dangerous conſpiracy formed by his couſin Flavius Clemens, whom he averred to be ſtill alive, and by ſeveral others, whoſe names were all ſet down with the places of their abode. While the emperor was reading the memorial with great attention, Stephanus drawing ſuddenly a dagger, which he kept concealed, ſtruck it into his belly. The emperor finding himſelf wounded, called to a boy, who happened to be in the room, to reach him a dagger which lay under his pillow, and to run for aſſiſtance; but under his pillow was found only a ſcabbard, and the doors were all locked and well ſecured. Domitian, notwithſtanding his wound, ſtruggled ſome time with Stephanus, and even threw him with great violence to the ground, ſtriving to wreſt the dagger out of his hand, and with his fingers, tho' all cut and mangled, to thruſt out his eyes. At length Parthenius, who had withdrawn when Stephanus came in, fearing ſome of the guards might, in the mean time, hearing the noiſe, come to his relief, opened the door of the chamber; and falling upon the emperor with Claudianus, Maximus, Satureius, and a celebrated gladiator, diſpatched him with many wounds. Many, who were not privy to the conſpiracy, alarmed at the noiſe, haſtened to the emperor's apartment; and, finding him wallowing in his blood, killed the brave Stephanus. The other conſpirators made their eſcape as ſoon as the murder was perpetrated [a]. Thus died Domitian, notwithſtanding all his precautions, and his pretended divinity, after having lived forty-four years, ten months and twenty-ſix days, and reigned fifteen years and five days. For his death the common people ſhewed neither grief nor joy; but the ſoldiers, whoſe pay he had encreaſed, and with whom he often ſhared his rapines, bewailed him more than they had done either Veſpaſian or Titus; and would have raiſed great diſturbances, had not their officers, as moſt of them were concerned in the conſpiracy, reſtrained them. The troops quartered in the country of the Getæ, were ready to revolt when they underſtood he had been aſſaſſinated; but the philoſopher Dion

His jealouſy.

He ſeems to have ſome knowledge of his death.

[z] Suet c. 14.

He is wounded by Stephanus.

And diſpatched by him, and the other conſpirators.

He is regretted by the troops.

[a] Idem, c. 17. Dio, p. 676. Philoſt. in vit. Apoll. Ty. p. 485.

Dion Chryſoſtomus, who had retired to that province, as we have related above, checked their fury, by a ſpeech which he made to the mutinous legion upon the guilt of tyrants, and puniſhments due to ſuch as abuſe their power, to the oppreſſion of the people commited to their care [b]. But, on the contrary, the ſenate could not diſguiſe their joy: they aſſembled in haſte, and after having, in the moſt opprobrious manner imaginable, reviled his memory, they commanded ladders to be immediately brought, in order to pull down, and tear to pieces all his images. An infinite number of ſtatues of gold and ſilver, erected to him in the different quarters of the city, were by their orders broken and melted down; his triumphal arches were overturned, and his name declared infamous; nay, they enacted a decree, commanding all inſcriptions, in which he was mentioned, to be razed, his name to be ſtruck out of the conſular tables, his body to be thrown into the Tiber, and his memory to be aboliſhed for ever [c]. Several antient inſcriptions are ſtill to be ſeen, in which the name of Domitian is razed [d]. All his acts were annulled, and thoſe whom he baniſhed recalled. A woman, by name Phyllis, who had been charged with the care of his education, while he was yet an infant, cauſed his body to be privately conveyed upon a bier, as that of a perſon of the meaneſt condition, to a country-houſe ſhe had at a ſmall diſtance from the city; where ſhe burnt it, and carrying the aſhes, without being obſerved, to the temple which he had built for the Flavian family, mixed them with thoſe of Julia the daughter of Titus, whom ſhe had likewiſe brought up. Domitian was the laſt emperor of the Flavian family, and likewiſe the laſt of thoſe princes, who are commonly ſtyled the twelve Cæſars.

The joy of the ſenate.

His ſtatues broken, and his acts annulled.

As the celebrated philoſopher Apollonius Tyaneus acted a chief part in the late revolutions of the Roman empire, and made at this time a great figure in the world, a ſuccinct account of his life and actions cannot be looked upon as foreign to the preſent ſubject, nor be ill received by our readers. Of the other writers who flouriſhed under Domitian, we

Some account of the celebrated philoſopher Apollonius Tyaneus.

[b] Suet. c. 22. Philoſt. ibid. p. 492. [c] Suet. ibid. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769. Macrob. Saturn. l. v. c. 12. Lactan. perſec. c. 3. [d] Goltz. p. 234.

we ſhall ſpeak in our notes (F). Apollonius was born three or four

(F) Theſe were Quintilian, Valerius Flaccus, Martial, Statius, Juvenal, Silius, &c. Marcus Fabius Quintilianus was, according to St. Jerom and Auſonius, a native of Calagorina, now Calahorra, in Old Caſtile. What profeſſion his father followed, we find no-where recorded; for all we know of him is, that he wrote ſome declamations, which are quoted by his ſon (15). Our Quintilian ſtudied rhetoric under Domitius Afer, who was ſtricken in years when Quintilian was very young (16), and died, as is plain from Tacitus (17), in the fifth year of Nero's reign. Hence it is manifeſt, that Quintilian did not come firſt to Rome with the emperor Galba, as St. Jerom ſuppoſes (18); neither can we conclude, as ſome have done (19), from his having ſtudied at Rome while he was very young, that he was born there. He pleaded ſeveral cauſes at Rome before queen Berenice (20), and conſequently under Veſpaſian; for in his reign Berenice came to Rome, and was by Titus ſent back to her own country, in the very beginning of his reign: Veſpaſian having ſettled a ſalary upon the profeſſors of eloquence, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer, Quintilian was the firſt who opened a free ſchool at Rome. He diſcharged that important office with great reputation, and to the ſatisfaction of all, for the ſpace of twenty years; during which time he acquired great wealth, what by a ſalary, what by the preſents made him by the parents of the children whom he inſtructed (21). Both Juvenal and Martial ſpeak of him as an able orator; and Pliny the younger, who was one of his diſciples, ſeems to have entertained a high opinion of him. After he had taught publicly for twenty years, he reſigned his charge, and writ a book about the cauſes of the decay of eloquence (22). Whether this be the dialogue which is commonly aſcribed to Tacitus, we will not take upon us to determine, there being, as to this particular, a great diſagreement amongſt authors. When Quintilian had finiſhed this treatiſe, he was prevailed upon by his friends to undertake a more laborious work, viz. his twelve books of rhetoric, which will be ever admired by all perſons of taſte and judgment. This performance coſt him two years labour, and it was much againſt his will that he publiſhed four years before the common chriſtian æra; for he is ſaid to publiſhed it before he had kept it by him for ſome time, in order to examine it as the work of another. It is inſcribed to one Marcellus Victorius, and filled with commendations of Domitian, altogether unworthy of a man of Quintilian's character (23). While he was employed in compoſing this work, Domitian charged him with the education of his ſiſter's grandſons, as we related above (24). He was afterwards honoured with the conſular ornaments, at the recommendation of Flavius Clemens, then in great favour with the emperor (35). Auſonius ſeems to inſinuate, that, after having acquired conſiderable wealth at Rome, he was, by what misfortune we know not, reduced to earn a livelihood by teaching rhetoric at Beſancon and Lions. Perhaps upon the death of Clemens, who was his chief patron, he was baniſhed Rome (26). Whether it was to him or to another of the ſame name, that Pliny the younger preſented, in a moſt genteel and obliging manner, a conſiderable ſum, on occaſion of the marriage of his daughter with Nonius Celer, has by ſome writers been queſtioned (27). Sidonius Apollinaris beſtows high encomiums upon Quintilian, and equals him to the moſt elegant writers of antiquity (28). As for the declamations which paſs under the name of Quintilian, and are frequently mentioned by the antients, it is evident, they were not written by him, but either by his father, or, as a modern author conjectures (28), by his grandfather, ſince Seneca the elder, the father of Seneca the philoſopher, who flouriſhed in the reign of Auguſtus, ſpeaks of the author of theſe declamations as a perſon more antient than himſelf (29). This is the opinion of M. Pithou concerning the declamations aſcribed to our Quintilian, which he publiſhed in 1580, and inſcribed to the celebrated Thuanus. Beſides theſe, there are nineteen declamations more, commonly thought to have been written by Quintilian; but by Voſſius aſcribed to Poſthumus the younger, who as we ſhall relate in the ſequel of this hiſtory, aſſumed the name of Cæſar, and that of Auguſtus in Gaul, about the year 260 (30).

(15) Quint. l. ix. c. 3. (16) Idem, l. v. c. 7. (17) Tacit. annal. xiv. c. 19. (18) Hier. chron. (19) Vide P. Pagi, p. 432. (20) Quint. l. iv. c. 1. (21) Martial. l. ii. epig. 90. Auſon. de Moſ. p. 268. Sidon. car. ix. ver. 318. (22) Quint. præfat. & l. vi. p. 177.

C. Valerius

(23) Idem, l. iv. præfat. (24) Idem, ibid. (25) Auſon. conſ. p. 387, (26) Idem ibid. (27) Plin. l. vi. epiſt. 32. P. Pagi, p. 247. (28) Sid. Apollin. l. v. epiſt. 10. & l. ii. car. ver. 190. & l. ix. ver. 318. (28) M. Pithou, in præfat. ad Thuan. (29) Sen. declam. l. x. p. 105. (30) Voſſ. rhet. c. 15.

to have lived an hundred years, and died ſoon after the acceſſion

C. Valerius Flaccus Setinus Balbus was a native of Padua, as is evident from Martial (31), and not of Setia in Campania, as ſome have conjectured from the name of Setinus. He wrote an epic poem on the voyage of the Argonauts, divided into eight books, which he began in the reign of Veſpaſian, to whom it is inſcribed, and continued under Domitian; for he was, according to Voſſius, prevented by death from putting the laſt hand to it (32). He died while Quintilian was writing his books of rhetoric, that is, in the latter end of Domitian's reign. Quintilian (33) and Martial (34) commend his performance; but the moſt able critics amongſt the modern writers ſpeak of it with the utmoſt contempt, diſcover in it a great many material faults, and few, if any, beauties (35).

The poet M. Valerius Martialis, ſo famous for his epigrams, was a native of Bilbilis, (36), which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from the preſent city of Calataïud in the kingdom of Arragon (37). He was born in the reign of Claudius, came to Rome in that of Nero, being then twenty years old, and lived there thirty years (38), favoured by the emperors, eſpecially by Domitian, whom on all occaſions he flatters in a moſt ſhameful manner. Upon that prince's death he left the city, and retired to his own country; where after three years, which he paſſed without writing, he was prevailed upon by Terentius Priſcus to compoſe his twelfth book, in which he ſpeaks of the emperors Nerva and Trajan (39). Pliny, in whoſe commendation he had written an epigram, had a particular kindneſs and eſteem for him; whence he preſented him, upon his departure from Rome, with a ſum of money to defray the expences of his journey (40). As to his writings, the emperor Lucius Verus uſed to call him his Virgil (41); but few, either before or ſince that prince's time, ſeem to have entertained ſuch a mighty opinion of his compoſitions. Scaliger approves of what he himſelf wrote of his epigrams viz. that ſome of them were good, ſome indifferent, and ſome bad. Moſt critics have found fault with his ceſſion of Nerva to the empire, which happened in the ninety-ſixth his thoughts, his ſtyle, and, above all, with his puns, which are often very low, and with his pretended witticiſms (42). Beſides, ſome of his epigrams are, for their lewdneſs, infamous, perhaps beyond any thing written in the Latin tongue. His epigrams are compriſed in fourteen books; beſides which, that de ſpectaculis is commonly aſcribed to him, tho' Voſſius takes it to be a collection of verſes written partly by Martial, and partly by other poets of that time, upon the ſhews which Titus exhibited in the year eighty of the chriſtian æra (43). Martial died, as we conjecture from Pliny's letters, about the end of the firſt century. He is by Lampridius (44) ſurnamed Cocus, perhaps becauſe his father, or he himſelf in his youth, followed that mean profeſſion.

(31) Martial. l. i. epigr. 62, 77, 87. (32) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 46. (33) Quint. l. 10. c. 1. (34) Mart. ibid. (35) Vide Bail. poet. c. 1163. p. 396. (36) Mart. l. xii. epig. 18. (37) Baudr. & Bail. poet. p. 412. (38) Voſſ. ibid. p. 46. (39) Mart. l. xii. præf. epig. 18, 4, 6, 8. & l. x. epig. 34. (40) Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 21. (41) Lamprid. vit. ver. p. 15.

Statius flouriſhed at the ſame time; but is never mentioned by Martial, which ſome aſcribe to jealouſy, Statius being highly eſteemed by Domitian, on account of his making, with extraordinary eaſe, extemporary verſes upon any ſubject whatever; which Martial durſt not attempt. He wrote two epic poems, viz. the Thebais, compriſed in twelve books, and the Achilleis, which conſiſts only of two, the poet being prevented by death from accompliſhing that work (45). They are both inſcribed to Domitian. Beſides theſe two poems, he wrote ſeveral other pieces upon various occaſions, which have likewiſe reached us, under the title of Sylvæ, and are comprehended in five books. His compoſitions were mightily eſteemed at Rome in his own time, and are ſtill admired by the young poets; nay, Julius Scaliger is of opinion, that of all the antient poets he comes neareſt to the inimitable Virgil. But better judges look upon Statius rather as a bad hiſtorian than a good poet, and deſpiſe his bombaſt ſtyle, and odd expreſſions. His Sylvæ, which were for the moſt part written off-hand, and without premeditation, are by moſt critics more eſteemed than his epic poems, there being in them ſome very good thoughts, mixed with ſuch as are quite trivial and common (46). Some writers have confounded P. Statius Papinius, who was a native of Naples, with Statius Surculus, or rather Uſulus, who was born in Toloufe, and, in the reign of Nero, taught rhetoric in Gaul (47). Statius acquired great fame by his Thebais, but no wealth; whence he was obliged to write pieces for the theatre, and ſupport himſelf by (42) Vide Bail. ibid. (43) Voſſ. poet. Lat. c. 3. (44) Lamp. in vit. Alex. p. 126. (45) Bail. ibid. p. 425. (46) Idem ibid. p. 426. (47) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 45.

ſixth year of the chriſtian æra. The ſurname of Tyaneus by that means (48). One Placidus Lactantius, who flouriſhed in the ſixth century, wrote a learned comment upon Statius, which has not reached our times (49).

Decius Junius Juvenalis was contemporary with Statius and Martial, and continued to write under Nerva and Trajan; for he ſpeaks of the baniſhment of Marius Priſcus, who was condemned in the third year of Trajan's reign, and one hundredth of the chriſtian æra (50). He was born at Aquinum, whence he came to Rome while he was yet very young, and there gained great credit by his ſatires, which were read by many Romans, who peruſed no other book (51). It were much to be wiſhed, that in cenſuring the manners of others, he had not ſhewed himſelf quite deſtitute of modeſty, nor inveighed againſt the abuſes which prevailed in his time, in a manner rather calculated to teach his readers to be vicious, than to inſpire them with averſion to vice. From his life, written many ages ſince, and quoted by Sidonius Apollinaris (52), it appears, that a player, in great favour at court, offended at ſome verſes of his ſeventh ſatire, had intereſt enough with the emperor to get him removed from Rome and ſent into Egypt, to command a legion quartered in the utmoſt bounds of that province; where he died ſoon after of grief, being fourſcore when he was obliged to undertake that journey. Some writers conjecture this player to have been one Pylades, who was highly favoured by Trajan. Quintilian in all likelihood alluded to Juvenal, when he wrote, that, in his time lived ſome poets, authors of ſatires, who would one day be ranked amongſt the beſt writers (53). Salmaſius is of opinion, that the antient ſcholiaſt of Juvenal was contemporary with Spartianus, who flouriſhed under Dioclefian and Conſtantine the great (54). Julius Scaliger and ſome other critics prefer Juvenal to Horace; but now-a-days few, if any, men of taſte acquieſce to their judgment, thinking they ſufficiently honour Juvenal, by placing him amongſt the Latin ſatiriſts next to Horace, but next at a great diſtance.

Caius Silius Italicus wrote a poem, highly commended by Martial (55), on the ſecond Punic war. Before he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, he had pleaded many years at the bar, and had even been conſul; which office he diſcharged

(48) Juv. ſat. vii. ver. 83. (49) Voſſ. ibid. (50) Juv. ſat. iv. (51) Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 374. (52) Sid. Apoll. carm. ix. ver. 274. (53) Quint. l. x. c. 1. (54) Salmaſ. in Spartian. p. 162. (55) Mart. l. iv. epig. 14.

neus he borrowed from the city of Tyana in Cappadocia, the the year that Nero was killed. He is not by our modern critics much eſteemed as a poet; but greatly commended for the purity of his ſtyle, wherein he is thought to excel all the writers of his time (56). He adheres with great exactneſs to truth, and relates ſome events, which we read no-where elſe (57). He died in the ſecond year of the reign of Trajan, by abſtaining from all food, being no longer able to bear the pain occaſioned by an impoſtume, which the phyſicians could not cure (58). He died the laſt of all thoſe who had been conſuls under Nero, and was himſelf the laſt conſul under that prince (59). From what he ſays of Domitian (60) it is plain, that he wrote after the war with the Dacians. Moſt writers have ſuppoſed him to be a native of Italica, and thence called Italicus; but Italicus was, as appears from the letters of Pliny and the conſular tables, not an epithet, but his name; and beſides had he been born in Italica, he would have thence been called Italicanus, or Italicenſis (61).

Voſſius is of opinion, that Terentianus, who, in Martial's time, governed Syene in Egypt (62), is the ſame perſon with Terentianus Maurus, who wrote a poem on the meaſure of verſes, which has reached our times, and is greatly eſteemed by all perſons of taſte; but others aſcribe that excellent performance to Poſthumius Terentianus, to whom Longinus, about the year 270, inſcribed his book "on the ſublime." Several other poets are mentioned by Martial as flouriſhing at this time, namely Curtius Montanus, Turnus, and Scæva Memor, who were brothers; Aruntius Stella, Codrus or Cordus, Paceius, Fauſtus, Rubrenus Lappa, M. Unicus, Ligurinus, Theodorus, Canius, Licinianus, Voconius Victor, and Paſſienus Paulus (63). Turnus acquired, it ſeems, great reputation by his ſatires, and was, though of a mean deſcent, very powerful at court under the emperors Titus and Domitian (64). Scaliger aſcribes to Scæva Memor, upon what grounds he has not thought fit to impart to us, the tragedy entitled Octavia, which is commonly believed to have been written by Seneca (65). Suidas mentions one the place of his nativity. His birth was foretold and accompanied, if the author of his life is to be credited [e], by many prodigies. When he was but fourteen years old, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Pythagoric philoſophy, firſt at Tarſus, the capital of Cilicia, and afterwards at Ægæ, another city of the ſame province, under the direction of one Euxenes, whoſe manners did not anſwer his profeſſion. But Apollonius following his precepts, without regarding his manners, retired at the age of ſixteen to a houſe in the country, led there a life of great auſterity, abſtaining, purſuant to the maxims of his ſect, from all manner of fleſh, ſuffering his hair to grow, going barefoot, and clad only in linen, that he might uſe nothing proceeding from any living creature. From his country-houſe he removed, after ſome time, to the temple of Æſculapius in the city of Ægæ, where he ſoon became known, great numbers of votaries flocking daily to the temple of that pretended deity, for the preſervation or recovery of their health. There Apollonius began to ſet up for a cenſor and reformer of manners, having already, it ſeems, a mighty opinion of his own virtue [f]. His father dying about the time that Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, was accuſed of having betrayed the Romans, that is, about the ſeventeenth year of the chriſtian æra, he took poſſeſſion of his inheritance; but reſerved a ſmall ſhare of it for himſelf; the greateſt part of it he yielded to his brother, who led a vicious and diſſolute life, from which he was by this means retrieved; the reſt, ſave a very ſmall portion, he divided amongſt his neceſſitous relations. Being thus diſengaged from every thing that could divert him from the ſtudy of philoſophy and the practice of virtue, he paſſed five years in ſilence, agreeable to the cuſtom of the Pythagorics; wherein he found, as he himſelf

(56) Vide Bail. poet. p. 392. (57) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 29. (58) Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 7. (59) Idem ibid. (60) Silius Ital. l. iii. p. 51. (61) Vide Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 42. & Bail. poet. p. 388. (62) Martial. l. i. epig. 87. & Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 47. (63) Vide Voſſ. ibid. (64) Juv. ſat. i. p. 4. Mart. l. vii. epig. 96. (65) Voſſ. ibid. p. 48.

He applies himſelf to the ſtudy of the Pythagoric philoſophy. The auſterity of his life.

And diſintereſtedneſs.

one Epaphroditus, author of ſeveral books upon the grammar; which have been long ſince loſt. He was a native of Bœotia, had been ſlave to Modeſtus governor of Egypt; but afterwards became famous at Rome in the reign of Nero, and died in that of Nerva, in the ſeventy-fifth year of his age (66).

[e] Philoſt. vit. Apoll. Ty. l. i. c. 3. [f] Idem, c. 6—9.

(66) Suid. p. 966.

ſelf owned, great difficulty. During that time, he appeaſed, ſays the author of his life, ſeveral tumults and ſeditions in Cilicia and Pamphylia, eſpecially at Aſpenda, one of the chief cities in the latter province, where the populace roſe, and were ready to burn the chief magiſtrate alive, for not obliging ſome of the wealthy inhabitants to produce their corn, during the famine, and ſell it at a reaſonable price. He went afterwards to Antioch, to Epheſus, and to ſeveral cities, where he took upon him to revive the worſhip of ſome deities or idols, which now began to be neglected. He practiſed every-where ſecret myſteries, to which thoſe alone were admitted, who had obſerved ſilence for the ſpace of four years. He took upon him the character of legiſlator, pretending to require nothing of others, but what he had performed himſelf: he even boaſted a thorough knowledge of all languages, without ever having learnt them; and had the impudence to give out, that the moſt ſecret receſſes of mens hearts and their moſt private thoughts lay open to him [s]. However, he had yet but ſeven diſciples, and theſe too abandoned him, as ſoon as he declared his intention of travelling as far as India, to viſit the philoſophers there, known by the name of Bramans, or Bracmanes; ſo that he left Antioch, attended only by two domeſtics; but at Niniveh was joined by Damis, a native of that place, who of all the diſciples he ever had, proved the moſt addicted to him; for he obſerved with great attention, and carefully regiſtered, not only his moſt minute actions, but even his words. Theſe memoirs of Damis falling afterwards into the hands of Julia Auguſta, the wife of the emperor Severus, ſhe imparted them to Philoſtratus, who chiefly copied from them what he wrote of his pretended hero. Apollonius, on his journey from Niniveh to Babylon, learned, as he paſſed through Meſopotamia, what to his time had been a great ſecret, namely, that of underſtanding the anſwers of the oracles delivered by birds. Thus this wiſe philoſopher adopted the follies peculiar to each country through which he paſſed. Upon his arrival at Babylon, he was received by the mages of the place, with whom he often conferred in private. Philoſtratus deſcribes Babylon as a city above ſeventy miles in compaſs, with walls of an extraordinary height and breadth, as if it had been no leſs magnificent and beautiful

His impudence and preſumption.

His favourite diſciple Damis.

He arrives at Babylon.

[s] Idem, c. 10—25.

beautiful in the time of Apollonius, than formerly in that of Nebuchadonezzar; whereas it is plain from Pliny, who was contemporary with Apollonius, that Babylon then lay in ruins, and ſcarce any building remained, except the temple of Belus [h]. Trajan, who, not many years after, was prompted by a commendable curioſity to viſit ſo celebrated a place, found it quite buried in its ruins [i]; and Pauſanias, who wrote in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, tells us, that Babylon, the greateſt city the ſun ever ſaw, had in his time nothing left but its walls. Theſe remained long after, the ſpace within being made a park by the Parthian kings for the keeping of wild beaſts, and the diverſion of hunting. It is therefore plain, that Philoſtratus was no leſs miſtaken in his deſcription of Babylon, than he is in ſuppoſing, that the kings of Parthia, in the time of Apollonius, reſided there, it being plain from Strabo, that they then paſſed the winter at Cteſiphon near Seleucia, and the ſummer at Ecbatana [k]. He tells us, that the king's name who then reigned was Vardanes, and that, two years and two months before, he had recovered his kingdom, which had been unjuſtly ſeized by his brother Gotarzes, adding, that Apollonius paſſed twenty months at the court, and found, about ſix months after, the ſame prince ſtill on the throne [l]; ſo that according to Philoſtratus, Vardanes muſt have reigned four years and upwards: whereas it is plain from Tacitus [m], that Vardanes began to rule over the Parthians in the ſeventh year of Claudius's reign, and was dead ſome time before the end of the ninth. Apollonius left Babylon, and, taking leave of the king, ſet out for India; where he was received with great marks of eſteem by a king named Phraothes, of whom Philoſtratus relates wonders; and by him introduced to Hiarchus, the chief of the Bramans, who at that time was but eighteen years old. If what Philoſtratus relates of theſe philoſophers be true, they were far from being gods, tho' they impiouſly paſſed themſelves for ſuch upon the undiſcerning multitude [n]. Apollonius paſſed four months with them, held frequent conferences with the chief men amongſt them, to which not even Damis was admitted, and ever after entertained a mighty opinion of their ſect. After he had had learned all the myſteries of their profeſſion, he left India; and returning by ſea, landed at the mouth of the Euphrates, or rather the Tigris; went from thence by land to Babylon, then to Niniveh, and from Niniveh to Antioch. He was not, it ſeems, much admired at Antioch; for, after a ſhort ſtay in that city, he removed to Ionia, and ſettled in that country, reſiding ſometimes at Epheſus, and ſometimes at Smyrna [o]. He is ſaid to have undertaken with incredible ſucceſs the reformation of manners, firſt at Epheſus, and afterwards in the other cities of Ionia, reclaiming, what by his precepts, what by his exemplary life, ſuch at were entirely abandoned to all manner of lewdneſs and iniquity [p]. From Ionia he went to Ilium, where he embarked for Leſbos, and from thence ſailed to Athens, in which city he reformed innumerable abuſes, and utterly aboliſhed the inhuman ſpectacles of gladiators. He travelled all over Greece, reviving every-where the antient ſuperſtition of the Greeks, and eſtabliſhing the idolatrous worſhip of the gods. The Eleans invited him to the ſports, which were to be celebrated on occaſion of the CXth olympiad, ſeven years before Nero undertook the cutting of the iſthmus, and conſequently in the year of the chriſtian æra 61. He complied with their invitation, and, by his warm exhortations, inſpired many both Greeks and foreigners, with the love of virtue and abhorrence of vice. At Corinth he was kindly received, and ever after admired by Demetrius, the moſt celebrated Cynic of thoſe days, and his diſciple Menippus. At Lacedæmon, where he paſſed great part of the winter, he is ſaid to have perſuaded the inhabitants to reſume their antient manner of living [q]. But of this great and remarkable reformation, no notice is taken by any other writer. In the beginning of the ſpring, he ſailed from Lacedæmon to Crete, and from thence to Rome, where he ſtayed performing wonderful things, related at length by the author of his life, till he was obliged to quit the city, in virtue of an edict enacted by Nero, driving all philoſophers out of Rome. He then retired to Cadiz, where, in a private conference with Galba, he encouraged him to revolt from Nero, and aſſume the ſovereignty. From Cadiz he croſſed over to Returns to Aſia, and there undertakes the reformation of manners.

His travels to India.

[h] Plin. l. vi. c. 26. [i] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 785. [k] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 743. [l] Philoſt. ibid. l. i. c. 15, 19. [m] Tacit. annal. xi. c. 8, 9, 10. [n] Philoſt. l. iii. c. 6, & 9.

He encourages Galba to revolt from Nero.

[o] Idem, c. 15, 16. [p] Idem, l. 4. c. 1, 2. [q] Idem c. 3——11.

to Africa, from Africa to Hetruria, and thence to Sicily, where he received the tidings of Nero's death. However, he would not return to Rome, but ſailed to Achaia or Greece, where he remained the winter, and early in the ſpring paſſed over into Egypt, where he was followed by vaſt crouds, the ſuperſtitious Egyptians flocking from all quarters to hear and ſee him. Philoſtratus would fain perſuade us, that Veſpaſian went into Egypt for the ſame purpoſe; but of the true motive of his journey, we have ſpoken elſewhere. However, Veſpaſian, who was not exempt, as Tacitus obſerves, from ſuch ſuperſtition, while he was in Egypt, went to viſit Apollonius, and ſeemed to entertain a mighty opinion of him. He conſulted him in private about the ſtate of his affairs, and paid great deference to his judgment. Dion and Euphrates, two celebrated philoſophers, adviſed Veſpaſian to renounce the ſovereignty, after he had overcome Vitellius, and reſtore the republic to its former liberty. But Apollonius oppoſed their ſentiments, which occaſioned a warm debate, Apollonius being, it ſeems, impatient of all contradiction. Veſpaſian followed the opinion of Apollonius, who thereupon took the liberty to inſtruct him how to govern with equity and moderation. Veſpaſian would have rewarded him with great generoſity for his excellent precepts; but the philoſopher would not accept the leaſt acknowledgment[r]. From Alexandria Veſpaſian departed for Rome, and Apollonius ſoon after for Ethiopia, with a deſign to viſit the philoſophers of that country, whom Philoſtratus calls Gymnoſophiſts; a name by all other writers given to the philoſophers of India. Of the thirty diſciples he had at this time ten only accompanied him in his journey, the others chuſing to remain at Alexandria. He was at firſt received very coldly by the Ethiopian philoſophers, who had been prejudiced againſt him by Euphrates; but they were ſoon reconciled to each other, and held ſeveral private conferences, which Apollonius interrupted to view the ſources of the Nile; but he did not go beyond the third cataract. He returned to Egypt, about the time that Titus took the city of Jeruſalem, which he entered on the eighth of September of the year 70. The next year Titus returned to Rome, and was met by Apollonius at Argos, who the ſame year travelled travelled all over Phœnicia, Ionia, Cilicia; viſited ſeveral cities of Greece; and, if Codinus is to be believed, went to Byzantium, and there ſet up ſeveral taliſmans, or magical figures, which remained till the year 870, when the emperor Baſilius cauſed them to be removed [s]. From Byzantium, he returned to Greece, and from thence to Rome; where he endeavoured to ſtir up the people againſt the emperor Domitian, and exhorted Nerva, who was afterwards emperor, to head them. Domitian was informed of his private practices, and at the ſame time told, that in the neighbourhood of Rome he had ſacrificed a child, in order to diſcover by viewing its entrails, what ſucceſs would attend Nerva, if he engaged in the conſpiracy. Hereupon the emperor wrote to the governor of Aſia, whither Apollonius was already retired, ordering him to ſeize him, and ſend him in chains to Rome. But Apollonius, before the order arrived, had left Aſia, in order to return to Rome. At Puteoli he found Demetrius the celebrated Cynic, who acquainted him with the emperor's edict, ordering all the philoſophers to depart Rome; and at the ſame time exhorted him to retire, leſt he ſhould fall a ſacrifice to the rage of Domitian, who bore an irreconcileable hatred to all philoſophers, and to him in particular. Apollonius replied, that he could not follow his advice, without betraying Nerva; and that he was very ſure it was not in the power of the tyrant to put him to death. He therefore purſued his journey to Rome, in the habit peculiar to philoſophers; but obliged Damis, his only companion, to quit it, leſt he ſhould be diſcovered and ſeized [t]. He no ſooner arrived at Rome, than the emperor ordered Caſperius Ælianus, captain of the prætorian guards to ſeize him. Caſperius, who had a particular veneration for him, under pretence of examining him in private, inſtructed him how to make his defence, when ſummoned before the judges; and then, as he durſt not diſmiſs him, committed him to priſon; where Apollonius comforted his fellow priſoners, fifty in number, and encouraged them to bear their confinement, and the miſeries attending it, with conſtancy and patience. After he had been thus confined for the ſpace of ſix days, he was brought before the emperor, who examined him

Is conſulted by Veſpaſian.

Travels into Ethiopia.

[r] Idem. l. v. c. 3——14.

Goes to Rome.

Where he is ſeized, and impriſoned by Domitian's orders.

[s] Georg. Codin. origines Conſtantinop. l. vii. c. 2——6.

[t] Philoſt. ibid.

him concerning the deſigns of Nerva. Apollonius anſwered, That Nerva had never entertained the leaſt thought of conſpiring againſt him, or aſſuming the ſovereignty, tho' he was at that time actually contriving, according to Philoſtratus, the means of depoſing the emperor, and ſeizing the empire, being inſtigated thereunto by Apollonius himſelf[u]. Domitian, finding he could draw no ſatisfactory anſwer from him, ordered his beard to be ſhaved, a great affront to a philoſopher; and commanded him to be led back to priſon, loaded with chains, from which, however, he was two days after diſcharged, at the requeſt of Caſperius. While he was in bonds, he aſſured Damis, who attended him even in priſon, that the emperor, notwithſtanding his great power, could not hurt him; and, in ſo ſaying, drew with great eaſe his leg out of the chain. He was a few days after brought again before the emperor; who, after having examined him in the preſence of many perſons of diſtinction, declared him innocent, and afterwards had a private conference with him, in which Apollonius diſplayed to him the great evils that muſt neceſſarily enſue from the prince's giving ear to informers. As for myſelf, ſaid he, I am not under the leaſt apprehenſion: you may cauſe me to be ſeized; but put me to death you cannot; that the laws of fate and my deſtiny will not allow. Apollonius, having thus ſpoke, diſappeared, and was ſeen that evening at Puteoli, three days journey diſtant from Rome[w]. From Puteoli he paſſed over into Sicily, and from thence into Greece, where he remained two years, followed and admired by vaſt crowds, and perſons of all ranks and ages, whom, by his precepts and example, he animated to deſpiſe wealth, and place their whole happineſs in the purſuit of virtue. From Greece he returned to Ionia, reſiding partly at Smyrna, and partly at Epheſus; but frequently viſiting all the cities of that province. While he was diſcourſing to a numerous aſſembly at Epheſus, the ſame minute that Domitian was ſlain, he began all on a ſudden to lower his voice, as if he had been ſeized with fear; but nevertheleſs purſued his diſcourſe for ſome time, tho' faintly, and often ſtopping, as if he had been intent upon ſomething elſe. At length he quite gave over ſpeaking, fixed his eyes ſtedfaſt on the ground; and, after a ſhort

Is brought before the emperor, and by him declared innocent.

Is acquainted with Domitain's death the very minute it happens.

[u] Idem, ibid. c. 3, 12, 14.

[w] Idem, c. 17.

ſhort ſilence, Strike home, he cried, ſtrike the tyrant home! As the numerous aſſembly was greatly ſurpriſed, he no ſooner returned to himſelf, than he bid them be of good cheer and rejoice; For the tyrant, added he, is dead; he is juſt now expired [x]. The ſame thing is related by Dion Caſſius, as an event not to be doubted; nay, he adds, that Apollonius, during his trance, as he calls it, named Stephanus, crying out ſo as to be heard by the whole aſſembly, Courage, brave Stephanus! courage! diſpatch the tyrant [y]. Nerva, who ſucceeded Domitian, had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the empire, than he wrote to Apollonius, inviting him to Rome. The philoſopher returned anſwer, That by the decrees of fate, they were never more to ſee one another. However, ſome time after he wrote to the emperor a letter, filled with excellent precepts for governing with equity and moderation. This letter he ſent by Damis, whom he charged to deliver to the emperor ſeveral rules of government by word of mouth in his name. While Damis was at Rome he received advice, that Apollonius had diſappeared; whence he concluded, that he had ſent him to Rome, on purpoſe that he might not be preſent at his death: hence he is generally thought to have died this year, the firſt of Nerva's reign, and ninety-ſixth of the chriſtian æra. Damis, in his memoirs, made no mention of his death; and Philoſtratus declares, that in his time no one could give any probable account of it. Some pretended he died at Epheſus; others related, that he went into a temple at Lindus in the iſland of Rhodes, and was never afterwards ſeen. Philoſtratus aſſures us, that tho' he had travelled into ſeveral countries, he could no-where find his tomb, nor hear any certain account of the manner of his death [z]. This ſuccinct account of the life of Apollonius is ſwelled by Philoſtratus with a great number of miracles and predictions, upon which he makes long deſcants. Amongſt other miracles wrought by his hero, he tells us, that he reſtored to life a young woman of a conſular family; but at the ſame time ſeems to doubt, whether or no ſhe was quite dead: and truly, had he ever wrought ſuch a miracle, he would have been, as Euſebius rightly obſerves [a], more famous than he Is invited to come by Nerva, but refuſes to go thither.

He diſappears.

Miracles aſcribed to him.

[x] Idem, l. viii. c. 10. [y] Dio, l. vii. p. 768

[z] Philoſt. l. viii. c. 13. [a] Euſeb. in Hier. p. 461.

he ever was. His prodigies are atteſted only by Philoſtratus, who, as Lipſius obſerves [m]; is guilty of many groſs miſtakes, and often contradicts himſelf in what relates to the Roman hiſtory. What can ſeem leſs probable than his account of what paſſed at the interview between Apollonius and Domitian? Euſebius calls his book a Romance; and Photius looks upon it as a heap of inconſiſtent fables [n]. Moſt the fathers ſpeak of it in the ſame ſtyle [o], as do likewiſe Suidas [p] and the moſt judicious among the modern writers, viz. Scaliger [q], Vives [r], Voſſius [s], Caſaubon [t], &c. Many of the pagans themſelves ſeem to have entertained but a very indifferent opinion of Apollonius, notwithſtanding his boaſted virtue and miracles. Even thoſe who bore him no hatred looked upon him as a magician, and ſcrupled admitting him to their myſteries [u]; nay, the ſame opinion ſtill prevailed in the time of his panegyriſt Philoſtratus, as he himſelf witneſſes [w]. Lucian, ſpeaking of one of his favourite and moſt faithful diſciples, calls him a celebrated and profeſſed magician [x]. In the epitome of Dion Caſſius by Xiphilin, we read, that the wicked emperor Caracalla had a particular eſteem for Apollonius, whom he looked upon as the moſt accompliſhed impoſtor and ſorcerer the world had ever ſeen. No one can peruſe his life, tho' written with the utmoſt partiality, without diſcovering in all his actions a great deal of pride, arrogance, and preſumption, and an extraordinary opinion of his own virtue. Before his journey to India, when the image of the Parthian king was ſhewn him, and he commanded to adore, according to the cuſtom of the country, he returned to the king's officers this arrogant and haughty anſwer; The prince whom you adore, may reckon himſelf happy, if he deſerves by me to be only eſteemed and commended [y]. He imagined himſelf poſſeſſed of all virtues in an eminent degree, took upon him every-where the character of cenſor, legiſlator, inſtructor,

What opinion the antients entertained of him.

His pride, arrogance, and preſumption.

[m] Lipſ. Tacit. hiſt. l. iii. n. 80. [n] Euſeb. ibid. Phot. c. 44. p. 29. [o] Vide Aug. epiſt. xlix. Chryſ. in Jud. hom. iii. [p] Suid. p. 376. [q] Scaliger. in Euſeb. chron. [r] Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 15. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Caſaub. in Spart. p. 229. [u] Philoſt. l. iv. c. 6. l. viii. c. 8. [w] Idem, l. 2. c. 3. [x] Lucian. vit. Alex. p. 476. [y] Philoſt. l. i. c. 14, 15, 19.

inſtructor, &c. pretended to know every thing, to foreſee future events, to be acquainted with the moſt hidden thoughts of thoſe with whom he converſed; nay, he ſuffered himſelf to be by the multitude acknowledged for a god, and divine worſhip to be paid him; which he indeed once refuſed, but the only motive which prompted him to reject it was, fear of being envied [z]. Philoſtratus cries up his diſintereſtedneſs and the purity of his manners; but tho' he would receive no preſents from kings or emperors, yet he accepted, and even aſked, a conſiderable ſum of one of the pontiffs [a]. As to the purity of his manners, he was commonly thought not to be free from all blame [b]; at leaſt his favourite diſciples wallowed, if Lucian is to be credited, in all manner of lewdneſs [c]. As he held the metempſychoſis, or tranſmigration of ſouls, he cauſed a lion to be publicly adored, pretending, that the ſoul of Amaſis, one of the antient kings of Egypt, had paſſed into that animal [d]. Philoſtratus endeavours to excuſe, in the beſt manner he can, his hero for quarelling with the philoſopher Euphrates, on whom he lays all the blame. But either the ſame writer, or another of the ſame name, who had read the life of Apollonius, and often refers his readers to it, owns, that neither Apollonius nor Euphrates behaved on that occaſion as became philoſophers [e]. However, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts both of Apolnius and his panegyriſt, to diſcredit and cry down Euphrates, he was, two hundred years after his death, generally eſteemed the greateſt philoſopher of his time [f]. Apollonius himſelf, before their quarrel, ſpoke of him to Veſpaſian as a man of an unblemiſhed character, not foreſeeing for all his pretence to a prophetical ſpirit, that he was ſoon to change his ſtyle, and inveigh againſt him as one of the moſt wicked of men [g]. Pliny the younger, who was intimately acquainted with Euphrates, beſtows mighty encomiums upon him [h]; and Arrian, in his comments upon Epictetus, [z] Idem, l. vii. c. 6. l. i. c. 20. l. viii. c. 2. l. iv. c. 10.

[a] Idem, l. viii. c. 7. [b] Philoſt. vit. ſophiſ. p 568.
[c] Lucian. vit. Alex. [d] Philoſt. vit. Apoll. l. v. c. 15.
[e] Philoſt. vit. ſoph. c. 7. p. 492. [f] Euſeb. in Hier. p. 464, 465. [g] Idem, ibid. p. 463. [h] Plin. l. i. epiſt. 10.

Epictetus, not only extols his eloquence, but commends him greatly for having lived like a philoſopher, before he aſſumed the habit peculiar to that profeſſion [i]. He died in the beginning of Adrian's reign, with whoſe permiſſion he put an end to the infirmities attending old age with a draught of poiſon [k]. He publiſhed ſome writings againſt Apollonius, which Philoſtratus promiſes to refute [l]. Eunapius ſeems to aſcribe other works to him upon more noble ſubjects, by which he gained great reputation [m]. As no one could give any certain account of the death of Apollonius, his countrymen, the inhabitants of Tyana, believed him immortal, and conſecrated a temple to him cloſe to their city [n]. His images were ſet up in many temples; and the emperors, inſtead of checking, countenanced this ſuperſtition, by the honours which they themſelves paid to the impoſtor. Adrian collected and lodged in the palace at Antium a great many of his letters [o]. Antonius Caracalla honoured him with divine worſhip, and conſecrated a temple to him [p]. The emperor Alexander kept his image in a private place of his palace, together with the images of our Saviour, of Abraham, and of ſeveral princes, who had governed with equity and moderation [q]. Vopiſcus tells us, that he read in certain memoirs, and alſo heard of perſons of credit, that the emperor Aurelian being reſolved to give up the city of Tyana to be plundered by his ſoldiers, Apollonius appeared to him, and diverted him from that deſign; and adds, that the emperor, convinced by that miraculous apparition, that Apollonius was a god, vowed to him an image, a temple, and a ſtatue [r]; but whether he performed his vow, Vopiſcus does not inform us; neither does he vouch the truth of the apparition, tho' he profeſſed a particular veneration for Apollonius, and even deſigned to write his life in Latin, as Philoſtratus had done in Greek, that his ſtupendous actions, ſays he, may be known to the whole world. But, notwithſtanding the great eſteem which ſeveral of the emperors had for him, and his many pretended miracles, he was at the beginning of the Honours paid him after his death.

[i] Arrian. Epict. l. iii. c. 15. & l. ii. c. 8. [k] Dio, l. 69. p. 791. [l] Philoſt. l. i. c. 10. [m] Eunap. in vit. ſophiſt. præfat. [n] Idem ibid. [o] Philoſt. l. viii. c. 13, 14. [p] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 878. [q] Lamp. in vit. Veri, p. 123. [r] Vopiſc. in vit. Aurel.

the fourth century, generally looked upon as an impoſtor and a magician [s]. Eunapius, who wrote in the beginning of the fifth century, attempted to retrieve the reputation of his pretended hero [t]; but was therein attended with no better ſucceſs, than a late writer of no mean character; for in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of men, falſehood muſt in the end yield, and truth prevail. Philoſtratus has tranſmitted to us ſeveral letters written by Apollonius, moſt of them very ſhort, with a long apology, which he had compoſed with a deſign to pronounce it before Domitian, not knowing [u], tho' a great prophet, that the emperor would not hear it, and that in writing it he laboured to no effect. Beſides this apology and a great number of letters to perſons of all ranks and conditions [w], he wrote a treatiſe upon judicial aſtrology, compriſed in four books [x], and another upon ſacrifices, wherein he pretended to ſhew with what kind of victims each deity was moſt pleaſed. The former treatiſe was not much eſteemed: but the latter was received with general applauſe. It is once quoted by Euſebius [y], and mentioned likewiſe by Suidas [z]. His theology, out of which Euſebius quotes a paſſage [a], and his treatiſe upon ſacrifices are in all likelihood one and the ſame work.

His works.

[s] Lact. l. 5. c. 3. [t] Eunap. in præfat. [u] Philoſt. l. viii. c. 3. [w] Idem, l. iii. c. 13. [x] Idem, l. iv. c. 6. [y] Euſeb. de præp. evang. l. iv. c. 13. p. 376. [z] Suid. [a] Euſeb. demonſt. evang. l. iii. c. 3.

CHAP.

GE

of the Memo

all its I of ye B

A GENERAL MAP of the ROMAN EMPIRE

Shewing the Situation of all its Provinces &c of its Seats of its Barbarous Nations on their Frontiers.

ATLANTIC OCEAN.

Picts

Hibernia

BRITAIN

Caledonia

Angles Saxons

Jutes

GERMANY

Saxons

Sicambri

Burgundians

Bavarians

Suevi

Goths & Vandals

Huns

Pannonia

The European Sarmatia

The Bastarnæ

Palus Maotis

SCYTHIA

Seine

Paris

Loire

GALLIA or GAUL

Segusiani

Lions

Provence

Rhone

Gallicia

Spain

Lusitania

Lisbon

Tarragona

Carthagena

Cadiz

Straits of Hercules

Tingis

Mauritania Tingitana

Mauritania Cæsariana

Mount Atlas

Getulia

PART of AFRICA.

ITALY

Rome

Brundusium

Sardinia

Sicily

Utica

Carthagena

Numidia

Tripolitana

LIBYA.

DESERTS of LIBYA.

Scythia

Dacia

Macedonia

Thrace

Epirus

Greece

Peloponnesus

THE EUXINE SEA.

Paphlagonia

Abidos

ASIA MINOR

Armenia

Assyria

Mesopotamia

The River Euphrates

Babylonia

Comagena

Syria

Cyprus

Phœnice

Palestine

Egypt

Alexandria

Cyrene

Temple of Ammon

ARABIA the DESERT.

ARABIA FELIX

THE RED SEA

The Deserts of Thebes

IBERIA

THE CASPIAN SEA

THE PERS

OCEAN.

Picts

Hibernia

BRITAIN

Cimbri

Angles

Saxons

Scandi

GERMANY

Burgundian

Bavarians

Seine

Paris

GAUL or GALLIA

Loire

Segnani

Pannonia

Quadi

Goths afterwards Huns

The European Sarmatia

The Bastarnæ

Palus Mæotis

The Cherso-nese

THE EUXINE SEA.

IBERIA

THE CASPIAN SEA

ORAL or SALT SEA

SCYTHIA IN ASIA.

Lions

Provence

Gallicia

Rhone

Aragona

Lusitania

Rome

ITALY

Dacia

Scythia

Thrace

Macedonia

Epirus

Greece

Peloponnesus

Sicily

Abydos

Paphlagonia

ASIA MINOR

Armenia

Assyria

Mesopotamia

Tigris

Euphrates

Comagena

Syria

Phœnicia

Cyprus

Rhodes

Carthagena

Cadiz

Straits of Hercules

Tingis

Mauritania Tingitana

Mauritania Cæsariana

Utica

Carthage

Mount Atlas

MEDITERRANEAN SEA

Alexandria

Cyrene

Tripolitana

Getulia

PART of AFRICA.

LIBYA.

Egypt

Pelusium

ARABIA the DESERT.

Babylonia

THE PERSIAN GULPH

Temple of Ammon

DESERTS of LIBYA.

ARABIA FELIX

THE RED SEA

The Deserts of Thebes

J. Wheatley &c

A IN ASIA.

CHAP. XX.

From the death of Domitian, the laſt of the twelve Cæſars, to the death of Trajan, who brought the empire to its utmoſt grandeur and extent.

HAVING delivered in this and the foregoing volumes, purſuant to our plan, the hiſtory of Rome, from Romulus to the commonwealth, from the commonwealth to the empire, and continued it to the death of Domitian, the twelfth emperor, and the laſt of thoſe princes, who are commonly ſtyled the twelve Cæſars; we ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of the other emperors, from the reign of Domitian, to the removal of the imperial ſeat to Conſtantinople, thence to the diviſion of the empire, and from the diviſion to the hiſtory of both empires; of the weſtern, to the taking of Rome by Odoacer, when with Auguſtulus fell the very name of an empire in the weſt; of the eaſtern, to the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, to its recovery by the Greeks; and finally, to its utter deſtruction by the Turks, whoſe hiſtory, from the firſt notice we find of them to the preſent time, will follow, as in its proper place. Theſe are the ſubjects we deſign to purſue in their order, not doubting, but they will prove as uſeful and entertaining as any of the preceding parts of this hiſtory, notwithſtanding the extraordinary ſucceſs which they have met with both at home and abroad, and which we had not vanity enough to have promiſed ourſelves in ſo difficult an undertaking. The foregoing chapter we cloſed with the death of Domitian, who was ſucceeded by Nerva, as was Nerva by Trajan. The reigns of theſe two excellent princes will ſupply us with matter for the preſent chapter.

M. Cocceius Nerva emperor.

THE death of Domitian was no ſooner divulged, than the ſenate aſſembled, and with one voice declared M. Cocceius Nerva emperor. He was a native of Narnia in Umbria; but his family came originally from the iſland of Crete, ſo that he was neither by birth a Roman, nor deſcended from an Italian family. However, his father, grandfather, and great-grandfather had been honoured in Rome with the conſular dignity. His grandfather, M. Cocceius Nerva, one of the moſt learned civilians in Rome, was conſul in the eighth year of Tiberius's reign and the twenty-ſecond of the chriſtian æra, accompanied that prince in his retirement, and, affected with the ſadneſs of the times, choſe, when in perfect health, a voluntary death [a]. His father, who bore the ſame name, was conſul in the fourth year of Claudius and fortieth of the chriſtian æra [b]. His mother, by name Plautilla, was deſcended from an illuſtrious family, being the daughter of one Lænas a conſular [c]. The emperor was born, according to Dion Caſſius [d], on the ſeventeenth of March, in the eighteenth year of Tiberius's reign and thirty-ſecond of the chriſtian æra, and was by Nero, in the twelfth year of his reign, honoured with the

His family.

His preferments.

prætorſhip and a ſtatue in the palace [e], having by his elegant poems (for he was one of the beſt poets of his time) gained the affection of that prince, who even inſcribed to him ſome of his poetical pieces [f]. Pliny ſpeaks of his epigrams and commends them [g]. He was conſul with Veſpaſian in the year 71, and with Domitian in 90 [h]. He is commended by all the antients as a prince of a moſt ſweet and humane temper, of great moderation and generoſity, and one who looked upon himſelf as raiſed to the empire, not for his own advantage, but for that of his people; and truly the happineſs and welfare of thoſe who lived under him were, during the ſhort time he reigned, his only end and purſuit. He ſeems to have been naturally timorous [i]; and ſome writers charge both him and Trajan with exceſſive drinking [k]. Apollonius Tyaneus was the firſt, if Philoſtratus is to be credited, who ſolicited him to aſſume the ſovereignty, or at leaſt to deliver Rome from the tyranny of Domitian. Nerva hearkened to him; but his courage failed him, when the deſign was to be put in execution [l].

His humanity, generoſity, &c.

[a] Tacit. annal. iv. c. 8. Aur. Vict. epit. Eutrop. Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767. Front. aquæduct. p. 119. Onuph. in faſt. p. 198.
[b] Onuph. ibid. [c] Gruter. p. 246. [d] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 771.
[e] Tacit. annal. xv. c. 7. [f] Martial. l. viii. epigr. 70. & l. ix. epigr. 27. [g] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 8. [h] Front. aquæd. p. 219. [i] Aur. Vict. in vit. Trajan. [k] Idem ibid.

cution [l]. Apollonius, however, did not ſcruple denying the whole to Domitian, aſſuring him, that Nerva, tho' equal to the greateſt honours, was ſo far from procuring them by unlawful means, that he would not accept them, if offered, dreading nothing ſo much, on account of his infirmities and his love of retirement, as being any-ways concerned in the adminiſtration of public affairs [m]. However, Domitian, either acquainted with Nerva's deſign, or giving credit to the aſtrologers, who adviſed him to beware of Nerva, ſince his nativity ſeemed to promiſe him the empire, confined him to Tarentum in the year 94; and would have put him to death, had not a more kind aſtrologer aſſured the emperor, that Nerva, who was of a weak conſtitution and ſubject to many infirmities, would die in a few days [n]. Aurelius Victor writes, that Nerva, dreading the cruelty of Domitian, had retired to Gaul, and was there when he received the news of the tyrant's death, and his own aſſumption to the empire [o]. On the other hand, Dion Caſſius takes no notice of his baniſhment; but ſuppoſes him to have been at Rome when Domitian was murdered: for he tells us, that Parthenius and the other conſpirators offered the empire, before the aſſaſſination of Domitian, to ſeveral perſons; who, looking upon ſuch an offer as a ſnare laid for their deſtruction, declined it; but that at length Nerva, who daily expected to be ſacrificed to the jealouſy of the emperor, was prompted, by his own fear, to accept the ſovereign power, as the only means of preſerving his life [p]. Domitian therefore being killed on the eighteenth of September of the year 96, Nerva was the ſame day declared emperor by the ſenate, and, as ſuch, acknowledged by the prætorian guards, notwithſtanding their concern for the death of the late emperor, which they would have revenged, had they not been reſtrained by Petronius Secundus, one of their captains, and by Parthenius, Domitian's chief chamberlain [q]. Nerva had ſcarce aſſumed the ſovereignty, when a falſe report was ſpread, that Domitian was ſtill alive, and the news of his death only an artifice to diſcover the deſigns of ſuch as he ſuſpected: hence dread ſeized all, and the Narrowly eſcapes death under Domitian.

Is acknowledged emperor by the ſenate and ſoldiery.

[l] Philoſt. in vit. Apoll. Tyan. l. vii. c. 3. [m] Idem ibid. c. 14. &. l. viii. c. 3. [n] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769. [o] Aur. Vict. in epit. [p] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767. [q] Plin. panegyr. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769.

concourſe about the new emperor diſperſed in a moment. Nerva himſelf, naturally wary and timorous, was ſtruck ſpeechleſs, betrayed great diſmay in his countenance, and, fallen from the higheſt hopes, waited for preſent death, till Parthenius aſſured him, that the report was quite groundleſs. Hereupon recovering his former temper, he went firſt to the camp of the prætorian guards, and thence, after he had ſecured them by a promiſe of the uſual donative, to the ſenate, where he was received with the greateſt marks imaginable of eſteem and affection. Many congratulatory ſpeeches were made to him on this occaſion; but that of Arrius Antonius, grandfather to the emperor T. Antonius by his mother, was of a different nature from the reſt; for embracing the new emperor, with whom he had long lived in great intimacy, "I am come, ſaid he, with the reſt, to con"gratulate the ſenate, the people of Rome, and the "provinces of the empire, upon your advancement to this "high poſt; but cannot pay the ſame compliment to
"you, who, after having, by your wiſdom and virtue,
"happily eſcaped the rage of ſo many wicked princes,
"plunge yourſelf into new dangers and troubles, being
"expoſed to the cenſure and hatred both of your friends
"and foes, eſpecially of the former, who will not fail,
"if any of their ſuits are denied, to become your moſt
"implacable enemies [r]". Nerva now confirmed in the ſovereignty both by the ſenate and ſoldiery, blended together two things, ſays Tacitus [s], once thought irreconcileable; public liberty and ſovereign power: for under him the Romans enjoyed all the former, and felt none of the evil effects of the latter [t]. He immediately delivered from their fears, and ſet at liberty, all thoſe who had been, under the late emperor, arraigned of treaſon, and recalled ſuch as had been baniſhed under colour of the ſame crime [u], cauſing their lands and inheritances to be reſtored to them, without the leaſt deduction. Pliny mentions many illuſtrious perſons, who returned from baniſhment on this occaſion [w]; and a medal ſtruck the following year, which has reached us, bears the following legend; 'exules Romæ redditi,'

The Romans happy under him.

[r] Aur. Vict in epit.
l. ix. epiſt. 13.
l. iv. epiſt. 11.

[s] Tacit. vit. Agrip. c. 3.
[u] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769.

[t] Plin.
[w] Plin.

redditi,' that is, the exiles reſtored to Rome [x]. However, he would not ſuffer Licinianus, who had been baniſhed for debauching a veſtal, to return to Italy; but gave him leave to paſs the remainder of his life in Sicily [y]. He enacted more ſevere laws againſt informers, than Titus had done, who abhorred that race of men; and cauſed all the ſlaves and freed-men to be put to death, who had informed againſt their maſters and patrons. Beſides theſe, many other informers were publicly executed, and among them a philoſopher, by name Seras. At the ſame time, he publiſhed an edict, forbidding, agreeable to the antient laws of Rome, a ſlave or freed-man to appear againſt his maſter in any accuſation whatſoever; and ordering, that no perſon ſhould, for the future, be accuſed of violated majeſty, or proſecuted for living after the manner of the Jews [z], by which words Dion, without all doubt, meant the Chriſtians. He ſolemnly ſwore, that no ſenator ſhould ever by his orders be put to death; and religiouſly obſerved his oath, tho' ſome of that body conſpired againſt him, as we ſhall relate anon. All the goods and effects belonging to particulars, which he found in the palace, he ordered to be immediately reſtored to the proprietors; leſſened the taxes; delivered the Jews from the cruelties and oppreſſions of the collectors of the public revenues; and, to the great ſatisfaction of the Romans, annulled the law of Auguſtus, ordering the twentieth part of each inheritance and legacy to be paid into the exchequer. He allowed no gold or ſilver ſtatues to be erected to him, retrenched all ſuperfluous expences, aboliſhing for that purpoſe divers ſacrifices and public ſhews; and as he ſtill wanted money wherewithal to relieve the neceſſitous citizens and reward his friends, he at laſt ſold great part of the gold and ſilver plate, and rich furniture, both of his own houſe and of the imperial palace, with ſeveral houſes and eſtates. In ſelling them, he was not difficult as to the price; but ſeemed overjoyed to have ſo favourable an opportunity of obliging many. He laid out a vaſt ſum upon a purchaſe of land, to be divided amongſt the poor of Rome, appointing ſome ſenators of known integrity, and amongſt the reſt one Corellus, highly eſteemed by Pliny [a],

Punishes all informers.

Aboliſhes the law of majeſty.

Redreſſes grievances.

His generoſity towards the people.

[x] Birag. numiſ. p. 144.
[y] Euſeb. l. iii. c. 20.
[z] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769.
[a] Plin. l. vii. epiſt. 31.

to divide it amongſt the moſt indigent [b]. From ſeveral medals of this year appears, that he twice divided conſiderable ſums among the people, beſides the lands, and moreover a large quantity of corn [c]. The children of ſuch as were poor he cauſed to be brought up, in all the cities of Italy, at the public expence. He eaſed not only Italy, but all the provinces, of the heavy impoſitions with which they had been burdened by Veſpaſian and Domitian; and utterly aboliſhed the tribute upon all carriages, which was generally looked upon as an inſufferable grievance: hence the ſenate cauſed ſeveral medals to be ſtruck, to perpetuate by that means the remembrance of ſo great a favour [d]. Of the many inſtances of his diſintereſtedneſs taken notice of by the antients, we ſhall only relate the following: Atticus, a citizen of Athens, father to the famous Herodes Atticus, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the reign of T. Antoninus, having diſcovered in his houſe a large treaſure, wrote to Nerva, deſiring to know how he ſhould diſpoſe of it. The emperor, who had no biaſs to avarice, anſwered, Utere, Uſe it; but Atticus, not thinking himſelf yet ſecure, wrote to him a ſecond letter, acquainting him, the treaſure was too great for a private perſon, and that he was thence afraid to uſe it. To this the generous prince replied in two words, Ergo abutere, Then abuſe it, ſignifying thereby, that the treaſure was his without reſerve, and that he might diſpoſe of it as he thought fit *. Nerva renewed the law of Domitian, forbidding the caſtration of children [e]; and by one edict confirmed all the grants of that prince. He publiſhed a law forbidding any one to marry his niece, which was firſt allowed in the reign of Claudius [f]; applied himſelf with great care to the reformation of manners; was aſſiduous in the adminiſtration of juſtice; and, in ſhort, behaved in ſuch a manner towards all, that he uſed to ſay, he believed he might reſign the empire, and return with ſafety to a private life, not being conſcious to himſelf of having done the leaſt thing that could give any man juſt motive of offence [g]. He was perhaps too kind to ſuch as were altogether unworthy of his favours; which gave occaſion

His diſintereſtedneſs.

Some of his laws.

[b] Dio, ibid. p. 770. Zonar. p. 199. Chron. Alexand.
[c] Birag. numiſ. p. 143. [d] Idem, p. 144. * Philoſt. in vit. ſophiſt. p. 546. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 770. [f] Idem, ibid. [g] Idem, ibid.

caſion to ſome perſons to complain of his lenity and indulgence. Having one day invited to his table, beſides many other perſons of diſtinction, Junius Mauricus, who had been baniſhed by Domitian, and Fabricius Veiento, a conſular, who, with his ſecret informations, had occaſioned the ruin of many illuſtrious citizens in the preceding reign, one of the gueſts happened to mention Catullus Meſſalinus, a noted informer under Domitian, when the emperor, hearing him named, What would Catullus do, ſaid he, were he alive now? If he were alive now, replied Mauricus with great freedom, he would be at table with us; which was a gentle reflection on the emperor's lenity and kindneſs to Veiento and others, whom he ought rather to have puniſhed than careſſed [h]. As ſoon as, by the death of Domitian and aſſumption of Nerva, public liberty was reſtored, to uſe the expreſſion of Pliny [i], all who had ſuffered by falſe accuſations flocked to the ſenate, demanding, that condign puniſhment might be forthwith inflicted on ſuch as had informed againſt them. The ſenate hearkened to their requeſt, and puniſhed ſome with death, others with baniſhment; but not without great partiality, ſparing thoſe of their own body. Hereupon Pliny boldly undertook the accuſation of Publicus Certus, who was not only of the ſenatorial order, but had been by Domitian named to the conſulſhip with Vectius Proculus. The ſenate, having firſt attempted in vain to perſuade Pliny to drop the proſecution, referred in the end the whole affair to the emperor, who contented himſelf with confirming the conſulſhip to Vectius, and naming another to that dignity in the room of Certus, who died ſoon after of grief [k]. Nerva did not think it adviſeable to condemn him, as was then commonly believed, becauſe he lived in great friendſhip with the governor of Syria, who was at the head of a powerful army; which gave no ſmall umbrage to Nerva [l]. Beſides, in the heat of the firſt proſecutions, ſome perſons, among the reſt the philoſopher Seras, had been puniſhed with death as informers, and aftewards found innocent; which gave the good-natured emperor great uneaſineſs [m].

His too great lenity and indulgence.

[h] Vict. epit. Plin. l. iv. epiſt. 22. [i] Plin. l. ix. epiſt. 13. [k] Idem, ibid. Dio, p. 769. [l] Plin. ibid. [m] Dio, ibid.

On the calends of January, Nerva entered upon his third conſulſhip, which was the firſt after his acceſſion to the empire, and choſe for his collegue L. Verginius Rufus, to whom the ſoldiers had often offered the empire. As Verginius was riſing, after he had aſſumed the faſces, to pronounce a ſpeech in praiſe of the emperor, according to the cuſtom which then obtained, he let a book drop out of his hand, and as he ſtooped to take it up, fell himſelf, and had the misfortune to break his leg; which, as he was then in the eighty-third year of his age, occaſioned his death. He was by the emperor's orders, buried with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, and Cornelius Tacitus, the hiſtorian, whom Nerva named to the conſulate in his room, pronounced his funeral oration [n]. Pliny wrote another panegyric upon him, in a letter which he ſent to one of his friends, acquainting him with the death of that illuſtrious citizen [o]. This year, Calpurnius Craſſus, deſcended from the antient and illuſtrious family of the Craſſi, conſpired with ſome others againſt Nerva; who, being immediately informed of their wicked deſigns, ſent for them, and carrying them with him to the public theatre, placed them next himſelf, and preſented to them, as Titus had done on the like occaſion, the ſwords of the gladiators, which were always brought to and viewed by the emperor [p]. We are not told what effect this inſtance of generoſity had upon the conſpirators. All we know is, that Craſſus, having owned his crime, was, with his wife, baniſhed to Tarentum. The ſenate were for condemning both him and his accomplices to death: but the emperor, alledging the oath he had taken not to ſpill the blood of any ſenator, checked their zeal. Whereupon Fronto, to whom Nerva had reſigned the faſces, offended at the prince's unſeaſonable clemency, as he ſtyled it, ſaid boldly, that it was a great misfortune to have a prince, under whom all things were criminal and forbidden; but a ſtill greater to be governed by one, under whom all things were allowed [q]. The emperor was ſo far from reſenting this freedom, that thenceforth he acted with ſomewhat more ſeverity, taking for his counſellors ſuch of the ſenators as were perſons of great experience and Verginius Rufus dies.

Calpurnius Craſſus conſpires againſt Nerva.

Who pardons him.

[n] Plin. l. ii. epiſt. 1. p. 770. Vict. ibid.
[o] Idem, ibid.
[p] Dio.
[q] Dio. p. 769.

and known integrity, and diſpatching, with their advice, all matters of conſequence. The ſame year, the prætorian guards headed by Ælianus Caſperius their commander, occaſioned diſturbances in the city, under colour of revenging the death of Domitian; flew to the palace, and there beſieged Nerva, demanding with great boldneſs, that all thoſe who had been any-ways concerned in the aſſaſſination of the late emperor, might be forthwith delivered up to them, or publicly executed. Nerva, tho' naturally timorous, behaved on this occaſion with incredible firmneſs; for, offering his bare neck to the incenſed ſoldiery, he begged they would be ſatisfied with his life, and ſpare thoſe, to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom, on that account, he could not in honour abandon. But his reſolution was to no effect; he was in the end conſtrained, as Pliny writes [r], to condemn thoſe, whom he ſtudied to preſerve at the expence of his own life; for the ſoldiers, without being in the leaſt awed or moved by him, cut in pieces Petronius Secundus, Parthenius, and the other conſpirators, as we read in Victor the younger, or as he is by ſome ſtyled, Victorinus [s]. Neither did the mutinous ſoldiery ſtop here, but obliged the emperor to return them public thanks before the people, for putting to death the worſt and moſt wicked of men [t]. This inſolence and boldneſs of the ſoldiery proved in the end very advantageous to the empire; for Nerva, finding himſelf deſpiſed on account of his infirmities and old age, reſolved to name ſome perſon for his ſucceſſor, who ſhould be able, both to ſupport him, and to govern with equity and moderation after his death. He was not without many relations and friends of his own; but, as he had more at heart the welfare of the empire, than the grandeur of his family, he overlooked them, and choſe Ulpius Trajan, the greateſt and moſt deſerving perſon of that age, for his ſucceſſor, and at the ſame time adopted him in the capitol, declaring his adoption with a loud voice thus: With my hearty wiſhes for the proſperity of the ſenate and people of Rome, and that what I do may prove fortunate to them and myſelf, I declare Marcus Ulpius Trajan my ſon. He afterwards gave him the title of Cæſar, with that of Germanicus, which he himſelf ſeems to have aſſumed about this time, inveſted him with

The prætorian guards raiſe a tumult.

Nerva is obliged to comply with their unjuſt demands.

He adopts Ulpius Trajan.

[r] Plin. panegy. [s] Vict. in epit. [t] Idem, ibid.

with the tribunitial power, and even honoured him with the title of emperor; ſo that he created him not only his ſucceſſor, but his partner in the empire: at the ſame time, he named him conſul for the enſuing year [u]. The adoption of Trajan, which was received with great joy both by the ſenate and people, put a ſtop to the diſorders committed by the ſoldiery, who immediately returned to their duty. As Trajan was then at the head of a powerful army in Lower Germany, Nerva ſent him a diamond of great value, and wrote to him with his own hand, acquainting him with his preferment, and leaving to him the revenging of the affront put upon him by the prætorian guards and their commander. Some time after, Trajan ſent for Caſperius and thoſe of his party, under colour of employing them in ſome expedition; but inſtead of making uſe of them, diſcharged them all with ignominy [w], or, as ſome write, put them to death. Towards the cloſe of this year, Nerva took upon him the title of imperator, on account of a victory gained over the Germans in Pannonia [x], of which we know not the particulars.

The death of Nerva.

THE following year, he entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having Ulpius Trajan, now the ſecond time conſul, for his collegue; but died ſoon after, according to ſome, on the twenty-firſt, according to others, on the twenty-ſeventh, of January. For having heated himſelf in chiding with great acrimony the celebrated informer Aquilius Regulus, he was ſeized with a fever which as he was weak and ſtricken in years, ſoon put an end to his life, after he had reigned ſixteen months and eight, or at moſt nine, days. He had lived, according to Dion Caſſius [*], ſixty-five years ten months, and as many days; according to Eutropius, ſeventy-one, and according to St. Jerom, ſeventy-three, years [y]. He died in the Salluſtian gardens, whence his body was carried by the ſenate to the tomb of Auguſtus [z]. He was ranked among the gods, and Trajan out of gratitude cauſed ſeveral temples to be erected to him, both in Rome and the provinces [a].

Is ranked amongſt the gods.

He

[u] Vict. ibid. Sid. car. vii ver. 114. Plin. panegyr. Dio, l. lxix. p. 770. [w] Dio, ibid. [x] Plin. panegyr. Birag. numiſm. p. 145. [*] Dio, ibid. [y] Euſeb. chron. [z] Vict. epit. [a] Plin. panegyr. Eutrop. Sid. car. vii. ver. 113.

He was, no doubt, a prince of great wiſdom, generoſity, and moderation; but ſome of the provinces were more grievouſly oppreſſed in his reign than in that of Domitian, the governors, who dreaded Domitian, preſuming upon the lenity and goodneſs of his ſucceſſor, to enrich themſelves at the expence of the unhappy people committed to their care. Theſe grievances Nerva would not have failed to redreſs, had he lived long enough to know them.

Trajan. TRAJAN was a Spaniard both by birth and extraction, deſcendedrat her of an antient, than an illuſtrious, family, born in Italica, near Seville, now known, according to ſome by the name of Old Seville, according to others, by that of Alcala del Rio [b]. His father, named alſo Trajan, had been honoured with the conſulſhip, diſtinguiſhed with triumphal ornaments, and raiſed, no doubt, by Veſpaſian to the rank of a patrician [c]. Trajan, commander of the tenth legion, who ſignalized himſelf at the taking of Japha, as we read in Joſephus [d], was, we conjecture, father to the preſent emperor, who was born, according to moſt writers, in the twelfth year of the reign of Claudius, and fifty-ſecond of the chriſtian æra [e]. He followed the profeſſion of arms from his early youth, and ſerved ten years in quality of tribune [f]. He checked the pride of the Parthians, ſays his panegyriſt, while he was yet very young, and defeated their meaſures with the bare fame of his name [g]. But he then commanded, in all likehood, under his father, to whom he gave, when emperor, the title of Parthicus, as appears from various medals [h]. He was prætor in the year 86, and conſul in 91, with Acilius Glabrio. Soon after his conſulſhip, he withdrew to Spain, dreading the cruelty of Domitian, and there led a retired life, till he was by that prince recalled, and appointed governor of Lower Germany [i]; which muſt have been after the revolt and defeat of Antoninus in 88, for had he had any ſhare in that victory, Pliny would have mentioned it in his panegyric. While he was governor of Germany, he performed nothing which his panegyriſt

His family, anceſtors and preferments.

thought

[b] Vide Baudr. p. 394. [c] Plin pan. Eutrop. [d] Joſeph. bell. Jud. c. 11. [e] Eutrop. Goltz. Gruter. &c. [f] Plin. panegyr. [g] Idem, ibid. [h] Spanh. l. vii. p. 851. [i] Dio, l. lxvii. p. 765. Spartian. p. 1, 8. Plin. panegyr.

thought worthy mentioning, since he only says, that while he governed Germany, he gained the affections of the soldiery, but, notwithstanding their inviolable attachment, never entertained the least thought of revolting from the worst of princes, to whom he had sworn allegiance, and seizing, as he might, the empire for himself [k]. He was still governor of Germany, when Nerva adopted him for his son, appointed him his successor, and took him for his partner in the empire, as we have related above. To this choice Nerva was directed by the extraordinary merit of Trajan, and a sincere desire of continuing to all the nations subject to the empire, that happiness which they enjoyed in his reign. And truly Trajan possessed in an eminent degree all those qualities which form a great, and excellent prince. He was, when preferred to the empire, in the forty-second, or, as some will have it, the forty-fifth, year of his age, and consequently neither subject to the vices of youth, rashness, and precipitation, nor to the weakness and indolence attending old age. His body was robust and inured to fatigue; his countenance comely and majestic; his stature regular and tall; and his behaviour extremely engaging [l]. He was not himself a man of learning, having from his childhood been brought up in the camp; but favoured the learned, and encouraged in others what he himself wanted. As to military affairs, he was, without dispute, the best commander of his age, and equal to the greatest generals of antiquity. In every duty of war he was indefatigable; he marched always on foot at the head of the army, even after he was emperor, and crossed immense countries without ever once mounting on horse-back, or suffering himself to be carried, as other emperors had done, in a chariot or litter. His diet was such as chance presented. In his garb and general dress he little varied from a common soldier. Upon consultations and dispatches he bestowed nights and days. He never retired to his tent till he had visited the whole camp, and was always the first in the field when the usual exercises were to be performed. He was acquainted with all the old soldiers, called them by their names, remembered their exploits, and familiarly conversed with them; but at the same time knew how to keep them to their duty [m]. He was great in

Is adopted by Nerva.

Trajan an excellent commander.

[k] Idem, ibid. [l] Plin. ibid. [m] Plin. ibid. Dio. l lxviii. p. 772.

in war, and equally great in peace. When he firſt aſſumed the ſovereign power, he publicly profeſſed, that he did not think himſelf in that high ſtation more exempt from the obſervance of the laws, than the meaneſt of the populace; and accordingly took an oath to obey them, which he religiouſly obſerved; and thence Pliny ſays, that all the emperors before him had made the ſame profeſſions, but their profeſſions were not believed. What they had promiſed to be, Trajan was; for he poſſeſſed the place of a lawful prince, only to prevent the exerciſe of lawleſs power [n]. He delighted to ſee his people happy, and had nothing ſo much at heart as to make them ſo. To accompliſh this, he chearfully leſſened his revenue, leſſened his authority, and reſtrained his prerogative, where it ſeemed in the leaſt to interfere with the intereſt and happineſs of his people. He was aware, that over-bearing pride was not the means to win affection or eſteem, and that condeſcenſion in a prince is not irreconcileable with his dignity, but rather a ſure way to raiſe it: he therefore lived with his people rather like a father with his children, than a prince with his ſubjects [o]. He advanced none but the moſt virtuous and worthy; and ſuch as were otherwiſe, he choſe to reform and reclaim rather with gentleneſs and clemency, than with rigor and ſeverity. On his taking upon him the empire, he declared in full ſenate, that no good man ſhould ever be put to death by his orders, which he confirmed by a ſolemn oath, and religiouſly obſerved it. He ſuffered but few ſtatues to be erected to him, checked ſuch as offered to flatter him, and would not allow any extraordinary honours to be conferred upon him. His palace was conſtantly open to perſons of all ranks, whom he received with extraordinary kindneſs, heard with great patience, and ſtrove, as far as in him lay, to diſmiſs none from his preſence diſſatisfied; looking upon himſelf as raiſed to that high poſt, not for his own advantage, but for that of others. To his other great qualities, he added that of veracity, acting in council, in public negotiations, and with private men, without thoſe little artifices which wiſe men deſpiſe, and none but the apes of wiſe men practiſe. He would never ſuffer any one to be condemned upon ſuſpicions, however ſtrong and well-grounded, ſaying, it was better a thouſand criminals ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, than one

His moderation, affability, generoſity and other virtues.

[n] Plin. ibid. [o] Idem ibid. Dio, p. 773. Vict. in epit.

one innocent perſon be condemned [p]. When he appointed Suburanus captain of his guards, in preſenting him, according to cuſtom, with a drawn ſword, the badge of his office, he uſed theſe memorable words; "Pro me; ſi merear, in me: Employ this ſword for me; but turn it, if I deſerve it, againſt me [q]." He allowed none of his freedmen any ſhare in the adminiſtration, telling them, that he, and not they, was inveſted with the ſovereign power, and therefore warning them not to aſſume any authority inconſiſtent with their rank. Some perſons having a ſuit with one of them, by name Eurythmus, and ſeeming to fear the imperial freedman, Trajan aſſured them, that the cauſe ſhould be heard, diſcuſſed, and decided according to the ſtricteſt laws of juſtice; adding, "For neither is he Polycletus, nor I Nero." Polycletus, of whom we ſpoke in the reign of Nero, was that prince's favourite freed-man. Trajan is ſaid to have excelled even Nerva himſelf in generoſity, and all the preceding princes in the largeſſes with which he relieved, not only the citizens of Rome, but the indigent people in all the provinces of the empire: whence he was by all nations looked upon as a common father, and as ſuch loved and revered [r]. However, he was not without ſome faults: he was adicted to wine. This fault Dion Caſſius owns, but adds, that he never drank to exceſs [s]. On the other hand, Aurelius Victor aſſures us, that he enjoined all his officers not to put in execution ſuch orders as he ſhould give at, or after, his banquets [t]; and Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate, writes, that Trajan had a talent for eloquence, and would have applied himſelf with ſucceſs to that ſtudy, had he not by immoderate drinking impaired his natural capacity [u]. Pliny extols his chaſtity [w], but Dion owns, that he abandoned himſelf to the moſt infamous and unnatural practices [x]; and agrees therein both with Spartian [y], and the emperor Julian [z], who likewiſe charges him with lazineſs, for ſuffering Sura to write moſt of his letters [a]. He loved gay amuſements and diverſions; but from hence aroſe no neglect or relaxation in his conducting public affairs. He was ſomewhat ambitious, and more more deſirous of extending the confines of his empire, than was conſiſtent with juſtice. When he affirmed any thing for certain, he uſed to add; "So may I ſee Dacia reduced to a province, and paſs the Euphrates and the Danube on bridges built by myſelf [b]." He ſuffered his name to be placed on the buildings which he had only repaired, as if they had been founded by him. Whence he was nick-named parietarius, which name is common to all plants growing on walls [c]. How his lenity, mildneſs, and good-nature, ſo much cried up by the antients, were conſiſtent with his perſecuting the chriſtians, is what we cannot eaſily conceive. He ſuffered himſelf to be ſtyled lord, as appears from Pliny's epiſtles to him; a title, which other good emperors, and Auguſtus himſelf, had conſtantly refuſed, and he ſeems at firſt to have declined [d]. He likewiſe allowed ſacrifices to be offered to his ſtatues, and people to ſwear by his life and eternity, as moſt ſacred things [e]. We ſhall now purſue the hiſtory of his reign, according to the order of time.

His faults.

[p] Plin. pan. Vict. epit. Dio, p. 771. [q] Dio, p. 778. Aur. Victor. [r] Dio, & Plin. ibid. [s] Dio, p. 772. [t] Aur. Vict. in Adrian, p. 2. [u] Julian. Cæſar, p. 30. [w] Plin. pan. p. 36. [x] Dio, ibid. [y] Spart. in Adrian. [z] Julian. ibid. p. 12. [a] Idem, p. 38.

TRAJAN commanded, as we have related above, a powerful army in Lower Germany, when he was adopted by Nerva and declared his ſucceſſor, which happened about the latter end of the year 97. He declined at firſt accepting that high poſt, but was ſoon prevailed upon by the officers of his own army, and the deputies diſpatched to him from the armies in Upper Germany and in Mæſia, to yield, and aſſume the title of Cæſar. He did not ſeem in the leaſt elated with his new dignity, chuſing rather to be looked upon by his ſoldiers as their general, than their emperor [f]. Nerva dying ſoon after, that is, on the twenty-firſt or twenty-ſeventh of January of the following year, tidings of his death were firſt brought to him by Adrian his couſin. Hereupon Trajan, who was then at Cologn, immediately aſſumed the title of Auguſtus, and was acknowledged as ſuch by the armies in Germany and Mæſia, who with great joy ſwore allegiance to him [g]. He had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the empire, than he wrote to the ſenate, aſſuring them upon his oath, that no man of probity ſhould ever by his orders either be put to death or injured in his fortune [h]. He did not immediately leave Germany, but continued there all this and He accepts the title of Cæſar, and the empire.

[b] Ammian. l. xxiv. [c] Idem. l. xxvii. [d] Plin. panegyr. p. 4, & 106. [e] Plin. l. x. epiſt. 102, & 89. [f] Plin. pan. [g] Idem, l. x. epiſt. 53. [h] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 771.

and part of the following year; for the time of his conſulſhip was expired, as Pliny informs us [i], before he ſet out for Rome. All the German nations ſent deputies to him, congratulating him upon his acceſſion to the empire; and the barbarians, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and uſed, during the winter, to paſs that river on the ice, and commit great devaſtations on the Roman territories, hearing that Trajan was created emperor, refrained from all hoſtilities, not daring to provoke ſo great a commander, now at liberty to chaſtiſe them [k]. Tacitus the hiſtorian, in his book of the cuſtoms of the Germans, marks the years to the ſecond conſulate of Trajan; whence ſome have concluded, that the ſaid book was compoſed this year, Trajan being now conſul the ſecond time. He ſpeaks there of the expulſion of the Bructerians by the Chamavians and Angrivarians, as a thing lately happened; and adds, that the gods vouchſafed to gratify the Romans with the ſight of a battle fought by the barbarians, in which, ſays our hiſtorian, there fell above ſixty thouſand ſouls, without a blow ſtruck by us; and, what is a circumſtance ſtill more glorious, they fell to furniſh us with a ſpectacle of joy and recreation. May the gods, concludes Tacitus, perpetuate amongſt theſe nations, if not love for us, yet by all means hatred towards each other, ſince they cannot more ſignally befriend us, than by ſowing diviſions amongſt our foes [l]! the Bructerians, who were thus expulſed, and, as Tacitus writes, utterly extirpated, are thought to have inhabited the country about Rees and Emmerik in the dutchy of Cleves [m]. However, the Bructerians were not utterly exterminated, as Tacitus ſeems to ſuppoſe; but being driven with great ſlaughter from their antient habitations, they ſettled in the preſent country of Naſſau, where they gave the Romans no ſmall trouble, as we ſhall relate in the ſequel of this hiſtory. Pliny tells us, that Trajan cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to Veſtricius Spurinna for having conſtrained the Bructerians, notwithſtanding their fierceneſs and arrogance, to receive their king [n], whom, it ſeems, they had driven out. But this muſt have happened before the battle and defeat mentioned by Tacitus.

The Barbarians awed by his preſence.

The Bructerians driven out by other German nations.

THE

[i] Plin. pan. 37. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Tacit. de Ger. c. [m] Buch. Belg. l. v. c. 1. [n] Plin. l. ii. epiſt. 7.

THE next conſuls were Aulus Cornelius Palma and Caius Soſius Senecio, to whom Plutarch inſcribed ſeveral of the lives he wrote, and ſome of his moral works. The ſenate had offered the conſulate to Trajan; but he declining it, tho' all the emperors, ever ſince the time of Claudius, had aſſumed that dignity the year after their acceſſion to the empire, Palma and Senecio, his two chief favourites, were appointed in his room [o]. This year Trajan left Germany and ſet out for Rome: his march proved no-ways burthenſome to the provinces through which he paſſed, no man being injured either in his perſon or fortune, by the emperor or his numerous attendance. He cauſed the expences of his march, and that of Domitian when he went into Gaul, to be computed and inſerted in the public regiſters, that his ſucceſſors might thence learn how to conduct themſelves on the like occaſion [p]. He entered Rome on foot, and was there received by perſons of all ranks with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, the people of Rome promiſing themſelves complete happineſs under ſo good and ſo great a prince. He tenderly embraced his old friends, who came to meet him, and would not be treated by them as their ſovereign, but as a friend, aſſuring them that ſuch they ſhould find him on all occaſions. He went ſtrait to the capitol, attended by the ſenate and the whole city, and thence to the palace [q]. His wife Pompeia Plotina, who accompanied him, turning to the people as ſhe mounted the ſteps of the palace, I hope, ſaid ſhe, to come out the ſame as I go in: and truly, during the whole time of her huſband's reign, her conduct was without reproach; nay, ſhe acquainted the emperor with ſeveral diſorders, occaſioned by his too great indulgence; and by that means put a ſtop to them [r]. She is mightily cried up by Pliny on account of her modeſt behaviour and extraordinary kindneſs to the emperor's ſiſter [s], by name Marciana, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions [t]. The ſenate offered to both the title of Auguſta, which they declined, ſo long as Trajan refuſed that Trajan ſets out for Rome.

How received there.

His wife Pompeia Plotina.

of

[o] Plin. pan. p. 110——115.
[p] Idem ibid. p. 37.
[q] Idem ibid. p. 38, 39.
[r] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 771. Vict. epit. vit. Conſtant.
[s] Plin. ibid. p. 150, 151.
[t] Birag. numiſm. p. 166.

of the father of his country, which he ſeems to have accepted towards the end of this year, the ſecond of his reign. Plotina proved always very favourable to Adrian; for, by her means and at her recommendation, he was adopted by Trajan [u]. In an inſcription of the year 116, which was the nineteenth of Trajan's reign, Marciana is ſtyled goddeſs; whence it is evident, that ſhe was then dead [w]. From her the metropolis of Lower Mœſia took the name of Marcianopolis. She had a daughter, named Matidies, mother to another Matidies, and to Julia Sabina, the wife of the emperor Adrian. Pliny obſerves that Silius Italicus, who had withdrawn into Campania, did not quit his retirement to come to Rome, and congratulate the emperor upon his arrival; which, ſays that writer, greatly redounded to the glory of both, of Trajan for granting him that liberty, of Silius for daring to demand it [x]. The ſenate decreed the emperor ſoon after his arrival the title of Optimus, which he willingly accepted, and ſeemed to value above all thoſe which were afterwards conferred upon him on account of his victories [y]. However, we do not find it in any inſcription amongſt his other titles, till the year 110, the thirteenth of his reign [z]. This year he paid part of the donative, which he had promiſed according to cuſtom, to the ſoldiery, and made large diſtributions both of money and corn amongſt the Roman people, extending his generoſity to ſuch as were abſent, and even to children, who had been hitherto excluded from any ſhare in ſuch largeſſes till eleven years old [a]. By means of theſe largeſſes, which he frequently renewed, he is ſaid to have ſupported near two millions of ſouls [b]. He did not confine the effects of his good-nature to Rome alone, but appointed very conſiderable ſums to be paid yearly out of the exchequer for the maintenance of children, whom their indigent parents could not without great difficulty bring up and ſupport. To this unbounded generoſity allude, no doubt, ſeveral medals ſtruck this or the following year, which repreſent Trajan diſtributing corn to children with the following legend, He nouriſhes Italy [c].

The title of Optimus decreed to the empeſor.

His largeſſes.

He

[u] Spart. in vit. Adrian. [w] Velſarii monum. Auguſtina. lapide 35. [x] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 7. [y] Dio, p. 781. [z] Vide Fabretti de column. Trajan. c. 9. [a] Plin. pan. p. 44. Birag. p. 149. Spart. p. 16. [b] Vide Spart. not. Caſaubon. p. 122. [c] Occonis. numiſm. p. 202, 205.

He took great care that Rome ſhould be ſupplied with plenty of proviſions, eſpecially with corn, which during the whole time of his reign, was ſold at a very low rate: he exhibited ſeveral ſhews and a combat of gladiators, to ſatisfie the populace, fond of ſuch diverſions; but drove out of Rome the players, who had been baniſhed by Domitian, but, at the requeſt of the people, recalled by Nerva. He publiſhed ſeveral laws againſt informers, and confined to the iſlands, ſuch of that tribe as had been ſpared by Nerva, utterly aboliſhing the ſo much hated law of majeſty. He repaired, at a vaſt charge, ſeveral old buildings, and enlarged the circus; but would not ſuffer the people to return him thanks for his public works; nay, he iſſued an edict, forbidding his name to be mentioned either in the circus or the theatre, which, till then, had reſounded, ſays Pliny, with the praiſes of wicked princes [c]. All theſe things are related by Pliny as happening in the ſecond year of Trajan's reign, before the time appointed for the electing of conſuls. The people had, it ſeems, recovered their antient privilege of creating magiſtrates; for Trajan, whom the ſenate had preſſed to accept a third conſulſhip, appeared amongſt the other candidates, begging like a private citizen the ſuffrages of the tribes [d]. He choſe for his collegue Fronto, according to ſome; Frontinus, according to others; for both M. Julius Fronto and Sextus Julius Frontinus, who wrote a treatiſe on aqueducts, lived at this time. In the ſame aſſembly, Pliny and Tertullus Cornutus were appointed to ſucceed Trajan and Fronto or Frontinus, and others to ſucceed them; for at this time few conſuls held that dignity above three months. In the beginning of the year, Trajan had no ſooner aſſumed the faſces, than he aſcended the roſtra, and in preſence of the people, bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath to obſerve the laws, declaring that what was forbidden to private citizens was equally forbidden to good princes, who, as they are not above the laws, are no leſs bound than the meaneſt of the populace to conform to them: hence to the public vows, which were in the beginning of each year offered for the health and proſperity of the emperor, he added theſe conditions; If he obſerves the laws; if he governs the republic as he ought; if he procures the happineſs of his people [e]. Before Trajan reſigned the faſces, the

Is an enemy to informers.

His modeſty.

Binds himſelf by a ſolemn oath to obſerve all the laws.

[c] Plin. pan. p. 74. & l. x. epiſt. 88. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 709. [d] Plin. ibid. p. 120. [e] Plin. ibid. p. 1[illegible]

the cauſe of Marius Priſcus, accuſed, by a city of Africa and by ſeveral particular perſons, of extortion during his proconſulate, was heard by the emperor and ſenate. Pliny and Tacitus the hiſtorian pleaded for the Africans; and the trial laſted three days, the emperor hearkening the whole time with great attention to the reaſons alledged on both ſides, without ever betraying the leaſt biaſs to either. In the end Priſcus was degraded from the rank of ſenator and baniſhed Italy: at the ſame time Hoſtilius Firminus, his lieutenant and accomplice, was declared incapable of holding any employment in the empire [f]. This is, no doubt, the Marius, who, in ſpiteofthe angry gods, enjoyed, as we read in Juvenal [g], even in exile, the immenſe wealth which he had accumulated by the moſt wicked means; while Africa bewailed, without redreſs, the loſſes it had ſuſtained by his avarice: hence the poet calls his condemnation an empty judgment.

Marius Priſcus tried and condemned.

The condemnation of Marius Priſcus was followed by that of Claſſicus, proconſul of Bœtica, or rather of his accomplices; for Claſſicus, finding himſelf accuſed of extortion by the whole province, laid violent hands on himſelf before the time appointed for his trial. However, the province purſued their action againſt his accomplices, who had ſhared in his rapines, and they were by means of Pliny, who pleaded in behalf of the province, all condemned. The eſtate, which Claſſicus poſſeſſed before he was ſent into Spain, was adjudged to his daughter; but the reſt was diſtributed amongſt thoſe whom he had plundered during his adminiſtration: Bæbius Probus and Fabius Hiſpanus, the miniſters of his rapines, were baniſhed for five years, tho' they alledged in their defence, that they were obliged blindly to obey the orders of the proconſul. Stillonius Priſcus, who had commanded a cohort under Claſſicus, was baniſhed Italy for two years: the daughter of Claſſicus was likewiſe accuſed by the province; but Pliny, judging her innocent, declined pleading againſt her; whence the proſecution was dropped [h]. Norbanus Licinianus, who had been lieutenant to Claſſicus, but his declared enemy, was at the ſame time condemned for other crimes, not mentioned by hiſtorians, and confined to one of the iſlands in the Archipelago [i].

The trialof Claſſicus.

For

[f] Plin. l. x. epiſt. 4. l. ii. ep. 11. l. vi. ep. 29. l. iii. ep. 9.
[g] Juvenal. ſat. 1. ver. 49. & ſat. 10. ver. 120.
[h] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 4. & 9.
[i] Idem, l. iii. epiſt. 9.

FOR what we have hitherto related of Trajan's adminiſtration, we are chiefly indebted to Pliny, from whoſe panegyric on that prince, we have copied it. Pliny pronounced his ſpeech in the ſenate, when he entered upon his conſulſhip, having compoſed it before at the requeſt of the ſenators. After he had delivered it in full ſenate, he added, as he himſelf informs us, many things to it, that it might ſerve as a model for other princes. Before he publiſhed it, he rehearſed it before ſome of his friends, who for three days together heard him with great attention; which he aſcribes, not to the elegance or beauties of his performance, but to their being perſuaded, that the praiſes which he beſtowed on Trajan, were a ſincere encomium on that prince, and altogether free from flattery. Pliny himſelf aſſures us, that ſuch paſſages in his diſcourſe, as were the leaſt ſtudied, pleaſed moſt; which gave him no ſmall ſatisfaction: for thence he began to entertain hopes of ſeeing the true taſte revive, and the maſculine eloquence of the antients again admired. He ſent his diſcourſe, which he ſtyles a book, to one of his friends, begging him to mark what he diſliked in it, that he might by that means be ſure he approved of the reſt [k].

Pliny pronounces his panegyric in the ſenate.

About this time, Largius Macedo, who, for his extraordinary parts, had been raiſed from a very mean condition (for he was the ſon of a freed-man) to the prætorian dignity, was inhumanly murdered by his ſlaves, whom, forgetful of his origin, he treated with the utmoſt ſeverity. They fell upon him while he was bathing at one of his country-houſes, and left him for dead; but he afterwards returned to himſelf, and lived a few days, during which he had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing all thoſe crucified, who had been any-ways concerned in the attempt [l]. Towards the end of this year Julia Sabina, grand-daughter to Marciana the emperor's ſiſter, was married to Adrian, the ſon of Ælius Adrian Afer, couſin to Trajan. This match, which in the end proved unhappy to both, was concluded by the empreſs Plotina, who had a particular kindneſs for Adrian, the emperor himſelf rather conſenting to it than approving it [m].

Largius Macedo murdered by his ſlaves.

Adrian marries Julia Sabina.

THE following year, Trajan, at the earneſt req[illegible] the ſenate, entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having [illegible] his collegue, [k] Idem, l. iii. epiſt. 13, 18.

[l] Idem, ibid. epiſt. 14.
[m] Spart. in Adrian.

collegue, according to ſome [n], Sextus Articuleius Pætus, according to others [o], P. Orſitus. The ſame year, Bæbius Macer, Cæpio Hiſpo, Valerius Paulinus, and Caius Cæcilius Strabo were honoured with the conſular dignity [p]. Adrian was this year quæſtor, and charged with the care of the regiſters of the ſenate [q]; which employment he ſoon reſigned, to attend the emperor in the war with the Dacians.

Trajan's firſt war with the Dacians.

Decebalus, king of the Dacians, obliged Domitian, as we have related in the foregoing chapter, to purchaſe a peace with a large ſum; which he engaged to pay yearly to Decebalus. To this tribute Trajan would not ſubmit, alledging, that he had not been conquered by Decebalus. Beſides, the Dacians grew daily more formidable, and their king maintained a good underſtanding with Pacorus king of the Parthians, whom Decebalus had preſented with one Callidromus, who had been made priſoner in Mœſia by Suzagues, one of his lieutenants, during the war with Domitian. The good underſtanding between thoſe two powers gave Trajan no ſmall jealouſy. Whereupon the Dacians having paſſed the Danube, and committed ſome hoſtilities in the Roman territories, he was glad of that pretence to make war upon them, and humble an enemy, whoſe power he began to fear. Having therefore drawn together a mighty army, he marched with incredible expedition to the banks of the Danube, paſſed that river without oppoſition, Decebalus not being appriſed of his arrival, and entered Dacia, committing every-where dreadful devaſtations. Decebalus, however, was not in the leaſt diſmayed; he armed all the youth of the country, and boldly advanced to meet the Romans, pitching his camp at a ſmall diſtance from their entrenchments. Trajan immediately drew out his men, in order to offer the enemy battle. As he advanced to the place where they lay, a large muſhroom was found, and brought to him, with the following words in Latin cut upon it: Your allies, eſpecially the Byrrhi, adviſe you to conclude a peace with the Dacians, and to retire. Trajan deſpiſing that advice, continued advancing in order of battle, till he diſcovered Decebalus, at the head of a powerful army, coming full march to meet him.

He

[n] Idat. in faſt. epiſt. 3, 12, 17.
[o] Onuph. in faſt.
[p] Plin. l. iv.
[q] Spart. in Adrian.

He then halted to encourage his men, which he did in a few words, and then ordered the trumpets to ſound the charge. All we know of this action is, that great numbers of the enemy fell, and that the Romans gained the victory; which, however, coſt them dear, the wounded on their ſide being ſo numerous, that they wanted linen to bind up their wounds; whereupon Trajan tore his own robes to ſupply that want. Such as fell in the battle, he cauſed to be interred with great ſolemnity, and ordered an altar to be built on the ſpot, and ſacrifices to be yearly offered in honour of the deceaſed [r]. Trajan purſuing the advantage of his victory, followed the enemy cloſe; and, without giving them time to levy new forces, haraſſed them without intermiſſion to ſuch a degree, that Decebalus, reduced almoſt to deſpair, ſent ſome of the chief lords of his court with propoſals of peace. Trajan appointed Licinius Sura and Claudius Libianus, captain of the prætorian guards, to treat with them; but the deputies not agreeing, Trajan continued his ravages, advancing from one hill to another, not without great danger, till he arrived in the neighbourhood of Zermizegethuſa, the metropolis of Dacia. On the other ſide, Maximus, one of the Roman generals, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, in one of which he took the ſiſter of Decebalus priſoner, and recovered a Roman ſtandard, which had been loſt when Fuſcus was defeated and killed in the reign of Domitian. At length Decebalus, no longer able to withſtand the Romans, and dreading the deſtruction of his capital, which would be attended with the loſs of his whole kingdom, diſpatched anew embaſſadors to Trajan, offering to accept ſuch conditions as he ſhould think fit to impoſe. Accordingly Trajan granted him a peace upon the following terms: 1. That he ſhould ſurrender the territories which he had unjuſtly taken from the neighbouring nations. 2. That he ſhould deliver up his arms, his warlike engines, and the artificers who made them, with all the Roman deſerters. 3. That, for the future, he ſhould entertain no deſerters, nor take into his ſervice the natives of any country ſubject to Rome. 4. That he ſhould diſmantle all his fortreſſes, caſtles, and ſtrong-holds. And, laſtly, That he ſhould have the ſame friends and

The Dacians defeated.

Trajan's humanity to the wounded.

Decebalus king of the Dacians ſues for peace.

Which is granted him upon hard terms.

[r] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 771.——774.

foes with the people of Rome. With theſe articles Decebalus complied, tho' much againſt his will; and having ſworn to obſerve them, he was introduced to Trajan, before whom he threw himſelf on the ground, acknowledging himſelf his vaſſal. Trajan commanded him to ſend deputies to the ſenate for the ratification of the peace; which he did accordingly. The war being thus ended, Trajan having placed garriſons in moſt of the cities of Dacia, returned to Rome which he entered in triumph, either in the end of this, or the beginning of the following, year, and took the ſurname of Dacicus, being the firſt Roman who had triumphed over that nation [s]. His triumph was followed by a combat of gladiators and the diverſions of the ſtage, in which one Pylades gained the applauſe of the people, and the emperor's favour. Trajan had but two years before driven all the players out of Rome; but, as he took great pleaſure in ſuch entertainments, he recalled them on this occaſion, tho' he did not abandon himſelf to theſe amuſements in ſuch manner as to neglect the diſpatch of buſineſs; for he diſcharged with great care and application all the duties of a prince, was aſſiduous in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and aſſiſted in perſon at all the cauſes of any importance, that were pleaded either in the ſenate or forum [t]. This year Julius Baſſus, who had been accuſed under Trajan, and, after a long trial, declared innocent, was again accuſed of extortion by the Bithynians; for he had been by Nerva appointed pro-conſul of Bithynia. Pliny, who pleaded in his behalf, owns, that he failed rather through imprudence than avarice, in accepting ſome preſents, which was, by ſome late laws, forbidden to all governors of provinces, under ſevere penalties. However, Pliny prevailed upon the ſenate, inclined to condemn him as guilty of extortion, to be ſatisfied with obliging him to reſtore the value of the preſents to thoſe, of whom he had imprudently accepted them [u].

Trajan the firſt who triumphed over the Dacians.

'The following year, one Suranus, of whom we find no farther mention in hiſtory, and L. Licinius Sura, or, as ſome ſtyle him, Suras, were choſen conſuls. Sura was Trajan's favourite, and had employed all his intereſt with Nerva Licinius Sura the emperor's chief favourite.

[s] Dio, p. 710. Spart. in Adrian. Goltz. p. 646. Euſeb. in chron. p. 341. [t] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 774. [u] Plin. l. iv. epiſt. 9. l. vi. epiſt. 29. & l. x. epiſt. 14.

Nerva in his behalf; whence to him chiefly, after Nerva, Trajan acknowledged himſelf indebted for his adoption and preferment [w]. He was, as Gruter conjectures from ſeveral antient inſcriptions [x], a native of Spain, born either in Tarragon or Barcelona, extremely rich, and thence envied by many even of Trajan's friends, who by falſe inſinuations, ſtrove to eſtrange the prince's mind from him, as if he harboured evil deſigns. But Trajan, who repoſed an entire confidence in him, inſtead of hearkening to his enemies, went one night to ſup with him, without being invited; and, diſmiſſing his guards, ordered Sura's ſurgeon to apply a remedy to his eyes; truſted himſelf to his barber, who ſhaved him; then bathed, and ſupped with Sura, without ever betraying the leaſt diffidence or fear. The next morning, he told thoſe about him, who were always ſuggeſting ſomething againſt Sura, If he entertained any evil deſigns againſt me, he would have put them in execution laſt night [y]. Sura was ſtill alive in the year 109, the twefth of Trajan's reign, when Adrian, whom he had always favoured, was conſul; but died ſoon after, having aſſured Adrian before he died, that Trajan would in the end adopt him [z]. Trajan cauſed his funeral to be performed with the utmoſt magnificence, erected a ſtatue to him, and called ſeveral ſplendid baths, which he built, after his name. This year Trajan, at the requeſt of the ſenate and at the motion of Nigrinus, tribune of the people, publiſhed an edict, ſubjecting ſuch pleaders as received fees from their clients, to the penalties of the law againſt extortion; and Licinius Nepos, prætor, upon his taking poſſeſſion of that office, procured a decree from the ſenate, commanding the parties, before their cauſe began to be tried, to ſwear, that they had neither given nor promiſed any fee, preſent, or reward to thoſe who were to plead in their behalf. Pliny takes notice of this law, and declares, that he was pleaſed to ſee that forbidden to others, which he had never practiſed himſelf [a]. Towards the end of the year, Trajan aſſumed twice the title of emperor [b], for victories which were gained by ſome of his lieutenants, (for he himſelf continued the whole year at Rome) but are not mentioned by any hiſtorian.

Pleaders forbidden to receive fees.

THE next conſuls were Trajan, the fifth time, and Lucius Appius Maximus, who had ſignalized himſelf in the Dacian [w] Vict. in epit. [x] Gruter. p. 249. [y] Dio, ibid. p. 777 [z] Spart. in Adrian. [a] Plin. l. v. epiſt. 14. [b] Goltz. p. 64.

The port of Centumcellæ.

Dacian war. This year Trajan began, and finiſhed two years after, a magnificent and convenient harbour at Centumcellæ, now Civita Vecchia, which he called after his own name, the harbour of Trajan [c]. It is mentioned by Ptolemy, and deſcribed by Rutilius in his poem [d].

Pliny appointed governor of Pontus and Bithynia.

Pliny was this year ſent to govern Pontus and Bithynia, not in quality of proconſul, as others had been, but of lieutenant and proprætor, with conſular authority; that is, he was not appointed governor of that province by the ſenate, but by the emperor, tho' the province of Pontus and Bithynia belonged to the ſenate. As there were many abuſes in that province to reform, the emperor ſent Pliny thither with an extraordinary authority as his lieutenant; but afterwards allowed the ſenate to appoint the governors as formerly, Adrian being the firſt who took the province of Pontus and Bithynia from the ſenate, and gave them Pamphylia in the room of it [e]. Pliny was particularly commiſſioned to examine the revenues and expences of the cities within his juriſdiction, and to retrench all unneceſſary charges [f]; but the emperor would not empower him to recall ſuch as had been baniſhed by other governors [g], nor even thoſe whom he himſelf ſhould think fit to baniſh [h]. Pliny wrote an account of his journey to the emperor, whence it appears, that he arrived in Bithynia on the ſeventeenth of September, and Servilius Pudens his lieutenant on the twenty-fourth of November [i].

The following year, L. Licinius Sura and M. Marcellus being conſuls, Sauromates, king of Boſphorus, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Trajan, and entered into an alliance with him and the Roman people [k].

Decebalus violates the articles of the treaty.

Soon after, Decebalus king of the Dacians, not able to live in ſubjection and ſervitude, (for ſo he called the peace which Trajan had granted him) began, contrary to the late treaty, to raiſe men, provide arms, entertain deſerters, fortify his caſtles, and invite the neighbouring nations to join him againſt the Romans as a common enemy. The Scythians hearkened to his ſolicitations; but the Iazyges refuſing to bear arms againſt Rome, he invaded their country, and ſeized that part of it which bordered on the Danube. Hereupon Decebalus was by the ſenate declared an enemy; and Trajan, not caring

[c] Plin. l. vi. epiſt. 31. Occo. numiſm. p. 212. [d] Rutil
p. 132. [e] Dio, in excerpt. Valeſii, p. 714. [f] Plin
l. x. epiſt. 19. [g] Idem ibid. epiſt. 44. [h] Iden ibid. epiſt. 57. [i] Idem ibid. epiſt. 17, 18, 26, 34 [k] Idem l. x. epiſt. 68, 69, 73, 74.

caring to commit the management of the war to another, marched againſt him in perſon. Decebalus, not finding himſelf in a condition to withſtand him by open force, had recourſe to deceit and treachery, ſending aſſaſſins, under the name of deſerters, to murder him; but one of theſe, being apprehended upon ſuſpicion and put to the torture, diſcovered the whole plot, and named his accomplices, who were immediately ſeized and executed. Decebalus, failing in this attempt, invited Longinus, one of Trajan's favourites and chief commanders, to a conference, as if he deſigned to put an end to the war, by ſubmitting to the articles of the former treaty, with ſome ſmall alteration. Longinus, not ſuſpecting any treachery, complied with the invitation. But Decebalus immediately ſeized him; and after having attempted in vain to make him diſcover the deſigns of the emperor, he wrote to Trajan, offering to ſet Longinus at liberty, upon condition that he would grant him an honourable peace, reſtore the country bordering on the Danube, and defray all the charges of the war; adding, that if theſe conditions were not complied with, he would inſtantly put Longinus to death. Trajan returned him a judicious anſwer, neither ſeeming to undervalue the life of his favourite, nor yet make ſuch account of it, as to purchaſe it at too high a rate. But while Decebalus was deliberating with himſelf, and in ſuſpenſe about the meaſures he ſhould purſue, Longinus, by a doſe of poiſon, which was privately conveyed to him by a freed-man, put an end to his life. Decebalus immediately diſpatched to Trajan a centurion taken with Longinus, offering him the body of the deceaſed general, with ten captives, provided he would deliver up the freedman, whom Longinus had ſent, before he took the poiſon to the emperor, under colour of negotiating a treaty: but Trajan would neither hearken to the propoſal, nor even ſuffer the centurion to return. In the mean time, Trajan, that his troops might with more eaſe paſs the Danube, built a bridge over that ſpacious river, which, by the antients, is ſtyled the moſt magnificent and wonderful of all his works, and the moſt ſtately fabric of that nature in the univerſe. It was all of ſquare ſtone, and contained twenty arches, each of them one hundred and fifty feet above the foundation, and ſixty feet in breadth, all diſtant from each other one hundred and ſeventy feet. It was built where the river was narroweſt, and conſequently where the ſtream was ſtrongeſt and

His treachery.

Trajan builds a bridge over the Danube.

and moſt rapid; which renders the fabric ſtill more ſtupendous and amazing, on account of the almoſt inſurmountable difficulties they muſt have met with in laying ſo large a foundation [l]. The architect employed on this occaſion was one Apollodorus of Damaſcus, who, it ſeems, left a deſcription of his great work [m]. Trajan ordered two caſtles to be built to guard the bridge, one on the Roman, the other on the Dacian ſide of the river. Pliny mentions this bridge in the ſhort account he gives us of the Dacian war [n]; and ſeveral medals repreſenting it have reached our times [o]. It was built in Upper Mæſia, which, in the time of Aurelian, began to be called Dacia [p]. We are told, that ſome remains of it are ſtill to be ſeen near Zerevin in Lower Hungary [q]. Trajan built it, that the Roman forces might with eaſe and readineſs paſs the Danube, and fall upon the barbarians in their own country; but Adrian, fearing the barbarians might make uſe of it to invade the Roman territories, broke down the arches, but the piers were ſtill ſtanding in Dion Caſſius's time; that is, one hundred and twenty years after, tho' they ſerved then only to ſhew, ſays that writer, the utmoſt extent of human power [r]. When they were by time entirely demoliſhed, the river was ſo choaked with the ruins, that it was not navigable till turned into another channel [s]. This ſtupendous fabric was begun and ended this ſummer; but Trajan, not thinking it adviſeable to enter Dacia upon the approach of winter, contented himſelf with making the neceſſary preparations for vigorouſly attacking the enemy early in the ſpring.

In the mean time, the following conſuls were choſen at Rome, Tiberius Julius Candidus and Aulus Julius Quadratus, both the ſecond time. This year, the eighth of Trajan's reign, a dreadful earthquake overturned in Aſia the cities of Elea, Myrine, Pitame, and Cumæ; and in Greece the cities of Opus and Oritæ [t]. Adrian diſcharged for ſome time the office of tribune of the people, and then went to attend Trajan in the war againſt the Dacians.

Trajan marches againſt the Dacians.

The emperor, early in the ſpring, paſſed the Danube on the [l] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 776. [m] Procop. de ædificiis Juſtin. l. iv. c. 6. [n] Plin. l. viii. c. 4. [o] Occo, p. 204. Baron. annal. ad ann. 105. [p] Fabretti de colum. Trajan. c. 301 [q] Occo, p. 204. [r] Dio, ibid. [s] Procop. ibid [t] Euſeb. chron.

the bridge he had built, and entering the enemy's country, purſued the war with more prudence than expedition, not caring to expoſe his men to unneceſſary dangers [u]. He often encamped, ſays Pliny [w], on ſteep and barren mountains; was obliged to divert rivers into new channels, and to attempt and perform things, which, were they not well atteſted, would ſeem altogether fabulous. He gave many ſignal inſtances of his perſonal courage, and the ſoldiers, animated by his example, chearfully underwent all the hardſhips of a laborious warfare [x]. Amongſt the reſt, one of his horſemen being wounded in an engagement, and carried to the camp to have his wound dreſſed, when he there underſtood, that his life was deſpaired of and the wound incurable, he returned to the combat before his ſpirits failed him, performed great feats, and expired fighting with incredible bravery [y]. Several inſcriptions are ſtill to be met with, mentioning perſons whom Trajan rewarded on account of their gallant conduct in the war with the Dacians [z]. In this war Adrian commanded a legion, and, in the many battles that were fought, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner; whence the emperor highly pleaſed with his gallant behaviour, preſented him with the diamond, which Nerva had ſent him, as we have related above, when he adopted and named him his ſucceſſor. This preſent Adrian looked upon as a pledge of his future adoption [a]. Some inſcriptions have reached our times, in which Dacia is ſaid to have been added to the empire by the courage and valour of Adrian [b]. At length Trajan made himſelf maſter of the capital of Dacia, and almoſt of the whole country; inſomuch, that Decebalus, ſeeing himſelf ſtripped of his dominions, and dreading to fall into the hands of the conqueror, choſe rather to put an end to his life, than to live in ſubjection, or acknowledge himſelf overcome. His head was immediately brought to Trajan, and by him ſent to Rome. He had concealed his treaſures in a deep pit, which he cauſed to be dug in the bed of the river Sargetia, now Iſtrig, having for that purpoſe turned the ſtream into another channel, and afterwards brought it to its former courſe. As for his rich moveables, he ſecured them in deep caves, which he cauſed to Expoſes himſelf to great dangers.

Makes himſelf maſter of the capital of Dacia, which is reduced to a Roman province.

[u] Dio, ibid. [w] Plin. l. viii. epiſt. 9. [x] Dio, p. 776. [y] Idem, p. 777. [z] Fabr. column. Trajan. c. 8. p. 238, 241. [a] Spart. in Adrian. Dio, lxix. p. 787. [b] Fabr. ibid, p. 242.

to be dug by captives, whom he immediately after put to death, that they might not diſcover the ſecret; but Bacilis, one of his chief favourites and confidents, being taken in this war, diſcovered the whole to Trajan, who ſeized both the treaſure and precious moveables of the deceaſed prince [c]. We are told, that notwithſtanding this diſcovery, great riches were found in thoſe places many ages after, which had eſcaped Trajan [d]. The famous column of Trajan, of which we ſhall ſpeak anon, is thought to have been raiſed for a laſting monument of the victories gained by that prince over the Dacians and their king; at leaſt many of the remarkable events of this war are expreſſed, as Ciacconius and Fabretti inform us, in the baſſo-relievo of that pillar [e]. Dacia being thus entirely ſubdued, Trajan reduced it to a Roman province, which was according to Eutropius [f], a thouſand miles in compaſs. The Romans held it, as Feſtus informs us [g], to the reign of the emperor Gallienus; during which time it was governed by a Roman magiſtrate, with the title of proprætor, as appears from ſome antient inſcriptions [h]. Trajan built ſeveral caſtles in the country, and placed garriſons in them, to keep the inhabitants in awe. He likewiſe planted a great number of colonies, diſtributing lands among the poor citizens of Rome and of the other towns of Italy, who were willing to ſettle in Dacia. The Hungarian writers mention ſeveral cities in their country, which were on this occaſion built or peopled by the Romans: but the moſt celebrated of all was Zermizegethuſa, which in ſeveral antient inſcriptions, is ſtyled Colonia Ulpia Trajana, Auguſta Dacia Sarmiz. It was eſtabliſhed by M. Scaurianus proprætor of Dacia, and continued ſubject to the Romans at leaſt to the death of the emperor Severus [i]. At preſent it is but a poor village in Tranſilvania, known by the name of Gradiſch [k]. In Mœſia and Thrace ſeveral cities borrowed their names from Trajan; for we find the city of Trajanapolis in Thrace mentioned by the antients; that of Ulpia in Upper Mœſia, now Servia; the cities of Plotinopolis, which, no doubt, was ſo called from Plotina, Trajan's wife, and Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Mœſia, which took its name from Marciana, the emperor's ſiſter, and was according to Jornandes, built by Tra-

Many colonies planted in Dacia.

[c] Dio, ibid. [d] Fabr. ibid. [e] Idem, ibid.
[f] Eutrop. p. 236. [g] Ruf. p. 550. [h] Gruter. p. 354.
[i] Idem, p. 63. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 1040. [k] Baude. p. 348.

Trajan I. The ſame writer adds, that upon the banks of the river Iater, or Iatrus, he founded another city, which he called Nicopolis, or the city of victory, to perpetuate the memory of his victories over the Sarmatians, or rather Dacians; for Jornandes frequently confounds theſe two nations [m]. This city is by Ammianus Marcellinus called ſometimes Nicopolis, ſometimes Ulpia, and placed not on the Iatrus, but on the Neſſus or Neſtus; and truly from ſeveral inſcriptions produced by the learned Holſtenius [n], it appears to have ſtood near the conflux of the Neſtus and the Danube. We muſt not confound, as ſome writers have done, Nicopolis in Dacia with another of the ſame name upon mount Hæmus in Thrace. Trajan, upon his return to Rome, triumphed over the Dacians a ſecond time; cauſed ſeveral medals to be coined in memory of his victories, many of which are ſtill to be ſeen [o]; entertained the people with public banquets; with ſhews in which ten thouſand gladiators entered the liſts; with combats of wild beaſts, of which above ten thouſand were killed, and all kinds of diverſions, which laſted one hundred and twenty-three days [p]. Canius at the requeſt of Pliny, deſcribed this war in verſe [q]; and Trajan himſelf is ſaid to have written an account of it in ſeveral books [r]. This war broke out in the beginning of the preceding year, but was not ended till the latter end of this; for we are told, that he took for the fifth time, the title of imperator about the latter end of the ninth year of his tribunitial power, which was the eighth of his reign [s]. The ſame year is remarkable for the entire reduction of Arabia Petræa by Aulus Cornelius Palma governor of Syria, after it had been long governed by its own kings [t]. The inhabitants of Petra and Boſtra reckon their time from this year, in which their country was firſt annexed to the Roman empire [u]. Trajan reduced, together with the Dacians, ſeveral nations in alliance with them; ſo that the fame of his conqueſts reaching the moſt diſtant countries, and even India, embaſſadors were ſent from thence to congratulate him upon the ſucceſs which had attended his arms [w].

Trajan's ſecond triumph over the Dacians.

Arabia Petræa entirely reduced.

THE

[l] Jorn. de reb. Goth. c. 16. [m] Idem, ibid. c. 18. [n] Holſt. ad Steph. p. 225. [o] Occo, p. 201. [p] Dio, ibid. p. 777. [q] Plin. l. viii. ep. 14. [r] Voſſ. hiſt. Lat, c. 30. [s] Vide Noris. epiſt. conſul. p. 47, 48. [t] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 777. [u] Euſeb. in chron. p. 206. [w] Dio, ibid.

THE next conſuls were Cerealis and L. Ceionus Commodus Verus, the father of L. Ælius Verus, as is commonly ſuppoſed, who was by Adrian created Cæſar [x]. During their adminiſtration, the Capitoline ſports, eſtabliſhed by Domitian, were exhibited the ſixth time, when the prize in poetry was won by a child thirteen years old, named L. Valerius Pudens [y]. This year Trajan made at a vaſt charge, a road through the Palus Pontina, or Pontine Marſhes, whereof the remains are ſtill to be ſeen [z]; and this, no doubt, is the Via Trajana, or Trajan's Highway, mentioned in ſeveral antient inſcriptions produced by Occo [a] and Gruter [b]. Dion Caſſius adds, that he ordered all the diminiſhed coin to be melted down, and mentions ſeveral magnificent buildings, with which he embelliſhed Rome: but of theſe we ſhall ſpeak hereafter; for Trajan muſt have only begun them this year, ſince he left Rome in the month of October, and was at Antioch in the very beginning of the enſuing year [c]. However, before he ſet out for the eaſt, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by Craſſus and ſeveral other perſons of the firſt quality; but ſeaſonably diſcovered. The conſpirators were tried, not by him (for he declined being judge and at the ſame time a party), but by the ſenate, who, it ſeems, condemned them to baniſhment; for upon the emperor's death, one Craſſus Frugi endeavoured to make his eſcape from an iſland, to which he is ſaid to have been confined for aſpiring at the empire; but was killed by one of Adrian's officers, without the emperor's knowledge, as if he had attempted his eſcape with a deſign to raiſe new diſturbances [d]. The true motive of Trajan's journey into the eaſt was a deſire of glory, as Dion Caſſius informs us [e], which he hoped to reap from a war with the Parthians, who, we may ſay, rivalled the Romans themſelves in power, and had given them ſeveral great overthrows. The pretence he alledged for quarrelling with that nation was, that the king of Armenia, by name Exedares, had received his crown at the hands of the king of Parthia; whereas the Roman emperors claimed a right of diſpoſing of that crown ever ſince the reign of Nero, who in the year ſixty-ſix, the twelfth of his empire, had crowned at Rome Tiridates

A conſpiracy againſt Trajan.

His moderation on that occaſion.

Deſigns to make war upon the Parthians.

[x] Onuph. Idat. in faſt. Spart. in Ælii vit. [y] Onuph. in faſt. p. 216. [z] Dio, ibid. [a] Occo, p. 209. [b] Grut. p. 199. [c] Ignat. acta. p. 2, 3. Uſſer. notæ, p. 35. [d] Dio, ibid. p. 778. [e] Idem, ibid.

ridates king of Armenia. What happened after that time in Armenia we find no-where recorded; we only know, that Tiridates was ſtill on the throne in ſeventy-two, the third of Veſpaſian's reign. As for the affairs of the Parthians, Vologeſes, brother to Tiridates, was in the year eighty ſucceeded by Artabanes, and he by Pacorus the friend of Decebalus [f]. who reigned while Pliny governed Bithynia [g]. Pacorus was father to Parthamaſiris, and probably to Coſrhoes, who reigned at this time in Parthia [h]. Aurelius Victor calls him Coſdroes, and Dion Caſſius Hoſroes. Trajan, who wanted only a pretence to make war upon the Parthians, pretended to be highly affronted at the Parthian king's giving the crown and royal enſigns to Exedares, and demanded ſatisfaction, threatening him with war, if he refuſed to comply with his juſt demands. Coſrhoes deſpiſed his menaces; whereupon Trajan, who had already made the neceſſary preparations for this expedition, immediately left Rome and croſſed over into Greece. When Coſrhoes found he was in earneſt, he began to abate of his pride, and ſent deputies to him with rich preſents, begging that he would not, upon ſuch ſlight motives, engage the two empires in a bloody and deſtructive war; at the ſame time, he acquainted him that Exedares, finding himſelf neither acceptable to the Romans nor to the Parthians, had abdicated the crown, and beſought Trajan to diſpoſe of it in favour of Parthamaſiris. The embaſſadors met Trajan at Athens, and there delivered their meſſage; to which the emperor replied, that friendſhip was ſhewn by actions, and not by words; that he was going into Syria, and that there he ſhould take ſuch reſolutions as he ſhould think proper. He then diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, without deigning to accept any of their preſents [i]. He then purſued his journey through Aſia Minor, Cilicia, and the other provinces, to Seleucia in Syria, and from thence to Antioch, the capital of that province, which he entered crowned with a branch of an olive-tree on a Thurſday, which, that year and the following, happened, and never more during his reign, to be the ſeventh of January [k].

And ſets out for the eaſt.

Embaſſadors ſent to him by the king of the Parthians.

Arrives at Antioch.

[f] Zonar. in vit. Tit. [g] Plin. l. x. epiſt. 8. [h] Dio, p. 779. [i] Idem, p. 778. [k] Uſſer. not. in act. Ignat. p. 35. Lond. ann. 1647.

The following year's conſuls were Lucius Licinius Sura the third time, and Caius Soſius Senecio the ſecond, who reſigned the faſces to Suranus and Servianus [l], in whoſe conſulſhip Adrian was prætor, and exhibited moſt magnificent ſhews [m]; for he did not attend Trajan into the eaſt.

Adrian commands in Lower Pannonia.

When the time of his prætorſhip expired, he was ſent to command the armies in Lower Pannonia, where he maintained with great ſeverity the military diſcipline, and kept in awe the Sarmatians, whom Euſebius and St. Jerom count among the nations ſubdued by Trajan [n]. Servianus, who was conſul with Suranus, is called in ſeveral antient inſcriptions Julius Servilius Urſus Servianus, the ſame, no doubt, who married Paulina, ſiſter to Adrian, and the emperor's couſin [o]. Pliny wrote ſome letters to him as an intimate friend, and by his means obtained ſeveral favours of the emperor [p]. When he ſpeaks of him to others, he calls him a perſon of great accompliſhments [q]. He was governor of Upper Germany in the year 98, the firſt of Trajan's reign, and from thence was ſent into Panonia [r]. Trajan entertained a mighty opinion of his talents, and uſed to ſay, that among the great men who might aſpire at the empire, he was the moſt capable of diſcharging that high truſt with reputation. He was no friend to Adrian, and is ſuppoſed to have oppoſed his adoption; for that prince, a little before he died, in the year 138, ordered Servianus, then ninety years old, to be put to death, that he might not ſurvive him, tho' he had, during the whole courſe of his reign, treated him in a very friendly manner, and preferred him to the firſt employments [s]. He is often called by the Greek writers Severianus inſtead of Servianus [t]. But to return to Trajan: he made his entry into Antioch on the ſeventh of January, as we have related above. During his ſtay in that city, Abgarus, or,

Abgarus king of Edeſſa and other princes ſend preſents to Trajan.

as ſome call him, Augarus, prince of Edeſſa in Meſopotamia, ſent him preſents, and, by his embaſſadors, declared his ſincere deſire of living in friendſhip with him and the people of Rome; but, as he equally feared the Romans and Parthians, and was deſirous to pleaſe both, he declined

[l] Idat. chron. Alexand. Onuph. in faſt. [m] Spart. in Adrian. [n] Hier. in chron. [o] Spart. in Adrian. p. 1, 2.
[p] Plin. l. iii. epiſt. 26, 27. [q] Idem. l. viii. epiſt. 23.
[r] Spart. in Adrian. p. 1. [s] Idem ibid, & Dio, l. lxix. p. 795.
[t] Vide Spart. cum not. Caſaubon.

clined waiting upon him in perſon. The other petty princes in that neighbourhood came perſonally to offer their ſervice to the emperor of Rome, and brought with them, according to the cuſtom of the eaſtern countries, rich preſents. One among the reſt preſented him with a ſtately courſer, who, as he was brought before the emperor, kneeled down, bowed his head to the ground, and adored him, as he had been taught before-hand. Trajan received all the princes who came to attend him, with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, accepted their preſents, and pretended to repoſe an entire confidence in them. Having made the neceſſary preparations for his intended expedition, he left Antioch, bending his march towards Armenia, when Parthamaſiris, who had wrote to him before, and in his letter ſtyled himſelf king of Armenia, ſent him a ſecond letter, (for Trajan had returned no anſwer to the firſt) wherein he omitted the title of king, and deſired, that M. Junius, governor of Cappadocia, might be appointed to treat with him, Trajan ſent only the ſon of Junius, and in the mean time purſued his march, making himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, without meeting with the leaſt reſiſtance. At Sata, or rather Satala, a city in Armenia Minor, the emperor was met by Anquialus king of the Heniochi, a people of Circaſſia on the Euxine ſea, and of the Maheloni, of whom we find no further mention in hiſtory. Trajan received him with all poſſible demonſtrations of kindneſs, and made him rich preſents, in order to attach him to his intereſt. Upon his arrival at Elegia in the Greater Armenia, Parthamaſiris came to wait upon him, and beg of him the crown of Armenia. Trajan received him ſeated upon a throne or tribunal, and attended by the chief officers of his army. As Parthamaſiris approached the throne, he took off his crown, and laid it at the emperor's feet, without uttering a ſingle word, not doubting but he would immediately return it to him. In the mean time, the ſoldiers, pleaſed to ſee the king of Armenia, tho' ſupported by the whole power of the Parthian empire, obliged to ſubmit, and reſign his crown to their general, congratulated him upon it with loud ſhouts of joy; which ſo terrified Parthamaſiris, that he attempted to withdraw, and return to his metropolis; but finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, he deſired to ſpeak to Trajan in private. Hereupon he was carried into the emperor's tent; but Trajan not liking his propoſals, and refuſing to comply with them,

The king of Armenia writes to the emperor, who ſeizes ſeveral places in that kingdom.

The king of Armenia waits upon him in perſon.

he left the tent in a great paſſion, and endeavoured to make his eſcape out of the camp. But Trajan, having ordered him to be ſtopped, and brought back, aſcended his tribunal anew, and deſired the prince to repeat in the hearing of all, the propoſals he had made to him in private, and his anſwers, that perſons, who were ignorant of what had paſſed between them, might not give falſe accounts of it, and miſrepreſent it to the world. Upon this Parthamaſiris, no longer able to contain himſelf, told Trajan, that he had neither been conquered, nor taken priſoner; that he came thither voluntarily, believing no injury would have been offered him, and that he ſhould receive his kingdom of Trajan, as Tiridates had done of Nero. Trajan replied, that Armenia belonged to the Romans, and that it ſhould receive a Roman governor, and be no longer a kingdom; that as for Pathamaſiris, he gave him liberty to retire whither he pleaſed. Accordingly he diſmiſſed him, and the Parthians who came with him, and appointed them a guard, that they might not be inſulted by the ſoldiery, or raiſe diſturbances; the Armenians he detained, as ſubjects of the Roman empire, and ordered them to return to their reſpective dwellings. Parthamaſiris endeavoured to maintain himſelf in his kingdom by force of arms; but loſt his life in the attempt, ſo that Trajan made himſelf maſter of Armenia, which he reduced to a Roman province [u]. As to the other particulars of this war, we find them no-where recorded. Upon the reduction of Armenia, ſeveral princes ſubmitted of their own accord to Trajan, amongſt whom are mentioned the kings of Iberia, Sarmatia, Boſporus, and Colchis [w]. He named a king to rule over the Albanians, and appointed one Julianus prince of the Apſiles, whoſe country bordered on the Euxine ſea, having for its metropolis the city of Dioſcuria, afterwards called Sebaſtapolis. Arrian, who wrote under Adrian, ſpeaks of a camp in the neighbourhood of this city, which he calls the boundary of the Roman empire [x]. The Romans had, before Trajan's time, a garriſon in Melitene or Melitine, a caſtle of Leſſer Armenia, which Trajan made a city, and appointed to be the metropolis of the whole country; whence in proceſs of time it became one of the moſt populous and wealthy cities

Trajan refuſes him the crown of Armenia.

Armenia reduced to a Roman province.

Several kings ſubmit to Trajan.

[u] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 779. Arrian. in perip. pont. Euxin. p. 7. Eutrop. in vit. Trajan. [w] Eutrop. ibid. [x] Arrian. ibid.

cities in the east [y]. The emperor, having left garrisons in all the strong-holds of Armenia, advanced to the city of Edessa in Mesopotamia, where he was received in a very friendly manner by Abgarus king of that district. Abgarus had before sent him several presents; but put off, under various pretences, waiting upon him in person. However, Trajan by the mediation of Abgarus's son, by name Arbandes, a very comely youth, received his excuses, and admitted him to his friendship. Abgarus made a great entertainment for the emperor and the chief officers of his army, at which Arbandes, who was perhaps too much beloved by Trajan, diverted him with dancing after the manner of his country [z]. Manes, the chief of one of the Arabian nations, Sporaces, prince of Anthemusia, a province of Mesopotamia, Mebarsapes, king of Adiabene, and Manisares, king of some district in that neighbourhood, declared, that they were ready to join Trajan; but, in the mean time, delayed meeting him, so that the emperor began to distrust them, especially after the treachery of Mebarsapes; who having demanded and obtained a body of troops to protect his dominions, as he pretended, against the Parthians, put most of them to the sword, and kept the rest in captivity. Amongst the latter was a centurion, named Sentius, who, as Trajan, highly provoked at this treachery, approached a place of great strength, called Ademysires, where he was kept, found means to break his chains, and, with the assistance of his fellow-captives, killed the governor of the fort, and opened the gates to the Romans [a]. Trajan, now master of so strong and important a place, advanced boldly into Mesopotamia and reduced great part of it by the bare fame of his name. As the greatest part of Adiebene lay beyond the Tigris, Trajan built a bridge over that river, which is represented on several medals that have reached our times [b]. The cities of Nisibe and Batue made a vigorous defence; but in the end were obliged to yield. If the city of Nisibe belonged, as Josephus writes, to the king of Adiabene, it was at this time, as is manifest from Dion Cassius [c], in the hands of the Parthians. As for Cosrhoes, we know not what measures he took, or what attempts he made to stop the progress

Enters Mesopotamia.

The treachery of the king of Adiabene.

Trajan builds a bridge over the Tigris

[y] Procop. de ædific. Justin. l. iii. c. 4. [z] Dio, ibid. p. 780. [a] Idem, p. 781. [b] Occo, p. 205. Birag. p. 157. [c] Dio, ibid.

of Trajan's conquests. In Dion Cassius we read, that Manisares offered to yield to the Romans for ever all Armenia, and that part of Mesopotamia, which they had already conquered. Whence we conjecture, that the name of Manisares has crept into the text instead of Cosrhoes, who alone could make such an offer, and between whom and Trajan a treaty was, it seems, concluded, since Aurelius Victor writes, that the emperor obliged him to deliver hostages. What treaty this was, or on what occasion, or by whom it was violated, (for the war broke out anew) we are no-where told. To this treaty perhaps allude the medals, which were struck about this time, with the following legend, "Peace established; the king of the Parthians restored [n]." The power of the Parthians was, as Dion Cassius informs us [o], greatly weakened at this time by their intestine wars; so that Cosrhoes was perhaps obliged to recur to Trajan, and implore his protection against his own subjects. This is all we know of Trajan's wars in the east, till the year 115, the eighteenth of his reign. We should be able to give a better account of all these transactions, if the Parthian history, composed by Arrian, who flourished at this time, on purpose to set forth the exploits of Trajan, and by him divided into seventeen books, had reached us [p]; but that history being long since lost, and many other histories of these times, (for under no prince there flourished a greater number of celebrated historians than under Trajan) we are with no prince's exploits less acquainted than with Trajan's. Not to mention the many historians who have described the Parthian war, in which Trajan distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, both as a soldier and a general, Marius Maximus, Fabius Marcellinus, Aurelius Verus, Statius Valens, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Dion Cassius, wrote his life, either by itself, or in the body of the Roman history. But none of the works of these authors are now remaining; so that we are obliged to recur to the abridgment of Dion Cassius by Xiphilin, and to the still more compendious and undigested writings of Aurelius Victor and Eutropius. We cannot even learn of any writer, whether Trajan ever returned to Rome after he set out from thence thence to conquer Armenia, However, we cannot perſuade ourſelves that he continued in the eaſt, without once viſiting the metropolis of the empire, for the ſpace of eleven or twelve years: the more, becauſe ſome medals it appears pretty plain, that he returned to Rome before the year 112, the fifteenth of his reign, and that he left it the ſame or following year [q]; which gives a great light to hiſtory, and may ſerve to juſtify the acts of the glorious martyr St. Ignatius. Luſius Quietus diſtinguiſhed himſelf above all the commanders employed by Trajan in this war. He was a Moor by nation, and born in a country not ſubject to Rome; but nevertheleſs ſerved in the Roman cavalry, till he was either by Domitian or Nerva for ſome miſdemeanour degraded and diſmiſſed. Trajan, wanting Moors in his wars with the Dacians, took this prince again into the ſervice, with a body of his countrymen and dependents, at the head of whom he performed wonders, both in the firſt and ſecond Dacian war [r]. In the Parthian war he ſerved with ſuch courage and ſucceſs, that Trajan honoured him with the conſulate, and, towards the end of his reign, appointed him governor of Paleſtine, by way of reward for a ſignal victory which he gained over the Jews of Meſopotamia [s]. His reducing the Mardi, a people of Aſia near Armenia, and not far from the Caſpian ſea, is mentioned, as what moſt of all contributed to his glory and preferment [t]. Ammianus Marcellinus extolls him as one of the greateſt captains that ever bore arms for the Romans [u]. We are told, that Trajan had ſuch a kindneſs and eſteem for him, that he had ſome thoughts of naming him for his ſucceſſor, tho' he was not even born a ſubject of the empire [w]. We ſhall have occaſion to mention him again in the following reign. In the ſix following years we find nothing recorded by the compilers of the antients, (for the works of the antients themſelves have been long ſince loſt, as we have hinted above) except the names of the conſuls, the making the high-way by Trajan from Beneventum

A treaty between Trajan and the king of the Parthians.

[n] Vide Occon. p. 201. [o] Dio, p. 783. [p] Phot. c. 58.

Lucius Quietus diſtinguiſhes himſelf in this and Trajan's other wars.

[q] Vide Birag. p. 158. [r] Dio, in excerpt. Valeſ. p. 710. l. lxviii. p. 773. Spart. in Aur. Themiſt. orat. xvi. Mauric. tactic. l. xi. c. 2. [s] Dio, in excerpt. p. 710. Euſeb l. iv. c. 1. [t] Euſeb. ibid. [u] Ammian. l. xxix. [w] Euſeb. & Themiſt. ibid.

ventum to Brunduſium; the burning the pantheon by lightning; the overturning of ſome cities in Galatia by an earthquake; and dedicating of the great ſquare at Rome, which took its name from Trajan. The conſuls (for of theſe magiſtrates we have never yet omitted the names) were Appius Annius Trebonianus Gallus and Marcus Attilius Metellus Bradua; Aulus Cornelius Palma, the ſecond time, and L. Tullus; Priſcinus, or Priſcianus, and Orfitus; Caius Calpurnius Piſo and M. Vettius Bolanus; Trajan, the ſixth time, and Titus Sextius Bolanus; Lucius Publius Celſus, the ſecond time, and Caius Clodius Criſpinus; Quintus Ninnius Hoſta and Publius Manilius Vopiſcus. Theſe were conſuls from the eleventh to the ſeventeenth year of Trajan's reign, incluſively; that is, from the 108th to the 114th of the chriſtian æra. On ſome medals that were coined during Trajan's ſixth conſulſhip, is marked the departure of that prince from Trajan returns to the eaſt.

Rome [x], no doubt, to return to the eaſt: which we may ſuppoſe to have happened the year he was conſul, the fifteenth of his reign; for in that year Adrian, who commanded under him in the ſecond Parthian war, was created archon, or chief magiſtrate of Athens; which honour was probably conferred upon him, as he paſſed through that city with Trajan [y].

The eighteenth year of Trajan's reign and 115th of the chriſtian æra was remarkable for the victories gained by that great warrior over the Parthians, and for which he aſſumed the title of emperor the ſeventh, eighth, and ninth times [z]. Whatever gave occaſion to this war (for hiſtory is ſilent upon this head), Trajan, before he left Syria, ſent, at the requeſt of his friends, ſome perſons

He conſults the oracle of Heliopolis.

to conſult the oracle of Heliopolis in Phænicia, to know whether he ſhould return from this war to Rome. The oracle returned an anſwer, as uſual, in ambiguous terms, which might be interpreted either way. Trajan, putting the beſt conſtruction upon the dark words of the oracle, early in the ſpring left Syria, and marched againſt the Partians encamped on the other ſide of the Tygris. As the river was not fordable, and the enemy poſſeſſed with a numerous army the oppoſite bank, he ſecretly cauſed a great [x] Noris. epiſt. conſul. p. 72.

[y] Vide Noris. ibid.
[z] Gruter. p. 218. Goltz. p. 65, 66.

great number of boats to be built in the woods of Niſibis, which being conveyed upon carriages to the river-ſide, a bridge was ſuddenly formed with them over the river, which Trajan paſſed in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the enemy, who greatly annoyed him with ſhowers of arrows, till he ſent ſeveral boats againſt them manned with archers and ſlingers, and ordered others to move up and down the river, as if they were trying to land in other places. This ſo diſtracted the Parthians, already diſmayed and ſurpriſed at the ſight of ſo many veſſels in a country quite deſtitute of wood, that they gave way, and ſuffered the Roman army to paſs the river without further moleſtation. Trajan made himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Adiabene, which he had reduced in the former war, but perhaps reſtored upon the concluſion of the peace. He likewiſe ſubdued the country, which at that time ſtill retained the name of Aſſyria, and in which ſtood the city of Ninos or Ninive, and Arbela and Gaugamela, two places famous in hiſtory on account of the victories of Alexander the Great. As the Parthians were greatly weakened by their domeſtic wars and ſtill divided among themſelves, Trajan advanced, without oppoſition, to the celebrated city of Babylon, of the power and greatneſs of which we have read ſuch wonders. He entered it, no one offering to withſtand him; and reduced its large territory, where the Roman ſtandards had never before been diſplayed. By this acquiſition, he became maſter of thoſe rich and noble countries, Aſſyria and Chaldæa. There he was led by his curioſity, ſays Dion Caſſius, to viſit the lake of bitumen, which was made uſe of in building the famous walls of Babylon. But that lake is by Rutilius[a], and others, placed in Meſopotamia. Afterwards he began a canal between the Euphrates and the Tigris, in order to convey his veſſels out of the former river into the latter, and with them lay a bridge over the Tigris, being reſolved to beſiege Cteſiphon, which ſtood on that river: but being informed, that the bed of the Euphrates was much higher than that of the Tigris, he abandoned the deſign, fearing the ſtream would become too rapid, and conſequently

He paſſes the Tigris on a bridge of boats.

Reduces Aſſyria.

And arrives at Babylon.

He begins a canal between the Euphrates and the Tigris, but drops that undertaking.

[a] Rut. itiner. p. 32.

consequently unnavigable [b]. However Ammianus Marcellinus assure us, that the emperor Julian, having removed the stones with which the mouth of the canal was stopt, conveyed his vessels through that cut from the Euphrates into the Tigris, a little above Ctesiphon [c]. This canal was called Naarmalca, that is, the river of kings. Trajan, fearing the above-mentioned inconvenience, did not think it advisеable to make use of the canal; but ordered his vessels to be brought upon land-carriages from the Euphrates to the Tigris, these two rivers being in some places at a small distance from each other; and having formed a bridge with them, passed his army over the Tigris, and made himself master of Seleucia, and likewise of the great city of Ctesiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian, and afterwards of the Persian empire [d]. Upon his entering that city, he was proclaimed emperor by the army, who with loud shouts of joy confirmed to him the title of Parthicus, which he had first gained by the reduction of Nisibis. At Ctesiphon he took the daughter of Cosrhoes, and seized the throne of the Parthian kings, which was of massy gold [e]. Cosrhoes himself made his escape, and was still living in the reign of Adrian. Trajan acquainted the senate with the success that had attended him in this expedition: whereupon a decree passed, allowing the conqueror of the Parthians to enter Rome in triumph as often as he pleased [f]. The taking of Ctesiphon put him in possession of all the neighbouring countries. Eutropius tells us, that he reduced the Marcomades, the Cardueni, Anthemisia, a large province of Persia, says that writer, and all the countries lying between Babylon and India. At Babylon he visited the house in which Alexander the Great died, and there performed some ceremonies in honour of that famous conqueror [g]. Ammianus Marcellinus writes, that in his time Trajan's tribunal was still to be seen at a city in the neighbourhood of Babylon which he calls Ozogardene [h]. Trajan reduced Assyria to a Roman province, as he had before done Armenia and Mesopotamia; so that the empire now extended to the Tigris, and even beyond that river. How he disposed of the country of the Parthians, we shall relate Makes himself master of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian empire.

Reduces several countries.

Assyria made a Roman province.

[b] Dio, p. 784. Eutrop. in Trajan.
[c] Ammian. l. xxiv.
[d] Dio, ibid.
[e] Spart. in Adr.
[f] Dio, ibid.
[g] Dio, p. 785.
[h] Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 265.

relate anon. He obliged the inhabitants of Meſopotamia, and, no doubt, thoſe likewiſe of the other provinces, to pay him a yearly tribute [h]. The dialogue between Triepho and Critias, which is falſely aſcribed to Lucian, ſeems to have been written about this time; for it ends with the news of the taking of Suſa, formerly the metropolis of Perſia. Mention is likewiſe there made of inroads made by the Scythians, as if they committed great devaſtations in the Roman territories [i]. Towards the end of the autumn, Trajan returned to Antioch, which was that winter almoſt entirely ruined by one of the moſt dreadful earthquakes mentioned in hiſtory. That city was then crouded with troops, and ſtrangers came from all quarters, either out of curioſity, or upon buſineſs, and embaſſies; ſo that there was ſcarce a nation or province but what had a ſhare in the calamity; and all the Roman world, ſays Dion Caſſius [k], ſuffered in one city. The earthquake was preceded by violent claps of thunder, unuſual winds, and a dreadful noiſe under ground: then followed ſo terrible a ſhock, that the earth all trembled, ſeveral houſes were overturned, and others toſſed to and fro like a ſhip in the ſea: the noiſe of the cracking and burſting of the timber, of the falling of the houſes, and a diſmal and loud roaring under ground, drowned the cries of the diſmayed people. Thoſe who happened to be in their houſes, were, for the moſt part, buried under their ruins; ſuch as were walking in the ſtreets and in the ſquares, were by the violence of the ſhock, daſhed againſt one another, and moſt of them either killed or dangerouſly wounded. As the earthquake continued with ſome ſmall intermiſſion, for many days and nights together, many thouſands periſhed by it, and among the reſt the conſul Marcus Pedo Virgilianus, with many other perſons of great diſtinction. The moſt violent ſhock of all was, as we read in the acts of St. Ignatius, on a Sunday, the twenty-third of December. Trajan himſelf was much hurt, but nevertheleſs eſcaped through a window out of the houſe where he was. Dion Caſſius pretends, that he was taken out of the window, and carried away by one, who in tallneſs exceeded the human ſize. The ſame writer adds, that mount Liſon, which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from Antioch, bowed with its top, and threatened to fall down upon the city; that other mountains fell; that new rivers appeared; and others, that had

A dreadful earthquake at Antioch.

Trajan himſelf is hurt.

flowed

[h] Eutrop. ibid. Feſt. Ruf. breviar. p. 553. Spart. ibid.
[i] Lucian. in philopatride, dialogo. Et Baron ad ann. 114.
[k] Dio, p. 781.

flowed before, forſook their courſe, and vaniſhed. When the earthquake ceaſed, the voice of a woman was heard crying under the ruins; which being immediately removed, ſhe was found with a ſucking child in her arms, whom ſhe had kept alive, as well as herſelf, with her milk. Search was made for others, but no one beſides was found alive, except a child, that was ſtill ſucking its dead mother [l]. This dreadful earthquake is mentioned by Euſebius, Aurelius Victor, and Evagrias, who all ſpeak of it as the greateſt calamity recorded in hiſtory [m].

THE next conſuls were L. Ælius Lamia and Ælianus Verus. From an inſcription of this year, the nineteenth of Trajan's reign, we learn that the ſenate and people of Rome returned the emperor ſolemn thanks for having facilitated the entry into Italy on the ſide of the Adriatic ſea, by a port made by his orders at Ancona, as he had ſome years before made one on the Mediterranean, at or near Centumcellæ, now Civita-Vecchia. Upon the return of the ſpring, Trajan, leaving Antioch, viſited the conquered countries; and finding them all in a ſtate of tranquility, he made various regulations; and then embarking on board his fleet, ſailed down the Tigris, being deſirous to view the Perſian gulf, which Dion Caſſius calls the Red-Sea, or Mare Erythræum, ſuppoſing it to have taken that name from Erythrus, a prince once very powerful in thoſe parts [n]. The ſtorms, the rapidity of the river, and the tides rendered his navigation both troubleſome and dangerous. However, he made himſelf maſter of Meſene, an iſland formed by the Tigris, and obliged Athambylus, who reigned there, to pay him tribute. He was well received by the inhabitants of Charax Spaſinæ, the metropolis of Athambylus's dominions, which moſt geographers place at the mouth of the Tigris. Dion Caſſius tell us, that Trajan ſailed into the Ocean, meaning perhaps the Perſian gulf; for it is not probable, that, with the ill-built boats, of which his fleet conſiſted, he purſued his courſe beyond Ormuz, where the gulf ends. It was, we conjecture, on this occaſion, that he reduced Arabia Felix. Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, had ſome years before ſubdued Arabia Petræa, as we have obſerved above, and reduced it to a Roman province. But now Trajan made

The port of Ancona.

Trajan ſails down the Tigris into the Perſian gulf.

He reduces Arabia Felix.

[l] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 781. Ignat. acta, p. 53, 54. [m] Euſeb. chron. p. 208. & l. i. c. 12. [n] Dio, p. 784.

made himſelf maſter, it ſeems, of Arabia Felix; for Arrian, in his book on the navigation of the Red Sea, obſerves, that in the reign of Trajan, there were at Leuca, a borough upon that ſea, a centurion, and ſome troops, with a receiver, who claimed the fourth part of all the goods that were landed there [o]. The ſame writer places on the ſouth coaſt of Arabia, beyond the ſtreights of Bebel Mander, a city called Arabia, and ſurnamed Eudæmon, or the Happy, from its having been formerly enriched by means of the trade that was carried on there; but adds, "A little be-"fore our time it was deſtroyed by Cæſar, and is at pre-"ſent only a village [p]." As he places it in the country of the Homeritæ [q], ſome writers take it, to have ſtood where the preſent city of Aden ſtands. Beſides, it appears from ſeveral medals, or pieces of money, coined after the year 111, the fourteenth of Trajan's reign [r], that he reduced Arabia, not by his lieutenants, but in perſon [s]. Feſtus too mentions the conqueſt of Arabia [t]; and Eutropius ſeems to reckon the reducing of that country to a Roman province amongſt the laſt actions of Trajan [u]. A writer who is ſuppoſed to have flouriſhed about this time, after having ſaid, that the power of the Perſians and Parthians had yielded, adds, that Suſa itſelf was taken, and that all Arabia would ſoon ſubmit to the victorious and invincible prince [w]. This muſt, without all doubt, be underſtood of Arabia Felix, which it is thence plain he did not ſubdue, till after the conqueſt of Aſſyria, that is, before this year, the nineteenth of his reign, and the 116th of the chriſtian æra. Some read in Feſtus [x], that he conquered the country of the Saracens; but as no mention is made of that people by any other writer of thoſe times, we readily fall in with thoſe who, inſtead of Saraceni, read Oſrhoeni, who inhabited one of the provinces of Meſopotamia, called Oſrhoene, from a king of the country named Oſrhoes [y]. Trajan having reached the ocean, as we read in Dion Caſſius, and there diſcovering a ſhip bound to India, wiſhed he was young, that he might extend, as Alexander had done, his conqueſts to that country [z]. Eutropius tells us, that he had a fleet

He envies Alexander, who conquered India.

[o] Arrian. in peripl. Erythyr. p. 6. [p] Idem, p. 8. [q] Idem, p. 46. [r] Birag. p. 116. [s] Occo, p. 215. [t] Feſt. in breviar. p. 551. [u] Eutrop. in Trajan. [w] Lucian. philop. [x] Feſt. p. 551——553. [y] Procop. l. i. Perſ. c. 18. [z] Dio, p. 784.

fleet ready equipped in the Red Sea, with a deſign to invade India; that he informed himſelf of the cuſtoms, ſtrength, and manner of fighting of the Indians; and that he envied the happineſs of Alexander, who had ſubdued them, and extended his conqueſts far beyond the bounds of the Roman empire. The Romans had even the vanity to brag, that they had brought India under ſubjection, as Euſebius obſerves[a]; but by India they perhaps meant Arabia Felix. Trajan wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the ſucceſs of his arms, and naming the ſeveral nations, which he had conquered, and which were utterly unknown. They decreed him extraordinary honours; among the reſt, that he ſhould, upon his return to Rome, triumph over each particular nation, which he had ſubdued; which was decreeing him, not one, but many triumphs: a triumphal arch was built in his own forum, to perpetuate the memory of his conqueſts; and the people of Rome made great preparations to receive him with the utmoſt pomp upon his return. But to Rome he never returned; nor was the end of his actions anſwerable to the beginning. For moſt of the nations, which he had conquered, revolted and ſhook off the yoke, after having driven out or maſſacreed the garriſons that had been left amongſt them. The Jews, who had been diſperſed into all parts of the world, fell into a dreadful rebellion in all the provinces of the empire, being prompted thereunto by the abſence of the emperor, and the late terrible earthquake, which as they imagined, portended the ruin and downfal of the Roman empire. They roſe at the ſame time in Alexandria, all over Egypt, and in Libya Cyrenaica, againſt the other inhabitants of thoſe countries, whom hiſtorians call Greeks, and againſt the Romans, who were very numerous in thoſe provinces, which had been long ſubject to Rome. In Egypt, which was then governed by Lupus, they aſſembled in vaſt crowds, committed dreadful diſorders, and falling upon the inhabitants, who endeavoured to ſuppreſs the tumult, defeated them at the very firſt onſet with great ſlaughter. But this advantage coſt them dear; for the Egyptians, who had the good luck to eſcape the general carnage, ſheltering themſelves in Alexandria, ſeized and maſſacred, without diſtinction of ſex or age, all the Jews who dwelt in that city[b]. The Jews indeed ſold their lives dear, but were in the end overpowered, and all to a man cut in pieces[c]. The Jews Extraordinary honours decreed him by the ſenate.

The Jews revolt in ſeveral places.

[a] Euſeb. chron. p. 206.
[b] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 2.
[c] Oros. l. vii. c. 12.

Jews of Cyrene, who were it ſeems, the ringleaders of the revolt, finding they could not receive the aſſiſtance which they had promiſed themſelves from their brethren in Alexandria, (for they had formed a deſign of ſeizing that city) entered Egypt, committing every where moſt dreadful devaſtations and unheard-of cruelties. They were headed, according to Euſebius[d], by one Lucua, whom he ſtyles king; but, according to Dion Caſſius[e], by one named Andrew, whom they had choſen for their leader. However that be, their rage and fury was ſo great and boundleſs, their barbarities ſo heinous and outrageous, that they are ſcarce to be matched in hiſtory. For, not ſatisfied with inhumanly maſſacring Greeks and Romans of all ranks, ages, and degrees, they devoured their fleſh, waſhed themſelves in their blood, wore their ſkins, and made themſelves garlands with their intrails; ſome they ſawed aſunder; others they threw to wild beaſts, or obliged them to fight till they killed one another, after they had put them to all kinds of torments. Thus they deſtroyed in Libya above two hundred thouſand perſons; an incredible number in Egypt, not ſpecified by hiſtorians; and in the iſland of Cyprus, where they likewiſe roſe, two hundred and fifty thouſand: Salamis, one of the chief and moſt populous cities of that iſland, they laid in aſhes, after having, with that cruelty which was ever peculiar to the Jewiſh nation, murdered all the inhabitants, without ſparing either women or children[f]. By theſe maſſacres, the province of Libya was ſo diſpeopled, that it would have been left quite uninhabited, had not the emperor Adrian ſent thither a few years after ſeveral colonies[g]. Trajan, informed of theſe barbarities, reſolved in a great rage to purſue thoſe impious wretches, not as rebels, but as monſters, and enemies to mankind. Accordingly he diſpatched into Libya, Marcius Turbo, with a ſtrong body of horſe, and foot, and a conſiderable fleet, injoining him to purſue them both by ſea and land with revenge anſwerable to the enormity of their crimes. Turbo defeated them in a pitched battle, and put great numbers of them to the ſword, but not without the loſs of many of his beſt men, the Jews of Cyrene having been joined before the battle by thoſe of Egypt[h]. Neither was the victory compleat, nor the battle deciſive; for the

And commit unheard-of cruelties.

They are defeated in Africa by Turbo.

[d] Euſeb. ibid. [e] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 786. [f] Doi. ibid.
[g] Oros. l. vii. c. 12. Euſeb. in chron. [h] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 2.

the war continued till the reign of Adrian, who ſucceeded Trajan on the eleventh of Auguſt of the year 117. That prince is ſaid by St. Jerom to have conquered the Jews, who had revolted a ſecond time[i]; which Scaliger and others underſtand with reſpect to the firſt revolt under Nero. Beſides, Spartian tells us, that Turbo, having, in the very beginning of Adrian's reign, ended the war with the Jews, was ſent by that prince againſt the Moors, who had begun to make incurſions into the Roman territories before the death of Trajan[k]. In the Iſland of Cyprus, the Jews were, by the Romans and inbabitants, all cut off to a man; and thoſe of that cruel and treacherous nation forbidden, upon pain of death, ever to ſet foot upon that iſland; which prohibition the inhabitants extended even to ſuch as were driven thither by ſtreſs of weather, and whom conſequently they put immediately to death[k]. They revolted likewiſe in Meſopotamia, but were there ſoon quelled by the brave Luſius Quietus, who defeated them in a pitched battle, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the reſt out of the country[l]. The example of the Jews was followed by moſt of the countries which Trajan had conquered, the inhabitants riſing every-where up in arms, and murdering or driving out the Roman gariſons. Againſt them the emperor diſpatched Luſius Quietus and L. Appius Maximus, who were attended with very different ſucceſs; for Maximus was defeated and killed; by whom, hiſtory does not inform us: but Luſius diſtinguiſhed himſelf as uſual, gained great advantages over the enemy, recovered the city of Niſibis, beſieged, ſtormed, and laid in aſhes the city of Edeſſa. On the other hand, Erucius Clarus and Julius Alexander, two other commanders of the emperor, retook the city of Seleucia upon the Tigris, and ſeveral others, which had ſhaken off the yoke. Luſius was, for his gallant conduct, rewarded with the government of Paleſtine[m], no doubt, to keep that province in awe, which was chiefly inhabited by Jews, and ſeemed inclined, as Spartian informs us[n], to revolt and raiſe new diſturbances in the empire. For theſe advantages, and the recovery of his conqueſts, Trajan took the tenth and laſt time the title of emperor[o]. During theſe diſturbances, Sambelus

And all cut to pieces in the iſland of Cyprus.

Moſt of the countries conquered by Trajan revolt.

But are again reduced.

[i] Hier. in chron.
[k] Dio. l. lxviii. p. 785. Euſeb. l. iv. c. 2.
[a] Spart. in Adr. p. 6.
[k] Spart. in Adr. p. 3.
[l] Dio, p. 786. Ammian. l. xxix.
[m] Dio, in excerpt. Val, p. 720.
[o] Goltz. p. 86.

Sambelus, king of Meſene, continued faithful to Trajan. Neither did the Parthians make any attempts towards the recovery of their liberty, or rather of their former condition. But Trajan, fearing they would ſoon ſhake off the yoke, thought it adviſeable to oblige them, by giving them, inſtead of a Roman governor, a king of their own nation. With this deſign he repaired to Cteſiphon; and having there aſſembled in a large plain the Romans and Parthians, he aſcended a high throne, and declared one Parthamaſpates king of the Parthians, putting, with great pomp and ſolemnity, the crown upon his head. Parthamaſpates, whom Spartian calls Pſamateſſiris, continued faithful to the Romans; but was deſpiſed by the Parthians as a ſlave to Rome, and had ſcarce any authority over them[p]. In ſeveral coins, which have reached our times, is repreſented a king proſtrate before Trajan, with this legend on ſome, "He gives a king to the Parthians"; and on others the following, "He diſtributes kingdoms[q]".

Trajan gives a king to the Parthians.

The following year, the twentieth and laſt of Trajan's reign, Niger and Apronianus being conſuls[r], the emperor marched into Arabia and there made war upon the Hagareni, or Agareni, who had likewiſe revolted. What part of Arabia they inhabited, we cannot determine, ſince we find no farther mention made of them till the times of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, when the name of Hagareni became common to the Saracens and Arabians in general. The emperor laid ſiege to their city, which by Xiphilin is called Atra. It was neither great nor beautiful, ſays Dion Caſſius[s], but thought to be very rich, by reaſon the ſun was worſhipped there, which drew crouds of people thither with rich preſents from the neighbouring countries[t]. It was ſituated on the top of an high and ſteep mountain, well peopled, and ſurrounded with ſtrong walls[u]. But its chief ſtrength conſiſted in the barrenneſs of the neighbouring country, deſtitute, to a great diſtance, of graſs, wood, and even of water; ſo that a great army could not long ſubſiſt before it; hence it was neither taken now by Trajan, nor afterwards by Severus, tho' they had both made a breach in the wall. Trajan narrowly eſcaped being killed in one of the attacks,

He beſieges Atra.

[p] Dio. p. 786.
[q] Occo, p. 213. Birag. p. 163.
[r] Idat. & Caſſiodor. in Faſt.
[s] Dio, l. lxviii. p. 785.
[t] Idem, l. lxxv. p. 854.
[u] Herodian. l. iii. p. 528.

attacks; for having laid aſide the enſigns of his dignity, that he might not be known, he headed his men in perſon: but the enemy, knowing him, notwithſtanding that diſguiſe, by his grey hairs and majeſtic air, aimed chiefly at him, wounded his horſe, and killed an horſeman by his ſide. Beſides, as often as the Romans advanced to the attack, they were driven back by violent ſtorms of wind, rain, and hail, and dreadful flaſhes of lightening. At the ſame time, they were in a ſtrange manner infeſted in their camp by ſwarms of flies: ſo that Trajan was in the end obliged to raiſe the ſiege and retire. Soon after, as he was ſtricken in years and worn out with ſo many long marches, he was ſeized with a dropſy and palſy, which he aſcribed to poiſon, but others thought natural. However, he was ſtill for returning into Meſopotamia, to reduce ſome places which had revolted there. But his diſtemper encreaſing, he left the command of the army to Adrian, whom he had appointed governor of Syria, and embarqued for Italy. It was no ſooner known, that he had ſet ſail, than all the countries, which he had conquered at a vaſt charge, and by expoſing himſelf to innumerable dangers, ſhook off the yoke, and recovered their former condition, in ſpite of the troops which he had left to keep them in ſubjection. The Parthians drove out Parthamaſpates; the Armenians choſe themſelves a king; and the greateſt part of Meſopotamia revolted from Rome, and ſubmitted to the king of the Parthians. Thus all the pains he had taken, all the toils he had undergone, and the immenſe ſums he had expended, proved in the end to no effect. Upon his arrival at Selinus in Cilicia, which was afterwards from him called Trajanopolis, he was ſeized with a flux, which in a very ſhort time put an end to his life. He died in the beginning of Auguſt, after having reigned nineteen years, ſix months, and fifteen days, counting from the death of Nerva to the eleventh of Auguſt, (for we know not the preciſe day on which he died) when Adrian received at Antioch the news of his death, which had been concealed for ſome time, and thereupon cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor [w]. Eutropius, and ſuch as have copied him, tell us, that Trajan died at Seleucia in Iſauria. But Seleucia is at a great diſtance from

But raiſes the ſiege.

Is taken ill, and ſets ſail for Italy.

The Parthians drive out their king.

Trajan dies at Selinus in Cilicia.

[w] Dio, p. 786. Aurel. epit. Julian. Cæſar, p. 39.

from the ſea; but moſt writers agree, that he was going to Rome by ſea. Beſides, it appears from ſeveral inſcriptions [x], from the author of the verſes commonly aſcribed to the Sibyls, and from the chronicle of Alexandria, that he died at Selinus. Hence Scaliger and Caſaubon wonder, how any one can call in queſtion a thing ſo well atteſted [y]. His body was burnt at Selinus, and his aſhes carried by his wife Plotina and his niece Matidies, or Matidia, in a golden urn, to Rome, where they were received with extraordinary pomp, and depoſited under the ſtately column, which he had erected, tho' it ſtood within the walls, where no one before him had been buried [z]. Sports, called Parthic Sports, were for many years celebrated in memory of his victories in the eaſt [a]. From an antient inſcription, we learn, that Phidemion, his freedman, his chamberlain, cup-bearer, and ſecretary, died a few days after him, on the twelfth of Auguſt, of grief for the loſs of ſo good a maſter [b]. Trajan left no children [c]; nor are we told that he ever had any. Some write, that he deſigned in imitation of Alexander the Great, to die without naming a ſucceſſor; others tell us, that he intended to name ten perſons to the ſenate, leaving it in their power to chuſe which of them they judged beſt qualified for the ſovereignty [d]. We read in Dion Caſſius [e], that once at a banquet he deſired his friends to name ten perſons, whom they thought capable of, and equal to, the ſupreme power. Both Trajan himſelf and his friends ſeemed, according to Spartian, to judge Neratius Priſcus, who was the greateſt civilian of his time, the beſt qualified for ſucceeding him in the empire [f]. That writer adds, that one day he addreſſed him thus: To you Neratius, I recommend the provinces, in caſe I ſhould die. He had likewiſe ſome thoughts of leaving the empire to Servianus [g], whoſe daughter Adrian had married; and to Luſius Quietus, of whom he deſervedly entertained a mighty opinion [h]. But in the end, Adrian was preferred to all the reſt; which was rather owing to the favour of Plotina, than to any extraordinary kindneſs of Trajan towards him. For though the emperor was nearly related to him, had been his guardian, and given him his niece in marriage, yet he never took great notice of him [i]; nor did Adrian ever ſhew any particular affection for Trajan. Hence it was commonly believed, that Trajan did not adopt him; but that Plotina, who was a great friend to Adrian, introduced, after the death of her huſband, a ſuppoſititious perſon, who, counterfeiting the voice of the dying emperor, declared, that he adopted Adrian. Dion Caſſius tells us in expreſs terms, that Trajan never adopted Adrian; but the whole affair was managed by Plotina and Atianus, or rather Tatianus, who had been jointly, with the emperor, Adrian's guardian; and adds, that for this reaſon the emperor's death was for ſome days concealed. This Dion Caſſius learnt of his father Apronianus, who, as he had been governor of Cilicia, where the emperor died, had thence certain intelligence of what had paſſed at his death. Beſides, the letters written to the ſenate concerning this adoption were not ſigned by Trajan, but by Plotina, who had never before ſigned any of her huſband's diſpatches [k]. A modern writer, of no mean character [l], looks upon what Dion Caſſius relates of the ſuppoſititious adoption of Adrian as an arrant fable; and pretends, that he was adopted by the emperor a whole year before his death; which, if true, would have left no room even for ſuch a fable. What induced him to embrace this opinion is, that Adrian, as we read in moſt authors, and as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, reigned twenty-two years: on the other hand, it is certain, that he died on the tenth of July in 138. He muſt therefore have begun to count the years of his reign from the ninth of Auguſt of the year 116, that is, a year before Trajan's death; for that prince died in the beginning of Auguſt in 117, he thence concludes, that Adrian muſt have been adopted a year before; and from the time of his adoption reckoned the years of his reign. This objection, which we ſhall endeavour to anſwer at the end of Adrian's reign, reign, as in a more proper place, is not of ſuch weight with us as to make us look upon the account, which Dion Caſſius gives of Adrian's adoption, as an arrant fable. We ſhall cloſe the hiſtory of this great emperor's reign with a ſuccinct account of his noble and uſeful works. Aure- Great works performed by Trajan.

His aſhes are conveyed to Rome, and depoſited under his column.

[x] Vide P. Pagi. ad ann. 117. [y] Vide Caſaubon. in Spart. not. C. p. 10. & Scaliger. in Euſeb. chron. p. 341. [z] Dio, l. lxix. p. 788. Ciaccon. col. Traj. Vict. epit. [a] Dio, ibid. [b] Euſeb. chron. p. 208. [c] Themiſtius, orat. 16. [d] Spart. in Adri. p. 3. [e] Dio, l. lxix. p. 795. [f] Spart. ibid. [g] Dio, p. 795. [h] Themiſt. orat. 16.

Whether he adopted Adrian.

[i] Dio, p. 795, 788. Spart. ibid. [k] Dio, l. lxix. p. 787, 788. [l] Dodwell. in append. ad diſſertat. Cyprianic. Oxon. 1684. p. 67.

lius Victor will have him to have firſt introduced the uſe of poſt-chaiſes; but that invention is generally aſcribed to Auguſtus [m], and was probably only improved by Trajan, as it was after his time by ſeveral other emperors, as appears from Gothofredus, who treats of this ſubject at length in his comments upon the Theodoſian code [n]. He made at an immenſe charge, a large and convenient road, leading through many barbarous nations, from the moſt diſtant coaſts of the Euxine ſea to thoſe of the Ocean in Gaul [o]. He built ſeveral magnificent libraries in Rome, and a ſtately theatre in the field of Mars [p]. He adorned the city with many magnificent edifices, enlarged the circus, repaired a great number of antient buildings, and ſupplied with plenty of water thoſe quarters of the city, which by other princes had been neglected. But the moſt magni- His ſquare and column.
ficent of all his works was the great ſquare, which he made at Rome, and called from his own name, having for that purpoſe levelled an hill an hundred and forty-four foot high. In the midſt of the ſquare, he erected the famous column, which is ſtill to be ſeen, to ſerve him for a tomb, and at the ſame time to ſhew the height of the hill, which he levelled, as appears from the inſcription on the baſis, dated the ſeventeenth year of his tribunitial power, which was the 114th of the chriſtian æra. The emperor Conſtantius, when he came to Rome in 357, found nothing in that ſtately metropolis which he admired ſo much as Trajan's ſquare [q]. The architect employed by Trajan in this inimitable work, as Conſtantius ſtyled it, was one Apollodorus. Ciacconius tells us, that on the top of the column, which ſtood in the midſt of the ſquare, was placed Trajan's ſtatue, holding a golden apple in its right hand; and adds, that in this apple were depoſited the aſhes of the deceaſed prince [s]. But Eutropius and Victorinus, whom we have followed, tell us, that he was buried under the column. During this prince's reign, moſt of the provinces of the empire ſuffered greatly by earthquakes, and were grievouſly afflicted with a dreadful plague, with famine, and frequent conflagrations [t]. At Rome the Tiber overflowed its banks with incredible violence, laid great part of the city under water, over-turned many houſes, and greatly damaged the fields; tho' Trajan cauſed a great canal to be dug, in order to drain them, and to convey the water into its natural channel [u]. Phlegon tells us, that in Trajan's time a woman was delivered at Alexandria of five children the ſame day, three males and two females, who were brought up with great care by the emperor. The next year the ſame woman was delivered of three children [w]. We read in Plutarch [x], that in Trajan's reign a veſtal, named Helvetia, going on horſe-back, was ſtruck dead with a flaſh of lightning, and thrown quite naked on one ſide, and her horſe on the other; which the ſoothſayers looked upon as preſaging ſomething highly diſhonourable to the veſtals and the Roman knights. Accordingly, not long after, the ſlave of a knight, named Buteces, came of his own accord, and depoſed, that his maſter and ſeveral others of the equeſtrian order had for ſome time carried on a criminal converſation with three veſtals, Æmilia, Licinia, and Martia, who were immediately puniſhed, and the knights too their accomplices. But the pontiffs, having firſt conſulted the books of the Sibyls, declared, that the crime was to be expiated by burying alive in the forum boarium, or the ox-market, two men and two women, natives of Greece and Gaul; which was done accordingly, tho' they had not long before condemned the ſame crime in others. For the Britons having immolated a human victim to their gods, their magiſtrates had been ordered to puniſh them; though they were afterwards pardoned upon their pleading an antient cuſtom, but at the ſame time commanded, under the ſevereſt penalties, to forbear ſuch ſacrifices for the future [x]. Trajan notwithſtanding his humanity and good-nature, ſuffered the chriſtians to be inhumanly perſecuted in moſt provinces of the empire. As he publiſhed no new edicts againſt the chriſtian religion, he is not as Baronius obſerves [y], reckoned by Tertullian among

[m] Vide Cod. Theodoſ. tom. ii. p. 510, 511. [n] Goth. in cod. Theodoſ. tom. ii. p. 506, &c. [o] Aur. Vict. [p] Plin. paneg. p. 96. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 778. [q] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 71. [r] Dio, p. 789. [s] Ciacon. de col. Trajan. c. 14.

Three veſtals puniſhed.

Two men and two women buried alive at Rome.

Trajan ſuffers the chriſtians to be perſecuted.

[t] Vict. epit. [u] Plin. l. viii. ep. 17. [w] Phleg. mir. c. 20. [x] Plut. quæſt. Rom. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Baron. ad ann. 100.

among the perſecutors of the church. But that he was an enemy to the chriſtians, and highly prejudiced againſt them, is manifeſt from Pliny's letter to him [z], and his anſwer to Pliny [a]. This may be aſcribed to his looking upon the chriſtians, who were already very numerous and multiplied daily, with a jealous and ſuſpicious eye, as the underminers of the religion of the empire, and enemies to the gods adored at Rome and in all the Roman provinces. Beſides, he perhaps accounted them eſtabliſhers of heteriæ, or illegal ſocieties, which uſually breed factions and ſeditions; whence all ſocieties, or colleges, not ſettled by an imperial edict, or a decree of the ſenate, were forbidden, and the perſons frequenting them adjudged guilty of treaſon. But after he had been informed by Pliny of their innocence, he could not, nor indeed did he, as appears from his anſwer, entertain any ſiniſter opinion of them. But nevertheleſs, inſtead of putting an immediate ſtop to the perſecution, he ſent directions into Bithynia, where it chiefly raged, repugnant to good ſenſe, and altogether inconſiſtent with his ſo much boaſted juſtice, humanity, and good-nature. For he commanded, that no inquiſition ſhould be made for the chriſtians, but that ſuch as were accuſed ſhould be puniſhed; which was, as Tertullian obſerves in his excellent apology [b], declaring them innocent, and at the ſame time ordering them to be treated as criminals. If they are guilty, ſays that writer, addreſſing himſelf to the emperor, why do you forbid any ſearch to be made after them? If they are innocent, why do you command them to be puniſhed? This ordinance, however iniquitous and abſurd, continued in vigor till the perſecution of Severus, that is, for almoſt a whole century. But for a more particular account of the unjuſt proceedings, even of the beſt emperors, againſt the chriſtians, we refer our readers to Tertullian [c], and Euſebius [d], where they will find, that by ſome emperors it was forbidden, upon pain of death, to accuſe the chriſtians, who nevertheleſs were, by a ſtrange inconſiſtency, to be capitally puniſhed, when accuſed or diſcovered [e]. As Trajan was, what every prince ought to be, a generous encourager of learning, under him the efforts of genius and ſtudy

His unjuſt proceedings againſt them began to revive [f]; and his reign became famous for a great number of eminent hiſtorians, poets, orators, and philoſophers, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in our notes (A).

[z] Plin. l. x. ep. 102. [a] Idem ibid. ep. 103. [b] Tertull. apol. c. 2 [c] Tertull in apol. [d] Euſeb. l. v. c. 21. [e] Tertull. apol. c. 5.

[f] Plin. pan. p. 84. Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 2, 3.

(A) Theſe were Julius Frontinus, Cornelius Tacitus, Pliny the younger, Pompeius Saturninus, Titinius Capito, Claudius Pollio, Verginius Romanus, &c. Sextus Julius Frontinus was prætor in the firſt year of Veſpaſian's reign, but yielded that dignity to Domitian, after having held it but one day, or two at moſt (1). Some years after he commanded in Britain with great reputation and ſucceſs, till the ninth year of Veſpaſian's reign, when he was ſucceeded by the celebrated Agricola. As that command was given to ſuch only as had been conſuls, Frontinus, no doubt, had been honoured with the conſulſhip before he was ſent into Britain. He is thought to have been conſul a ſecond time under Nerva, and a third under Trajan (2). He was likewiſe augur, and ſucceeded in that dignity by Pliny the younger, in the fourth year of Adrian's reign (3); whence we conclude, that he diedthat year, the 100th of the chriſtian æra, the augurate being an employment for life. He was a great civilian, and highly eſteemed by all the men of learning who flouriſhed in his time, eſpecially by Martial, who mentions and commends him in his epigrams. In his laſt will he deſired, that no tomb might be erected to him, ſaying, that without ſuch monuments the world would remember him, if his life had deſerved it (4). Tacitus, ſpeaking of Frontinus, ſays. that he was a man as great and able as he found ſcope and ſafety to be (5). He was one of the greateſt commanders of his time (6), and gave ſignal proofs both of his bravery and conduct, in utterly ſubduing the powerful and warlike nation of the Silures, tho' beſides the courage of the enemy, he was likewiſe obliged to ſtruggle with the difficulties of places and ſituation (7). He wrote four books of ſtratagems, which have reached our times, and are ſuppoſed to have been inſcribed to Trajan. As he flatters Domitian in ſeveral places of his work, we may thence conclude, that it was compoſed in his reign. In the preface, which he prefixed to this work, he tells us, that he had ſtudied the military art with great application; and, beſides the book of ſtratagems, written ſome others upon the ſame ſubject. We read likewiſe in Vegetius, that what Frontinus compendiouſly wrote on military diſcipline, and copied in great part from Cato the cenſor, was greatly eſteemed by Trajan (8). Ælian quotes another work done by him, in which he ſeems to have collected what-ever he found in Homer upon the ſubject of war (9). Nerva committed to him the care of the fountains and aqueducts of Rome; on which occaſion he wrote the treatiſe of aqueducts, which has reached us; as have done ſome other ſmall pieces of his, and are to be found in the collection which Scriverius has made of the antients, who have treated of the military art, and publiſhed at Antwerp in 1607. From theſe pieces it appears, that they were written during the war with the Dacians; which ſome underſtand of Domitian's war with that people; others of Trajan's (10). As for the treatiſe of colonies, which Scriverius aſcribes to Frontinus, it either was not done by him, or has been ſince altered; for mention is there made of Adrian, Severus, Antoninus, Commodus, and other emperors, who reigned long after Frontinus's time.

(1) Tacit. l. iv. c. 39. (2) Noris epiſt. conſul. p. 61, 62. (3) Plin. l. iv. epiſt. 8. (4) Plin. l. xix. epiſt. 19. (5) Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 17. (6) Ælian. tact. p. 3. (7) Tacit. ibid.

Cornelius Tacitus, the greateſt orator, ſtateſman, and hiſtorian of his time, was, as is commonly ſuppoſed, the ſon of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and procurator of Belgic Gaul. His promotion in the ſtate was begun, as he himſelf informs us (11), by Veſpaſian, augmented by Titus, and by Domitian advanced yet higher. He was prætor under Domitian in the year of the Chriſtian æra 88, the ſeventh of that prince's reign, and conſul under Nerva in 97, being ſubſtituted to Verginius Rufus, whoſe panegyric, or funeral oration, he compoſed and pronounced (12). He married in 77, or 78, the daughter of the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola (13). Lipſius is of opinion, that he left children by her, ſince the emperor Tacitus pretended to be deſcended from him, or to be of the ſame family; for he called the hiſtorian, as Vopiſcus informs us (14), his kinſman; and Sidonius counts him among the anceſtors of Polemus, prefect of Gaul (15). He had been four years abſent from Rome, when Agricola died (16); which has given occaſion to ſome writers to ſuppoſe, without any foundation, that he was baniſhed by Domitian. He pleaded at the bar, even after he had been conſul; and, by his eloquent ſpeeches, gained the reputation of the greateſt orator of his time (17). He was was much admired by Pliny, who lived in cloſe friendſhip with him, and by all men of learning, who reckoned it a great honour to be acquainted with a perſon of his extraordinary accompliſhments (18). He ſeems to have publiſhed ſome ſpeeches, and likewiſe verſes (19), which have been long ſince loſt. One of his letters has been conveyed to us amongſt thoſe of Pliny. Tho' he was the greateſt orator of his time, he is now known only by his hiſtorical works, which can never be ſufficiently admired and commended. He ſeems to have written his deſcription of Germany during the ſecond conſulate of Trajan, that is, in 98. His life of Agricola, which Lipſius thinks one of the fineſt pieces in the Latin tongue, was, as we conjecture from the preface, one of the firſt pieces he compoſed, and probably publiſhed in the very beginning of Trajan's reign. The work which compriſes the lives of the emperors, from the death of Galba to that of Domitian, ought to be placed next; for in his annals he refers the reader to his account of the reign of Domitian (20). That work, which is by Tertullian (21) and other antients called the hiſtory of Tacitus, compriſed the tranſactions of the Romans, both at home and abroad, from the year 69, to the year 96, of the chriſtian æra; but only his account of the year 69, and part of the year 70, have reached our times. Having ended his hiſtory, he began his annals, (for ſo he himſelf ſtyles them) from the death of Auguſtus to the reign of Galba, in which there are many lamentable chaſms, as we have already obſerved. He had reſerved, as he himſelf tells us (22), for the ſtudy and employment of his old age, the reigns of Nerva and Trajan; but that work, it ſeems, he never undertook, no mention being made of it by any of the antients. He likewiſe propoſed writing the hiſtory of Auguſtus's reign; but St. Jerom knew of no other hiſtorical works of Tacitus, except his hiſtory and annals, which were in all thirty books (23). Of theſe are now remaining, not without many chaſms, only twelve books of his annals, and five of his hiſtory. As to his ſtyle, it is ſublime and expreſſive; his thoughts are great, his phraſe elevated, and his words few. He ſhews himſelf, throughout his whole work, an upright patriot, zealous for public liberty and the welfare of his country; a declared enemy to tyrants, and to the tools of tyranny; a lover of human kind, a man of virtue, who adores liberty and truth, and every-where recommends them. As no man had ſeen more, and few thought ſo much, he draws events from from their firſt ſources, takes off every diſguiſe, and penetrates every artifice. He ſaw every thing in a true and uncommon light; whence his reflections are maſterly and profound, like mirrors, where human nature and government are exhibited in their proper ſize and colours. His ſtyle is a kind of language peculiar to himſelf, weighty, grave, and well-adapted to his ſubject. The older he grew, the more he curtailed his ſtyle; for his hiſtory is much more copious and flowing than his annals; ſo that what has by ſome been reckoned a fault, was in him the effect of his judgment. His Latin is pure and claſſical; he has few or no words which had not been uſed by ſome approved writers; nor does he often give new ideas to old words. However, as he is ſparing of his words, and, after having ſtarted the idea, leaves the reader to purſue it, he is thence charged by the moderns with obſcurity. The emperor Tacitus directed his books to be placed in all the libraries; and, for their better preſervation, ordered ten copies of them to be tranſcribed every year at the public expence (24). But notwithſtanding this care, many of them have been long ſince loſt, as we have obſerved above. As for the dialogue on the decay of eloquence, which is by ſome aſcribed to Tacitus, by others to Quintilian, and was written in the ſixth year of the reign of Veſpaſian, Lipſius, from the ſtyle, is more inclined to adjudge it to Quintilian than to Tacitus. But of that piece we have ſpoken already in this volume (25). The unjuſt cenſure of Mr. Bayle and others upon Tacitus, as if he had derived the actions of his princes, even the moſt innocent, from wicked counſels and deſigns, is fully confuted by Mr. Gordon in the diſcourſes which he has prefixed to his excellent tranſlation of that hiſtorian (26); a tranſlation which has been of great uſe to us in compiling ſeveral parts of this hiſtory.

(8) Veg. l. 1. c. 18. (9) Ælian. tact. c. i. p. 1. (10) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii. c. 4. (11) Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 1. (12) Plin. l. ii. ep. 1. (13) Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 9. (14) Vopiſ. in Tacit. (15) Sid. l. iv. epiſt. 4. (16) Tacit, ibid. c. 44 (17) Plin. l. ii. epiſt. 1, 11.

(18) Idem, l. iv. epiſt. 13, 15. l. ix. epiſt. 10 (19) Plin. l. ix. epiſt. 10. (20) Tacit. annal. c. 11. (21) Tertull. ap. c. 16 & lib. de ſpectac. (22) Tacit. hiſt. l. i. c. 1. (23) Hier. in Zac.

Pliny was a native of Comum, now Como, the ſon of L. Cæcilius, by the ſiſter of Pliny the elder, by whom he was adopted, and thence took the name of C. Plinius Cæcilius Secundus (27). He was born in the eighth year of Nero's reign the 61ſt of the chriſtian æra, and ſtudied eloquence under Quintilian (28) with ſuch ſucceſs, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two greateſt orators of their time. In his youth he followed the profeſſion of arms (29), was prætor under Domitian, and under Trajan conſul, augur and governor of Pontus and Bithynia. But his chief employment was to plead cauſes, which he did with great eloquence, and equal diſintereſtedneſs, not accepting of his clients fees or preſents of any kind, even before the law forbidding them paſſed in the ſenate, (24) Vopiſc. in Tacit. (25) Vol. xiv. p. 572. (26) Gord. p. 18—23. (27) Plin. prol. & l. v. ep. 8. (28) Idem, l. ii. ep. 14. (29) Idem, l. i. ep. 10.

nate. He publiſhed ſeveral harangues or ſpeeches, none of which have reached our times except his panegyric upon the emperor Trajan. An inſcription, quoted by Voſſius (30), aſcribes to him ſome hiſtorical pieces; but of theſe no mention is made by any antient writer: nay, Apollinaris Sidonius tells us, that Tacitus did not apply himſelf to the writing of hiſtory, till he had in vain endeavoured to engage Pliny in that province (31). The letter in which Pliny excuſes himſelf from that taſk, is ſtill extant (32), but inſcribed to one Capito; perhaps in the time of Sidonius, that is, in the fifth century, it paſſed for a letter written to Tacitus. Some make Pliny author of the lives of illuſtrious men, which by ſome critic is aſcribed to Cornelius Nepos, but by Voſſius to Aurelius Victor (33). Pliny often mentions his own verſes; but, as they have been long ſince loſt, we can give no account of them. He himſelf made and publiſhed a collection of ſuch of his letters as he thought the moſt diverting and inſtructive (34); and of theſe are ſtill extant ten books, which have been of ſignal uſe to us in deſcribing the reign of Trajan. He was, as appears from his letters, a man of great honour, probity, diſintereſtedneſs, and good-nature; of which we find innumerable inſtances in his letters. He preſented the city of Comum, where he was born, with a valuable and numerous collection of books, which he bought at a great rate, and allotted a large fund to be employed, partly in purchaſing other books, and partly in maintaining and bringing up the children of his poor countrymen (35). As the citizens of Comum uſed, for want of proper maſters at home, to ſend their children to be educated at Mediolanum, now Milan, he prevailed upon them to contribute towards the hiring and maintaining of profeſſors in all arts and ſciences, and was himſelf at the third part of the charge; he would have willingly paid the whole, had he not believed, that the parents of the children, by being obliged to diſburſe two thirds of the requiſite ſum, would be thence more effectually induced to chuſe profeſſors well qualified for that truſt, than if the whole charge were borne by him; in which caſe, favour, he apprehended, might prevail over merit (36). Beſides his countrymen, he preſented others with conſiderable ſums, namely, Quintilian, on occaſion of the marriage of his daughter (37); the poet Martial, when he left Rome, to return to Spain, his native country (38); and one Romanus Firmius, (30 Voſſ. hiſt. lat. l. i. c. 30 (31) Sidon. l. iv. ep. 23.

(32) Plin. l. v. ep. 8. (33) Voſſ. ibid. (34) Plin. l. i. ep. 1.
(35) Idem. l. i. ep. 8. l. vii. ep. 18. (36) Idem, l. iv. ep. 13.
(37) Idem, l. vi. ep. 32. (38) Idem, l. iii. ep. 21.

to make up the ſum that was requiſite for his being raiſed to the equeſtrian order (39). He was not himſelf poſſeſſed of a large eſtate; but by beſtowing little upon himſelf, he could afford beſtowing a great deal upon his friends, as he had no children (40) A lady of merit, named Corellia, for whom Pliny had a particular value, having betrayed to him a deſire of having lands on the lake of Como, he generouſly offered her a ſmall eſtate, lately fallen to him, which bordered on that lake. Corellia refuſed the preſent, and deſired to know the value of it; when one of Pliny's freedmen no doubt by private orders from his maſter, undervalued it, and ſold it to her at a very low rate; which Corellia afterwards knew, but Pliny could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept the full value of the land (41.) He at once diſcharged all the debts of one of his friends, ſubſtituting himſelf in the room of all his other creditors, who had brought him into great trouble. When his friend died, his daughter Calvina was for renouncing the inheritance; but Pliny to ſave the reputation of the deceaſed, generouſly forgave her what ſhe owed him, tho' he had contributed a conſiderable ſum towards her fortune, when ſhe was married (42). The reader will find in Pliny's letters innumerable other inſtances of his generoſity, diſintereſtedneſs, and good-nature, which the brevity we have propoſed to ourſelves will not allow us to relate in this place.

Pompeius Saturninus flouriſhed under Trajan, and is highly commended by Pliny, with whom he lived in great friendſhip, as an excellent orator, poet, and hiſtorian (43). Pliny publiſhed nothing without ſubmitting it firſt to the judgment of Saturninus (44). This is perhaps the ſame Saturninus who died in the fifth year of Trajan's reign, and bequeathed part of his eſtate to Pliny (45). His works have been long ſince loſt. Titinius Capito is likewiſe mentioned by Pliny as a writer of no mean character. He deſcribed the deaths of illuſtrious men, amongſt whom were ſome of his cotemporaries, condemned, no doubt, by Domitian (46). Pliny tells us elſewhere (47), that with excellent verſes he celebrated the actions of great men; and adds, that he prevailed upon the emperor, Nerva or Trajan, to erect a ſtatue in the forum to L. Silanus, who was by Nero's orders put to death in the year 65, the eleventh of that prince's reign. Cataneus, in his notes upon Pliny (39) Idem, l. ep. 19. (40) Idem, l. ii. ep. 4. (41) Idem, l. vii. ep. 11. & 14.

(42) Idem, l. ii. ep. 4.
(43) Idem, l. vii. ep. 16.
(44) Idem, ibid. ep. 8.
(45) Idem, l. v. ep. 7.
(46) Idem, l. viii. ep. 12.
(47) Idem, l. i. ep. 17.

Pliny (48), tells us that Lactantius quotes a book upon public ſhews, written by Titinius Capito. Claudius Pollio, who is likewiſe greatly commended by Pliny (49), wrote the life of Muſonius Baſſus, his benefactor. Suidas ſpeaks of one Aſinius Pollio, who was a native of Tralles in Aſia, and a celebrated ſophiſt and philoſopher, and aſcribes to him ſeveral pieces; amongſt the reſt, one giving an account of the memorable actions and ſayings of the philoſopher Muſonius; but he adds, that Muſonius taught at Rome, in the time of Pompey the great (50); but is commonly thought to have been therein guilty of a great overſight (51). Pliny likewiſe mentions and commends one Verginius Romanus, who wrote comedies and other poetical pieces (52). Under Trajan flouriſhed, according to Voſſius (53), two Greek poets, Serapio, an Athenian, Plutarch's friend, and Rufus, an Epheſian, author of the ſix books upon ſimples, known to Galen and other phyſicians. Pliny ſeems to have entertained a mighty opinion of the ſophiſt Iſæus, who came to Rome, when he was about ſixty (54), and there gained, as appears from Juvenal (55), the reputation of an eloquent orator. He was native of Aſſyria, and in his youth had led a moſt debauched life; but afterwards changing his conduct, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy and eloquence (56). He ſeems to have left no other works behind him, except his declamations. Of Plutarch, Suetonius, Epictetus, and ſeveral other writers, who lived under Trajan, but died after him, we ſhall ſpeak anon.

(48) Plin. l. i. ep. 17. (49) Idem, l. vii. ep. 31.
(50) Suidas, p. 579. (51) Vide Jonſ. l. iii. c. 7.
(52) Plin. l. vi. ep. 31. (53) Voſſ. poet. Græc. p. 73. (54) Plin. l. i. ep. 3. (55) Juv. ſat. iii. ver. 74. (56) Philoſtr. ſoph. c. 20. Suidas, p. 1274.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXI.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the death of Trajan, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, when the power of the Roman empire began to decline.

Adrian. ADRIAN, who ſucceeded Trajan in the empire, was the ſon of Ælius Adrianus Afer, couſin-german to that prince, and of Domitia Paulina, ſprung from an illuſtrious family in Cadiz. His family came originally from Italica in Spain, the native city of Trajan, whither Adrian, in the account he wrote of his own life, pretended, that his anceſtors had removed ſome ages before, from the city of Adria in the country of the Picentes, now the dukedom of Atri in Abruzzo. Marullinus, his great-great-grandfather, was the firſt Roman ſenator of the family [h]. He was born, according to Spartan, in Rome, on the twenty-fourth of January, in the year ſeventy-ſix of the chriſtian æra, while Veſpaſian was conſul the ſeventh time and Titus the fifth [i]. Eutropius writes, that he was born in Italica; but Caſaubon thinks he was therein miſtaken [k]. He was named P. Ælius Adrianus, or Hadrianus, to which names he added, after his acceſſion to the empire, that of Trajan [l]. His father dying when he was about ten years old, left him under the guardianſhip of Trajan and Cælius Tatianus, or Attianus, as Salmaſius calls him, a Roman knight [m]. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, and was, at the age of fifteen, ſo thoroughly acquainted with that language, that he was commonly ſurnamed the Young Grecian. He then went to ſerve in Spain, and ſtaid there till he was recalled by Trajan, with whom he lived as his ſon. He was ſoon after appointed by Domitian one of the decemvirs, and thence raiſed

His extraction, employments, &c.

[h] Spart. in Adrian. p. 1—3. Pariſ. 1620. Pagi. p. 30.
[i] Idem ibid. & P. Ixviii. p. 786.
[k] Caſaub. in not. ad Spart.
[l] Dio, l.
[m] Spart. ibid.

raiſed to the command of the ſecond auxiliary legion, with which he was ſent into Mœſia about the latter end of that prince's reign. We are told that in Mœſia an aſtrologer aſſured him, that the ſovereign power was by the fates deſtined to him; which was confirming what his great-uncle Ælius Adrianus, who was likewiſe ſkilled in aſtrology, had foretold many years before [n]. When Trajan was adopted by Nerva, he was ſent to him with the congratulations of the army upon that occaſion, and ſoon after removed by Nerva from Mœſia into Upper Germany; whence he haſtened upon the death of that prince, which happened ſoon after, to carry the firſt tidings of it to Trajan. Servianus, who commanded in Upper Germany, and was no friend to Adrian, tho' he had married his ſiſter Paulina, detained him, till he had diſpatched an expreſs to Trajan with the news of Nerva's death, and afterwards ſupplied him with an old chariot, which broke down by the way, that he might not ingratiate himſelf with the new emperor, by firſt informing him of his acceſſion to the empire. But nevertheleſs Adrian purſued his journey on foot with ſuch expedition, that he arrived in Lower Germany, where Trajan then was, before the expreſs [o]. Trajan kept him with him; but tho' he was his kinſman, his guardian, tho' he gave him afterwards his ſiſter's grand-daughter, Sabina, in marriage, yet he never conferred any extraordinary honours upon him. In his youth he had ſquandered away his eſtate, and contracted great debts; which, with his other vices, Servianus took care to exaggerate to the emperor, in order to eſtrange his mind from him, and prevent his adopting him; for Servianus entertained a very indifferent opinion of Adrian, and believed, that Rome could never be happy under ſuch a prince [p]; and truly he was a perſon of moſt extraordinary parts, and had ſome great virtues, but allayed with no leſs vices. He was endowed with a memory almoſt beyond belief; he could repeat by heart a whole book, however difficult and intricate the ſubject of it was, after having once peruſed it; he knew the name of every ſoldier in the army, and remembered the names of all the old ſoldiers, who had once ſerved under him, tho' they had been long diſbanded. He excelled in every branch of learning, and was without compariſon the beſt orator, poet, grammarian, philoſopher, and mathematician of his time; thoroughly ſkilled in phyſic;

Trajan conferred no extraordinary honours upon him.

His extraordinary memory, learning, &c.

[n] Idem. ibid. [o] Idem, p. 4. [p] Idem, p. 8.

public; well acquainted with the virtues and properties of moſt herbs and minerals; in drawing and painting he was equal to the greateſt maſters; ſung, and played upon all kinds of inſtruments, ſo as to be reckoned the moſt ſkilful muſician of the age he lived in. He even applied himſelf to the ſtudy of judicial aſtrology and magic. He uſed at the ſame time to write, dictate to ſeveral ſecretaries, give audience to his miniſters, and diſcourſe with them about affairs of the greateſt importance; for no man was better acquainted with his domeſtic affairs, than he with thoſe of the whole empire. His court was conſtantly crouded with philoſophers, orators, poets, mathematicians, &c. for whom he always ſhewed a particular eſteem, and took great pleaſure in diſputing with them, and challenging the poets by extemporary verſes, at which he had an extraordinary talent. Having one day excepted againſt an expreſſion uſed by Favorinus, that philoſopher modeſtly yielded, tho' he might have produced out of good authors ſufficient authority for his expreſſion; which ſeeming ſtrange to his friends, Do you think, ſaid pleaſantly Favorinus, that I will pretend to be more learned than one who has thirty legions at his beck? In the beginning of his reign, he gave many inſtances of his clemency and good-nature; but afterwards cauſed ſeveral perſons to be unjuſtly put to death: whence ſome writers cry him up as a moſt merciful prince, while others repreſent him as naturally inclined to cruelty, but often forgiving injuries, through fear of undergoing the fate of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian [q]. In the very beginning of his reign, Tatianus adviſed him to put three perſons to death, who, he ſaid, would not fail to raiſe diſturbances, viz. Bæbius Macer, governor of Rome, Laberius Maximus, and Craſſus Frugi, of whom the two latter had conſpired againſt Trajan, and were then in baniſhment; but the emperor would not hearken to any ſuggeſtions againſt them, ſaying, It would be highly unjuſt and tyrannical to puniſh any one for a crime, which he was only likely to commit [r]. Spartian writes, that he freely forgave all thoſe who had any ways injured him while he was a private perſon; and that one day meeting one of them after he was emperor, he told him that he had eſcaped by his promotion to the empire.

Favours the learned.

Inſtances of his clemency.

[q] Idem ibid. Ammian. l. xxx. Dio, l. lxiv. p. 790. [r] Spart. p. 10.

Remembers and punishes some injuries done him in Trajan's time.

empire[s]. On the other hand Dion Cassius tells us, that he remembered, and punished with great severity, some injuries done him in Trajan's time; and that he never forgave the famous architect Apollodorus, who had spoken contemptuously of him before that prince[t]. He allowed every one free access to him, and seemed never better pleased than when they spoke to him with liberty, or admonished him of his faults. Of this we read the following instance: A woman having one day applied to him on occasion of a troublesome law-suit, the emperor told her, That he was not then at leisure to hear her. The woman not satisfied with this answer, cried out to him aloud, To what purpose then are you emperor? With which frankness Adrian was so well pleased, that postponing all other affairs, he heard her with great patience, and dismissed her fully satisfied[u]. The Roman people demanding one day with great noise in the theatre something, which Adrian was no-ways inclined to grant them, he ordered the public crier to command silence with the imperious word Tacete, Be silent, used by Domitian on the like occasion; but the crier, instead of obeying him, said only, The emperor begs you would be silent; which Adrian was so far from resenting, that he commended his prudence, and amply rewarded it[w]. He was courteous and affable towards persons of all ranks, conversed familiarly with his friends and visited them, nay, and his freed men, when indisposed, twice or thrice a day, comforting them in their sickness, and assisting them with his counsels, he frequently entertained them at his table, and honoured them with his company at their houses, without being invited, conversing with them more like a private person than a prince. He refused them nothing which he thought reasonable to grant them, and enriched some who had never asked him the least favour[x]; but at the same time gave ear to slanderers, and believed every tale that was whispered against them; whence all those whom he had most favoured and raised to the highest honours, were in the end disgraced, treated by him as enemies, and either put to death or banished[y]. His liberality knew no bounds; he allotted large sums for the maintenance of poor children of both sexes, and in that excelled even Trajan. Upon such of the senators as were, by misfortunes, reduced Kind to his friends.

Bears to be admonished.

But gives ear to slanderers.

His liberality.

[s] Idem, p. 8. [t] Dio, l. lxix. p. 789. [u] Idem, p. 790.
[w] Idem, ibid. [x] Idem. p. 7. Dio. p. 791. [y] Spart. & Dio, ibid.

duced to poverty, he ſettled penſions ſuitable to their rank, and the number of their children. Among the populace he diſtributed yearly an immenſe quantity of corn, made large preſents to ſuch of the knights as were not able to ſupport their dignity, and ſupplied all thoſe whom he appointed governors of provinces, or commanders of armies, with horſes, mules, cloaths, and money to defray the charges of their journey. During the feaſt of Saturn, he uſed to ſend preſents to his friends, laying hold of that opportunity to reward them for their fidelity and attatchment to his perſon. His preſents to kings and princes always exceeded thoſe which they had ſent him. Such of the public profeſſors, as were no longer able to diſcharge their office as they ought, he diſmiſſed with marks of honour and handſome allowances. As he ſpent moſt part of his reign in viſiting the provinces of the empire, he left every where marks of a magnificence truly great and princely [z]. He is ſaid never to have ſeized unjuſtly any man's property [a]; neither would he ever receive legacies left him by perſons who were not known to him, or by ſuch of his friends as had children [b]. He ſhewed on all occaſions a high reſpect for the ſenate, conſuls, and other magiſtrates, tranſacting nothing without their advice. He ſcarce ever failed aſſiſting at their aſſemblies, when he was either at or near Rome, and uſually waited on the conſuls to their houſes. He would not ſuffer the Roman knights to ſit as judges in the cauſe of a ſenator, tho' that had been cuſtomary when the cauſe was pleaded before the emperor in perſon; neither would he allow of any appeals from the ſenate to him [c]. He adminiſtered juſtice with great impartiality, following therein the advice of P. Jubentius Celſus, Salvius Julianus, and Neratius Priſcus, all three men of great probity, and the beſt civilians in Rome. He narrowly enquired into the conduct and behaviour of his miniſters, diſcharging them when guilty of the leaſt injuſtice or miſdemeanour. He allowed his freed-men no power; and ſuch as pretended to have any, in order to gain by that means credit or wealth, he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity: Obſerving one day from his window one of his freed-men walking between two ſenators, he ſent one of his attendants to give him a box on the ear, and tell him, that it did not become Reſpects the ſenate.

Is impartial in the adminiſtration of juſtice.

Allows no power to his freed-men.

[z] part. p. 10. Dio p. 790, Philoſt. ſoph. c. 27. [a] Dio, ibid. [b] Spart. p. 9. [c] Idem, p. 17.

come him to walk between two perſons, to whom he might one day be a ſlave [d]. He was an enemy to all pomp and parade; whence he would never ſuffer the ſenators to attend him but upon buſineſs. He uſually returned from the ſenate in a ſedan, that the ſenators might be diſpenſed from accompanying him to the palace. His medals are all very plain, without the uſual titles of emperor, high pontiff, father of his country, &c. He would not ſuffer his name to be put upon any of the ſtately buildings which he erected, except upon the temple he built in honour of Trajan; but at the ſame time was pleaſed that ſeveral aqueducts and cities ſhould bear his name [e]. Out of Rome he laid quite aſide the port and majeſty of an emperor; in his garb and dreſs he little varied from a common ſolder; his diet was ſuch as chance preſented; he uſually marched on foot, with his head bare, making no diſtinction between the frozen mountains of the Alps, and the ſcorching deſerts of Africa; he viſited the ſoldiers in perſon when ſick, took particular care of their proviſions, made them preſents, &c. but at the ſame time put down the uſe of arbours, ſhady walks, bowers, &c. baniſhing from the camp whatever ſeemed in the leaſt to encourage luxury and idleneſs. He was acquainted with every ſoldier in the army, knew his age, remembered his exploits, if he had performed any, &c. He preferred none but men of courage, ſtrength and good characters, ſaying, Such as the officers are, ſuch will the ſoldiers ſoon be. By this means he revived and reſtored the antient military diſcipline, which, by the negligence of many princes had been decaying ever ſince the time of Auguſtus [f]. He is generally blamed by the antients as too inquiſitive, and prying into every one's ſecrets, tho' they no-ways concerned him; as addicted to the moſt infamous pleaſures, and abandoned to all manner of ſuperſtition; which was the chief cauſe of his perſecuting the chriſtians, whom he looked upon as enemies to the idolatrous worſhip of his gods [g]. He took great delight in hunting, and is ſaid to have killed bears, lions, and other wild beaſts, with his own hand. He founded a town in Mœſia, which he called Adrianotheræ, that is, Adrian's chace, becauſe he had killed a bear there. He loved

He revives the antient military diſcipline.

His vices.

[d] Idem, p. 10. [e] Idem, p. 9, 10. [f] Idem, p. 5. Dio, p. 790.—792. [g] Dio, & Spart, ibid. Ammian. l. xxv. Hier. chron. Tertul. apol. c. 5.

loved his hunting-horſes and dogs to ſuch a degree, that he built them tombs, and wrote himſelf their epitaphs [h]. He was the firſt emperor, as Spartian obſerves [i], who let his beard grow, to cover ſome ſcars, which disfigured that part of his face. He married, as we have related above, Julia Sabina, grand-daughter to Marciana, Trajan's ſiſter; but treated her more like a ſlave than a wife, and often declared, that, had he been a private perſon, he would have divorced her. However, he ſuffered her to be honoured with the title of Auguſta, when he took that of the "father of his country [k]." He is thought in the end to have poiſoned her, being no longer able to bear with her haughty and imperious temper. She ſeems to have been a woman of a very indifferent character; for ſhe is ſaid to have publicly bragged of her having prevented Adrian from having any children by her, and by that means ſaved the world from utter deſtruction [l]. Having thus premiſed a ſuccinct account of the virtues and vices of Adrian, we ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of his reign, according to the order of time. Having cauſed himſelf to be declared emperor on the eleventh of Auguſt of the year 117, he immediately wrote to the ſenate, excuſing his having aſſumed that title without their conſent and authority, alledging, that he had been forced to it by the ſoldiery. He begged they would confirm the title, without conferring other honours upon him till he deſerved them. In the ſame letter he ſolemnly promiſed never to put any ſenator to death, nor to tranſact any affair of conſequence without their counſel and advice [m]. He doubled the donative given by other emperors to the ſoldiery, and appointed Tatianus, or Attianus, formerly his guardian, with Similis, captains of the prætorian guards. Similis was a man of great probity, moderation, and prudence, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in quality of centurion under Trajan, who had a particular value for him. As it was much againſt his will that he accepted the command conferred upon him by Adrian, he reſigned it three years after, withdrew into the country, and there ſpent in retirement the ſeven remaining years of his life. A little before he died, he Diſlikes his wife Julia Sabina.

The characters of Similis and Tatianus captains of the prætorian guards.

[h] Spart. p. 12, 13. Dio, p. 792. [i] Idem ibid. [k] Euſeb. chron. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 13. [l] Vict. epit. [m] Dio, l. lxix. p. 788.

compoſed his own epitaph, importing, that he had been ſeventy-ſix years upon the earth, but lived only ſeven[n]. Tatianus was a man of a quite different character; for he adviſed Adrian, upon his acceſſion to the empire, to put ſeveral perſons to death, and was thought to have been the chief author of the murders, which that prince committed about two years after[o]. Adrian had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the empire, than he deprived the brave Luſius Quietus, who had ſerved with great credit under Trajan, of the command of his countrymen the Moors, ſuſpecting him as if he aſpired at the empire. As to the conqueſts made by his predeceſſor, he reſolved to abandon them all; and accordingly withdrew his troops from Armenia, Meſopotamia and Aſſyria; ſo that the Euphrates became anew the boundary of the Roman empire. He allowed the Armenians to chuſe themſelves a king; and as the Parthians were diſſatisfied with Parthamaſpates, whom Trajan had raiſed to the throne, he appointed him king of ſome neighbouring nation, and ſuffered the Parthians to recall Coſrhoes, whom Trajan had driven out two years before[p]. He was likewiſe determined to abandon Dacia; but his friends prevailed upon him to keep a province, in which ſuch numbers of Roman citizens had ſettled. However, he ordered the arches of the famous bridge built by Trajan over the Danube to be broken down, fearing the barbarians might make themſelves maſters of it, and invade the Roman territories[q]. Adrian, having given the neceſſary orders for maintaining the tranquillity of the eaſt, and appointed Catilius Severus governor of Syria, left Antioch, and ſet out for Rome, which he did not reach till the next year[r]. Epiphanius tells us, that before he left the eaſt, he went into Egypt; and that paſſing by Jeruſalem forty-ſeven years after it had been taken by Titus, on that occaſion he reſolved to rebuild it; which deſign, however, he did not put in execution before the latter end of his reign[s].

Adrian abandons the countries conquered by Trajan.

THE following year, Adrian entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having been named to that dignity by Trajan before before he died, together with Fuscus Salinator, and who had married the daughter of Servianus, Adrian's niece [t].

[n] Spart. cum not. Salmaſ. p. 19. Dio, p. 796. [o] Spart. & Dio, ibid. [p] Spart. p. 10. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 776. [q] Eutrop. in Adrian. & Dio, ibid. [r] Spart. p. 3. [s] Epiphan. menſ. c. 14.

This year Adrian returned to Rome, where he was received by all ranks of men with extraordinary demonstrations of joy; but he could by no means be prevailed upon to accept the triumph, which had been prepared for Trajan, and was by the senate decreed for him. At his motion that honour was conferred upon the image of Trajan, which Adrian himself seems to have carried [u]. Soon after his entrance into the city, he remitted to the inhabitants of Rome and Italy all debts, without restriction, due from them to the exchequer, and to particular persons in the provinces what was owing by them for the last sixteen years, burning in Trajan's new square all the bonds and registers relating to those debts, in order to secure every one against such claims. The sum, which he forgave on this occasion, amounted to seven millions of our money and upwards. No wonder therefore, that such a generous action is so much extolled by the historians of those times, and mentioned in most of the inscriptions and medals of this and the following year. On one of the medals which has reached our times, Adrian is represented with a torch in his hand, setting fire to the bonds, with this legend, "He enriches the whole world [w]." Besides, he lessened the taxes both at Rome and in the provinces, and eased the cities of the great burden which had been laid upon them by Trajan, of supplying such as travelled for the service of the public with horses, chariots, and carriages, which was thenceforth done at the charge of the emperor [x].

He arrives at Rome; but refuses the triumph decreed him by the senate.

Remarkable instances of his generosity.

The Third Consulship of Adrian. A.D. 119.

The Sarmatians and Roxolani defeated.

The following year, Adrian was consul the third time; but resigned the fasces after four months, and never after resumed them. He had for his collegue one Rusticus, of whom we find no further mention. This year the Sarmatians and the Roxolani, whose country bordered on the Palus Mæotis, invaded Illyricum; which obliged Adrian to leave Rome and hasten into Mœsia, where he defeated the barbarians upon their return from Illyricum. Those who escaped saved themselves by swimming cross the Danube, and soon after sent embassadors to Adrian, who granted them honourable terms, and by

[t] Idat. Cassiodor. Onuph. in fast. Spart. p. 3.
[u] Spanh. l. ix. p. 811, 815. [x] Spart. p. 17.

that means put a ſpeedy end to the war. They afterwards quarrelled with one another, and choſe Adrian for their umpire, who compoſed their differences to the general ſatisfaction of both parties. Having thus both terrified the barbarians and at the ſame time gained their affections, he appointed Martius Turbo, whom he had recalled from Mauritania, governor of Pannonia and Dacia, and led his army into Illyricum; whence he wrote to the ſenate, complaining of Cornelius Palma, L. Publius Celſus, Domitius Nigrinus, and Luſius Quietus, as if they had formed a conſpiracy againſt him. They were all conſulars, men of extraordinary parts, and had been greatly eſteemed and beloved by Trajan; but nevertheleſs the ſenate, out of complaiſance to the emperor, ordered them to be immediately put to death, without ſo much as acquainting them that they had been accuſed. As no one believed them guilty of the crime laid to their charge, their death drew upon the emperor the public hatred, who thereupon left Illyricum and haſtened back to Rome, where he publicly declared upon his oath, that they had been executed againſt his will and without his knowledge; but was not believed, ſays Dion Caſſius, by thoſe who knew, that Palma and Celſus had been always his enemies, and that he was jealous of Nigrinus and Quietus, who were equally beloloved and eſteemed by the Roman people[y]. Beſides theſe four excellent men, as Dion Caſſius ſtyles them, ſeveral other perſons of great merit and diſtinction were accuſed and condemned, as privy to the ſuppoſed conſpiracy; which filled the city with dread and terror. But Adrian himſelf, having got rid of thoſe whom he chiefly feared, put a ſtop to the cruel and unjuſt proceedings of the ſenate, by an edict, forbidding any one to be accuſed or tried upon the law of majeſty. He was deſirous of having Tatianus, formerly his guardian, and now captain of the prætorian guards, put to death; for he was a man of a haughty and imperious temper, and aſſumed greater power and authority, than the emperor was willing to grant him; but nevertheleſs Adrian, not thinking it adviſeable to ſpill more blood, diſſembled his hatred for the preſent, and prevailed upon Tatianus to reſign his command, by offering him a place in the ſenate, and the conſular

Four conſulars put to death.

[y] Dio, l. lxix. p. 788.

ſular ornaments, which he readily accepted. Martius Turbo, governor of Pannonia and Dacia, and one of the beſt officers of his age, was put in his room, as was Septicius Clarus in the room of Similis, who this year reſigned of his own accord, and retired from the city [z]. Towards the end of the year the emperor went into Campania, where he relieved with great generoſity the poor inhabitants of all the cities through which he paſſed.

THE next conſuls were L. Catilius Severus, whom Adrian had appointed governor of Syria three years before, and Titus Aurelius Fulvius, who ſucceeded Adrian in the empire, and is commonly known by the name of Antonius Pius [a]. This year Adrian, who uſed to ſay, that an emperor ought to imitate the ſun, who illuminates not one place, but all the corners and regions of the earth, began his progreſs, with a deſign to viſit in perſon all the provinces of the empire, and examine the ſtate of each country ſubject to Rome, that he might not be obliged to depend entirely upon the accounts tranſmitted to him by his miniſters and governors. Thus he employed almoſt the whole remainder of his reign, that is, near ſeventeen years. From ſeveral antient coins we learn, that he viſited the following countries, Gaul, Spain, Germany, Mauritania, Africa, Libya, Sicily, Achaia, or Greece, Eubœa, Macedonia, Egypt, and the city of Alexandria, Paleſtine, Arabia, Syria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Cappadocia, Phrygia, Aſia, Bithynia, Thrace, Mœſia, and Dalmatia [b]. No mention is made on any of the medals, which have reached us, of Britain, Armenia, or Dacia; which provinces, it is certain, he viſited, as we ſhall relate anon. He began his progreſs with Gaul, where he viewed all the chief cities and Roman forts, and ſignalized himſelf by extraordinary bounties, relieving with great generoſity the poor inhabitants in all the places through which he paſſed. From Gaul he went into Germany, where lay the flower of the Roman troops; and therefore he ſpent ſome time there, in order to revive and eſtabliſh among them the antient military diſcipline; for he did not leave Germany till the beginning of the following year, when Annius Verus, grandfather Adrian reſolves to viſit all the provinces of the empire.

He goes into Gaul, and thence into Germany.

[z] Idem, p. 795, 796. Spart. p. 7.

[a] Onuph. in faſt. P. 220.

[b] Birag. p. 175. 177.

grandfather to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, and Augur, or, as he is called in the Alexandrian chronicle, Augurinus, were conſuls. During their conſulate, Adrian, leaving Germany, returned to Gaul, and from thence paſſed over into Britain, where he is ſaid to have reformed many abuſes [c]. The greateſt part of the iſland was, when he arrived in Britain, ſubject to Rome; but the northern nations had, upon the departure of Agricola, revolted, and recovered their antient liberty. Adrian did not think it adviſeable, nor worth his while, to make war upon them, and reduce them anew; but, in order to ſecure the countries belonging to the Romans againſt the incurſions of the warlike Caledonians, he cauſed a mighty wall to be built, extending from the river Eden in Cumberland to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty miles in length [d]. In other countries too, where the barbarians were not ſeparated from the Romans by rivers, he ordered walls to be made of earth, ſays Spartian [e], which were ſtrengthened with ſharp ſtakes driven deep into the ground. In Britain he diſgraced and diſcharged his ſecretary Suetonius Tranquillus, no doubt the hiſtorian, and Septicius Clarus, captain of the prætorian guards, for their diſreſpectful behaviour towards the empreſs Sabina [f]. Having ſettled the affairs of Britain, he returned to Gaul, and built at Niſme a magnificent palace, in honour of Plotina, Trajan's widow. No remains of this ſtately edifice, or baſilic, as Spartian calls it, are now to be ſeen; but the antiquaries take the magnificent amphitheatre, which the inhabitants calls les Aredes, or Point du gard, and ſeveral other antient buildings, which are ſtill to be ſeen in that city, to have been raiſed by Adrian, or by his ſucceſſor Antoninus [g]. From Gaul Adrian went into Spain, and paſſed the winter at Tarraco, now Tarragona, where he rebuilt the temple of Auguſtus founded by Tiberius, and held a general aſſembly of the ſtates of Spain, in order to compoſe the differences which reigned amongſt them, about the raiſing of levies to recruit the Roman armies. At Tarraco he narrowly eſcaped being killed by a ſlave, who, while the emperor was walking in his maſter's garden, Croſſes over into Britain.

His wall there.

He returns to Gaul.

And thence goes into Spain.

Where he is in danger of being aſſaſſinated.

[c] Spart. p. 6. [d] Idem, ibid. Uſſer. Britan. eccleſ. antiq. p. 1024. Dublin, 1635. [e] Idem, ibid. [f] Idem, ibid. [g] Vide Salmaſ. in Spart. p. 23.

garden, aſſaulted him with a drawn ſword. Adrian, cloſing with him, ſeized him, and delivered him to the guards, who were haſtening to his aſſiſtance; but afterwards, finding the ſlave was diſtracted in his ſenſes, he committed him to the care of the phyſicians, and took no farther notice of the attempt. Adrian did not viſit the city of Italica, whence his family originally came; but diſtinguiſhed it with many privileges [h]. Gellius quotes a diſcourſe made by the emperor in the ſenate in favour of Italica, Utica, and other free cities, demanding the rights and privileges of colonies, tho' Adrian himſelf thought the condition of free cities preferable to that of the colonies [i]. From Spain the emperor returned to Rome in the month of April, as appears from an antient inſcription, Acilius Aviola and Cornelius Panſa being then conſuls; but he did not ſtay there long; for either in the end of this, or the beginning of the following, year, when Quintus Arrius Pætinus and Caius Ventidius Apronianus were conſuls, he was, according to St. Jerom and Euſebius [k], at Athens. During his ſtay in that city, the Cephiſus happening to break over its banks, and lay under water great part of the city of Eleuſina, he cauſed a bridge to be built over that river, and provided againſt its overflowing for the future [u]. From Athens he paſſed into the eaſt, where he apprehended a war with the Parthians; but prevented it by a conference, with whom hiſtory does not inform us; but it was in all likelihood with Coſrhoes king of the Parthians. The following year, Manius Acilius Glabrio and Caius Bellicius Torquatus being conſuls, Adrian returned from the eaſt through Aſia, and viſited Cilicia, Lycia, Pamphylia, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Phrygia, ordering temples, ſquares, and other edifices to be built at his expence in moſt of the chief cities of thoſe provinces, eſpecially in Nicomedia, Nicæa, and Cyzicus. He likewiſe viſited the iſlands of the Archipelago, and arrived in the beginning of the following year, P. Cornelius Scipio Aſiaticus and Vettius Aquilinus being conſuls, in Achaia, and paſſed the remaining part of the winter at Athens, where he was initiated in the rites of Ceres and Proſerpine, called the Eleuſinian myſteries, following therein

Returns to Rome.

Goes to Athens, and from thence into the eaſt.

Viſits ſeveral provinces, and paſſes the winter at Athens.

[h] Idem, p. 6. & Dio, p. 792.
[i] Aul. Gell. l. xvi. c. 13.
[k] Euſeb. chron. p. 211.
[u] Hier. in chron.

therein the example of Hercules and Philip king of Macedon. From Athens, after he had presided there at the public games, and bestowed innumerable favours upon the Athenians, he sailed to Sicily, where he was led by his curiosity to visit the top of mount Ætna, in order to view from thence the rising sun, believed to exhibit there all the colours of the rain-bow. From Sicily he returned to Rome in the beginning of the following year, when Annius Verus, grandfather to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, was the third time consul, with L. Varius Ambibulus [w]. The two next years, the eleventh and twelfth of Adrian's reign, and 127th and 128th of the christian æra, are quite barren of events. The consuls were Titianus and Gallicanus, Torquatus Asprenas and Annius Libo [x]. The following year, P. Juventius Celsus and Q. Julius Balbus Marcellus being consuls, the cities of Nicomedia, Cæsarea, and Nicæa in Bithynia were almost entirely overturned by an earthquake; but rebuilt at the expence of the emperor, who was thence styled the Restorer of Bithynia, as appears from some medals [y]. In the beginning of this year, Adrian was still at Rome; for on the third of March he proposed some difficulties touching inheritances, which were resolved by a decree of the senate, dated the fourteenth of the same month [z]. But soon after he set out again on a new progress, passing first into Africa; where, upon his arrival, it rained, after a five years drought, which together with the many favours he bestowed upon the inhabitants of that province, (for he left every-where signal marks of his liberality and good-nature) gained him the affections of all ranks of men. From Africa he returned to Rome, and there caused the obsequies of Plotina, to whom he was indebted for the empire, to be performed with the utmost pomp and magnificence. She died either while Adrian was in Africa, or soon after his return from thence. He bewailed her with many tears, appeared for nine days in deep mourning, composed verses in her praise, and caused her to be ranked among the gods [a].

Visits Sicily, and returns to Rome.

Rebuilds several cities at his own expence.

Crosses over into Africa, whence he returns to Rome.

Plotina dies, and is ranked among the gods.

THE

[w] Noris. epist. consul. p. 78. Dio, l. lxix. p. 797.
[x] Idat. Onuph. &c. in fast. Birag. p. 123.
[y] Eusеb. in chron. p. 211.
[z] Digest. v. c. 3. l. xx. Noris. epist. consul. p. 421.
[a] Dio, p. 792.

THE next conſuls were Q. Fabius Catullinus and M. Flavius Aper, during whoſe adminiſtration a temple was built at Rome, in honour of that city and of the goddeſs Venus, who was called the Temple of Rome, and the Temple of the fortune of Rome [b]. On account of this temple Adrian changed the antient name of the feaſt, which was yearly kept on the twenty-firſt of April for the foundation of Rome, calling it Romana, inſtead of Palilia [c]. This temple was one of the wonders which the emperor Conſtantius chiefly admired when he came to Rome [d]. It was afterwards conſumed by accidental fire, and rebuilt by Maxentius [e]. When the fabric was ended, Adrian ſent the plan of it to the famous architect Apollodorus; which was tacitly telling him, that he was not the only great architect in the world: and this was what the emperor meant by ſending the plan after the building was accompliſhed; for tho' he himſelf had employed him, yet he bore him a private grudge, on account of his having checked him with great acrimony, for pretending, in Trajan's time, to give his opinion concerning certain buildings. Apollodorus, who was no flatterer, after having viewed the plan, deſired thoſe who brought it to tell the emperor from him, that the fabric was too low for the place in which it ſtood; and, on the contrary, the ſtatues of Rome and Venus too tall: the architect, added he pleaſantly, has taken care, that the goddeſſes ſhall not riſe, nor walk out. Adrian was ſo offended at the freedom of this anſwer, that though he had deſired Apollodorus to acquaint him with his ſentiments concerning the building, yet he baniſhed him, and ſoon after, under ſome pretence or other, cauſed him to be put to death [f]. In the beginning of the ſummer, Adrian ſet out from Rome, with a deſign to viſit anew the provinces of the eaſt; and, paſſing through Athens purſued his journey to Aſia, where he conſecrated ſeveral temples. In Cappadocia he purchaſed a great number of ſlaves for the ſervile offices of the camp. To Coſrhoes he ſent back his daughter, who had been taken priſoner by Trajan, and promiſed to reſtore to him his golden throne; but never performed his promiſe. He invited to a conference all the neighbouring kings, and many of them complied

The temple of Venus and Rome.

Apollodorus finds fault with it, which coſts him his life.

Adrian returns to Aſia.

And there confers with the eaſtern kings.

[b] Ammian. l. xvi. [c] Athen. l. viii. [d] Ammian. ibid. [e] Aur. Vict. p. 526. [f] Dio, p. 789.

complied with the invitation, viz. Malaſſes king of the Lazi, Reſmagas king of the Abaſgi, Spadages king of the Sauni or Sauniges, Staquimfan king of the Zydretæ. The territories of theſe princes lay partly eaſt, partly north, of the Euxine ſea. Beſides theſe, ſeveral other petty kings came to wait upon Adrian, and were by him entertained with great pomp and magnificence, and loaded with rich preſents upon their departure. The Bactrian princes did not come, but ſent embaſſadors to conclude an alliance with the people of Rome. The kings of Albania and Iberia neither ſent embaſſadors, nor came in perſon; which they repented when they underſtood how the others had been received and entertained [f]. In Syria he went up to the top of mount Caſſius in the neighbourhood of Antioch, to obſerve from thence the riſing ſun, and offer a ſacrifice to Jupiter, who was worſhipped upon that mountain; but he was there overtaken by a violent ſtorm of thunder and lightning, which fell both upon the prieſt and the victim [g]. From Syria he paſſed into Paleſtine and Arabia, and from thence into Egypt [h]. It is obſerved in the Alexandrian chronicle, that the famous coloſſus of Rhodes ſhook this year, the fourteenth of Adrian's reign, for the firſt time [i].

He viſits Paleſtine, Arabia, and Egypt.

THE next year, Servius Octavius Lænus Pontianus and M. Antoninus Rufinus were conſuls. During their adminiſtration, Salvius Julianus, one of the moſt learned civilians of his age, compiled, by the emperor's command, the perpetual edict, containing all the laws which had been yearly publiſhed by the prætors in their edicts. This collection was called the edictum perpetuum, becauſe it was to continue in force for ever, to be as a body of ſtanding laws to prevent the great confuſion occaſioned by the new edicts, and to ſerve as a guide and rule in the adminiſtration of juſtice throughout the whole empire [k]. Adrian continued in Egypt, all this and the following year, when Augurinus and Sergianus were conſuls. At Peluſium he viſited the tomb of Pompey the Great; and finding it almoſt entirely demoliſhed, he ordered it to be repaired at his own expence [l], and performed the uſual ceremonies in honour of the deceaſed hero.

The edictum perpetuum.

[f] Spart. p. 27. Arrian. in perip. Pont. p. 7. [g] Spart. p. 7. [h] Dio, p. 792. [i] Chron. Alexand. p. 598.
[k] Vide Voburg. hiſt Roman. Germanic. tit. i. p. 401. Francofurt. 1645. [l] Dio, p. 792. Spart. 7.

He diſliked the fickle, turbulent, and ſatirical temper of the Egyptians, eſpecially of the Alexandrians. In a letter which he wrote to Servianus his brother-in-law, he tells him, that the Chriſtians, Sarmatians, and Jews of that country were always ready to change their religion, becauſe they all adored one and the ſame god, their own intereſt; and adds, that they all ſuperſtitiouſly obſerved the motion and aſpects of the ſtars, and pretended to be ſkilled in divination [m]. He ſpeaks of a patriarch, who now-and-then viſited Egypt, meaning no doubt, the patriarch of the Jews [n]. He concludes with this obſervation, that at Alexandria no one was ſuffered to be idle; inſomuch, that even thoſe who were blind followed ſome profeſſion [o]. That city had, it ſeems, forfeited many of its antient privileges, probably on account of ſome ſedition; for St. Jerom tells us, that it was almoſt entirely ruined by the Romans [p]; but Adrian not only repaired both the public and private buildings, and reſtored to the inhabitants their former privileges, but heaped new favours upon them; for which they returned him ſolemn thanks, and conferred upon him what honours they could. But this ſenſe of gratitude was not in them long-lived; for he no ſooner left their city, than they publiſhed moſt bitter and virulent lampoons againſt him and his favourites. In the palace at Alexandria, which took up the third part of the city, one quarter was conſecrated to the muſes and ſciences, and thence called the Muſeum. There were lodged and entertained at the expence of the public men of learning, divided into ſeveral companies or colleges, according to the different ſciences and ſects which they profeſſed. They were all under one head, who was named by the emperor, and honoured with the title of pontiff. This inſtitution is generally aſcribed to Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, who placed there his famous library. The emperor Claudius to the antient muſeum added a new one, with large revenues. In the muſeum were always perſons eminent in all the branches of literature, and it was by the learned deemed a great honour to be admitted into this ſociety, or, as it is ſometimes expreſſed, to this table. This diſtinction Adrian granted to Dionyſius the ſophiſt, whom he greatly eſteemed,

He diſlikes the ſatirical temper of the Alexandrians

He repairs the city of Alexandria, and reſtores to the Alexandrians their antient privileges.

[m] Vopiſc. vit. Sat. p. 245. [n] Vide Pears. de Ignat. c. 2. & Vopiſc. ibid. [o] Hier. chron.

He viſits the muſeum.

eſteemed, and to an Egyptian poet, named Pancrates [q]. Adrian did not fail viſiting this place, and converſing with the moſt eminent men of that learned ſociety: he examined them, and ſuffered himſelf to be by them examined, aſking them many queſtions, and anſwering thoſe which they propoſed to him [r]. The emperor Caracalla ſuppreſſed this ſociety in the year 216 [s]; but it was afterwards re-eſtabliſhed, and ſubſiſted till the civil wars in the time of Aurelian, when that quarter, named Bruchium, was utterly demoliſhed [t]; inſomuch, that about the latter end of the fourth century, it was quite deſerted, and at ſome diſtance from the city [u].

He paſſes into Libya Cyrenaica.

Adrian from Egypt paſſed into Libya Cyrenaica, where he killed (for he took great pleaſure in hunting) a lion of a monſtrous ſize, which had committed great ravages in that country, and even unpeopled ſome parts of it [w].

The death of Antinous, ſuppoſed to have been ſacrificed by him.

What moſt of all rendered Adrian's journey into Egypt remarkable, was the death of Antinous, a beautiful youth, greatly beloved by a prince addicted to the moſt unatural pleaſures. He fell accidentally into the Nile, as he was ſailing on that river with the emperor, and was drowned. This is the account which Adrian himſelf gave of his death. But Dion Caſſius aſſures us, that the emperor, who had applied himſelf to the ſtudy of magic, being, by the falſe and execrable principles of that art, miſled into a belief, that he ſhould prolong his life by ſacrificing a human victim to the infernal gods, was obliged to accept of the tender which Antinous made him of his life, all the reſt preferring their own ſafety to the emperor's. Adrian would by choice have rather ſacrificed his deareſt friends, than his beloved catamite; but as no conſtraint was to be uſed, and none of them cared to prolong the emperor's life at the expence of their own, the offer of Antinous was accepted, and he ſacrificed [x]. Be that as it will, the emperor bewailed him, ſays Spartian [y], with all the tenderneſs and weakneſs of a woman lamenting the death of her huſband. To allay in ſome meaſure his grief, he deſired the Greeks to rank him amongſt the gods; which they did accordingly: ſo that in a ſhort a short time all the eastern provinces were filled with statues, temples and chapels consecrated to this new divinity. At Mantinea in Arcadia a magnificent temple was erected to him by Adrian, solemn sports instituted, and priests appointed to offer victims in honour of the deified pathic [z]. It was even pretended, that he uttered oracles; but his answers were commonly thought to have been composed by Adrian [a]. The astrologers, having discovered, or pretended to discover, a new star, gave out that it was Antinous [b]. The deifying of Antinous, and the sacrilegious worship paid him, was made use of by the christian writers as an argument to impugn the divinity of the other gods, who were more antient, but had no better claim to their godhead, than the infamous Antinous, and to expose the pagan religion. This argument we find wonderfully handled by Justin the Martyr, who was converted about this time to the christian religion, and likewise by Hegesippus, Athenagoras, Tatian, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Adrian caused the body of Antinous to be buried with the utmost magnificence, built a city in that place, and changed his tomb into a temple, where he was said to work miracles [c]; which we find exposed and ridiculed by the pagans themselves.

He is ranked among the gods.

[q] Strabo, l. xvii. p. 793, 794. Ammian. l. xxii. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 873. Athen. l. vi. &. xxvi. [r] Spart. p. 10. [s] Dio, ibid. p. 873. [t] Ammian. l. xxii. [u] Vide Caſaub. in Span. p. 36. [w] Athen. l. xv. p. 677. [x] Dio, l. lxix. p. 793. [y] Spart. p. 7.

THE following year, when Hiberus and Sisenna were consuls, Adrian left Egypt, and returned to Syria, where he passed this and the following year, and honoured Servianus his brother-in-law with a third consulship, and gave him C. Vibius Juventius Varus for his collegue. While Servianus was consul, the emperor wrote a letter to him, giving him an account of the state of Egypt, and of Alexandria its metropolis [d]. At the same time, he sent some presents, both to him and his wife Paulina, the emperor's sister, who died soon after. As Adrian conferred no extraordinary honours upon her after her death, the Roman senate and people were the more displeased with those he had bestowed upon Antinous [e]. Early in the spring, he left Syria, in order to return to Italy; but made a long stay at Athens, after having visited Thrace and Macedon. During his stay at Athens, the Jews revolted, provoked chiefly, says Dion

Adrian returns to Syria.

Visits Thrace and Macedon and returns to Athens.

[z] Dio, ibid. Spart. p. 8. Spanh. l. vii. p. 652——657.
[a] Spart. p. 7. Dio, ibid. [b] Dio, ibid. [c] Origen. in Celf. l. iii. p. 132. [d] Vopisc. vit. Sat. p. 245. [e] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 714.

Dion Caſſius [f], at Adrian's ſending a Roman colony to Jeruſalem; at his calling that city, after the name of his family, Ælia Capitolina, and his erecting a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place were the antient temple ſtood. Spartian tells us, that Adrian publiſhed an edict, forbidding them to be circumciſed; which prompted them to take up arms, and attempt the recovery of their antient liberty. Be that as it will, Adrian had no ſooner left Syria, than they openly revolted, under the conduct of one Barcoquebas, whom St. Jerom calls Coquebas and Coquibus [g]; but his true name was, as Scaliger informs us, upon the authority of the rabbies [h], Cozeb, that is, Liar, or Barcozebas, that is, the ſon of a lye; but being aſhamed of that name, he called himſelf Coquebas, which imports a ſtar, or Barcoquebas, ſignifying the ſon of a ſtar; for to himſelf he applied the prophecy of the ſtar which was to go forth out of Jacob, and pretended to be the promiſed Meſſiah [i]. The Jews flocked to him from all parts, appointed him their king, and looked upon him as the deliverer and reſtorer of their nation [k]. He overran all Judæa and Syria, committing every-where moſt dreadful ravages, and exerting his cruelty chiefly againſt the chriſtians, whom he put to moſt exquiſite torments, in order to make them blaſpheme Chriſt, and join him againſt the Romans [l]. Tinius, or Tinnius Rufus, who had been formerly governor of Thrace, as appears from ſome medals [m], and commanded at that time in Judæa, being reinforced with ſome troops, which Adrian ſent him upon the firſt notice of the revolt, fell upon the rebellious Jews, and, without diſtinction of ſex or age, put all to the ſword who fell into his hands. The Jews at firſt durſt not appear in the open field; but either kept within the ſtrong-holds which they had ſeized, or concealed themſelves in caves, which for that purpoſe they had dug to an incredible depth, ſallying from thence, and often ſurpriſing the Romans with great ſlaughter. However, Adrian ſeemed to deſpiſe them, till being joined by an infinite number of Jews from moſt provinces of the empire, and by many others who were not of that religion, but hoped to enrich themſelves with plunder, they became formidable. Then

The Jews revolt.

And commit dreadful ravages.

the

[f] Dio, l. lxix. p. 793. [g] Hier. in Dan. [h] Scalig. in chron. Euſeb. [i] Euſeb. l. ix. c. 6. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Juſt. apol. ii. p. 72. Sulp. l. ii. p. 148. [m] Noris epiſt. conſul. p. 399.

the emperor, fearing a general insurrection, dispatched an express to Julius Severus, governor of Britain, and the greatest commander of his time, ordering him to leave that island, and hasten to Palestine, to take upon him the command of the Roman army there. Severus, upon his arrival, did not think it adviseable to venture an engagement, the Jews being very numerous, and fighting, as he observed in some skirmishes, like men in despair. He therefore contented himself with intercepting their provisions, streightening their quarters, and cutting off the parties which they sent out to forage. By this means he did not doubt, but he would reduce them at last to submit, without any considerable loss on his side [n]. Tinnius Rufus commanded under him; for to him chiefly is ascribed, by St. Jerom and Eusebius, the glory of having entirely reduced the rebels [o]. The Jews made themselves masters of Jerusalem, after having driven out, or rather massacred, the Romans who had settled there by the emperor's orders. But Severus besieged it anew, took the place, and laid it in ashes, as we read in St. Jerom [p], Eusebius [q], Chrysostom [r], and Appian [s], who lived at this time. If credit is to be given to the tradition of the Jews, Turanus Rufus, or rather Tinnius Rufus, caused the ground where the temple stood to be ploughed up; which, among the Romans, was a mark of the greatest ignominy, and utter desolation, no one being, according to their laws, allowed to build, without an express decree of the senate, in places where that inauspicious ceremony had been performed [t]. The taking and razing of Jerusalem under Adrian happened, according to St. Jerom [u], in the month of August, the twentieth year of that prince's reign, and 136th of the christian æra. The Romans were more vigorously opposed by the Jews in Bitther or Bether, a strong city at a small distance from Jerusalem, than in any other place. As great numbers of Jews had retired to that place, and the siege lasted a long time, the besieged were reduced to the utmost extremity, for want of provisions. At length, most of them

Julius Severus, governor of Britain, sent against them.

The Jews make themselves masters of Jerusalem, which is besieged anew, taken, and laid in ashes.

[n] Dio, p. 793, 794. [o] Hier. in Dan. Eusеb. in chron. [p] Hier. in chron. ann. 124. in Joel i. p. 55. in Jer. xxxi. p. 342. in Dan. ix. p. 595. in Ez. v. 390. [q] Eusеb. l. i. c. 38. l. iii. c. 5. l. vi. c. 18. [r] Chrys. c. 1. hom. 3. [s] Appian. Syr. p. 83. [t] Vide Scal. isag. l. iii. [u] Hier. in Zach. viii. p 262.

Bether taken being ſtarved to death, and the reſt no longer able to manage their arms, the place was taken, ſays St. Jerom, the ſame day on which Jeruſalem had been reduced by Nebuchadonoſor, and the temple burnt by Titus ſixty-five years before [w]. The reduction of Bether did not put an end to the war, which was, according to Dion Caſſius, long and troubleſome [x]. It laſted, according to the Jewiſh tradition, three years and a half [y], according to St. Jerom [z], two or three years, and was ended by a complete victory, which the Romans gained over the Jews, Barcoquebas their leader being taken priſoner [a], and, no doubt, puniſhed according to his deſerts. In the courſe of this war the Romans demoliſhed fifty caſtles of great ſtrength, nine hundred and eighty-five towns, and killed in battles, ſkirmiſhes, and ſieges, five hundred and eighty thouſand men; for thoſe who periſhed by famine, fire, and diſtempers, are almoſt without number [b]. The Romans too loſt many of their beſt troops, notwithſtanding the great caution uſed by Severus and the other generals; inſomuch, that Adrian, in the letter which he wrote to the ſenate acquainting them with the laſt victory, omitted the expreſſion uſed by other emperors and commanders, "If you and your children are well, I and the army are well [c]." Of the Jews who outlived this ſecond general maſſacre of their nation, incredible numbers were ſold at the ſame price as horſes in a famous fair called the fair of Terebinthus, or of the Turpentine-tree [d]; which was on that account ever after abhorred by the Jews [e]. St. Jerom tells us, that a great fair was yearly held at the tent of Abraham [f], which ſome writers take to be the fair mentioned here; for in the valley of Mamre near Hebron, where that patriarch pitched his tent, and received the three angels, there was in the fourth century, as Euſebius informs us [g], a turpentine-tree, which the natives of the place pretended to have ſtood there from the beginning of the world. The Jews, who were not ſold at the fair of Terebinthus, were carried to Gaza, and there expoſed to ſale at another fair eſtabliſhed by Adrian, and thence

The Jews utterly defeated.

The Jews who outlived the ſlaughter ſold for ſlaves

[w] Idem ibid. [x] Dio, p. 793. [y] Vide Scalig. ibid. [z] Hier. in Dan. v. p. 592. [a] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 6. [b] Dio, p. 794. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Hier. in Jer. xxxi. p. 342. Chron. Alexan. p. 596. [e] Hier. in Zac. xi. p. 272. [f] Idem ibid. [g] Euſeb. chron. p. 209. & demonſtr. evang. l. v. c. 9.

thence called after his name [h]. Such as were not disposed of in Palestine, were transported to Egypt, where they perished either by famine, or were massacred by the inhabitants, who, as we have often observed, bore them an irreconcileable hatred [i]. The Jews were by several presages forewarned of this dreadful calamity, among which the most remarkable was the falling of the sepulchre of Solomon, which was held by them in great veneration, and fell a little before the war broke out [k]. When the war was ended, Adrian published an edict, which was confirmed by the senate, and hung up in all public places, forbidding the Jews, on pain of death, to set foot in Jerusalem, to approach that city, or any place whence it could be seen [l]. St. Jerom [m] and Tertullian [n] extend this decree to all Judæa; which seems to have been the opinion of the Jews themselves, for in their calendar is marked a fast, instituted, as is said there, on account of the decree, by which their forefathers were forbidden to set foot in the land of Judæa [o]. This fast is marked on the ninth of their fifth month, called by them Ab, and answering part of our August. But, on the other hand, Clement of Alexandria tells us, that he studied in Palestine under one who was of Jewish extraction [p]; and it is manifest from Origen [q], that in the third century there were Jews in Palestine; and from Epiphanius, that, in the reign of Constantine, their patriarch resided at Tiberias [r]. St. Austin [s] likewise and St. Hilarius [t] tell us, that they were excluded from Jerusalem, but not from the other cities of Palestine. Julian the apostate, out of hatred to the christians, countenanced the Jews; whence in his reign they undertook the rebuilding of their temple. But the succeeding emperors renewed the prohibition of Adrian, allowing, however, the Jews, upon their paying a considerable sum, to enter, or rather approach, the city once a year; that is, on the day in which it had been destroyed and laid in ashes by the Romans [u]. They were then ſuffered to bewail their misfortunes, and to be eye-witneſſes, ſays St. Jerom [w], of the accompliſhment of the prophecies. From the Itinerarium Burdigalenſe, which is ſuppoſed to have been written before the time of Julian the apoſtate, about the year 333, we learn, that on this occaſion they aſſembled chiefly in the place where the temple had formerly ſtood, and there performed certain ceremonies altogether idolatrous [x]. Thus all the attempts of that perfidious nation, towards the recovery of their former condition, ſerved only to heighten and aggravate thoſe calamities, with which they had been ſo often threatened by the prophets, and to reduce them to the deplorable ſtate in which we now ſee them, being a crew of contemptible vagabonds diſperſed all over the world, without king, temple, or pontiff; driven from their own country, and not daring to ſet foot in it even as paſſengers and ſtrangers. The edict of Adrian, excluding all Jews from Jeruſalem, extended to ſuch of them as had embraced the chriſtian religion; ſo that they too being obliged to quit that city, the church was by that means delivered from the ſervitude of the law; for, till that time, not only the biſhops of Jeruſalem had been choſen from among the circumciſed chriſtians, but all the converted Jews joined to the obſervance of the goſpel that of the law. When the Jews were baniſhed Jeruſalem, the church began to be compoſed only of converted Gentiles; and before the death of Adrian, which happened in 138, St. Mark, who was one of them, was appointed biſhop of that city, and ſucceeded by Caſſianus, in the nineteenth year of Antoninus's reign, and 156th of the chriſtian æra [b]. The Jews being thus driven out of Jeruſulem, that city began to be peopled only by Gentiles, and by another Roman colony, which Adrian ſent thither after the war. Upon the ruins and aſhes of that antient city, the emperor built a new one, giving it, as we have obſerved above, the name of Ælia Capitolina [c]; by which means the antient name of Jeruſalem was for ſome ages ſo entirely forgotten, that a martyr ſaying, when he was examined at Cæſarea in Paleſtine, that he was a native of Jeruſalem, Jeruſalem rebuilt by Adrian, and named Ælia Capitolina.

All Jews forbidden, on pain of death to set foot in Jerusalem.

They are afterwards allowed to visit Jerusalem once a year.

[h] Chron. Alexan. p. 596. [i] Dio, l. lxix. p. 794. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Euseb. l. iv. c. 6. Hier. in Is. vi. p. 36. Just. apol. ii. p. 84. Tertul. apol. c. 21. [m] Hier. in Dan. ix. p. 595. [n] Tertul. ibid. [o] Scalig. isag. l. i. c. 6. [p] Clem. strom. 1. [q] Orig. ad Afric. p. 244. [r] Epiphan. l. xxxii. c. 4. [s] Aug. civit. Dei. l. xvi. c. 21. [t] Hilar. in psal. xlviii. [u] Orig. in Josuah. xvii. Nazian. orat. xii. Hier. in soph. i.

[w] Hier. ibid. [x] Itin. Burdig. p. 43. [b] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 6. & l. v. c. 12. [c] Dio, l. lx. p. 793. Euſeb. l. iv. c. 6.

Jeruſalem, neither the governor of the province, nor any who were preſent, could conceive what city he meant [d]. Euſebius, Athanaſius, Hilarius, and other fathers, tell us, that Jeruſalem was no more; and truly that which Adrian built, was quite different from the antient city, as to its inhabitants and buildings, and in ſome meaſure as to its ſituation; for it extended more to the north, and took in mount Calvary and our Saviour's ſepulchre; and leſs to the ſouth; for about the middle of the fourth century, the celebrated mount Sion, formerly the place where the prieſts reſided and the doctors of the law, was quite uninhabited, cultivated like an open field, and planted with citruls, (as had been in expreſs terms foretold by Iſaiah) and other greens [e]. The temple lay in ruins, and the place where it ſtood was covered with a wood. The other quarters of Jeruſalem, which Adrian had not compriſed within the precincts of his new city, were filled with ruins; and thence were taken ſtones and other materials both for public and private buildings. At the ſight of theſe ruins, infinite numbers of perſons of all ranks, ſays Euſebius, embraced the chriſtian religion, ſeeing evidently fulfilled in them our Saviour's predictions touching Jeruſalem [f]. The name of Ælia ſtill obtained in the time of St. Chryſoſtom, and long after, in public acts and regiſters; but, by the chriſtians the city was ſtill named Jeruſalem, eſpecially after Conſtantine's time. Adrian in his new city erected a theatre and ſeveral temples, employing for that purpoſe the ſtones of the temple and ſanctuary of the Jews. Two ſtatues of the emperor, and others of the gods, were erected in the place where the temple had ſtood, and over the gate which led to Bethleem, one of marble, repreſenting a hog, to ſignify the utter reduction and ſervitude of the Jewiſh nation [g].

A theatre and ſeveral temples erected in the new city.

Dion Cassius, after having deſcribed the war which Adrian waged with the Jews, ſpeaks of another which broke out about the ſame time with the Alani or Maſſagetæ, a people of Sarmatia, who, under the conduct of Pharaſmanes their king, committed dreadful ravages in Media, entered Armenia, and penetrated into Cappadocia; but

The Alani invade the provinces of the empire.

[d] Euſeb. de pal. c. 11. [e] Euſeb. dem. evang. l. vi. c. 13. & l. viii. c. 3. Cyr. cat xvi. Iter. Burdig. [f] Euſeb. dem. evang l. viii. c. 3. [g] Chron. Alexand. p. 598. Euſeb. ibid. Iter. Burdig. p. 43.

ſoon withdrew from thence, not caring to encounter Flavius Arrianus governor of that province, who was preparing to meet them [h]. The inſtructions given by Arrian concerning the march of the Roman army againſt the Alani, and the order to be obſerved in the battle, which, it was thought, would enſue, have reached our times [i]. The Roman army conſiſted, as appears from theſe inſtructions, of troops from various nations, commanded by one Xenophon, who, no doubt, ſerved under Arrian governor of the province, ſince Arrian directs him how he is to conduct himſelf both in the march and battle. We have a deſcription of the Euxine ſea by Arrian, probably the governor of Cappadocia, addreſſed by way of a letter to Adrian. The author begins his relation with his arrival at Trebizond, where, by the emperor's orders, a temple was then building in honour of Mercury. He embarqued at Trebizond, in order to view the eaſtern coaſts of the Euxine ſea; which he did accordingly, viſiting every-where the Roman garriſons; obliging the ſoldiers to perform their military exerciſes before him; paying them their arrears, &c. and acquainting the emperor with the ſtate of each garriſon *. He ſailed by the mouth of the Phaſis, the waters of which river he obſerved ſwimming a long time, on account of their lightneſs, upon thoſe of the ſea. At the mouth of the Phaſis ſtood a caſtle garriſoned by four hundred Roman ſoldiers, and a town inhabited by ſome veterans and ſea-faring men; which, for the better ſecurity of the place, he ſtrengthened with a new ditch. He ended his voyage at Sebaſtopolis, the moſt diſtant city garriſoned by the Romans. Of all the barbarous nations, along whoſe coaſts he ſailed, the Sanni, called by Xenophon the Drilli, were the moſt fierce and warlike. They had then no king; and as they had formerly paid tribute to the Romans, Arrian, in his letter to the emperor, offers either to reduce them anew, or to extirpate the whole nation [k]. We are ſure he did not extirpate them; for we find them mentioned many ages after; neither are we told that he reduced them. To the account of his voyage along the coaſts of the Arrian's deſcription of the Euxine ſea,

[h] Dio, l. lxix. p. 794. [i] Arrian. mandat. in Alan. Upſaliæ, ann. 1664. * Arrian. perip. pont. Euxin. p. 1, 2, 3. [k] Idem, p. 4——7.

he Euxine ſea, he adds the deſcription of the coaſts of ſia, from Byzantium to Trebizond, and another of the ountry, from Sebaſtopolis to the Boſphorus Cimmerius, nd from thence to Byzantium, that the emperor might ake what meaſures he thought proper, in caſe he deigned to concern himſelf with the affairs of Boſphorus, the king of that country, by name Cotys, being juſt then dead. From this relation it appears that at this time a port was forming by the emperor's orders at Trebizond [l].

ADRIAN, in the mean time, continued at Athens, being mightily taken with the cuſtoms and learning of the Athenians. He was there admitted to the great myſteries of Eleuſina, different from thoſe in which he had been initiated ſome years before, and celebrated, according to Euſebius [m], the ſecond year of each olympiad; that is, every fourth year. He therefore had not left Athens in the beginning of the nineteenth year of his reign, which was the one hundred and thirty-fifth of the chriſtian æra, and the ſecond of the two hundred and twenty-eighth olympiad. As he had been created archon of Athens before he was emperor, he aſſumed the habit peculiar to that dignity, and, with the other magiſtrates, celebrated the great feſtival of Bacchus, diſtributing on that occaſion, large ſums and an immenſe quantity of corn among the populace [n]. Dion Caſſius tells us, that he ſubjected to Athens, the whole iſland of Cephalenia [o]; but in an inſcription addreſſed to Adrian Olympicus, as he is there called, the city of Pale in that iſland ſtyles herſelf autonomos, that is, free, and governed by her own laws [p]. He embelliſhed the city of Athens with many ſtately buildings, eſpecially with a library of marvellous ſtructure. Theſe edifices had been by his orders begun before, but were finiſhed this year, and conſecrated by the emperor himſelf [q]. He likewiſe finiſhed the magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympius [r], begun, according to Philoſtratus [s], five hundred and ſixty years before. In this Adrian's generoſity to the Athenians.

His buildings there.

[l] Idem, p. 7——10.
[n] Dio, p. 795. Spart. p. 9. Rein. inſcript. p. 335.
[o] Idem, ibid.
[p] Vide Wheler's travels, p. 437. Spart. p. 7. ſop. xxv.
[m] Euſeb. chron. p. 214.
[q] Hier. chron.
[r] Dio, ibid.
[s] Philoſ.

this temple he consecrated an altar to himself, and suffered the Greeks to build and consecrate a temple to him, which they called Panellenion [t], instituting on this occasion annual sports. In short, he embellished Athens with so many noble buildings, that he was looked upon as the second founder of that city; whence one quarter of it was from him called Adrianopolis. Many monuments of his generosity towards the Athenians are still to be seen [u]. From a decree of this prince concerning the sale of oil, produced by Wheler, it appears, that at this time all controversies were determined at Athens by the senate and people assembled by the magistrates, with an appeal to the pro-consul, or to the emperor [w]. The Athenians employed part of the money, with which he presented them, in building a city in the island of Delos, which they called Adrian's new Athens, and Olympia. The Athenians of Delos are mentioned in an inscription still to be seen at Venice [x]; but now remain only some ruins of this city, as well as of the many magnificent buildings, which by the superstitious pagans were erected in that island [z].

Adrian returns at length to Rome.

THIS year, the nineteenth of Adrian's reign and the one hundred and thirty-fifth of the christian æra, the emperor left Athens, and returned at length to Rome, Lupercus Pontianus and Rufus Atilianus being consuls [a]. Dion Cassius tells us, that in the shews which he exhibited soon after his arrival, the people pressing him to declare free one of the charioteers of the circus, who belonged to a private person, he returned the following answer; It does not become the Roman people to beg of their emperor the liberty of one who does not belong to him, nor the emperor to oblige the person to whom he belongs to grant him it [b]. He had not been long in Rome, when embassadors arrived from Volageses, probably king of Armenia, with complaints against Pharasmanes king of Iberia, and from the Iazyges, a people of Sarmatia, who were desirous to have their antient treaties with the people of Rome confirmed by the emperor. Adrian received them in a very obliging bliging manner, conducted them to the senate, and there ead to them an answer, which, at the request of the enate, he had composed before-hand. Pharasmanes came o Rome in person, with his wife and his son, to an- swer the complaints of Vologeses, bringing with him rich presents for Adrian, who repaid them with others far more valuable, and besides presented him with fifty elephants and five hundred chosen men, to serve him as a guard; enlarged his dominions; suffered him to sacrifice in the capitol; caused an equestrian statue to be erected to him; and assisted in person at a military exercise performed by him, his son, and the chief men of his court[c]. Nevertheless, by a strange whim, as we may call it, after so many presents and such extraordinary honours, he introduced into the amphitheatre three hundred criminals to be devoured by the wild beasts, or to fight as gladiators, in the embroidered tunics with which Pharasmanes had presented him, as if they had been fit only for such uses[d]. But this, no doubt, happened after the departure of the Iberian prince. After Adrian had travelled, we may say, all over the known world, he fell into a lingering disease, attended with a frequent bleeding at the nose, which the physicians of those days ascribed to his going constantly with his head uncovered in the greatest colds, heats, showers, &c. The loss of blood, as he was stricken in years, was followed by a dropsy, from which, as he entettained no hopes of ever recovering, he began to think of a successor; when several persons of great merit occurred to him, namely, Servianus, who had married his sister, and was now in the ninetieth year of his age; Fuscus the grandson of Servianus, and his own great-nephew; Pletorius Nepos, his antient and intimate friend; and Terentius Gentianus, a man greatly beloved and esteemed by the senate. These he judged, among the great men of Rome, the most capable of the supreme power; but nevertheless neglecting them, nay, conceiving an irreconcileable hatred to them, for no other reason but because they were equal to the empire, contrary to the expectation of all, and the advice of his friends, he made choice of L. Aurelius Annius Ceionius Commodus Verus, for he is called by all these names, and Adrian added those of Ælius and Cæsar. He was sprung from an illustrious family, of which we shall

[t] Spart. cum. not. Casaub. p. 26. [u] Vide Wheler, p. 421——471. [w] Idem, p. 470. [x] Euseb. chron. p. 215. [y] Grut. p. 405. [z] Wheler, p. 93, &c. [a] Noris. epist. conf. [b] Dio, p. 795.

Where he receives Pharasmanes king of Iberia.

He falls into a lingering disease,

Begins to think of a successor.

He adopts Commodus Verus.

His character.

[c] Idem, p. 794. [d] Spart. p. 9.

ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter; was endowed with many good qualities; had the port and air of a prince was well verſed in moſt branches of learning, eſpecially in poetry; and thought rather not unfit for the empire, than equal to it. He was of a very weak and infirm conſtitution, and at the ſame time entirely addicted to lewdneſs and debauchery; nay, it was commonly thought, that his beauty chiefly recommended him to Adrian, who is ſaid to have adopted him upon condition, that he ſhould conſent to his ſatisfying the paſſion which he had conceived for him. But what paſſed between them on this occaſion was never well known, ſays Spartian [e], both Adrian and Verus having bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to keep it ſecret. The adoption of Verus occaſioned great rejoicings in Rome. Adrian gave a largeſs to the people; diſtributed three thouſand ſeſterces amongſt the ſoldiery; exhibited games in the circus, combats of gladiators, &c. But as the new Cæſar's weakneſs daily encreaſed, and he began to vomit blood, Adrian ſoon repented his choice, telling the captain of his guards, That he had placed his hopes and ſupport in a falling wall; that he had loſt the four thouſand ſeſterces which he had diſtributed amongſt the people and ſoldiery; and adopted not a ſon, but a god, alluding to the cuſtom which obtained among the Romans of deifying their emperors and Cæſars. Theſe words being told by the captain of the guards to others, came at length to the ears of Verus, and ſo ſenſibly affected him, that they are thought to have greatly contributed to his death, which happened in the beginning of the following year, as we ſhall relate anon. The captain of the guards was immediately diſcharged and baniſhed the court. Verus, a few days after his adoption, was created prætor, and ſent to govern the province of Pannonia; in which employment he acquitted himſelf with reputation, and ſhewed himſelf well qualified for the command of an army. In an inſcription of the following year, the twenty-firſt of Adrian's reign he is ſtyled imperator [f]; whence we may conclude, if there is not ſome miſtake in the inſcription, as father Pagi pretends [g], that he waged war in thoſe parts; of which, however, no mention is made by hiſtorians.

Adrian repents his choice.

Verus is ſent into Pannonia.

The

[e] Spart. in Æl. Ver. p. 14.
[f] Gruter. p. 23.
[g] Pagi, p. 137.

The following year Adrian raiſed to the conſulſhip his adopted ſon Verus, and gave him for his collegue Sex. Vetulenus Civica Pompeianus, whoſe ſiſter Verus had married [h]. This year Adrian retired to Tibur, now Tivoli, where he employed his time in building a magnificent villa [i], the ſtately ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen in the poſſeſſion of the Roman jeſuits at a ſmall diſtance from Tivoli. Aurelius Victor tells us, that in his retreat he abandoned himſelf, as Tiberius had done formerly at Capreæ, to all manner of lewdneſs; but he was ſoon ſeized with a bloody flux, which reduced him to a miſerable condition. In that ſtate, abandoning himſelf to his natural cruelty, which till then he had reſtrained, he ordered many illuſtrious perſons, under various pretences to be arraigned and executed, and others to be privately murdered. Among the former were Servianus, his brother-in-law and his great-nephew Fuſcus, who, he pretended, had formed a deſign of ſeizing the empire. Fuſcus was but eighteen, and Servianus ninety. We are told, that the latter, before he was executed, called the gods to witneſs his innocence, and begged of them that they would puniſh the cruelty and injuſtice of Adrian, by reducing him to ſuch a ſtate, that he ſhould wiſh for death, and not have it in his power to die; which happened accordingly, as we ſhall relate anon [k]. To palliate his cruelty, to which he had, ſays Spartian, a great biaſs, he uſed to lament the unfortunate condition of princes, whoſe lives, he ſaid, were never thought to have been in danger till they were killed [l]. But for this ſaying, which we do not ever find to have been uſed by any good prince, he was indebted to Domitian. The following year, Ælius Verus Cæſar was conſul the ſecond time, with P. Cælius Balbinus Vibullius Pius, who had been raiſed by Adrian to the rank of a patrician, and was one of the anceſtors of Cælius Balbinus, whom we ſhall ſee preferred to the empire in the year 237, that is, an hundred years after [m]. This year, the Jewiſh war being ended, Julius Severus, who had utterly reduced that rebellious nation, was appointed governour of Bithynia, where he behaved with ſuch juſtice and moderation, having nothing in view but the welfare and happineſs of the people committed to his charge, Adrian retires to Tivoli.

Abandons himſelf to cruelty, ordering ſeveral illuſtrious perſons to be put to death.

[h] Noris. epiſt. conſ. p. 98. p. 795. Spart. p. 12. Idat. &c. Gruter. p. 293.

[i] Spart. p. 13.

[l] Spart. ibid.

[k] Dio.

[m] Onuph.

charge, that his name was famous in that province an hundred years after and upwards [n]. The next consuls were Camerinus and Niger [o]. In the beginning of this year Verus, who had spent part of the preceding year in Pannonia, being returned to Rome, and finding himself greatly indisposed, took a medicine, which proving too strong for him, he fell into a sleep, and died the very day in which he was to return thanks to the emperor for the honour he had done him. The speech which he had prepared for this purpose is commended by Spartian, in whose time it was still extant [p]. Dion Cassius tells us, that he was carried off by a violent voiding of blood [q]. His funeral was performed with the utmost pomp and grandeur, and his ashes deposited in the stately mausoleum, which Adrian had begun for himself. The emperor caused him to be ranked among the gods, and in several cities ordered temples to be built and statues erected to him [r].

Verus dies, and is ranked among the gods.

He was, as we have hinted above, extremely addicted to luxury and voluptuousness, and passed most of his time in the company of lewd women; which his wife resenting, he used to tell her, that wife was a name of honour, not of pleasure. He had always in his hands, and even in bed with him, Ovid's book of love, together with Martial the epigrammatist, whom he used to call his Virgil. When he travelled, he was attended by a great many domesticks, who ran by his chariot, with wings to their clothes, attired like so many Cupids, and called by the name of the winds, Boreas, Notus, Aquilo, Circius, &c. He had married the daughter of Nigrinus, whom Adrian put to death in the beginning of his reign, as we have related above, and had by her a son named L. Verus, whom we shall soon see raised to the throne with Marcus Aurelius, and several daughters of whom one was by Adrian betrothed to Marcus Aurelius, who nevertheless did not marry her. This daughter is thought to be that Fabia, who is but too famous in history. Verus being dead, Adrian was some time in suspense whom he should chuse in his room [s]; but at length seeing himself despised, says Aurelius Victor [t], on account of the weakness both of his body and mind, he declared his intention of adopting Titus Antoninus, upon condition, that he should adopt adopt M. Annius Verus, called afterwards M. Aurelius and L. Verus, the ſon of the deceaſed prince of that name. Antoninus having taken ſome time to deliberate, whether he ſhould accept of the adoption upon the terms propoſed by the emperor, in the end conſented to it; and was accordingly adopted with the uſual ceremonies, on the twenty-fifth of February of this year, the 137th of the chriſtian æra, and at the ſame time inveſted with the tribunitial and proconſular power [u]. Many were diſpleaſed with this adoption; but no one more than Catilius Severus, governor of Rome, who aſpired at the empire himſelf, and began privately to pave himſelf a way to it; but being diſcovered, he was deprived of his place, which was an employment for life. The empreſs Sabina died, it ſeems, after the adoption of Antoninus; for in an antient inſcription he ſtyles her his mother [v]. She is thought either to have been poiſoned by Adrian [x], or ſo ill uſed, that ſhe choſe to lay violent hands on herſelf [y]. Adrian cauſed her to be ranked among the gods [z], not caring whether ſhe was in the ſupernal or infernal regions, provided he was no longer troubled with her bad humour, or pleaſed his own.

His debaucheries.

Adrian adopts Titus Antoninus.

[n] Dio, p. 793. [o] Idat. Prosper, &c. [p] Spart. p. 11. [q] Dio, p. 796. [r] Spart. in Vero. [s] Spart. Ver. p. 16. [t] Adrian. vit. p. 11.

Sabina Auguſta dies.

ADRIAN bore his diſtemper a long time with firmneſs and patience; but being in the end tormented with violent pains in each joint of his body, he had recourſe to magic, ſays Dion Caſſius [a], and by that means once diſcharged his body of the watry humour with which it was filled. But the humour being ſoon recruited, and his pains encreaſing daily, he became in a manner furious, put ſeveral ſenators to death, and ordered Antoninus to take care, that ſeveral others, whom he named, were executed. But that good-natured prince warned them of their danger, and adviſed them to keep themſelves concealed; which they did accordingly, and were ſaved [b]. In the mean time, the emperor, deſirous to end his inſufferable pains with his life, often called for a dagger, and for poiſon, promiſing impunity, and a great reward, to ſuch as ſhould bring him either. But no one could, by any promiſes, be prevailed upon to contribute to his death.

Adrian's impatience in his ſickneſs.

Having

[u] Julius Capitol. in vit. Antonin. p. 18. [w] Onuph. p. 223. [x] Spart. p. 11. [y] Vict. epitome. [z] Birag. p. 185. [a] Dio, p. 797. [b] Aur. Vict. in Adri. p. 13. Antonin. vita, p. 17.

Attempts to lay violent hands on himself.

Having one day by chance found a dagger, he would have ſtabbed himſelf with it, had it not by one of his domeſtics been wreſted out of his hand. He then commanded his chief phyſician to give him poiſon: but he choſe rather to kill himſelf in his preſence, than obey his command [c]. He often conjured his moſt faithful freed-men to diſpatch him, and conſtrained a Jazygian, by name Maſtor, to promiſe it; but Maſtor fled, and never appeared till the emperor was dead. Another, whom he had obliged to make the ſame promiſe, haſtened to Antoninus, and acquainted him with it, who thereupon flew to the emperor's room attended by the captains of the guards, and beſought him to bear his illneſs, ſince it was unavoidable, with more patience and conſtancy; which ſo provoked him, that he commanded the perſon, who had diſcovered his deſign, to be put to death: but Antoninus ſaved him, and thenceforth narrowly watched the emperor night and day, ſaying, he ſhould think himſelf a parricide, if he neglected to preſerve his life as long as he could [d]. Spartian writes, that two blind perſons were reſtored to their ſight by Adrian, while in this condition; but at the ſame time owns, that Marius Maximus, who flouriſhed before him, looked upon the whole as a fiction and contrivance of Antoninus, to perſuade Adrian, that he would recover, and by that means divert him from laying violent hands on himſelf. One of theſe blind perſons was a woman, who, as ſhe gave out, had been admoniſhed in a dream to forbid Adrian to kill himſelf, becauſe he would one day recover; which ſhe neglecting to do, had been ſtruck blind, and ordered to return upon the ſame errand, having been firſt aſſured, that when ſhe had done it, and kiſſed Adrian's feet, ſhe ſhould receive her ſight again. The woman complied with the heavenly admonition, and was accordingly cured, after having waſhed her eyes in the water of the temple of the place from whence ſhe came. The other was a blind man, who coming out of Pannonia, touched Adrian, and that inſtant received his ſight. The emperor was then in a violent fever, which is ſaid to have immediately abated [e].

Two ſuppoſed miracles.

Adrian removes to Baiæ.

From Rome, Adrian removed to Baiæ in Campania; and there neglecting the advice of his phyſicians, and often ſaying, saying, that a multitude of physicians serves only to dispatch the sooner a patient, he lived without any rule, chose what food and drink he liked best, and by that means hastened his death. He was convinced of the immortality of the soul, and seemed apprehensive of its future state, as appears from the celebrated verses (B) which he composed and uttered a little before he expired, inquiring of his soul, whither it designed to go? He died at Baiæ on the tenth of July, after having lived sixty-two years, five months, and seventeen days, and reigned twenty years and eleven months, wanting one day [f] (C). Antoninus, whom he His death.

[c] Spart p. 12. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Idem ibid.

[f] Idem ibid. Dio, p. 797. Eutrop.

(B) The verses were;

Animula vagula, blandula,
Hospes, comesque corporis,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca.
Pallidula, rigida, nudula?
Nec, ut soles, dabis jocos.

Spartian seems to despise them, which shews that he understood as little of poetry, as he did of history.

(C) Most writers agree, that Adrian began his reign on the eleventh of August 117, and that he died on the tenth of July 138, and consequently reigned twenty years, and eleven months, wanting one day. But on the other hand, in some ancient inscriptions is marked the twenty-second year of his tribunitial power; which induced the learned Dodwell to maintain, as we have observed above, that Adrian was adopted by Trajan a year before that prince's death; and consequently, that the account given by Dion Cassius of his adoption ought to be looked upon as a mere fable. But cardinal Noris (57), Petavius (58). and F. Pagi (59), observe, that these inscriptions were made in distant provinces, where the death of the emperor might not have been known a month after it had happened. Besides, as only one month was wanting to the twenty-second year of the emperor's tribunitial power, the author of the inscription probably looked upon it as begun; whereof there are not wanting instances both in antient times and our own. Cardinal Noris, misled, as he himself owns, by these inscriptions, (57) Nor. de cenotaph. Pisan. c. 3. p. 86. (58) Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 23. (59) Pagi, p. 35.

he had left at Rome, and sent for when he found himself at the point of death, arrived according to Spartian [g], just before, according to others, soon after, he expired. His body was burnt at Puteoli, and his ashes conveyed by Antoninus, to Rome, where they were exposed in the gardens of Domitia, and afterwards deposited in the magnificent mausoleum, which Adrian had built for himself near the Tiber, that of Augustus being quite full [h]. Adrian had, by the cruelties committed in the beginning and the end of his reign, provoked the public hatred to such a degree, that the senate were for annulling all his acts, and calling several persons to an account, who had raised themselves by abusing the interest they had with him. They therefore at first unanimously opposed Antoninus, demanding for him the same honours which had been decreed to other emperors [i]. But Antoninus remonstrating with great modesty, that they could not condemn the memory of Adrian without annulling his own adoption, and degrading him from the empire, the respect and veneration they all had for that prince, who added tears to his intreaties, inclined them at last to comply with his demands, especially when they saw a great number of persons appear, who were thought to have been murdered by Adrian, but had been saved and carefully concealed by Antoninus [k]. The senate dreaded likewise the soldiery, who were greatly attached to Adrian [l]. And thus a prince, abhorred by all as a cruel and bloody tyrant, was ranked among the gods, and divine worship decreed him. Antoninus built a temple as Puteoli, and instituted annual sports to

The senate are for annulling his acts.

But deify him, at the request of Antoninus.

[g] Idem ibid. [h] Jul. Capit. in Anton. Dio, ibid. [i] Eutrop. Antonin. vit. p. 18. [k] Aur. Vict. in Heliog. p. 103. [l] Dio, p. 799.

ons, maintained, that Adrian died in 139, but afterwards finding the arguments proving his death to have happened in 138, unanswerable, he changed his opinion, and rejected the inscriptions as faulty (60). Dodwell owns, that Adrian died in 138, but will have him to have been invested with the tribunitial power, a year before the death of Trajan, contradicting therein all the ancients, who tell us, that he was adopted by that prince not long before he expired.

(60) Noris. ep. con. p. 85.

to his honour, with prieſts, fraternities, victims, &c [m]. But what gave Antoninus a far better claim to the title of pious, was his interceding with the ſenate in behalf of thoſe who had been baniſhed by Adrian, and whom that prince, ſaid he, would have recalled, had he lived longer [n].

No prince, perhaps, ever raiſed ſo many public and private edifices as Adrian; for he built in moſt cities of any note, eſpecially at Athens; and Greece, as appears from Pauſanias, was full of his edifices, bridges, and aqueducts. In an antient inſcription, mention is made of a famous aqueduct begun by him in New Athens, and ended by Antoninus in the third year of his reign and 140. of the chriſtian æra. By New Athens ſome underſtand a city of Liguria, others New Athens in the iſland of Delos [o]. At Rome he rebuilt the Pantheon, the temple of Neptune, the ſquare of Auguſtus, the baths of Agrippa, and an infinite number of other public edifices, conſecrating them anew, but leaving them the names of their firſt founders [*]. His houſe at Tivoli was an extraordinary ſtructure, and adorned with fine paintings, repreſenting in one apartment the infernal regions. This palace he ſtyled his Lycæum, Academia, Prytanæum, Canopus, Pœcile, and Tempe, names of the moſt celebrated places abroad, and gave to the ſeveral apartments of it the names of the different provinces [p]. He built a new bridge over the Tiber, now known by the name of Ponte Sant Angelo, and near it his own mauſoleum [q], which from the deſcription Procopius gives us of it [r], appears to have been rather a caſtle than a tomb. In the time of the emperor Juſtinian it was made uſe of as a caſtle, and is at preſent the chief, we may ſay the only, fortreſs of Rome, called by the preſent Romans Caſtel Sant Angelo. Spartian, to give us ſome idea of the height of this lofty building, tell us, that the chariot placed on the top of it, ſeemed very ſmall to thoſe who ſtood on the ground; but nevertheleſs was of ſo large a ſize, that a corpulent man could with great eaſe paſs through the openings which repreſented Adrian's public works.

His houſe at Tivoli.

His bridge on the Tiber, and mauſoleum.

[m] Spart. p. 17. [n] Anton. in vit. p. 19. [o] Vide Salmas. in Spart. p. 53. [*] Spart. p. 8. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Dio, p. 797. [r] Procop. de bell. Goth. l. i. c. 22.

Many cities called by his name.

the eyes of the horſes [s]. Many cities, either built, repaired, or peopled by Adrian with colonies, bore for ſome time his name, or that of his family, which was Ælia, viz. Carthage, Jeruſalem, two cities in Spain; Murſa, now Eſſek, in Pannonia; Stratonice in Macedon, Palmyra in Syria, Neoceſaræa in Pontus; Adrianopolis in Thrace, which ſtill retains it; Adriane, or Adrianopolis, in Libya Cyrenaica; Antinopolis in Egypt; called alſo Adrianopolis; Adrianothera in Myſia, which ſtill retained that name in the fifth century; and Adriane, in the ſame province, the birth-place of Ariſtides the ſophiſt, which, however, ſome writers will have to be the ſame city with Adrianothera [t].

His military inſtitutions.

The regulations which Adrian eſtabliſhed for the preſervation of the diſcipline among the troops, were afterwards obſerved as the military laws of the Romans, and are often quoted by Vegetius. Voſſius is of opinion, that the books of Mauritius, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of hereafter, are a collection of the military conſtitutions of Trajan and Adrian [u]. Adrian was the firſt who appointed, that each cohort ſhould have its proper maſons, architects, and ſuch artificers as were employed in raiſing buildings, and adorning them [w]. The regulations which he introduced, with reſpect to the army, to the court, and to the tribunals of juſtice, were ſtill obſerved in the end of the fourth century [x]. He was the firſt who employed Roman knights in quality of ſecretaries, and committed to them the care of his domeſtic affairs, other emperors having employed in ſuch offices only their freed-men [y].

His laws.

Gothofredus ſuppoſes Adrian to have been the author of a new juriſprudence, eſpecially by his perpetual edict, which he ſtyles the fountain of all laws in force among the Romans, at leaſt till the publication of the code by Theodoſius the younger [z]. Spartian mentions ſome of the laws publiſhed by Adrian, namely, that the children of preſcribed perſons ſhould enjoy the twelfth part of their fathers eſtates; that if any one found a treaſure in his own grounds, it ſhould be entirely his; if in thoſe of another, the owner of the ground

[s] Spart. cum not. Salmaſ. p. 51. [t] Vide Salmas. ibid. [u] Voſſii epiſt. additæ ad Pearſon. Ignatiana, p. 234. [w] Victor. epit. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Spart. p. 11. [z] Gothofred. cod. Theodoſ. prol. p. 283.

round ſhall have the moiety of it; if in any public place, it ſhall be equally ſhared with the exchequer: that ſuch as had ſquandered away their eſtates, ſhould be publicly whipt in the amphitheatre, and baniſhed the city: that men and women ſhould uſe ſeparate and diſtinct baths: that if a maſter ſhould be found killed in his houſe, not all his ſlaves ſhould be put to death; nay, that thoſe only ſhould be put to the queſtion who were near enough to have prevented the murder: that maſters ſhould no longer have power of live and death over their ſlaves, but that ſuch ſlaves as deſerved to be capitally puniſhed, ſhould be tried and condemned by the magiſtrates [a]. Porphyrius informs us, upon the authority of Pallas, who wrote before his time, that Adrian publiſhed an edict prohibiting all human ſacrifices, which were ſtill offered in ſeveral provinces of the empire [b]. However, this execrable cuſtom was afterwards revived, and obtained in Africa, where children continued to be immolated to Saturn till the time of the proconſul Tiberius, who cauſed the inhuman prieſts of that deity to be crucified on the trees, which formed the grove round his temple. Thoſe who executed the ſentence of the proconſul were ſtill living in the beginning of the third century, as we read in Tertullian [c]; whence it is manifeſt, that Tiberius did not, as ſome have imagined, govern Africa in Adrian's time. It appears from the antient writers, that human ſacrifices were, notwithſtanding Adrian's prohibition, immolated to Diana in the neighbourhood of Rome, and even in Rome, during the ſolemn myſteries, till the time of Conſtantine, or rather of Gratian, who utterly aboliſhed that execrable practice [d]. The Romans had on their eſtates what they called manufacturies, or work-houſes where they kept great numbers of people, eſpecially ſlaves at work. Theſe houſes were like ſo many priſons, whither maſters ſent ſuch of their ſlaves as had diſobliged them, and even kept them there in chains. Many, to avoid being liſted, or puniſhed for crimes they had committed, fled to theſe work-houſes, and were there kept concealed. Beſides, the owners of theſe manufacturies were thought to ſeize

He forbids human ſacrifices.

[a] Spart. cum not. Salmaſ. p. 52. [b] Porphyr. apud Euſeb. in triennal. Conſtantin. c. 16. [c] Tertull. ap. c. 9. [d] Lact. inſt. l. i. c. 21. Euſeb. ibid. Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 217. Tatian. p. 164.

passengers and strangers, whether slaves or freed-men, to shut them up in these houses, and oblige them to work, without their ever being afterwards heard of. Adrian therefore, to obviate such inconveniences and disorders, put down all the work-houses, except those which belonged to the emperor or to the public [e]. Onuphrius [f] supposes Adrian to have made a new division of the provinces of the empire, and is therein followed by the learned Pietro Giannone in his excellent history of the kingdom of Naples [g]; but the antients only tell us, that Adrian divided all Italy into four districts, which were by his appointment governed by four consulars, that is, senators who had been consuls [h]. The division of the provinces, which Onuphrius ascribes to Adrian, was by him copied from Festus, who wrote in the time of Valentinian I. and none of the antients speak of any change made in the provinces, by Adrian, except that which we have just now mentioned. That which Onuphrius supposes to be Trajan's ought, in our opinion, to be rather ascribed to Diocletian, who divided the empire, as we read in Lactantius [i], into innumerable provinces, in order to multiply offices and officers, and by that means keep the people in awe and terror. Aulus Gellius tells us [k], that in Adrian's time, a woman of known modesty and unblemished character, was brought to bed eleven months after her husband's death. The legitimacy of the child being questioned by the heirs of the deceased, the cause was tried before the emperor, who after having examined a great many unexceptionable witnesses concerning the character of the woman, and with great care and attention consulted the books of the antient philosophers and physicians, declared by a special decree, that a child might be born eleven months after its conception. Aulus Gellius assures us, that he himself had read this decree. In Adrian's time a violent persecution was raised against the christians, which Sulpicius Verus accounts the fourth persecution; but it is not generally reckoned so by the fathers of the church, since no new edicts were issued against the professors of the christian religion, but only the laws still in force put in execution, Adrian being prompted by his superstition, (for he was initiated in all the idolatrous ceremonies of the Greeks) to countenance the persecutors of those

He abolishes all private work-houses

Adrian's edict in favour of a woman brought to bed eleven months after her husband's death.

Adrian first suffers the christians to be persecuted and then puts a stop to the persecution.

[e] Vide Salmas. in Spart. p. 49. [f] Onuph. de rep. Rom. comment. [g] Giann. hist. civil. l. i. c. 5. p. 25. [h] Spart. p. 11. [i] Lact. de pers. p. 6. [k] Aul. Gell. l. iii. c. 16.

thoſe who were declared enemies of all ſuperſtition [l]. But after the perſecution had raged for ſome time with great violence, Adrian himſelf put a ſtop to it, being, upon the peruſal of the apologies preſented to him by Quadratus and Ariſtides, fully convinced of the innocence of the chriſtians, and the purity of their morals [m]; nay, he was even thought, if Lampridius is to be credited [n], to have had a deſign of cauſing our Saviour to be acknowledged as God, and to erect temples to his honour; but was diverted from it by ſome perſons who, conſulting the oracles, had received this anſwer, That if he ſuffered the God of the chriſtians to have temples, thoſe of the other gods would be ſoon abandoned. Under Adrian flouriſhed many perſons eminent in moſt branches of literature, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in our notes (D).

The

[l] Sulp. Sever. l. ii. c. 45. Hier. ep. 84. Euſeb. l. iv. c. 26. Tertull. apol. c. 5. [m] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 3. Hier. de vir. illuſtr. c. 19, &c. [n] Lamprid. in vit. Alexandr.

(D) Adrian himſelf ought to be ranked amongſt the writers who flouriſhed at this time; for he publiſhed ſeveral works both in proſe and verſe upon various ſubjects; and among the reſt, a Greek poem intituled the Alexandriad, of which we find the ſeventh book quoted by ſome of the antients (61). Spartian ſpeaks of certain books compoſed by him, and publiſhed under the title of Catacriani: wherein he pretended to imitate Antimachus, whom he preferred to Homer. Theſe, ſays the above-mentioned writer, were very obſcure pieces (62); and truly, from the title, they appear to have been ſuch as Spartian deſcribes them. Froben printed in 1551. a dialogue between Adrian and Epictetus, wherein the emperor propoſes ſeveral queſtions, which are anſwered by the philoſopher (63). Some of his Greek and Latin verſes have reached our times, beſides thoſe which we read in his life by Spartian (64), who ſpeaks of them with great contempt. But his judgment is of no weight with us, who find them mightily cried up by the beſt writers of thoſe times (65) Photius, who had peruſed his declamations, commends both his ſtyle and thoughts (66). We find the firſt book of his diſcourſe is quoted by the ancients, and the quotation relates to ſome remarks on the Latin grammar (67). Beſides his military inſtitutions, ſome writers aſcribe to him a treatiſe concerning the manner of drawing

(61) Vide Voſſ. hiſt Græc. l. ii. c. 11. Dio. l. lxix. p. 788. (62) Spart. in Adr. (63) Geſner. epit. p. 2. (64) Voſſ. ibid. (65) Vide Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 51. Et Salmaſ. in Spart. (66) Phot. c. 100. (67) Vide Salmaſ. ibid. Et Aul. Gell. l. x. c. 13.

Antoninus furnamed the pious.

The emperor Titus Antoninus derived his origin, on the father's ſide, from the city of Nemauſus, now Niſme, in Languedoc [o]. His anceſtors are ſaid by Aurelius Victor to ing up an army in battalia, which was long unknown, and firſt diſcovered in the reign of the emperor Anaſtaſius, about the latter end of the fifth century, and publiſhed with ſome additions by Mauricius, or Urbicus, then conſul (68). In the year 16 4. was printed at Upſal in Sweden, a treatiſe on the military art and ſtratagems, aſcribed to Mauricius, but that piece was done long after the time of Mauricius the conſul, ſince mention is there made of the French, Turks, Sclavonians, &c. (69). Adrian was, according to Dion Caſſius and Spartian, ſo fond of glory, that he wrote his own life in ſeveral books, but cauſed them to be publiſhed under the names of ſuch of his freedmen as were perſons of learning (70). Among theſe was Phlegon, a native of Tralles in Aſſia, who wrote a treatiſe on the long-lived, and another on wonderful things. Some fragments of theſe works are ſtill extant (71); and from a paſſage in the former it appears that he had not put the laſt hand to that piece in the nineteenth year of Antoninus's reign, the 156th of the chriſtian æra. Suidas aſcribes to Phlegon a deſcription of Sicily, three books of Faſti, an account of the famous places in Rome, and their names, and ſixteen books of the olympiads, to the 229th, begun in the year 137. of the chriſtian æra. This piece contained an account of the moſt remarkable things that in each olympiad, had happened in any part of the world. From the 177th olympiad, which has been conveyed to us by Photius, that work ſeems to have been exceeding well digeſted: had it reached our times, it would have cleared up ſeveral obſcure paſſages in hiſtory. Photius finds fault with the author for the trifling accounts he gives of all thoſe who gained prizes in the Olympic games, and inſerting in his work all ſorts of oracles. He likewiſe cenſures his ſtyle, as not quite pure and altogether Attic. In Photius's time only the five firſt books were extant which ended with the 177th olympiad, but the author had carried his hiſtory down to Adrian's time. It was addreſſed to one Alcibiades, belonging to that prince's life guard (72). In the thirteenth book of this work he is thought to have mentioned the darkneſs which happened at our Saviour's death (73): He ſpeaks of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, concerning which Photius quotes a long paſſage out of his fourteenth book (74). He is [o] Jul. Cap. in Antonin. cum not. Salmaſ. Pariſ. 1620.

(68) Voſſ. epiſt. additæ ad Pearſ. Ignatiana. (69) Maur. tactic. p. 253. 364, 384. (70) Dio, p. 793. Spart. p. 6. (71) Phot. p. 256. Suid. p. 1071. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 11. (72) Photius, c. 97. (73) Hier. chron. p. 158. Orig. in Mathæum, p. 438. (74) Phot. p. 167.

to have lived at Lanuvium, or rather Lavinium in the neighbourhood of Rome; perhaps they ſettled there, after having is frequently quoted by Stephanus the geographer. Suidas tells us, that Phlegon made an epitome of his ſixteen books of the olympiads, which epitome conſiſted of eight books; and that he likewiſe abridged the hiſtory of the victors in the Olympic games; and adds, that he publiſhed other works, which he does not mention (75). Phlegon, in his book of wonderful things, deſcribes a hippocentaur, taken on a mountain of Arabia, and ſent by the king of that country to the emperor, without doubt, Adrian, while he was in Egypt. The monſter died, but was embalmed by the governor, conveyed to Rome, and there placed in the imperial palace; where thoſe may ſee it, concludes Phlegon who queſtion the truth of my relation (76). St. Jerom tells us, that Antony, the famous anchoret, was met in the deſert by a hippocentaur, who ſpoke to him, and directed him what way he was to keep (77). Phlegon relates another hiſtory no leſs ſurpriſing of a young woman, who about ſix months after her death appeared again, walked, converſed, eat, and drank as ſhe had done formerly; which coming to the ears of her parents, they flew to ſee her, and, accordingly, had that ſatisfaction. But the young woman told them, that their curioſity would prove fatal to her, and put an end to her ſecond life; which words ſhe had ſcarce uttered, when ſhe fell dead at their feet. Such a ſurpriſing event, being divulged in an inſtant drew vaſt crowds to the place from all quarters. Phlegon haſtened thither with the reſt, and ſaw the body of the deceaſed laid out upon a bed; but not ſatisfied with that ſight, I cauſed the burying place of the family to be opened, ſays he, when I obſerved the bed, on which the young woman had been laid ſix months before, empty. He relates the moſt minute circumſtances of this wonderful event, names the perſons who were preſent, &c. (78.)

Favorinus, well known by the writings of Aulus Gellius, who was his diſciple, and by thoſe of Philoſtratus, was a native of Arles in Provence, and from his birth an eunuch, by profeſſion a philoſopher and ſophiſt, and well ſkilled both in the Greek and Latin tongues. He ſtudied under Dion Chryſoſtomus, and beſides Aulus Gellius, had for his diſciple the celebrated Herodes Atticus, whom he appointed his heir. He wrote a great many works quoted by the antients (79); but his ſtyle ſeemed to ſome deſtitute of the gravity becoming a philoſopher (80). He was for a long

(75) Suid. p. 1071.
(76) Phleg. mir. c. 34.
(77) Hier. in vit. Paul. heremit.
(78) Phleg. mir. c. 1. p. 13, 14.
(79) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 10. Suid, p. 1022, Philoſtr, vit, ſoph. p. 493. Demonactis, p. 549.
(80) Lucian. in vit.

ing removed from Niſme. The Aurelian family, which was the preſent emperor's is thought to have been very antient, but long time Adrian's chief favourite; but that prince growing in the end weary of him, as well as of the reſt of his friends, took delight in mortifying him, by preferring to him perſons of no merit; which the Athenians no ſooner underſtood than they pulled down and broke to pieces a ſtatue, which they had erected to him. When Favorinus was informed of the affront, Socrates, ſaid he, without the leaſt emotion, 'would have been glad to have come off ſo cheap (81).' Suidas obſerves, that he and Plutarch ſtrove who ſhould write moſt books. They lived in great friendſhip, and Plutarch even inſcribed one of his works to Favorinus (82), who died, it ſeems, about the latter end of the reign of Antoninus (83). Galen mentions one Demetrius of Alexandria, who, imitating the ſtyle of Favorinus, whoſe diſciple he was, uſed daily to declaim in public upon what ſubject ſoever was propoſed to him (86). Dionyſius of Miletus was likewiſe a philoſopher of great note, highly favoured by Adrian, raiſed to the equeſtrian order, and apointed governor of ſome province, but in the end diſgraced. He ſtudied under Iſæus, of whom we have ſpoken in the reign of Trajan. Philoſtratus clears him from a charge brought againſt him, namely, that of being addicted to the ſtudy of magic (87). Heliodorus likewiſe felt the effects of Adrian's inconſtancy; for the emperor, being in the end diſguſted with him, wrote ſome moſt virulent letters againſt him (88). One of the ſame name, perhaps the ſame perſon, was, according to Dion Caſſius, for ſome time ſecretary to Adrian (89)

Of all the philoſophers who flouriſhed in thoſe times, Epictetus is by far the moſt renowned: Aulus Gellius calls him the greateſt man the ſect of the ſtoics had ever produced (90). He is ſuppoſed to have been a native of Hierapolis in Phrygia, was for ſome time a ſlave, and belonged to Epaphroditus, whom Suidas calls one of Nero's life-guard (91). This is, without all doubt, Nero's celebrated freedman, to whom Joſephus inſcribed moſt of his works, and who was afterwards put to death by Domitian, as we have related in that prince's reign. Celſus, the famous champion of idolatry, writes of Epictetus, that while his maſter was one day ſqueezing his leg very hard in order to torment him, Epictetus ſaid to him very calmly, 'you'll break my leg;' which happening accordingly, 'Did not I tell you,' ſaid he, ſmiling, 'that you would break my leg (92)?' Epictetus was, as is ſuppoſed, ſet but was not diſtinguiſhed very early with preferments in Rome. His grandfather Titus Aurelius Fulvus, or Fulvius, His extraction and preferments.

(81) Philoſ. ibid. Dio, p. 719. (82) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 7. Gell. l. ii. c. 26. (83) Jonſ. ibid. (86) Galen. prog. com. p. 445. (87) Philoſt. ibid. p. 522, &c. (88) Spart. p. 7. (89) Dio, l. lxix. p. 789. (90) Aul. Gell. l. i. c. 2. (91) Suid. p. 996. (92) Orig. in Celſ. l. vii.

ſet at liberty, but remained always very poor (93). Being obliged by Domitian's edict, baniſhing all philoſophers, to quit Rome in 94. he retired to Nicopolis in Epirus, whence he returned upon that princes' death, and lived at Rome till the time of M. Aurelius, ſays Suidas (94), by whom as well as by his predeceſſor, he was, according to Themiſtius, held in great eſteem and veneration (95). But we cannot fall in with the opinion of theſe writers, ſince M. Aurelius uſed to look upon it as a great happineſs, not that he had learnt any thing of, or converſed with, Epictetus, but that he had read his writings (96). Epictetus reduced all his philoſophy to two points only, 'viz. to ſuffer evils with patience, 'and enjoy pleaſures with moderation;' which he expreſſed with theſe two celebrated words, ἀνέχου καὶ ἀπέχου; that is, 'ſuffer and abſtain (97).' He was againſt the celibacy of the philoſophers, but nevertheleſs ſeems to have obſerved it himſelf (98). He publiſhed ſeveral works, none of which, except his enchiridion, or manual, has reached us (99). But Arrian, his diſciple, publiſhed a great work, which he pretends to conſiſt intirely of what he had heard him ſay, and ſet down, as far as he could remember, in Arrian's own terms (100).

Arrian, a native of Nicomedia, was one of the moſt learned men of his age, and on account of his eloquence and knowledge, commonly ſtyled the ſecond Xenophon. He was preferred at Rome to the higheſt poſts of honour, even to the conſulſhip (1); whence moſt writers take him to be the Flavius Arrianus, who, while he was governor of Cappadocia, repulſed the Alani, as we have related above. He lived at Rome under Adrian, Antoninus, and M. Aurelius (2). Themiſtius tells us, that Trajan forced him from his retirement, in order to employ him as a miniſter in ſtate-affairs (3). He publiſhed in eight books the familiar diſcourſes of Epictetus; but only four of them have reached us (4), which are inſcribed to one L. Gellius. He publiſhed twelve books more, containing the ſpeeches of Epictetus (5), and wrote his life. Photius quotes ſeveral other books compoſed by him, viz. the hiſtory of Bithynia, his native country, the hiſtory of the Alani, and that of the Parthians, in ſeventeen books, which he brought down to the war which Trajan waged with vius, was the firſt conſul, of the Aurelian family. His father Aurelius Fulvus was likewiſe honoured with that dignity, with them (6). He deſcribed the expeditions of Alexander the Great in ſeven books, which are ſtill extant, and is thought by Photius to have excelled all who wrote on the ſame ſubject (7) He publiſhed, in ten books, the lives of the ſucceſſors of Alexander; and gave in one book, ſays Photius, an account of India (8). This account of India is now reckoned the eighth book of the hiſtory of Alexander (9). Beſides theſe works mentioned by Photius, Lucian aſcribes to him the life of a famous robber, named Telebous (10). We have already mentioned his deſcription of the coaſts of the Euxine Sea; but that of the coaſts of the Red Sea, tho' commonly aſcribed to him, is thought by the learned to have been done by one who flouriſhed before Adrian and was contemporary with Pliny the elder (11). Beſides the works of Arrian already mentioned, we have ſtill his tactica, whereof the beginning has been long ſince loſt: to his tactica are commonly added his inſtructions concerning the march of the army againſt the Alani, and the order to be obſerved in the battle.

(93) Aul. Gell. l. ii. c. 18. & l. xv. c. 11, (94) Suid. p. 996. (95) Themiſt. orat. 5. (96) Jul. Cap. in Antonin. (97) Aul. Gell. l. xvii. c. 19. (98) Lucian. in vit. Demonac. p. 555. (99) Suid p. 996. (100) Arrian. Epic. p. 1. (1) Phot. c. 58. (2) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 11. (3) Themiſ. orat. 17. (4) Phot. c. 58. (5) Idem, c. 58.

Plutarch was a native of Chæronea in Bœotia, where he was born in the reign of Claudius, about the year 50. of the chriſtian æra. He ſtudied under Ammonius, an Egyptian philoſopher; in the reign of Nero, and in that of Domitian taught at Rome, where, amongſt his other diſciples, he had the famous Arulenus Ruſticus, who was put to death by Domitian in 90 (12). We are told, that he was preceptor to Trajan; which we can hardly believe, ſince that prince was as old as Plutarch (14), and had from his youth been brought up in the camp. Suidas writes, that Trajan diſtinguiſhed him with conſular honours (15), meaning, no dobut, the conſular ornaments, and ordered the magiſtrates of Illyricum to adviſe with him in all affairs of importance. He continued at Rome till the death of Trajan, when he returned to his own country, and there bore the chief employments (16). He had ſeveral children, one of whom, by name Lamprias, publiſhed a catalogue of his father's hiſtorical pieces, which has reached us, but is imperfect (17). The philoſopher Sextus, one of the preceptors of the emperor M. Aurelius, was nephew to Plutarch (18). Plutarch publiſhed a great dignity, and univerſally eſteemed on account of his extraordinary accompliſhments and integrity. Arrias Antoninus, great many works, which are to every one well known, being tranſlated into all the modern languages. His ſtyle is not quite pure and Attic. Among the works commonly aſcribed to him, ſome are thought to have been written by others; and many of his works have been loſt, as appears from the citations of Gellius, Origen, Euſebius, Eunapius, Theodoret, and others. Marcus and Caninius Celer, two celebrated ſophiſts flouriſhed under Adrian, and publiſhed ſome declamations (19). Polemon, another famous ſophiſt, in great favour with Adrian, was a native of Laodicea upon the Lycus, which ſome place in Caria, others in Phrygia; but ſpent the greateſt part of his life at Smyrna, whither the youth flocked from all parts to hear him. He was ſeveral times ſent by that city in quality of embaſſador to the emperor Adrian, of whom he obtained great ſums for the inhabitants, tho' that prince was more addicted, ſays Philoſtratus (20), to the Epheſians than Smyrneans. As Adrian ſhewed an extraordinary kindneſs for him, he took care to turn it to his own advantage, and ſoon appeared with a train and equipage ill ſuiting his profeſſion; which drew upon him the envy of many, and the hatred of all. Antoninus treated him with great reſpect, tho' he had juſt occaſion to complain of his ruſticity, or rather inſolence. Herodes Atticus having heard him declaim, ſent him a conſiderable ſum, which, however, he refuſed as too ſmall; ſo that Herodes, to content him, was obliged to ſend him one much larger, which he condeſcended to accept. The king of Boſporus, who was well verſed in moſt branches of learning, coming to Smyrna to ſee that city, and the learned men there, ſhewed a great deſire of conferring with Polemon: but the proud and ſelf-intereſted philoſopher would neither viſit him, nor be viſited by him, till the king had ſent him a preſent of ten talents, and then he deigned to admit him into his houſe (21). Being greatly tormented with the gout, he retired to Laodicea, his native city, and there, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, placing himſelf, among his dead anceſtors, ordered the tomb to be ſhut up, that the ſun, as he ſaid, might never ſee him ſilenced (22). He left no writings beſides declamations. Under Trajan and Adrian flouriſhed, according to Suidas (23), Ptolemæus Chennus, Zenobius, Cephaleo, and Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus. Ptolemæus wrote ſeveral books, and, among the reſt, one intituled the ſurpriſing hiſtory

(6) Idem, ibid. (7) Idem ibid. (8) Idem, p. 91. (9) Voſ. hiſt Græc. l. ii. c. 11. (10) Lucian. in vit. Alex. Præſt. (11) Vide Salmaſ. in Solin. Et Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 7. (12) Ruald. vit. Plut. (13) Idem, p. 29. (14) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 10. (15) Suid. p. 546, (16) Ruald. c. 25. (17) Idem, c. 6. (18) Idem, c. 5. Et Suid. p. 729.

(19) Philoſtr. ſoph. 24. (20) Idem, ſoph. 25.
(21) Idem ibid. (22) Idem ibid. Et Suid. p. 554.
(23) Idem, p. 646, 1126, 1447.

ninus, his grandfather on the mother's ſide, was twice conſul, and eſteemed one of the greateſt and moſt virtuous men in Rome [p]. He married Boionia Procilla, deſcended from an illuſtrious family; and had by her Arria Fadilla, the mother of Antoninus, who, after the death of her huſband Aurelius Fulvus, married Julius Lupus, and had by him a daughter named Julia Fadilla. This daughter died before the emperor, but left a ſon named Mummius Quadratus [q]. T. Antoninus was born at hiſtory (24). Zenobius taught at Rome under Adrian, and tranſlated the hiſtory of Salluſt into Greek. He likewiſe made a collection of proverbs, which is ſtill extant (25). He is ſometimes called Zenodotus. Cephaleo, being baniſhed his own country, retired into Sicily, where he publiſhed in the reign of Adrian a hiſtory, beginning with Ninus, and ending with Alexander (26). Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, deſcended from the famous hiſtorian of that name, was a ſophiſt, and is commonly ſtyled Dionyſius the Atticiſt, and the muſician, becauſe he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of muſic, and publiſhed ſeveral works upon that ſubject, and one among the reſt divided into thirty-ſix books, and containing an account of the moſt famous poets, and players upon inſtruments (27).

[p] Idem ibid. p. 17. [q] Idem, p. 25.

Herennius Philo, born in the city of Byblos in Phænicia, wrote one book on Adrian's reign, twelve on the choice of books, and thirty on various cities, and the eminent perſons they had produced: the latter work was abridged by one Ælius Severus Athenæus. Origen quotes a paſſage out of Herennius Philo concerning the Jews, for whom, it ſeems, he had no great kindneſs (29). Philo tranſlated into Greek the hiſtory of Phænicia written by Sanchoniatho, in his native language, about the time of the Trojan war (30). The preface, and ſome paſſages of this tranſlation, have been conveyed to us by Euſebius (31). Philo himſelf wrote the hiſtory of Phænicia, which is quoted by Euſebius (32) and Stephanus of Byzantium (33). Hermippus of Berytus, or of that neighbourhood, was one of Philo's diſciples, and highly at Lavinium, on the nineteenth of September of the year 86. Domitian being then conſul the twelfth time, with Cornelius Dolabella. He is ſtyled by Julius Capitolinus, who wrote his life, T. Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Antoninus; but from ſeveral antient inſcriptions it appears, highly eſteemed by Adrian, tho' the ſon of a freedman. He wrote five books upon dreams, which are quoted by Tertullian and others (34). The book of legiſlators, quoted by Origen (35), is generally aſcribed to another Hermippus, a native of Smyrna, who flouriſhed long before Adrian's time. Paulus of Tyre, contemporary with Philo, publiſhed a treatiſe of rhetoric. He obtained of Adrian the title of metropolis for the city of Tyre (36), Leander Nicanor of Alexandria, the ſon of Hermias, publiſhed ſeveral grammatical and hiſtorical pieces (37). Diogeneianus, a native of Heraclea, publiſhed ſeveral writings of grammar and geography, which Heſychius made uſe of in compiling his lexicon (38). His collection of ancient proverbs is ſtill extant. Under Adrian flouriſhed, according to Voſſius (39), Jaſon of Argos, who compriſed in four books the hiſtory of Greece, to the death of Alexander. Ælian, author of the tactica, lived at this time; for he addreſſed his work to Adrian. Another writer of the ſame name flouriſhed about a hundred years after; whence it is no eaſy taſk to determine, which of theſe two was the author of the "hiſtory of animals," of the "hiſtoria varia," and of other pieces which are by the ancients aſcribed to an Ælian, but long ſince loſt.

(24) Phot c. 190. (25) Voſſ. c. 11. (26) Suid. ibid. Phot. c. 68. (27) Suid. p. 743. Voſſ. c. 12. Jonſ. l. iii. c. 8. (28) Suid. p. 1065. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 10. (29) Orig. in Celſ. l. i. p. 13. (30) Voſſ. ibid. l. i. c. 1. (31) Euſeb. præp. l. i. c. 9. (32) Idem ibid. l. iv. c. 16. (33) Voſſ. ibid. l. ii. c. 16.

Under Adrian flouriſhed the two Latin hiſtorians Suetonius and Florus. C. Suetonius Tranquillus was the ſon of Suetonius Lenis, or Lætus, a Roman knight, who, at the battle of Bedriacum, commanded a legion in quality of tribune, as we have related in the foregoing work. The hiſtorian was born about that time; for he was very young in 88. that is, twenty years after the death of Nero (40). Pliny the younger had a great kindneſs for him, kept him conſtantly with him, and wrote to one of his friends, that the more he knew him, the more he loved him, on account of his probity, ingenuity, prudent conduct, and application (41). We may therefore ſuppoſe him appears, that, inſtead of Fulvius, we ought to read Fulvus [r]. As from his infancy he behaved himſelf in a very dutiful and obliging manner towards all his relations, many of them left him their eſtates, by which means he became exceeding rich. He was a great lover of the country and country-diverſions, but nevertheleſs [r] Vide Salmaſ. in not. ad Anton. vit. p. 47.

(34) Tertull. de anim. c. 46. Voſſ. ibid. Orig. in Celſ. Suid. p. 1043. (35) Orig. ibid. (36) Suid. p. 465. (37) Suid. p. 229. Voſſ. ibid. l. ii. c. 12. (38) Suid. p. 737. (39) Voſſ. ibid. (40) Suet. vit. Oth. & Dom. (41) Plin. l. x. ep. 200.

him to be the Tranquillus, whom, in one of his letters, he encourages to plead a cauſe, without being under any apprehenſion from a dream, which ſeemed to threaten him with bad ſucceſs (42). In another letter (43), he ſeems very anxious about purchaſing for him a little place of retirement near Rome, proper for a man of ſtudy and application. In other letters he exhorts him to publiſh his writings, ſince they were finiſhed (44); and aſks his advice even as to his own conduct on a particular occaſion (45). He obtained for him the poſt of a tribune; which Suetonius begged him to confer upon Cæſennius Silvanus, his kinſman: this generous action is greatly cried up by Pliny. Suetonius married, but had no children. However, Pliny, from Bithynia, wrote to Trajan, begging him to grant to his friend the privileges, which thoſe enjoyed, who had three children (46). The emperor ſeldom granted ſuch favours, but nevertheleſs could not help complying with the requeſt of Pliny (47). Suetonius was afterwards ſecretary to Adrian, but diſcharged on account of his diſreſpectful behaviour towards the empreſs Sabina (48). Suidas ſtyles him a Latin grammarian, and aſcribes to him ſeveral grammatical works; adding, that he likewiſe wrote a book upon the ſports of the Greeks, two upon the ſhews of the Romans, two upon the Roman laws and cuſtoms, one of the life of Cicero, a catalogue of illuſtrious Romans, and the lives of the emperors, which has reached our times (49). He wrote likewiſe in three books the hiſtory of the kings, which Paulinus abridged in verſe (50). His book concerning the inſtitution of offices, quoted by Priſcian, is probably the ſame with that of the Roman laws and cuſtoms. He wrote, according to the ſame Priſcian, eight books "of the prætors." A book likewiſe entituled 'de 'rebus

(42) Plin. l. i. ep. 18. (43) Idem ibid. ep. 24.
(44) Idem, l. v. ep. 11. (45) Idem, l. x. ep. 34.
(46) Idem, l. x. ep. 100. (47) Idem ibid. ep. 101.
(48) Spart. p. 6. (49) Suid. p. 934.

leſs did not decline public employments, in which he acquitted himſelf with great reputation and univerſal applauſe. He was conſul in 120; afterwards one of the four conſulars appointed by Adrian to govern Italy, and then ſent into Aſia with proconſular authority; where, 'rebus variis,' is by ſome aſcribed to him. From the great number of authors, who have quoted his works, it appears, that they were generally read, and greatly eſteemed, both by the Greeks and Latins. Tertullian quotes his book of the Roman ſhews (51), and St. Jerom that of illuſtrious men, upon the plan of which he wrote his own (52): perhaps the lives of the illuſtrious grammarians, orators, and poets, commonly aſcribed to Suetonius, were part of that work. The life of Pliny the elder is thought not to have been done by Suetonius, but by a much more modern writer (53). Vopiſcus, ſpeaking of his hiſtory of the twelve Cæſars, calls him an impartial and correct writer; but adds, that he cannot compare him to Salluſt, Livy, Tacitus, or Trogus (54). His writings are no leſs lewd and infamous, ſays St. Jerom, as quoted by Voſſius (55), than were the lives of the emperors, whoſe hiſtory he writes. And truly, both he and Lampridius have mixed too much lewdneſs, as well as meanneſs in their writings; whence they are juſtly cenſured by Rualdus, as teaching their readers to be vicious (56).

Florus is thought to have been a native of Spain, and of the family of the Senecas; that his family-name was L. Annæus Seneca, and that being adopted by one Florus, he took the name of L. Julius Florus. We read of one Julius Florus, who, in the reign of Tiberius, taught rhetoric in Gaul with great applauſe (57). Spartian, in the life of Adrian, quotes ſome verſes compoſed by a poet named Florus, whom moſt writers take to be the epitomizer of the Roman hiſtory; for that epitome was written in the reign of Trajan, and ſeems to be the product of a poetical genius. It is greatly eſteemed by the learned, who nevertheleſs find fault with the author for not obſerving with due punctuality the order of time. It is not an abridgment of Livy; for with him the author often diſagrees. Whether the ſummaries prefixed to each book of Livy's hiſtory were done by Florus, is uncertain (58). The poet Florus uſed, it ſeems, to frequent taverns and eating-houſes, which was looked upon in thoſe days as highly unbecoming perſons of a liberal education. Hence Florus having written to Adrian the following verſes;

Ego

(51) Tertull. ſpec. c. 5. (52) Hier. vir. illuſ. præf.
(53) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 31. (54) Vopiſc. in Firm.
(55) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 31. (56) Rauld. in vit. Plut. c. 28. (57) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c. 30. (58) Voſſ. ibid.

where, by the mildneſs of his government, his affability, and engaging behaviour, he gained the eſteem and affections of perſons of all ranks. Upon his return to Rome, Adrian appointed him one of his council, and tranſacted nothing without his advice [s]. He married Annia Galeria, the ſiſter of Marcus Aurelius's father, and had by her two ſons and two daughters. The eldeſt of the daughters was married to Lamia Syllanus, but died ſoon after: ſhe was probably named Aurelia Fadilla; for we find one of that name called in an antient inſcription the daughter of the emperor T. Antoninus [t]. The other, named Annia Fauſtina, was married to M. Aurelius, her couſin german [u]. The two ſons, M. Aurelius Fulvus Antoninus, and M. Galerius Aurelius Antoninus, muſt have

His iſſue.

[s] Dio, l. lxx. p. 800. Jul. Cap. p. 17. [t] Vide Mabill. analect. c. iv. p. 500. [u] Jul. Cap. p. 18—23.

Ego nolo Cæſar eſſe, Ambulare per Britannos,
Scythicas pati pruinas.

That is, 'I deſire not to be Cæſar, to ramble among the Britons, 'and to endure the froſts of Scythia:' Adrian anſwered thus;

Ego nolo Florus eſſe, Ambulare per tabernas,
Culices pati rotundos.

That is, 'I deſire not to be Florus, to ramble among the ta-'verns and eating-houſes, and to be ſtung with gnats' (59). Aulus Gellius mentions one Terentius Scaurus, a celebrated grammarian, who flouriſhed under Adrian; and highly commends T. Caſtricius, whoſe diſciple he himſelf had been (60); but neither of them ſeems to have left any works behind them. Scaurus had been preceptor to Adrian; his ſon was preceptor to L. Verus, and his grandſon, or rather great-grandſon, to Alexander Severus (61).

(59) Spart. p. 8. (60) Aul. Gell. l. xi. c. 15. & 13.
(61) Vide Caſaub. in vit. L. Ver. p. 35.

have died very young; for no mention is made of them in hiſtory.

His character.

ANTONINUS is celebrated by all the antients as one of the beſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. His behaviour to all was extremely obliging: he was always ready to hear with patience the meaneſt of the people: to no one was ever admittance denied to his palace or preſence, eſpecially when they came to complain of his officers, miniſters, or procurators. He was an utter enemy to all pomp and oſtentation. His table, ſays his hiſtorian, was rich without extravagance, and frugal without meanneſs. He never courted the favour of the people, but ſeemed rather to deſpiſe popular applauſe, which had been the idol of moſt of his predeceſſors. He never flattered others, nor ſuffered any one to flatter him. He obſerved with great exactneſs, but without the leaſt affectation, the Roman laws and ceremonies. He offered in perſon, as high pontiff, the ſacrifices, which for other emperors had been offered by inferior prieſts; and never failed to aſſiſt, unleſs prevented by ſome indiſpoſition, at all public acts of religion, ſhewing always a profound reſpect for the deity [w]. It appears from an inſcription of the year 143, the fifth of his reign, that the ſenate erected a monument to his honour, in conſideration of his great and extraordinary regard for the public ceremonies [x]. As he never admitted any to his friendſhip with whom he was not thoroughly acquainted, he was a moſt conſtant friend, hearkened to no calumnies againſt them, nor entertained any fears or jealouſies, as Adrian had done, who in the end was weary of all his old friends, and diſcharged them with ignominy.

His religion, conſtancy in friendſhip, &c.

His clemency and mildneſs.

He was naturally of a ſweet and mild temper, ever inclined to mercy, which he ſhewed even to the moſt vicious and wicked, chuſing rather to deprive them of the means of doing miſchief, than to puniſh them according to their deſerts. During his long reign of twenty-three years, he is ſaid never to have done any thing that favoured of cruelty, ill-nature, or could give to any perſon whatſoever juſt motive of offence [y]. When he arrived in Aſia, with the character of proconſul, he choſe to lodge the firſt night in the houſe of Polemon the celebrated [w] Idem, ibid. Pauſ. l. viii.

[x] Rein. inſcript. p. 308.

[y] Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 18. Dio, ibid.

ſophiſt, which was the beſt and largeſt in Smyrna. But the proud and unmannerly ſophiſt, who was then in the country, returning home about midnight, and finding the proconſul in his houſe, inſtead of thanking him for the honour he had done him, made ſuch complaints of the liberty he had taken, as the clown was pleaſed to ſtile it, that Antoninus, to quiet him, was obliged to leave the houſe at that time of night, and ſeek for a lodging elſewhere. However, when Antoninus was raiſed to the empire, Polemon did not fail to come to Rome to wait upon him. The emperor received him in a moſt obliging manner, and ordered him to be lodged in the palace; but at the ſame time put him in mind of what had paſſed in Smyrna, by ordering his domeſtics to take care that no one turned him out of his apartment [z]. A comedian complaining to the emperor, that Polemon had driven him out of the theatre at mid-day, Antoninus anſwered, He drove me out of my lodgings at midnight, and nevertheleſs I made no complaints [a]. As M. Aurelius was weeping for the death of one of his preceptors, the courtiers, creatures for the moſt part void of humanity, repreſented to him, that it was beneath a prince to ſhew ſo much tenderneſs and concern; but Antoninus checked them with the following remarkable words; 'Pray let him weep, and give 'him leave to be a man; for neither philoſophy nor the 'imperial dignity ought to extinguiſh in us the ſentiments of Diſſembles affronts.

'nature [b].' The emperor going one day to ſee the fine houſe of Valerius Omulus, and admiring there, amongſt other things, certain pillars of porphyry, he aſked him where he had purchaſed them? But Omulus, inſtead of being pleaſed to ſee the emperor take notice of the ornaments of his houſe, returned him this rude anſwer, 'In other peoples 'houſes you muſt learn to be deaf and dumb [c].' Thus Omulus, who was a man of a ſatirical temper, and given to raillery, treated on this, and ſeveral other occaſions, the good-natured prince, who could not, as he often owned, prevail upon himſelf to puniſh any perſon for bare words, however free and diſobliging. Having ſent for Apollonius, the celebrated ſtoic, who reſided at Chalcis in Syria, to inſtruct M. Aurelius in the principles of that ſect, the the philoſopher flew to Rome, attended by a great number of diſciples, all Argonauts, ſays Lucian [d], gaping after the golden fleece. Upon their arrival, Antoninus invited Apollonius to court, in order to deliver his diſciple to him. The haughty pedant anſwered with great inſolence, that the maſter was not to come to the diſciple, but the diſciple to the maſter; which words being related to Antoninus, 'Does Apollonius then, ſaid he, ſmiling, 'think it a more troubleſome journey from his lodgings to 'the palace, than from Chalcis to Rome?' However, he ordered M. Aurelius to wait upon him [e].

[z] Philos. ſoph. 25. [a] Idem, ibid. [b] Jul. Capit. ibid. [c] Idem, ibid.

T. ANTONINUS was adopted by Adrian, as we have related above, upon the death of Ælius Verus Cæſar. Some authors write, that Adrian was induced to prefer him to ſo many other great men, by the particular reſpect and tender regard which Antoninus ſhewed to his father-in-law, whom, as he was very old and decrepit, he uſed conſtantly to conduct to the ſenate, attending him like a ſlave: Adrian ſeeing him one day leading and ſupporting the old man, was ſo pleaſed with that ſight, that he adopted him for that very reaſon [f]. But Adrian could not by this alone be prompted to confer ſo great an honour upon one, who had given ſo many proofs of his extraordinary talents and ability. He choſe him, therefore, becauſe he judged him to be, of all the great men in Rome, the beſt qualified for the ſovereign power [g]. He was adopted on the twenty-fifth of February of the year 138, and at the ſame time inveſted with the proconſular and tribunitial power, honoured with the name of Cæſar, now peculiar to the preſumptive heir of the empire, and diſtinguiſhed, as we conjecture from ſome antient coins, with the title of emperor [h], which had hitherto been given to none but the ſovereign. We are told, that his ſucceſſion to the empire was preſaged long before by many omens. While he governed part of Italy in quality of proconſul, one from among the croud cried out to him, while he was adminiſtering juſtice, 'May the gods proſper your under-'takings, O Auguſtus!' Upon his arrival in Aſia, the prieſts of the city of Tralles in Lydia received him not What prompted Adrian to adopt him.

His future grandeur preſaged.

[d] Lucian. in vit. Demonact. p. 532. [e] Jul. Cap. p. 23. [f] Idem, p. 17. [g] Dio, l. lxix. p. 796, 797. [h] Goltz. p. 70.

with the uſual ſalutation, Ave, proconſul; Hail proconſul! but ſtyled him emperor. At Cyzicus, a crown belonging to the ſtatue of one of the gods was found upon that of Antoninus, &c. [i] Adrian adopted Antoninus upon condition, that he ſhould adopt M. Annius Verus, the ſon of his wife's brother, and L. Commodus, the ſon of L. Verus Cæſar, which he did accordingly before the death of Adrian, probably the ſame day on which he himſelf was adopted [k]. The next day Antoninus returned the emperor thanks in the ſenate for the honour he had conferred upon him, diſtributed large ſums among the ſoldiery and populace, employing on this occaſion his own, and not the public, money; and beſides, paid what Adrian had promiſed them. All the cities of the empire uſed, on ſuch occaſions, to preſent the adopted prince with ſums of money inſtead of crowns, which were thence called aurum coronarium. Theſe ſums the generous prince remitted entirely to the cities of Italy, and a moiety to all the reſt. He even contributed out of his private fortune a great deal towards the works which Adrian was carrying on, and obeyed that prince, ſo long as he lived, with as much reſpect and ſubmiſſion as the meaneſt of his ſubjects, except when he attempted to murder himſelf, or others [l]. Adrian dying at Baiæ, on the tenth of July, he prevailed upon the ſenate, much againſt their will, to confer ſuch honours upon him as had been decreed to the beſt of emperors, and continued all thoſe in their employments, who had been preferred by him. It was according to ſome writers, on account of this tender and filial reſpect for the memory of his father, that the ſenate decreed him the glorious ſurname of Pius. Others think, that they diſtinguiſhed him with that title in regard of the great care he had of his father-in-law in his old age, or of Adrian in his ſickneſs, or becauſe he ſaved many whom Adrian had commanded to be murdered, or finally, on account of the natural ſweetneſs of his temper, and the extraordinary reſpect he ſhewed on all occaſions for religion and all religious perſons [m]. Be that as it will, he bears the epithet

His generoſity.

He cauſes Adrian to be ranked among the gods.

Why honoured with the title of pius.

[i] Jul. Cap. p. 8. [k] Spart. in Adr. p. 12. Jul. Cap. p. 16. Dio, p. 797. [l] Jul. Cap. p. 18. [m] Idem, p. 17. Pauſ. l. viii. p. 275. Dio, l. lxx. p. 799.

thet of Pius in ſeveral medals of this very year, and is chiefly known by it in hiſtory [n]. Pauſanias thinks he deſerved not only this title, but that likewiſe which was given to Cyrus, viz. the father of mankind, in conſideration of the paternal care he ſeemed to have of all men [o]. Commodus, and the emperors who ſucceeded him, aſſumed the ſame title; which ſerved only to render their wickedneſs the more remarkable [p]. This year Antoninus was likewiſe honoured with the title of Auguſtus and of high pontiff, and his wife Fauſtina with that of Auguſta. He refuſed many other honours which the ſenate offered him, and among the reſt the title of the father of his country [q]; which, however, he accepted the following year [r]. We are told, that Antoninus, in the beginning of his reign, ordered the pro-conſul of Africa to conſult the goddeſs Cœleſtis, who was worſhipped at Carthage, about his ſucceſſors and the ſtate of the empire; and that the pretended deity, after having uttered, like other oracles, many things obſcure and unintelligible, repeated the name of Antoninus eight times; whence it was concluded, that Antoninus ſhould reign eight years. But as he reigned near twenty-three, another conſtruction was long after put upon the oracle, viz. that eight emperors ſhould reign bearing the name of Antoninus; which interpretation we ſhall examine in the reign of the emperor Opilius Macrinus.

Honours conferred upon him by the ſenate.

WE know but very little of the actions of this great prince, and are almoſt quite at a loſs as to the order of them, with reſpect to what we know. Julius Capitolinus, who wrote his life, and inſcribed it to the emperor Diocleſian, is but a very indifferent hiſtorian, and greatly confuſed and perplexed in his accounts. What Dion Caſſius wrote of Antoninus has been loſt eight hundred years ſince, and conſequently before Xiphilin undertook the epitomizing of that author; ſo that we can only give our readers a general idea of this excellent prince's government and conduct. He lived, according to Julius Capitolinus, after his acceſſion to the empire, in the ſame manner as he had lived while he was yet a private perſon; no alteration appeared in his behaviour towards his [n] Spanh. l. viii. p. 714.

[o] Pauſ. l. viii. p. 275.
[p] Idem, ibid.
[q] Dio, l. lxx. p. 799. Jul. Cap. p. 18. Goltz. p. 71.
[r] Jul. Cap. in Macrino.

His extraordinary respect for the senatorial and equestrian orders.

his friends, nor had any of his enemies ever the least motive to be grieved for his preferment. He would suffer none but slaves to wait upon him, shewing on all occasions the greatest respect imaginable for the equestrian and senatorial orders. He never transacted any business of consequence without the advice of the senate, paying them, when emperor, that regard which he desired to see paid to them by other emperors while he was a senator. He frequently gave an account, even to the people, of all his actions and negotiations. When he demanded the consulship, or other employments, either for himself or his children, he appeared like a private person among other candidates; which shews, that he allowed the people, according to their antient right, to chuse the magistrates. M. Aurelius owns, that Antoninus convinced him by his example, that one might lead a private life even in a court. He moderated most of the imposts and

He lessens the tributes.

tributes, and strictly enjoined his receivers and collectors to exact them without any severity or oppression, saying, that he chose rather to be poor, than have his coffers filled at the expence of an oppressed people. He was no sooner raised to the empire, than he disposed of the greatest part of his private estate in favour of the indigent citizens; and the empress Faustina repining at his generosity, he told her; That a prince ought to have no private interest, no private property, and nothing in view but the Prefers only men of merit.

public welfare. He chose for governors of provinces such as were persons of known integrity, and is said never to have preferred an undeserving man to any employment whatsoever. Hence some continued in their posts during the whole time of his reign; for he was not for removing such as discharged their office to the satisfaction of the people, unless they themselves desired it, as did Orfitus governor of Rome, and some others. Gavius Maximus was for the space of twenty years captain of the prætorian guards; and others held their employments during the whole time of his reign. His paternal estate, which was very great, he laid out in bounties and largesses; but was very sparing of the public money; whence at his death his private coffers were found empty, but the exchequer full. He deprived several useless persons of the pensions which had been settled upon them by Adrian, saying, he could not bear to see the state devoured by those who were no-ways serviceable to it, but lived in idleness upon

Takes care of the public revenues.

the

the labours of others. Among thoſe whom he thus treated, was Meſomedes, a lyric poet, whom Adrian had rewarded with a yearly penſion on account of ſome verſes in praiſe of his beloved Antinous. Tho' he was thus ſparing of the public money, yet no one ever charged him with avarice; for he gave daily inſtances of an unbounded generoſity. He would accept of no legacies from ſuch as had children, and ordered the eſtates of thoſe who had been condemned for extortion, to be reſtored to their children, after the perſons, whom they had pillaged, had been fully ſatisfied. Under no prince fewer eſtates were confiſcated than under him. He utterly extirpated the whole tribe of informers, and was ready, upon the leaſt misfortune that happened to any city or province, to leſſen their tribute and taxes [t]. Many obtained the privileges of Roman citizens for themſelves, and not for their children, who, in that caſe, remained Greeks, according to the expreſſion of an antient hiſtorian, and conſequently were incapable of enjoying their fathers eſtates, which fell to the exchequer, if the deceaſed had no Roman citizen amongſt his relations. But this regulation, favourable indeed, to the avarice of princes, but repugnant to humanity, Antoninus utterly aboliſhed [w]. He beſtowed great privileges and ſalaries in all the provinces of the empire upon ſuch men of learning as undertook the educating of youth; maintained incredible numbers of children, whoſe parents were indigent; ſupplied all the ſenators and magiſtrates with large ſums to defray the expences of their neceſſary journies, and ſpent conſiderable ſums in ſhews and ſpectacles, complying therein with the inclinations of the people, tho' he himſelf had an utter averſion to ſuch diverſions. Tho' he was no-ways addicted to building, yet he raiſed a great number of ſtately edifices at Rome, and in the neighbourhood. He cauſed a port to be made at Caieta, now Gaeta; repaired that of Terracina; finiſhed Adrian's magnificent mauſoleum; built a ſtately palace at Lorium in Hetruria, about ten miles from Rome, in which place he had been educated; and contributed large ſums towards the repairing of ſeveral antient buildings in Greece, Ionia, Syria, and Africa. The village of Pallantium in Arcadia was by him made a city, and exempted from all manner of tribute, becauſe Evander was ſuppoſed to have built, and peopled Inſtances of his equity.

Favours men of learning.

His public works.

[t] Jul. Cap. p. 20——30.

[w] Pauſan. l. viii. p. 273.

pled with the inhabitants of that village, a city in the place where Rome ſtood [x]. He promiſed, in the beginning of his reign, to ſpill the blood of no ſenator; which promiſe he obſerved ſo religiouſly, that one being convicted of parricide, he contented himſelf with baniſhing him, even after he had owned his crime, to a deſert iſland. Attilius Tatianus and Priſcianus being accuſed of conſpiring againſt the life of the emperor, the latter laid violent hands on himſelf, and the former was only baniſhed. Of his ſon Antoninus took particular care, and brought him up as if he had been his own child. He would ſuffer no enquiry to be made after their accomplices, anſwering the ſenate, when they preſſed him to it, I do not care the world ſhould know by how many perſons I am hated. He never engaged in any war which he could avoid, and was often heard to ſay, that he had rather ſave one citizen, than deſtroy a thouſand enemies. By this means he gained the affections, not only of his own people, who looked upon him as their father and protector, but likewiſe of the declared enemies of Rome, who entertained ſuch an opinion of his equity, juſtice and moderation, that in their diſputes they choſe him for their judge and arbitrator; and truly no Roman emperor was ever more eſteemed and revered by all foreign nations than Antoninus. The king of the Parthians, having raiſed a formidable army and invaded Armenia, retired, contrary to the expectation of all, and diſbanded his troops upon the receipt of a letter from Antoninus. The kings of Hyrcania, Bactria, and India, ſent embaſſadors to him, courting his friendſhip, and deſiring his alliance. Pharaſmanes king of Iberia came in perſon to wait upon him at Rome, and ſhewed a far greater reſpect and veneration for him, than he had formerly done for Adrian. The Lazi, the Armenians, the Quadi, and ſeveral other nations, readily received ſuch princes as he was pleaſed to appoint over them, tho' they were not then ſubject to the empire [y]. Antoninus is by ſome hiſtorians compared, by others even preferred, to Numa, on account of the tranquillity which Rome enjoyed during the greateſt part of his reign, and his extraordinary care of all things belonging to the worſhip

Promiſes to put no ſenator to death, and obſerves his promiſe.

Is eſteemed even by the enemies of Rome.

[x] Jul. Cap. p. 17—20. Pauſan. l. viii. p. 273. [y] Jul. Cap. p. 20. Birag. p. 194. Spart. l. ix. p. 831, 832.

ſhip of the gods and to religion. Julius Capitolinus tells us, that he was by perſons of all ranks revered to ſuch a degree, that neither the people nor ſoldiery could for the ſpace of an hundred years and upwards, look upon any one as truly emperor, who did not bear the name of Antoninus; which was therefore aſſumed by all his ſucceſſors during a whole century: nay, Severus appointed, that the name of Antoninus ſhould be peculiar to the emperors, like that of Auguſtus [z]; ſo great was the veneration he had for Antoninus! That great name was indeed profaned and diſhonoured by Antoninus Caracalla; but nevertheleſs reſpected to ſuch a degree, even after his reign, that the emperor Macrinus obliged his ſon Diadumenus to aſſume it, fearing the ſoldiers would not acknowledge him emperor, unleſs diſtinguiſhed by that ſtill venerable name [a].

And revered by all ranks of men.

ADRIAN died, as we have related above, on the 10th of July 138, Camerinus and Niger being conſuls. Theſe were ſucceeded by the emperor Antoninus, the ſecond time conſul and Caius Bruttius Præſens. This year Antoninus gave his daughter Annia Fauſtina in marriage to M. Aurelius, whom he created Cæſar, and at the requeſt of the ſenate, tho' this year only quæſtor, named for the conſulate of the year enſuing; which he diſcharged with him, as appears from an antient inſcription on a monument raiſed to the honour of M. Aurelius by the two captains of the prætorian guards, Petronius Mamertinus and Gavius Maximus, and by the other officers of the ten prætorian cohorts, and the city-guards [b]. In another inſcription, which antiquaries take to be of this year, Antoninus is ſtyled the benefactor and preſerver of the city of Mopſueſtia, for having maintained the inhabitants in the poſſeſſion of their antient rights and privileges [c]. From a third inſcription we learn, that Antoninus ended this year an aqueduct, which had been begun by Adrian at New Athens in the iſland of Delos [d]. The next conſuls were M. Peducæus Siloga and T. Hoenius Severus [e], during whoſe adminiſtration one Celſus revolted; but all we know of his revolt is, that on this occaſion the empreſs Fauſtina was greatly diſpleaſed with the kindneſs which the good-natured emperor ſhewed to his enemies [f]. Soon after Fauſtina died, and was, notwithſtanding the diſſolute Marries his daughter Fauſtina to M. Aurelius.

The empreſs Fauſtina dies, and is ranked among the gods.

[z] Spart. in Geta. p. 90. [a] Idem in Diad. [b] Grut. p. 258. [c] Onuph. p. 225. [d] Idem, p. 224. [e] Cuſpin. p. 353. Onuph. in faſt. p. 225. [f] Coſſ. vit. per Vulcat. p. 43.

diſſolute life ſhe had led, at the requeſt of Antoninus, honoured with divine worſhip, prieſts, temples, ſtatues of gold and ſilver, &c. Games were inſtituted to her honour, and her ſtatue was, by Antoninus's order, carried amongſt thoſe of the other gods at the Circenſian ſports. The emperor was not unacquainted with her irregular conduct; but had done all that lay in his power to keep her diſorders concealed from the multitude [g]. The following year, L. Cuſpius Rufinus and L. Statius Quadratus being conſuls, Antoninus inſtituted ſolemn ſports at Puteoli, in honour of Adrian, which where ſtyled Pia or Pialia, and were to be celebrated the ſecond year of each olympiad [h]. The next conſuls were C. Bellicius Torquatus and Tiberius Claudius Atticus Herodes. The latter, who is greatly cried up by Aulus Gellius [i] and Philoſtratus [k], was a native of Athens, and the moſt eloquent orator of his time. He had an extraordinary talent at making ſpeeches off-hand; but not having ſucceeded as he expected in one which he had made, while we was yet a youth, before the emperor Adrian, he attempted to drown himſelf in the Danube. He inſtructed M. Aurelius and L. Verus in the Greek tongue, and was greatly eſteemed by Antoninus, who appointed him governor of the free cities of Aſia. He died in the fifteenth year of the reign of Marcus Aurelius, and 176th of the chriſtian æra, and left behind him many ſpeeches, letters, and other works, none of which have reached our times. In the following conſulſhip of Lollianus Avitus and Claudius Maximus, the Brigantes in Britain revolted; but were ſoon reduced by Lollius Urbicus governor of that province, who deprived them of great part of their country, ſubdued the more northern nations, and built a new wall between the friths of Forth and Clyde [l]. For the victories gained by Lollius, Antoninus was honoured, as appears from ſome antient medals, with the title of Britannicus [m]. The next year Antoninus entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having for his collegue M. Aurelius Cæſar, the ſecond time conſul, and gave the manly robe to Lucius Verus his adopted ſon, who had ended the fourteenth year of his age on the fifteenth of December of the preceding year.

Atticus Herodes is raiſed to the conſulſhip.

The Brigantes revolt and are reduced.

[g] Jul. Cap. p. 18. [h] Idem, p. 13. Pagi, p. 211.
[i] Aul. Gel. l. ix. c. 2. [k] Philoſt. ſoph. xxvii. [l] Vide Alford. annal. Britan. ad ann. 142. Uſſer. Britan. eccleſ. antiq. p. 1024. [m] Vide Caſaub. in Spart. p. 50.

year. He imitated therein Auguſtus, who had taken upon him the conſular dignity when he gave the manly robe to his adopted children Caius and Lucius Cæſars. The ſame year Antoninus conſecrated the temple which he had built to the honour of Adrian, and on that occaſion diſtributed conſiderable ſums among the populace [n]. In the next conſulſhip of Sex. Erucius Clarus and Cn. Claudius Severus, ſome diſturbances were raiſed in Germany and Dacia; but were ſoon compoſed by the governors of thoſe provinces. The Alani likewiſe, attempting to invade the Roman dominions, were driven back into their own country with no ſmall loſs [o]. During the adminiſtration of the following conſuls Largus and Meſſalinus, the emperor inveſted M. Aurelius with the tribunitial power. By Fauſtina, the daughter of Antoninus, he had already a daughter named Lucilla, who was afterwards married to L. Verus. The emperor on all occaſions ſhewed a particular eſteem for M. Aurelius, conſulted him in all affairs of moment, often followed his advice, and ſuffered him to govern as if he had been his partner in the ſovereign power, giving no ear to the malicious inſinuations of thoſe who attempted to eſtrange his mind from the young prince, as if he wiſhed for his death [p]. As the conduct of L. Verus was very different from that of M. Aurelius, the emperor treated him in a quite different manner, not beſtowing upon him either the title of Cæſar, or any other peculiar to the apparent heir of the empire; nay, he did not, during the whole time of his reign, inveſt him with any power whatſoever; which was a plain indication, that he diſliked him, and not without reaſon, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, and only ſuffered him, becauſe he had been obliged by Adrian to adopt him [q]. This year, being by the Romans reckoned the nine hundredth of their city, the ſecular games were celebrated by Antoninus with extraordinary pomp and magnificence [r]. In the conſulate of Torquatus and Julianus, the Moors took up arms, upon what provocation we know not, but were utterly defeated, driven quite out of their own country, and obliged to ſhelter themſelves in the moſt diſtant parts of Libya beyond mount Atlas [s]. The three following years were quite barren of events. In the firſt Servius Scipio Orfitus and Q. Nonius Priſcus were conſuls; in Shews a great eſteem for M. Aurelius.

But none for L. Verus.

[n] Jul. Cap. p. 36.
[o] Idem, p. 19.
[p] Idem, p. 24.
[q] Idem in Ver. p. 36.
[r] Aur. Vict. & Noris. epiſt. conſ.
[s] Pauſan. l. viii. p. 273.

in the ſecond Glabrio Gallicanus and Vetus; and in the third Quintilius Condianus and Quintilius Maximus. The two latter were brothers, and are mightily cried up by the antients, on account of their learning, their experience in both civil and military affairs, their wealth, and, above all, in regard of their mutual unity and concord; for they acted on all occaſions, ſays Dion Caſſius, as if they had not been two, but one perſon: whence they are known in hiſtory by the name of Quintilii. They governed the provinces together, the one being lieutenant to the other; were conſuls together; wrote to the emperor, received anſwers, judged cauſes, publiſhed books, in common, and were in the end unjuſtly condemned and executed together by order of the emperor Commodus, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of that prince's reign [t]. They were natives of Troas, and highly eſteemed by M. Aurelius, under whom they governed Greece in 173, and Pannonia in 178. They publiſhed a treatiſe on agriculture, whereof ſome fragments have reached our times [u].

The two brothers Quintilii.

The following year, the fifteenth of Antoninus's reign, Sextus Junius Glabrio and C. Omullus Verianus being conſuls, that eminent champion of the chriſtian religion, Juſtin the martyr, publiſhed his firſt apology, and preſented it to the emperor, to his adopted ſons, and to the ſenate. As Antoninus was a prince of a mild diſpoſition, he was ſo far moved by it, and by the informations which he had received from other parts of the empire, that he wrote a letter to the whole province of Aſia in favour of the diſtreſſed chriſtians, which he concluded with theſe words;

Antoninus favourable to the chriſtians

"If any one for the future ſhall moleſt the chriſtians, and "accuſe them merely on account of their religion, let the "perſon who is arraigned be diſcharged, tho' he is found to "be a chriſtian, and the accuſer be puniſhed according to "the rigor of the law [w]." At the ſame time the emperor wrote in behalf of the chriſtians to the Athenians, Theſſalonians, Lariſſeans in Theſſaly, and to all the Greeks [x]. Theſe letters put a ſtop to the perſecution; which however broke out anew, and raged with great violence under Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus's ſucceſſor, as we ſhall relate hereafter. The following year, when C. Bruttius Præſens and Several calamities.

[t] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 814. Caſaub. in Spart. p. 94. Philoſt. ſophiſt. xxvii. [u] Vide Caſaub. in Spart. p. 94. [w] Euſeb. l. iv. c. 26. Juſt. apol. p. 100. Chron. Alex. p. 608, 610.
[x] Euſeb. ibid. & l. iv. c. 13.

and A. Junius Rufinus were conſuls, the Tiber, overflowing its banks, laid the lower parts of Rome under water. The inundation was followed by a fire, which conſumed part of the city, and a famine, which ſwept off great numbers of the citizens, notwithſtanding the care which the good-natured emperor took to have corn conveyed to the city from the moſt diſtant provinces. The ſame year the cities of Narbonne in Gaul, and Antioch in Syria, and the great ſquare at Carthage were in great part conſumed by accidental fire; but ſoon reſtored by Antoninus to their former condition [y]. This year L. Verus diſcharged the office of quæſtor, and exhibited on that occaſion public ſhews, at which he preſided, ſitting between Antoninus and M. Aurelius. The following year he was raiſed to the conſulſhip, and had for his collegue T. Sextius, or, as he is called by others, Sextilius Lateranus. C. Julius Severus and M. Rufinus Sabinianus diſcharged that office next, and were ſucceeded by M. Ceionius Silvanus and C. Serius Augurinus, during whoſe conſulſhip the cities of Cos and Rhodes, with ſeveral others in Lycia and Caria, were overturned by a violent earthquake; but ſoon reſtored to their former luſtre, Antoninus contributing thereunto immenſe ſums, and making good the loſſes which the inhabitants had ſuſtained [z]. The four following years are quite barren of events: the conſuls were Barbarus and Regulus; Tertullus and Sacerdos; Plautius Quintillus and M. Statius Priſcus; Appius Annius Bradua and T. Vibius Bradus. The two latter were ſucceeded by M. Aurelius Cæſar the third time, and L. Verus the ſecond time, conſul. During their adminiſtration, the emperor was ſeized with a violent favour at Lorium, one of his country-ſeats, which in a few days put an end to his life on the ſeventh of March, after he had lived ſeventy-three years, five months, and ſixteen or ſeventeen days, and reigned twenty-two years, ſeven months and twenty-ſix days. When he found death approaching, he ſent for the captains of the prætorian guards, and the chief officers of the court, and in their preſence confirmed his adoption of M. Aurelius, and recommended to him the empire, without taking the leaſt notice of L. Verus. He then ordered the golden image of Fortune, which always ſtood in the emperor's bed-chamber, to be removed to the room of M. Aurelius. When the tribune came for

Is taken ill and dies.

[y] Jul. Cap. p. 20. Vict. epit. [z] Jul. Cap. p. 21.

for the parole, the word he gave him was equanimity. He left his paternal eſtate to his daughter, and legacies to all his friends and domeſtics. Though he died in an advanced age, he was no leſs lamented by all the ſubjects of the empire, than if he had been ſnatched from them in the bloom of his youth [a]. His funeral was performed with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, and his body depoſited in the pompous mauſoleum of his predeceſſor Adrian; on which occaſion two funeral orations were pronounced; one by M. Aurelius, and another by L. Verus. He was by the ſenate ranked among the gods, a temple was built to his honour, prieſts, ſacrifices, and annual ſports inſtituted, &c. [b] Gordianus, who aſſumed the title of Auguſtus at Carthage in the year 237, wrote in his youth an elegant poem, intituled Antoninades, deſcribing the lives, the wars, the public and private actions of Antoninus and his ſucceſſor M. Aurelius, named likewiſe Antoninus; but that work has not reached our times. Some ſpeeches were publiſhed under the name of Antoninus, which Marius Maximus maintained to be his, though they were commonly thought to have been written by others [d]. Of the writers who flouriſhed under him, we ſhall ſpeak in our note (E).

He is univerſally lamented.

A P

[a] Idem p. 22. [b] Idem ibid. [c] Idem in Gord.
[d] Idem in Anton. p. 21.

(E) Theſe were Juſtin, Julius Paulus, Appian, Callinicus Sutorius, Calviſius Taurus, Apollonius, Ptolemy the aſtrologer, Fronto, Telephus, and Claudius Maximus. Juſtin is thought to have inſcribed his abridgment of Trogus Pompeius to the emperor Antoninus Pius. That writer in an antient manuſcript, is ſtyled M. Junianus Juſtinus. His work was known to St. Jerom, St. Auſtin, and Oroſius, who often copies him. Some have confounded Juſtin the hiſtorian with Juſtin the martyr, who flouriſhed about the ſame time; but never publiſhed any work in the Latin tongue, not even the apologies which he wrote at Rome, and preſented to the emperor. Trogus Pompeius, whoſe hiſtory Juſtin abridged, is ranked among the beſt hiſtorians of Auguſtus's reign, and put upon the level with Livy, Salluſt and Tacitus (61). Julius Paulus publiſhed ſeveral poetical pieces, and is commended by Aulus Gellius, on account of his great erudition and probity. He lived in Gellius's time, but died before that grammarian began to (61) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. c. 19. & 23.

to write: whence he is thought to have flouriſhed under Adrian and Antoninus (62). Appian, who wrote the Roman hiſtory in Greek, was a native of Alexandria, pleaded ſome time at Rome, and was afterwards employed by the emperors to take care of their private eſtates and revenues (63). He lived in the reign of Trajan, Adrian and Antoninus, and wrote in the year 900. of Rome, the tenth of Adrian's reign (64). His Roman hiſtory is, properly ſpeaking, a ſeparate and diſtinct hiſtory of all the nations ſubject to Rome, from the earlieſt times to the reign of Auguſtus, tho' he ſometimes carries it down to the time of Adrian (65). He ſpeaks of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem under Adrian, as happening in his time (66). His hiſtory of the wars of Africa, Syria, Parthia, Pontus, Iberia, Spain, Illyricum, and of Hannibal and Mithridates, with five books of the civil wars, of which he wrote ſeven, have reached us; and beſides, ſome fragments of ſeveral other hiſtories copied by M. Valois from the collections of Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus. He likewiſe wrote the hiſtory of the wars of Judæa, and of that which Trajan waged with the Dacians (67). Photius admires the elegance of his ſtyle, but chiefly commends him as an unbiaſſed writer, and one who, in his accounts, aimed moſtly at truth (68). He borrowed many things of Polybius and Plutarch, whom he often copies (69). Scaliger is of opinion, that many things unworthy of ſo great an hiſtorian have been, by the ignorant tranſcribers, inſerted into his hiſtory of Syria. His plan, which was to write the hiſtory of Rome, and all the provinces of the empire, was much admired by Evagrius (70). Callinicus Sutorius was a native of Petra in Arabia; but ſpent moſt part of his life at Athens. He wrote the hiſtory of Alexandria in ten books, quoted by St. Jerom (71), and publiſhed ſeveral other pieces on various ſubjects (72). Some fragments in Greek by one Callinicus, publiſhed by Leo Allatius, are aſcribed by Voſſius to Callinicus Sutorius (73). But Jonſſius ſuppoſes Callinicus Sutorius to have flouriſhed in the time of the emperor Gallienus, to whom, and not to Galen the celebrated phyſician, he inſcribed, in his opinion, one of his works (74). Calviſius Taurus is often mentioned by Aulus Gellius, who went to hear him while he inſtructed the Athenian youth in the

(62) Aul. Gel. l. i. c. 92. l. v. c. 4. l. xvi. c. 10. l. xix. c. 7. Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 52. (63) Appian in Syr. Suid. p. 353. (64) Appian. p. 7. (65) Idem. p. 4. Evagr. l. vi. c. 24. (66) Appian in Syr. p. 83. (67) Idem ibid. p. 10. Phot. c. 57. (68) Phot. ibid. (69) Voſſ. Hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 13. (70) Evag. l. vi. c. 24. (71) Hier. in Dan. (72) Suid p. 1360. (73) Voſſ. ibid. (74) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 9.

the principles of the Platonic philoſophy (75). He was a native of Tyre, according to Philoſtratus; but, according to Suidas (76), and Euſebius (77), of Berytus. He publiſhed ſeveral works, one among the reſt ſhewing the difference between the doctrine of Plato and that of Ariſtotle. Aulus Gellius quotes a treatiſe written by him on anger, and the firſt book of his comments upon Plato's Gorgias (78). The ſame writer commends him on account of his abſtinence; for he lived chiefly upon lentils (79). Telephus, who inſtructed L. Verus in the Greek tongue, was born in Pergamus, and wrote a book on the rhetoric of Homer, another on the perfect agreement between that poet and Plato; the lives of ſuch poets as had written comedies or tragedies; inſtructions on the choice of books; a deſcription of Pergamus, with the hiſtory of its kings and laws; an account of the laws and cuſtoms of Athens; and a collection of epithets (80). Claudius Maximus was by birth a Tyrian, and one of M. Aurelius's preceptors whom he inſtructed in the principles of the Stoics. He publiſhed ſeveral philoſophical pieces, and diſcourſes on the Platonic philoſophy, which have reached our times, and are deſervedly eſteemed by the learned. Some writers are of opinion, that he was conſul in the year 144, the ſeventh of Antoninus's reign, and afterwards proconſul of Africa (81). We have already mentioned Apollonius the Stoic, who was another of M. Aurelius's preceptors, and whom that prince went frequently to hear, even after he was raiſed to the empire. Moſt writers aſcribe to him a work mentioned by Photius, wherein the author gives an account of illuſtrious women, of ſuch eſpecially as had applied themſelves to the ſtudy of philoſophy (82). Ptolemy, the celebrated aſtrologer and geographer, flouriſhed under Adrian and Antoninus. He made his laſt aſtronomical obſervation on a Wedneſday, the ſecond of February in the year 141, the fourth of Antoninus's reign; but nevertheleſs Suidas ſuppoſes him to have lived to the reign of M. Aurelius, and gives us a catalogue of his works. His geography is greatly commended by the antients; but we are told, that ſome of the manuſcript copies of that work are very different from the printed copies (83). Suidas writes, that he was born in Alexandria; but Voſſius maintains, that he was a native of Peluſium, and ſuppoſed to have been an Alexandrian, becauſe he made his aſtronomical obſervations in that city (84). Sulpitius Apollinaris, a celebrated grammarian, is often mentioned by Aulus Gellius, who ſeems to have entertained a great great opinion of him (85). He left ſome letters and ſome grammatical writings, wherein he found fault with another grammarian, by name Cæſellius Vindex (86). Some of his obſervations upon Terence have reached our times (87). M. Cornelius Fronto is cried up by the antients, as one of the beſt orators of his age, and by ſome put upon the level with Cicero. Aulus Gellius tells us, that he never viſited him, which he did frequently while he was very young, without profiting much by his inſtructions (88). In Adrian's time he paſſed for the moſt eloquent orator of that age, and was afterwards appointed by Antoninus to teach M. Aurelius and L. Verus the Latin eloquence. M. Aurelius valued him above all his preceptors, cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to him in Rome, and honoured him with the conſular dignity (89). St. Jerom ſtyles him an illuſtrious orator (90); and Sidonius ſpeak of him as the author of a particular kind of diction, more grave and leſs flouriſhed, than that of the antient orators (91). He publiſhed ſeveral harangues, one of which, againſt Pelops, was highly eſteemed, and preferred to all the reſt (92). Soſipater Chariſius publiſhed ſome letters of his, and other writings, on the propriety of words, in the collection of authors who have written on the Latin tongue (93). Sidonius commends one Leo, a man of great rank in the fifth century, for adopting the ſtyle of Fronto, from whom he was deſcended (94). We read in Minucius Felix, that one Fronto, a native of Cirtha in Numidia, publiſhed ſome diſcourſes againſt the Chriſtians, which were in great requeſt about the beginning of the third century (95). Theſe diſcourſes are by ſome able critics, aſcribed to Fronto the orator.

(75) Aul. Gel. l. xviii. c. 10. (76) Suid. p. 871. (77) Euſeb. in Chron. (78) Aul. Gel. l. i. c. 26. l. vi. c. 14. (79) Idem, l. xvii. c. 8. (80) Suid. p. 897 (81) Vide P. Pagi p. 144. (82) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 9. Phot. p. 161. Spanh. p. 53. (83) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 17. Cyp. diſput. append. c. 15. (84) Voſſ. ibid.

(85) Aul. Gel. l. iv. c. 17. l. xiii c. 17. &c. (86) Aul. Gel. l. vi. c. 6. l. xx. c. 6. l. xiii. c. 19. &c. (87) Vide Calviſ. an. 163. (88) Gell. l. ii. c. 26. (89) Jul. Cap. in Aurel. p. 23. (90) Hier. in chron. (91) Sid. l. i. epiſt. 1. l. iv. epiſt. 3. (92) Sid. l. viii. ep. 10. (93) Vide Caſaub. in Spart. M. Aur. (94) Sid. l. viii. epiſt. 3. (95) Min. Fel, p. 8.

APPENDIX.

A succinct account of the persecution of the Jews at Alexandria, and of Philo's embassy to the emperor Caius Caligula.

THE present account having, through mistake, been omitted in the reign of Caligula, its proper place, the reader, we hope, will overlook that involuntary omission, and not take it amiss, that we supply it here; the persecution of the Jews at Alexandria, the embassy of Philo to Caius, and the audience he had of that prince, being too remarkable incidents to be passed over in silence.

THIS dreadful persecution happened in the second year of the reign of the emperor Caligula and 39th of the Christian æra, while Egypt was governed by a Roman knight, named Avillius Flaccus, to whose base connivance it was chiefly owing. Flaccus had governed that province with great reputation, during the five last years of the reign of Tiberius, who had a particular value and kindness for him. But, upon the death of that prince and the accession of Caligula to the empire, he changed his conduct, grew remiss in the administration of justice, and made it his whole study to gain the affections of the people of Alexandria, hoping by that means to recommend himself to the favour of the new emperor, whose resentment he dreaded; and indeed not without reason, for he was no friend to the family of Germanicus, and was generally thought to have contributed to the disgrace and death of Agrippina, the mother of Caligula. Three crafty Egyptians, Dionysius, Lampo, and Isidorus, Avillius Flaccus courts the favour of the Alexandrians.

Iſidorus, who had been declared enemies of Flaccus, while he ruled with due ſeverity, being appriſed of his fears, remonſtrated to him, under colour of friendſhip, that the ſureſt means of winning the hearts of the Alexandrians was, to withdraw his protection from the Jews, of whom many thouſands lived in Alexandria, and to abandon them to the mercy of the Egyptians, who had ever borne an irreconcileable hatred to the Jewiſh nation. This counſel Flaccus readily embraced, well knowing that it would not diſpleaſe the emperor, whoſe hatred the Jews had provoked, by refuſing to acknowledge his pretended divinity. Beſides, Flaccus was of himſelf, it ſeems, no friend to the Jewiſh nation: for that people having the year before, in the firſt month of Caligula's reign, decreed him all the honours which were conſiſtent with their religion, and conſigned the decree to Flaccus, that, by his means, it might be conveyed to the emperor, he, inſtead of tranſmitting it to Rome, as he promiſed to do, ſuppreſſed it; which was doing them the greateſt unkindneſs imaginable, and drawing upon them the reſentment of a cruel and ambitious prince [a]. In the mean time, Agrippa, who had been ſet at liberty by Caligula, and declared king of the tetrarchy, which his uncle Philip had held, with the addition of that of Lyſanias, as we have related in our hiſtory of the Jews [b], arriving from Rome at Alexandria, on his journey to his new kingdom, was inſulted by the populace of that metropolis in a moſt outrageous manner, tho', to avoid the concourſe of people, he had entered the city by night [c]. As Flaccus winked at theſe inſults, inſtead of reſtraining them, the rabble grew more outrageous; and aſſembling in crouds, began, with great tumult and uproar, to demand, that the ſtatues of Caius might be placed in the Jewiſh oratories, or places of prayer, of which there were many in Alexandria, and all over Egypt. Flaccus not offering to oppoſe, but ſeeming rather to approve, the deſign, the rabble thronged immediately to the oratories, cut down the groves and trees about them, levelled ſome of them with the ground, and ſet fire to others; which, together with oratories, conſumed ſeveral noble monuments erected by the emperors in honour of the Jews, and a great many adjoining houſes. Such oratories as the rioters could not demoliſh,

Is no friend to the Jews.

King Agrippa inſulted by the people of Alexandria.

They deſtroy the oratories of the Jews, or profane them with the emperor's ſtatues.

[a] Phil. in Flacc. p. 968—1009. edit. Pariſ. 1640.

[b] Hiſt. Univerſ. vol. x. p. 552.

[c] Ibid. note P.

moliſh, becauſe the Jews, who lived near them, were very numerous, they profaned, by placing in them the emperor's ſtatues. In the largeſt of them all they erected a ſtatue of braſs, repreſenting Caius, in a chariot drawn by four horſes, which had been formerly conſecrated to Cleopatra, the great grand-mother of the laſt queen of that name. They did not, as Philo obſerves, ſhew great reſpect to Caius, in dedicating to him what had been formerly dedicated to a woman. But the merit, on which they laid the chief ſtreſs, was their encreaſing the number of temples conſecrated to this pretended deity, tho' even in that they did not ſo much regard his honour, as the ſatisfying of their own hatred to the Jews. The Alexandrians took care to acquaint the emperor with the tranſactions of each day, who is ſaid to have read their accounts with incredible ſatisfaction, partly becauſe he hated the Jews, and partly becauſe he believed the Alexandrians chiefly actuated, in afflicting the Jews, by a ſincere zeal for his honour [d]. The example of Alexandria was followed by all the other cities of Egypt; in which province there were at this time a million of Jews, and a vaſt number of oratories, of which the largeſt and moſt beautiful were ſtyled ſynagogues [e]. They were all demoliſhed, conſumed by fire, or prophaned with the emperor's ſtatues. A few days after the Jews had been thus ſtript of their oratories, Flaccus publiſhed an edict, declaring all the Jews aliens at Alexandria, without allowing them time to make good their claim to the rights of citizens, which they had long enjoyed undiſturbed [f]. The Jews who were never famous for bearing injuries with patience, when they could prevent or revenge them, made in all likelihood, ſome efforts towards the maintaining of their rights; which, though Philo has not thought fit to mention them, gave probably occaſion to greater diſorders. For the Alexandrians, conſidering them as men abandoned by the emperor to their mercy, laid hold of this opportunity to vent their rage upon a people whom they had ever abhorred, and looked upon as enemies to the reſt of mankind. The city of Alexandria was at that time divided into five quarters, which took their names from the five firſt letters of the alphabet. In each of Flaccus declares the Jews aliens of Alexandria,

[d] Phil. legat. c. 9. in Flacc. p. 972, 973.

[e] Euſeb. chron. p. 27, 28.

[f] Philo of theſe ſome Jews dwelt, but two were almoſt entirely peopled by them, and thence called the quarters of the Jews. They were therefore by the outrageous multitude violently driven out of all the other parts of the city, and confined to one quarter; the houſes, from which they had been driven, were plundered, and all their effects ſeized, as if they had been conquered in war. The rioters did not, ſays Philo, commit theſe robberies like thieves in the night, who are afraid of being brought to juſtice, but in the face of the ſun, ſhewing what they had taken to all they met, with as much confidence, as if it had been an inheritance or purchaſe: nay, they publicly divided the ſpoil in the market-place, in the preſence of thoſe very perſons whom they had plundered, adding mockery to their violence. As Flaccus never offered to check or reſtrain them, they broke open the ſhops and ware-houſes of the Jewiſh merchants, which were then ſhut on account of the public mourning for the death of Druſilla, the emperor's ſiſter; and thence conveyed away and ſold to the beſt bidder all their effects. Thus were the Jews at once driven from their habitations, reduced to beggary, and cooped up in a narrow corner of the city, where the Alexandrians doubted not, but they would ſoon periſh, either by the inconveniencies of the place, for moſt of them were obliged to lie in the open air; or by famine, for they were allowed to carry no proviſions along with them; or by the infection of the air and want of free reſpiration, many thouſands of men, women and children, being ſhut up in ſo cloſe and ſmothering a place. The Alexandrians watched them narrowly night and day, to prevent them from making their eſcape. But in the end, hunger prevailing over fear, ſeveral found means to withdraw either to the ſea-ſide, or to ſome remote burying-places; but ſuch of them as were diſcovered, were tortured in a moſt cruel manner, put to death, and their bodies ignominiouſly dragged through the ſtreets of the city. Thoſe Jews who, not having any notice of the uproar, happened to come to the city from their country houſes, were treated with the ſame cruelty, and hurried away to the torture, or torn in pieces by the enraged multitude. Some of the rioters lay night and day on the banks of the river, waiting there for the Jewiſh merchants; and as ſoon as any veſſel arrived belonging to that nation, they leaped into it, ſeized the effects, and then burnt it, together with the owners. In ſhort, when Jews appeared in any part of the city, except the narrow quarter allotted to them, they were ſure of being tortured, in a moſt barbarous manner, and maſſacred. The leaſt inhuman among the rioters diſpatched them with the ſword, or with fire, often burning whole families, without reſpecting the old men, or pitying the infants; and employing for fuel ſuch of their effects as no one thought worth purchaſing. Others more cruel, to prolong the torments of thoſe unhappy wretches, having tied them to ſtakes, kindled round them fires of moiſt and green wood; ſo that, after they had long borne the torment of a ſlow fire, they periſhed at length, ſuffocated with the ſmoke, when their bodies were but half burnt. Others, with ropes faſtened to their feet, were dragged through the ſtreets and public places of the city, the populace inſulting their bodies after they were dead, trampling them under foot, and mangling them with ſuch brutal cruelty, that not one member remained entire to entitle them to a funeral. They then, by way of mockery, pretended to bewail thoſe whom they had thus inhumanly butchered: but if any of their friends or relations lamented them in earneſt, they were immediately ſeized, whipt without mercy, and, after ſuffering all the torments which cruelty itſelf could invent, condemned to the ignominious puniſhment of the croſs [g].

All the Jew ſhut up in one quarter of the city.

Horrible cruelties practiſed upon the Jews.

FLACCUS might, with one word, have put a ſtop to the fury of the populace; but he the whole time pretended ignorance of the very things he ſaw and heard. However, he ſent at laſt for the leading men amongſt the Jews, as if he deſigned to make up all differences between them and the people of Alexandria. The Jews had at Alexandria an ethnarch, or chief of their nation, whom Joſephus calls, as is commonly believed, alabarch [h]. They had likewiſe a council, which was eſtabliſhed by Auguſtus; and out of this Flaccus cauſed thirty-eight perſons to be ſeized, to be bound like criminals, ſome with cords, others with chains, and in that condition to be dragged through the great market-place to the theatre, where the people were celebrating the birth-day of Caius, and there, in the preſence of their enemies, to be whipt ſo unmercifully, that ſome of them died ſoon after. In inflicting this puniſhment, he choſe the

They are cruelly treated by Flaccus

[g] Phil. in Flacc. p. 974—1010, & legat. c. 9. [h] Joſeph. antiq. l. xix. c. 4. Euſeb. p. 27.

the moſt ignominious method, (for different methods were then in uſe) treating them as public thieves and robbers. Thoſe who outlived this cruel puniſhment were impriſoned and kept under cloſe confinement, till Flaccus himſelf was arreſted, that is from the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, which was Caius's birth-day, to the latter end of September. During this ſolemnity, which ſeems to have laſted ſeveral days, many Jews were crucified, after the people aſſembled in the theatre had diverted themſelves with ſcourging, racking, and torturing them at their pleaſure. With theſe ſcenes of cruelty they were daily entertained, till the Jews, either expiring on the rack, or hurried away to execution, gave room to dancers, players, and other diverſions in uſe among the Romans; diverſions truly leſs horrible, but perhaps not more innocent. Such women as were ſuſpected to be Jews were by the inſulting populace ſeized, carried into the market-place, and there expoſed naked to public view. Thoſe who proved not to be Jews were immediately diſmiſſed; but to the Jewiſh women they cauſed hogs-fleſh to be immediately brought, which if they eat, they too were diſmiſſed untouched: but if, on the contrary, they adhered to their law, they were expoſed to the greateſt indignities imaginable, racked with all manner of torments, and put to a cruel death. Such was the condition of the Jews at Alexandria for the ſpace of about two months; for the perſecution continued to the feaſt of tabernacles. Philo, to whom we are indebted for this account, ſuffered, no doubt with the reſt of his nation; for he too was an Alexandrian Jew. We cannot help thinking his account ſomewhat exaggerated; and beſides, are convinced, that the Jews gave ſome occaſion to the unheard-of cruelty of the Alexandrians, which he has not thought fit to relate. King Agrippa, upon whoſe arrival the tumult began, did not in all likelihood continue long in a city where he had been ſo ill received. However, during his ſtay there, he was informed of the decree formerly made by the Alexandrian Jews in honour of Caius, and procured a copy of it, which he immediately tranſmitted to Rome, acquainting the emperor at the ſame time with the conduct of Flaccus, who had ſuppreſſed it. This provoked Caius to ſuch a degree, that he immediately diſpatched a centurion, by name Baſſus, with a band of ſoldiers, to ſeize Flaccus. Baſſus arrived in a few days at Alexandria, and, landing by night, enquired for the officer who

Many of them tortured and crucified.

Flaccus is diſgraced.

who commanded the troops quartered in the city, with a deſign to impart to him the emperor's orders, that he might hold his men ready in caſe of any reſiſtance. A ſoldier, whom he met in the ſtreet, informed him, that the officer ſupped that night with Flaccus, at the houſe of one Stephanio. Hereupon the centurion ſent one of his ſoldiers in the diſguiſe of a ſlave to Stephanio's houſe, who, upon his return, informed him, that Flaccus was attended only by a ſmall number of his domeſtics, and that no ſoldiers were to be ſeen in or about the houſe. Upon this intelligence, Baſſus immediately entered with all his men; and, having left a party to guard the gates, went with the reſt directly to the banqueting-hall, where to the great terror of the guests, he ſeized Flaccus, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, and carried him in bonds on board his veſſel. Flaccus ſtarting up, when the centurion firſt appeared, attempted to make his eſcape; but finding himſelf in a minute ſurrounded by armed men, he looked upon himſelf as loſt, and yielded. When news of what had happened was brought to the Jews, who continued ſtill ſhut up in the ſame place, they did not at firſt give any credit to it, but looked upon it as a ſnare laid for them. However, conjecturing from the noiſe and uproar which they heard in the night, that ſomething extraordinary had happened, ſome of them ſtole out, and, upon their return, confirmed the joyful tydings, that Flaccus was certainly arreſted. Hereupon, with one voice, they returned thanks to the Almighty for their deliverance, paſſed the reſt of the night in ſinging hymns, and, upon the return of the day, went in a body to the ſea ſide, to renew there, as they had no oratories where they could aſſemble, their thankſgiving with more ſolemnity. Soon after, Baſſus ſet ſail with his priſoner, who, after having much ſuffered during the voyage, arrived at length at Rome, where he had the mortification to ſee himſelf accuſed by Iſidorus and Lampo, who, with their flattering ſpeeches, had put him upon perſecuting the Jews.

Arreſted and ſent to Rome

But his greateſt enemy was the emperor himſelf, who, on this occaſion aſſuming the quality of judge, condemned him to baniſhment, declared his ſtate and all his effects forfeited, and ſeized them for himſelf. The only favour which Lepidus, who was his friend and then very powerful at court, could obtain for him, was, that he ſhould be confined to Andros, and not to Gyaræ, purſuant to his ſentence, which was the moſt deſert and abandoned iſland in the

Where he is condemned to baniſhment.

Archi-

Archipelago. He was therefore ſent under a guard to Andros, and there ſhewn to the inhabitants, who were ordered to watch him, that he might not make his eſcape. Some months after, he purchaſed a ſmall farm, and there led a ſolitary and retired life, till he was, together with the other exiles, maſſacred by Caius's orders. He defended himſelf with great bravery againſt thoſe who were ſent to diſpatch him, but was in the end overpowered and cut in pieces [i].

And ſoon after murdered.

THE grievances of the Alexandrian Jews did not end with the authority of Flaccus. The tumult ſtill continued, that unhappy people were ſtill cruelly inſulted by the enraged populace, and the magiſtrates of Alexandria refuſed to acknowledge the Jews for citizens, ſince Flaccus had declared them aliens. Hereupon both parties reſolved to ſend deputies to Rome, and refer the deciſion of their controverſy to the emperor. At the head of the Jewiſh embaſſy was Philo, and the celebrated Apion the chief of the embaſſadors from the city of Alexandria. Philo was a Jew of the ſacerdotal race, and ſprung from one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Alexandria, where his brother was alabarch, or the chief of his nation in that city [k]. Joſephus calls him a perſon every-way extraordinary [l]; and truly his works were highly eſteemed both by the Chriſtians and Pagans, and he ranked amongſt the beſt writers of his time. He was not only well verſed in the ſacred books, to which the whole knowledge of the Jews, was, generally ſpeaking, confined, but thoroughly acquainted with the philoſophy of the gentiles, and thought to ſurpaſs all the philoſophers of his age, in the knowledge of the maxims and tenets of Plato and Pythagoras. He applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the Platonic philoſophy, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that it was commonly ſaid at Alexandria, Either Plato imitates Philo, or Philo Plato. The philoſophers, who flouriſhed in thoſe times, ſtyled him the ſecond Plato, or the Jewiſh Plato [m]. Apion was likewiſe a man of great learning. He was, according to ſome, a native of Oaſis in Egypt; according to others, of the iſland of Creta, now Candia. Be that as it will, he was preſented with the citizenſhip of Alexandria, and thence paſſed Philo is ſent with the character of embaſſador to Caius.

Some account of him and of Apion.

[i] Phil. in Flacc. p. 976—982.
[k] Euſeb. l. ii. c. 4. Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 10.
[l] Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 10.
[m] Hier. de vir. illuſt. & epiſt. 84. c. 11. Phot. c. 105.

paſſed for an Alexandrian [n]. He is by ſome writers ſtyled Pleiſtonicus, which ſignifies, illuſtrious for many victories [o]; but how he came by that name, we are no-where told. Suidas calls him Mochthus, perhaps inſtead of Mochtherus, which ſignifies laborious [p]. He was by profeſſion a grammarian; for ſo were thoſe formerly called, who were well verſed in polite literature. Julius Africanus ſtyles him the moſt inquiſitive of all the grammarians; and adds, that no one was better verſed in antiquities, or had made more diſcoveries [q]. He was brought up by Didymus, a celebrated grammarian of Alexandria, and afterwards inſtructed by Apollonius and Euphanor [r]. He taught rhetoric at Rome under the emperors Tiberius and Claudius, and was eſteemed a man of great erudition, and well verſed in the Greek hiſtorians: his ſtyle was elegant and eaſy, but he is thought to have exaggerated the things which he relates to have been ſeen or heard by himſelf [s]. He viſited all the cities of Greece, as Pliny informs us [t], in the beginning of Claudius's reign, and was every-where received as a ſecond Homer. However, Seneca ſeems to to have made no great account of his erudition, which chiefly conſiſted, as he writes, in the knowledge of grammatical trifles. Of his works, and thoſe of Philo, we ſhall ſpeak anon.

THE embaſſadors were, according to Joſephus, three of each ſide, but five according to Philo, who was one of them, and conſequently is more to be depended upon, if we will not ſuppoſe with a modern writer [u], who ſtrives to reconcile Philo and Joſephus, that two more were afterwards ſent by the Jews, and the like number by the Alexandrians. They ſet out from Alexandria in the midſt of winter; and arriving at Rome, were forced to wait there till the return of Caius from Gaul, which happened on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt. The Jewiſh embaſſadors, in the mean time, conveyed to the emperor, by means of king Agrippa, who was then at Rome, a memorial, wherein they laid before him their deplorable condition, acquainted him with the hardſhips they had undergone, aſ-

They arrive at Rome, and tranſmit a memorial to the emperor, then in Gaul.

ſured

[n] Hier. ibid. Suidas, p. 327. [o] Gell. l. v. c. 14. & l. vi. c. 8. Plin. l. xxxvii. c. 4. [p] Suid. p. 355. [q] Euſeb. de præpar. evang. l. x. c. 10. [r] Suidas, ibid. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Plin. præfat. & Senec. epiſt. 88. [u] Tillemont, p. 806.

ſured him of their attachment to his perſon and government, and in a moſt ſubmiſſive manner implored his protection. When the emperor returned to Rome, the Alexandrian embaſſadors gained privately, with great ſums and larger promiſes, the famous Helico, who was by birth an Egyptian, had formerly been a ſlave, but was then in great favour with Caius, and his chamberlain. The Jewiſh deputies were no ſooner informed, that Helico had been gained over by their enemies, and did them all the ill offices with the emperor that lay in his power, than they ſtrove in their turn to bring him over to their intereſt; but he would not hearken to their propoſals, nay, would not ſo much as allow them acceſs to him. They therefore reſolved to apply directly to the emperor, and accordingly drew up a memorial, which was but an abſtract of the longer addreſs, which they had a little before tranſmitted to him by means of Agrippa. This they preſented to him in the field of Mars, as he was coming from the gardens of his mother Agrippina. Caius received the embaſſadors with a chearful and ſmiling countenance, and ſignified to them with a ſign of his right hand, that he would befriend them, nay, he ordered Homulus, the introducer of embaſſadors, to acquaint them, that he would hear them himſelf as ſoon as he was at leiſure. From this favourable reception, it was generally concluded, that the Jews would gain their cauſe, and triumph over their enemies. But Philo, whom age and experience had taught not to lay great ſtreſs upon fair words and outward appearances, dreaded the effects of the emperor's pretended friendſhip, and reaſoned with himſelf thus: Here are embaſſadors from all parts of the world, and why ſhould the emperor diſtinguiſh us from the reſt? He knows we are Jews, and conſequently, that we ſhould think ourſelves happy to be only treated like other nations. Can we reaſonably expect any extraordinary favour from a prince of another nation, or ſuppoſe that he has not a greater kindneſs for the Alexandrians than for us? He is partial to them without diſpute; and for their ſake it is, that he is eager to determine the affair. I ſhould be glad he would prove an impartial judge; but am afraid we ſhall find him an advocate for them, and an enemy to us. In the mean time, Caius, leaving Rome, went to ſee one of his magnificent palaces, which ſtood on the ſeaſide; and thither the Jewiſh embaſſadors followed him, expecting expecting every moment to be called and heard by him, purſuant to the promiſe he made to them by Homulus. At Puteoli they were firſt informed of the danger they were in, not only of loſing their cauſe againſt the Alexandrians, but of ſeeing their religion and nation utterly extirpated, in virtue of the order which the emperor had tranſmitted to Petronius, governor of Syria, commanding him to ſet up his ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem. Upon this intelligence, Philo, ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs as to the buſineſs with which he was charged, would have returned home with his collegues, could he have done it with honour. But though he now deſpaired of ſucceſs, yet he thought, that his dropping the ſuit might be looked upon as the effect of fear; and that his countrymen, who had ſent him, might with ſome reaſon complain, as if, through want of courage, he had betrayed their cauſe. However, the ſtorm which threatened the Jews on account of the ſtatue of Caius ſoon blew over, and Philo was in the end admitted, with his collegues, to the emperor's preſence. But they no ſooner appeared before him, than, from the fierceneſs of his looks, they concluded, that the emperor intended to act not like a judge, but as an accuſer rather and a party. For, inſtead of adviſing with men of knowledge and experience, and hearing both ſides indifferently in their turns, eſpecially in a caſe of this conſequence, where the lives and liberties of ſo many men were at ſtake, and privileges diſputed, which for the ſpace of four hundred years had never ſo much as been called in queſtion, the tyrant gave them plainly to underſtand, that he did not deſign to proceed according to the ordinary methods of law and juſtice. The emperor was then at a ſmall diſtance from the city, paſſing a few days at two country-ſeats, which, it ſeems, ſtood very near each other, and had formerly belonged to Mecænas and Lamias. Having therefore commanded the gardens belonging to both houſes, and the ſeveral apartments, to be opened, in order to view them, and entertain himſelf with the curioſities there, he ſent at the ſame time for the Jewiſh and Alexandrian embaſſadors, who were introduced to him while he was thus employed. Philo and his collegues no ſooner came into the emperor's preſence, than they threw themſelves proſtrate at his feet, addreſſing him with the titles of emperor and Auguſtus. The emperor received them, notwithſtanding the profound reſpect they ſhewed him, in

Upon his return they preſent another memorial to him.

Philo ſuſpects his kindneſs.

Is alarmed at an order iſſued by the emperor.

He is admitted to an audience.

ſuch manner, that they began to deſpair, not only of ſucceſs in their embaſſy, but even of their lives. For, with angry looks and a ſcornful ſmile, Are you not execrable wretches, ſaid he, declared enemies of the gods, ſince you have the impudence to diſpute a divinity that all the world acknowledges, and to ſet up againſt Caius a god whom you cannot ſo much as name? At the ſame time, lifting up his hands towards heaven, he uttered ſuch blaſphemies, as Philo, who was ſtruck with horror in hearing them, dares not repeat. The Alexandrian embaſſadors, concluding from this reception, that they had already gained their cauſe, could not diſſemble their joy; and there was not one attribute peculiar to God, which they did not indifferently aſcribe to Caius, who was highly delighted with their flattery. In order to provoke him ſtill more againſt the Jews, Iſidorus, a crafty inſinuating ſlanderer, addreſſing the emperor, If you knew, ſaid he, the mortal hatred theſe men, and their whole nation, bear to you, you would abhor and deteſt them much more than you do. When all the world were offering up their vows and prayers for the ſafety of your perſon, and the proſperity of your government, theſe alone, I mean all the Jews without exception, ſtood out with their uſual ſtubbornneſs and obſtinacy. At theſe words, the Jews cried out with one voice, that they were ſlandered, that they had offered hecatombs and ſacrifices for the happineſs of Caius and the empire; and that after they had ſprinkled the altar with the blood of the victims, they did not feaſt among themſelves, as moſt other nations do, upon the fleſh, but committed the whole ſacrifice to the ſacred fire: And this, added they, we have done upon three remarkable occaſions, upon your acceſſion to the empire, upon your recovery from that fit of ſickneſs which proved ſo ſenſible an affliction to moſt nations, and finally, for the ſucceſs of your arms in Germany. You did perhaps offer ſacrifices, replied Caius, I allow it: but it was to another, not to me: and what honour do I receive from your ſacrificing to another? Theſe blaſphemous words ſtruck us, ſays Philo, with horror, and chilled the very blood in our veins. In the mean time, Caius hurried from one apartment to another, taking a view of all the rooms and offices, finding fault where any thing was amiſs, and directing how it ſhould be mended. Thus he viſited every corner of both houſes, the Jews being obliged bliged all along to attend him, tho' joſtled and derided by the whole company, eſpecially by their adverſaries, who were the whole time mimicking them, like buffoons on the ſtage: and truly the whole, ſays Philo, looked rather like a comedy, than a ſerious negotiation; but as they were now at the mercy of the tyrant, who was both their judge and their enemy, they had no defence left them but ſilence and patience. After Caius had given ſome neceſſary orders about his buildings, he turned to the Jews, and gravely aſked them, Why they ſo much ſcrupled eating hogs-fleſh? Hereupon the whole company, ſome out of flattery, others becauſe they were diverted with the queſtion and mockery, burſt into ſo loud a laughter, that ſome of Caius's officers were highly offended at the liberty they took, thinking it inconſiſtent with the reſpect due to the majeſty of the prince. To the emperor's queſtion, the Jews anſwered with great reſpect, That ſeveral people and places had their ſeveral faſhions and cuſtoms, and that their adverſaries were prohibited ſome things as well as they: ſome people, for inſtance, ſaid one of them, abſtain from lamb. Very well, replied Caius merrily; I cannot blame them; for lamb's-fleſh is not very ſavoury. After the emperor had thus rallied and ridiculed them for ſome time, in the end he aſked them all on a ſudden in a paſſion, What title they had to the privileges of Alexandrian citizens, and to the freedom of that city? Hereupon they began to lay before him their reaſons; but he, finding they were of great ſtrength, and not knowing how thoſe which they had already alledged could be well confuted, ſtarted up in the midſt of their diſcourſe, and ran into a great hall; where, after he had walked a while, he cauſed the windows to be ſhut; and then returning to the Jewiſh embaſſadors, he aſked them with an air more compoſed, What they had to ſay? But they had ſcarce begun to ſpeak, when Caius, inſtead of hearkening to them, left them again, and ran in great haſte into another room to ſee ſeveral originals done by the moſt famous painters of antiquity. The Jews, finding themſelves ſo often interrupted, and expecting nothing from ſo mercileſs a tyrant but immediate death, had recourſe to the true, for protection againſt the pretended, god. Their prayers were heard, and Caius, without further outrages, diſmiſed them, ſaying, Theſe men are not

ſo

ſo wicked, as ignorant and unhappy, in not believing me to be a god. The Jewiſh deputies departed, reckoning themſelves fortunate in having thus eſcaped with their lives ſafe; not that they dreaded any kind of death, ſays Philo, which, had it been any-ways conducive to the preſervation of their law, they would, with great pleaſure, have embraced; but becauſe their deſtruction would have been inevitably attended with the utter ruin of thoſe who had ſent them. As for the ſubject of their embaſſy, they could not promiſe themſelves a favourable ſentence from a judge, who would not ſo much as hear them, being highly incenſed againſt their whole nation, as the only people ſubject to Rome, who refuſed to acknowledge his divinity. They continued in the city, waiting with the greateſt anxiety imaginable for the deciſion of their cauſe; for upon the ſentence, which the emperor might think fit to pronounce, depended the fate of the whole Jewiſh nation, who would be every-where perſecuted and ſtripped of their effects, privileges, oratories, &c. if the emperor ſhould countenance the Alexandrians in their cruel and unwarrantable proceedings againſt them [f]. Joſephus ſeems to ſpeak of another audience granted by Caius to the Jewiſh and Alexandrian embaſſadors; wherein Apion inveighed with great bitterneſs againſt the Jews, alledging many things againſt them; but his main charge was, that whereas temples and altars were erected to Caius by all other nations, and the ſame adoration paid to him as to the reſt of the gods, the Jews alone obſtinately refuſed either to conſecrate images to him, or to ſwear by his name. When Philo was about to reply in behalf of the Jews, Caius in a great rage commanded him to be ſilent, and with dreadful manaces bid him be gone. Hereupon Philo, turning to his collegues, Let us take courage, ſaid he; now Caius is againſt us, God will be for us [g]. What ſentence Caius pronounced in the end, we find no-where recorded: all we know is, that, during his whole reign, the Jews were grievouſly perſecuted and oppreſſed by the Alexandrians [h]; and that Alexander Lyſimachus, brother to Philo, and alabarch of the Alexandrian Jews, was, by Caius's

[f] Philo, ibid. p. 1019—1043. [g] Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii. 10. [h] Idem, l. xix. c. 4.

Caius's orders, committed to priſon, and there detained til he was diſcharged by Claudius; upon whoſe acceſſion to the empire, the Jews, notwithſtanding their boaſted patience, betook themſelves to arms, which occaſioned a great tumult at Alexandria. Claudius, upon the firſt tidings of the commotion, wrote to the governor of Egypt, enjoining him to appeaſe it; and at the requeſt of the two kings, Agrippa and Herod, enacted an edict, which he ſent to Alexandria, confirming to the Jews all the privileges they had ever enjoyed in that city, and declaring all the proceedings of Caius againſt them null and void [i] (E).

[i] Idem ibid.

(E) To this relation we ſhall ſubjoin a ſuccinct account of the works of Philo, of Apion, and ſome writers who flouriſhed under the princes of the Flavian family. Philo deſcribed in five books the evils ſuffered by the Jews under Caius; and theſe books, as he made frequent digreſſions in them upon the vices of that prince, he ſtyled ironically, Of the virtues of Caius (1). Of theſe five books, Euſebius takes that which has reached our times, under the title of Philo's embaſſy to Caius, to be the firſt (2). Photius ſtyles it, Caius blamed (3). The ſecond of theſe five books is, according to both theſe writers, that which is commonly known by the title of Philo againſt Flaccus, and which Photius calls, Flaccus blamed (4). However, the book againſt Flaccus ſeems to have been written before that of his embaſſy; ſince, in the end of the latter (5), he tells us, that he has already deſcribed the inexpreſſible calamities ſuffered by the Alexandrian Jews; and theſe calamities are the chief ſubject of his book againſt Flaccus. The three other books, or parts of that work, have been long ſince loſt; for Photius ſeems to have been acquainted with no other, but the two above-mentioned books written by Philo on that ſubject (6). Philo is ſaid to have read them during the reign of Claudius in full ſenate, when they were heard with uncommon applauſe, and ordered to be depoſited in the public library (7). The author ſeems to addreſs himſelf to the emperor Claudius in his book againſt Flaccus. St. Jerom mentions in his catalogue ſeveral books written by Philo; but of theſe (which are very ſurpriſing) takes not the leaſt notice. The

(1) Euſeb. l. i. c. 5. & 18. (2) Euſeb. c. 5. & 6. (3) Phot. c. 105. (4) Euſeb. & Phot. ibid. (5) Philo in legat. p. 1043. (6) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 7. (7) Euſeb. l. ii. c. 18.

The reader will find in Eusebius (8) and St. Jerom (9) a catalogue of his other works upon the scripture, and various different subjects. Eusebius commends the sublimity of his thoughts in explaining the scripture (10); and Origen writes, that most of his books upon the law of Moses were generally esteemed by men of learning (11). Photius, on the contrary, thinks he frequently neglects the obvious and literal, to hunt after an allegorical, sense (12). The same writer observes, that Philo often follows opinions contrary to the principles of the Jewish religion, and that he does not seem to disapprove the superstitious honours paid to the emperor Augustus. St. Jerom ascribes to him the Greek interpretation of the proper names in the pentateuch and the prophets (13). Some writers will have him to have been likewise the author of a Latin history, containing the most remarkable incidents from the creation to the reign of Saul; but others think that work, which often contradicts the scripture, altogether unworthy of Philo (14). St. Jerom says, that some antient writers ascribed to Philo the book of wisdom (15); but that he was not the author of that book, is plainly shewn by a modern writer of no mean character (16). Some writers tell us, that, in the reign of Claudius, he became acquainted with St. Peter at Rome, and contracted a friendship with that apostle (17); nay, Photius adds (18), that he embraced the christian religion, and afterwards renounced it upon some discontent. But the silence of all other writers, with respect to this particular, makes us question the truth of what Photius asserts.

Apion wrote several books (19), of which we find one only quoted by the antients, namely, his history of Egypt, containing a particular and distinct account of all the curiosities and antiquities of that country. Eusebius (20) and Tatian (21) cite some passages out of the fifth book of this work, which was in all likelihood the last. As all the Alexandrians bore an irreconcileable hatred to the Jews, no wonder that Apion filled his writings with false and slanderous accounts of them; which Josephus with great erudition confutes in a book, which he published against him and other pagan writers, in defence of the Jews, and intituled, An answer to Apion. Several persons ſeeming to queſtion the truth of what he had advanced in his Jewiſh antiquities, alledging, that if the race of the Jews was as antient and illuſtrious as Joſephus makes it, the Greek hiſtorians would have taken notice of them, he undertook another work, wherein he not only ſhews, that ſeveral hiſtorians have mentioned the Jews, but confutes the calumnies publiſhed againſt them by divers authors, eſpecially by Apion. This work is by Euſebius (22) and St. Jerom (23) intituled, Of the Jewiſh antiquities. Apion not only ſtrove to diſcredit the Jews in his hiſtory of Egypt, but wrote a book, of which they were the only ſubject (24), filled with calumnies againſt that nation, falſhoods, and accounts altogether fabulous; which Joſephus confuted, after he had ended his antiquities. Apion, after having in his writings, derided circumciſion in a moſt ſcurrilous manner, was himſelf by a diſtemper obliged to ſubmit to it, but to no effect; for the wound putrifying, he died ſoon after, by juſt judgment, ſays Joſephus, in great miſery and torments (25). The famous adventure of a ſlave named Androcles, who was nouriſhed, during the ſpace of three years, by a lion, whom he had cured of a wound, and by the ſame known in the ſight of all Rome, when he was expoſed in the amphitheatre to be devoured by the wild beaſts, muſt have happened about this time; for Apion, as quoted by Aulus Gellius (26), aſſures us, that he was eye-witneſs of that ſurpriſing and affecting ſcene; and adds, that the grateful lion was ſaved, and the ſlave preſented with his liberty.

(8) Idem ibid. (9) Hier. de vir. illust. c. 11. (10) Idem ibid. 11. Orig. in Matth. p. 369. (12) Phot. c. 105. (13) Hier. nom. Hebr. c. 3. (14) Voss. ibid. l. ii c. 7. (15) Hier epist. cxv. (16) Du Pin reponse au remarques de pere de S. Vanne. (17) Euseb. l. ii. c. 17. Hier. de vir. illust. c. 11. (18) Phot. c. 105. (19) Suid. p. 356. Aul. Gell. p. 146. Plin. l. xxxvii. c. 5. (20) Euseb. præp. evang. l. x. c. 11. (21) Tatian. orat. ad Græc. p. 172.

Juſtus the ſon of Piſtus, contemporary with Joſephus, and of the ſame religion, but a native of Tiberias in Galilee, wrote likewiſe in Greek the hiſtory of the Jewiſh war, of the taking of Jotapat, and of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. This hiſtory he compoſed ſoon after the war, but did not publiſh it till Veſpaſian, Titus, and king Agrippa were dead, that is, twenty years after he had wrote it, about the thirteenth year of Domitian's reign. Joſephus, who was at variance with him, tells us, that he ſo long ſuppreſſed his hiſtory, becauſe he durſt not ſtand the teſt and cenſure of the world, while ſo many perſons were yet alive, who were able to diſprove him (27). St. Jerom, and ſeveral other writers, ſpeak of this hiſtory of Juſtus (28), and obſerve, that he was no-ways a candid hiſtorian, and that he often contradicted point-blank the memoirs or commentaries of Veſpaſian, Titus, and other generals. We have therefore no cauſe to regret the loſs

(22) Euſeb. præp. evang. l. iii. c. 9. (23) Hier. vir. illuſt. c. 13. (24) Euſeb. p. 490. Juſt. orat. ad Græc p. 9, 10. (25) Joſeph. in Ap. l. ii, (26) Aul. Gell. l. v. c. 14. (27) Joſeph. antiq. l. xx. c. 9. & vit. (28) Hier. de vir. illuſt. c. 14. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 8.

loſs of ſuch a work. This hiſtory is probably different from another done by the ſame author, containing the lives and reigns of all the Jewiſh kings, from Moſes to the death of young Agrippa (29). This work, which Photius (30) calls a chronicle, was ended in the third year of the reign of Trajan, and is probably what St. Jerom (31) and Suidas (32), who tranſlated it, call Juſtus's ſhort commentaries. Another writer by name Antonius Julianus, flouriſhed about this time, and publiſhed an account of the Jewiſh war, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. For Minucius Felix, who wrote in defence of the Chriſtian religion, in the beginning of the third century, refers the pagans to Antonius Julianus, and to Joſephus, telling them, that in the writings of theſe hiſtorians, they will find that the Jews were not abandoned by God till they had abandoned him; and that they only ſuffered what they had been forewarned they ſhould ſuffer, if they continued to diſobey his law (33). We find two perſons bearing that name mentioned by the antients, viz. Antonius Julianus, procurator of Judæa, who was with Titus, as Joſephus informs us (34), at the ſiege of Jeruſalem; and Antonius Julianus, a native of Spain, and profeſſor of rhetoric at Rome, often quoted and commended by Aulus Gellius, who was one of his diſciples (35). He flouriſhed about the middle of the ſecond century, and wrote ſome rhetorical and grammatical books (36). An hiſtory in Hebrew and Latin of the Jewiſh war has reached our times, done by one Joſephus, the ſon of Gorion, who pretended, it ſeems, to paſs himſelf upon the world for the celebrated Joſephus. But the ableſt critics take him to have been a Jew born in Gaul in the ſeventh century, and his hiſtory to be only an abridgment of the Latin tranſlation of Joſephus's hiſtory, which is commonly aſcribed to Rufinus, with the addition of many groſs miſtakes, and fabulous accounts (37). As for the hiſtory of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, which bears the name of Hegeſippus, it is but a tranſlation of the hiſtory of Joſephus, wherein the author allows himſelf a great latitude, retrenching ſeveral things, and adding harangues, deſcriptions, and even ſome events which he had probably found in other hiſtorians. We muſt not confound this writer, as ſome have done, with another of the ſame name, who flouriſhed in the ſecond century, and was a native of Greece, whereas the compiler of Joſephus was, as is evident from ſome paſſages in his work, quite ignorant of the Greek tongue (38) Beſides, he mentions the city of Conſtantinople, and tells us, that having by degrees eclipſed the cities of Antioch and Alexandria, it was no longer the fourth, but the ſecond, city of the Roman empire (39). It is therefore plain, that he did not write before the reign of Conſtantine the great, nor even before the end of the fourth century. Voſſius is of opinion, that he flouriſhed about the latter end of the tenth century; but the propriety of his expreſſions, and the elegance and ſublimity of his ſtyle, are a convincing proof, that he wrote before the total and general decay of learning, that is, before the fifth century. Hence the learned biſhop Pearſon takes him for an author of the fourth or fifth century (40); and father Mabillon quotes two manuſcripts of Hegeſippus's hiſtory, both written, as he conjectures from the characters, before the ſeventh century (41). Gronovius takes St. Ambroſe, concealed under the aſſumed name of Hegeſippus, to be the true author of that hiſtory, being induced thereunto by ſeveral of St. Ambroſe's phraſes, which he obſerved in it (42). But the ſame phraſes are often common to ſeveral writers of the ſame age; and the ſtyle of Hegeſippus is, in our opinion, far more eaſy and proper than that of St. Ambroſe, or of Paulinus, Sulpicius Severus, Aper, Eucherius, or Hilarius; for to each of theſe the work, which bears the name of Hegeſippus, has by ſome writers been aſcribed. To the hiſtory of Hegeſippus is annexed an anacephalæoſis, or ſummary of the chief matters contained in it, which by ſome is thought the work of the ſame author; but Gronovius ſpeaks of it, and not undeſervedly, with great contempt (43). In this ſummary, and not in the hiſtory itſelf, is found the ſuppoſititious letter from Pilate, to Tiberius concerning our Saviour. The hiſtory of Hegeſippus is quoted by John of Saliſbury, who flouriſhed in the twelfth century, and by John of Trittenheim, abbot of Spanheim, in his learned book of eccleſiaſtical writers; but he, by confounding the author of this work with the above-mentioned Hegeſippus, who flouriſhed in the ſecond century, has led many others into the ſame miſtake (44).

(29) Voſſ. ibid. Euſeb. p. 47. (30) Phot. c. 33. (31) Hier. ibid. (32) Suid. p. 1251. (33) Min. Fel. p. 27. (34) Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. v. c. 4. (35) Aul. Gell. l. i. c. 4. l. ix. c. 1. l. xv. c. 1. l. xviii. c. 5. l. xix. c. 9. (36) Idem, l. i. c. 4. (37) Voſſ. hiſt Lat. l. ii. c. 8. Baron. ad ann. 72.

Of Flavius Joſephus, the moſt famous of all the hiſtorians who flouriſhed under the princes of the Flavian family, we have already ſpoken (38) Hegeſ. l. iii. c. 1. 6. & 9. Biblioth. patrum. l. vii. p. 462, 463. (39) Idem ibid. c. 5. p. 465, 466. (40) Pearſon. ann Paulin. p. 50. Lond. 1688. (41) Mabill. iter Italic. p. 14. Pariſ. 1687. (42) Gronov. obſervat. eccleſ. c. 1. (43) Idem ibid. (44) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii, p. 706. Trit. p. 4.

ſpoken in the ſeveral parts of this work; and therefore ſhall cloſe this note with only a few remarks on his hiſtory of the Jewiſh wars, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. This hiſtory he compoſed at Rome, in the reign of Veſpaſian, in his own language (45), which was much the ſame with the Syriac, and afterwards tranſlated it into Greek, with the aſſiſtance of ſome perſons who were better acquainted with that tongue than he (46). For the knowledge of the ſeveral languages was not a thing practiſed or valued by the Jews, but looked upon as a profane ſtudy, the ſum of their wiſdom and learning conſiſting in the knowledge of their laws and the right underſtanding of the Scripture (47); which, however, it is plain they never did rightly underſtand with relation to the Meſſiah. The Syriac hiſtory was immediately diſperſed over all the eaſtern countries, and greedily read by the Arabians, Adiabenians, Babylonians, Parthians, and all the Jews beyond the Euphrates (48). Some copies of this work, which was divided into five books, are ſtill extant (49). The Greek tranſlation proved both troubleſome and expenſive to him (50). He divided it into ſeven books, and did not put the laſt hand to it before the fifth year of Veſpaſian's reign; for he mentions the temple of Peace as finiſhed, which was conſecrated the following year, the ſixth of Veſpaſian's reign; and ends his hiſtory with the death of Catullus, which did not happen, as is evident from Dion Caſſius, before that time (51). Joſephus cloſes his hiſtory with theſe words: As for my ſtyle, and manner of writing, I ſubmit it to the judgment of the reader; but as to the candour and ſincerity of my accounts, I do here declare to the world, that I have kept ſtrictly to truth, and have had nothing elſe in view throughout the whole work. Of what paſſed amongſt the Romans he was an eye-witneſs, and learnt of the deſerters, who all applied to him, every ſtep taken by the enemy (52). Beſides, Titus imparted to him his own commentaries or memoirs (53); ſo that he was thoroughly acquainted with every thing that happened during the whole time of the war. As ſoon as he had ended his Greek tranſlation, he preſented it to Veſpaſian, to Titus, to king Agrippa, and to ſeveral others who had been eye-witneſſes of what he relates (54); which he would never have done, had he been conſcious to himſelf of having ſwerved in the leaſt from truth. King Agrippa, in ſixty-two letters to Joſephus, authentically witneſſed the candour and ſincerity which reigns throughout the whole work (55); and Titus not satisfied with ordering it to be published, and lodged in the public library, signed, some read transcribed, with his own hand the copy, which was to be placed there as an authentic relation of the Jewish war, and the destruction of Jerusalem (56) Hence Suidas gives to Josephus the title of lover of truth, as peculiar to him (57). But after all, his history is not exempt from faults; some of which he himself corrected in the works he afterwards published (58). It was either a deplorable ignorance, or inexcusable flattery, that prompted him to misinterpret the scripture, and apply to Vespasian the prophecy, importing, that in those days a prince should come out of Judæa, who should rule over the whole world; which could be understood of the Messiah alone. Photius speaking of the Greek translation of this history, greatly commends it, even on account of the style, which to him seems easy, proper, and no less elegant than that of the Greek historians (59): and St. Jerom calls Josephus, the Livy of the Greeks (60). Hence it is evident that the many obscure passages, odd phrases, and irregular constructions, which are to be met with in this work, ought to be ascribed to the copyists, and not to the author. When Josephus had ended his history of the Jewish wars, he undertook the general history of his nation, from the beginning of the world, to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, when the Jews revolted and strove to shake off the Roman yoke, which was the occasion of their utter ruin. Of this work which is comprised in twenty books, and was finished by Josephus in the fifty-sixth year of his age, that is, in the thirteenth of Domitian's reign, and towards the end of the ninety-third of the Christian æra, we have spoken in various places of this history; and therefore shall only repeat here, that he frequently contradicts point-blank holy writ; of which the reader will find many instances in father Possevin's learned Apparatus (61). Of the famous passage concerning our Saviour, we have spoken at length in our history of the Jews (62). To the general history of the Jews, which Josephus himself intituled the Jewish antiquities, tho' brought down to the twelfth year of Nero's reign, he added the particular history of his own life, which he finished before the death of Domitian, that is, before the eighteenth of September of the year 96, of the Christian æra. Eusebius and St. Jerom look upon his life as a part of the twentieth book of his Antiquities; and likewise upon upon his book againſt Apion, as a continuation of the ſame work (63). Beſides the above-mentioned works, a diſcourſe compoſed by Joſephus has reached our times, wherein he ſhews, that it is in the power of reaſon to command and ſubdue the paſſions: whence the treatiſe is by ſome ſtyled, the rule of reaſon; but by others, the hiſtory of the Maccabees, becauſe Joſephus deſcribes there at length the glorious death of thoſe illuſtrious champions. This piece St Jerom cries up as a moſt elegant performance (64); and St. Gregory of Nazianzus refers his readers to it for a true and affecting account of the martyrdom of the Maccabees (65). We find Joſephus quoted by ſome antient writers for things, of which no mention is made in his works which are ſtill extant. Thus Oroſius refers us to him for an account of the expulſion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius (66); and Origen quotes him as aſſerting, that the Jews generally aſcribed the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the ruin of their nation, to their putting unjuſtly St. James to death (67). Joſephus himſelf promiſes in his antiquities the hiſtory of Monobazes, king of the Adiabenians (68), of whom nevertheleſs no farther mention is made in his works which have reached us. Voſſius likewiſe aſſures, that in the printed copies of Joſephus many things have been left out, which he found in the manuſcript copies of the antient Latin tranſlation (69) aſcribed by father Poſſevin to the celebrated Rufinus of Aquileia (70). Joſephus, at the end of his antiquities, promiſes a ſhorter relation of the Jewiſh war, and of all that had happened to that unhappy people from the beginning of the ſaid war to the time in which he ended his Antiquities, that is, to the 93d year of the Chriſtian æra (71). He likewiſe propoſed writing four books of the opinions of the Jews concerning God and his nature, and of their laws, that he might have an opportunity of informing the world, why by their law ſome things were allowed them, and others forbidden (72). But neither Euſebius, nor any other writer, mentions theſe works; which inclines us to believe, that he was prevented by death from executing his deſign, and that he died about the latter end of Domitian's reign. Photius aſcribes to him an anonymous book, Of the ſubſtance of the univerſe (73). Poſſevin is of opinion, that he wrote a book on the ſeventy weeks of Daniel (74); and truly St. Jerom ſays, that he ſpeaks of them much at length (75), which he does not in any of his works which have been tranſmitted to us. Joſephus lived at Rome from the return of Titus (63) Euſeb. l. iii. c. 9, 10. Hier. vir. illuſt. c. 13. (64) Hier. in Pelag. l. ii. c. 3. (65) Greg. Nazian. orat. 22. (66) Oroſ. l. vii. c. 6. (67) Origen. in Matth. (68) Joſeph. antiq, l. xx. c. 2. (69) Voſſ. ſibyllin. p. 43. (70) Poſſevin. ibid. (71) Joſeph. antiq. l. xx. c. 9. (72) Idem ibid. (73) Phot. c. 48. (74) Poſſevin. ibid. (75) Hier. in Iſai.

(45) Joſeph. bell. l. 1. (46) Idem in Api. l. 1. (47) Idem, antiq. l. xx. c. 9. (48) Idem, bell. Jud. l. i. (49) Vide Poſſevin. apparat. tom. i. p. 966. Coloniæ, an. 1608. (50) Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. i. (51) Dio, l. lxvi. p. 751, 752. (52) Joſeph in Api. l. 1. (53) Idem, in vit. (54) Idem, in Api. l. i.

(55) Idem, in vit. (56) Idem ibid. & Hier. vit. vir, illust. c. 13. (57) Suid. p. 1261. (58) Vide Huetii demonstrat. evang. p. 326. (59) Phot. c. 47. (60) Hier. epist. 22. (61) Possevin. apparat. tom. i. p, 967. 968, Coloniæ, an. 1608. (62) Hist, Univers. Vol. x, p. 530.

Titus to that city in 71, till his death, which happened about the latter end of Domitian's reign, who was killed in 96. He was highly eſteemed and favoured by the three princes of the Flavian family: for Veſpaſian made him free of the city, lodged him in the houſe in which he himſelf had lived before he was emperor, ſettled upon him a yearly penſion, and aſſigned him certain lands, in Judæa. Titus ſhewed him no leſs kindneſs than his father had done; and Domitian, as well as his wife Domitia, conferred on him ſtill greater honours. This drew upon him the hatred of his envious countrymen, by whom ſeveral falſe accuſations were brought againſt him, but he was always declared innocent. In the reign of Veſpaſian, a Jew, by name Jonathan, being ſent to the emperor in chains, for having, at the head of two thouſand men, raiſed great diſturbances in Cyrene, declared, that Joſephus had aſſiſted him underhand with arms and money. But Veſpaſian, giving no credit to the calumny, commanded his head to be ſtruck off. Domitian likewiſe puniſhed with great ſeverity ſome Jews, and an eunuch, who was tutor to Joſephus's ſon, for falſly informing againſt him (76). Thus he lived at Rome, highly favoured by the emperors; and was, after his death, honoured by the Roman people with a ſtatue (77).

(76) Joſeph. in. vit.

(77) Euſeb. l. iii. c. 3.

A N

AN INDEX

TO THE FOURTEENTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and the Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABGARUS's embaſſy to Trajan, 578. Reception of him, 579.

Abudius R. an informer baniſhed, 17,18.

Acerronia Polla miſtaken for Agrippina, murdered, 197.

Achaia, the province of, infranchiſed by Nero, 265. Plundered by him, 268.

Achambyſus ſubdued by Trajan, 588.

Actiac games, anniverſary forbid by Caligula, 71.

Actius's account of Druſus's Death, 14.

Acutia condemned, 24.

Ademyſtis delivered up to the Romans, 581.

Adiabene ſubdued by Trajan, 581.

Adjutrix the legion, furious onſet againſt the Rapax, 358. Defeated, ibid. Declares for Veſpaſian, 396.

Adminius, prince of Britain, protected by Caligula, 74.

Adria, where ſituate, 607.

Adrian adopted by Trajan, 559, 596. Made quæſtor, 566. Funeral honours to Sura, 569. Demoliſhes Trajan's bridge, 572. Gallantry againſt the Dacians, ibid. & ſeq. Prætorſhip and Games, 578. Sent into Pannonia, ibid. Made Archon of Athens, 584. Governor of Syria, 594. Proclaims himſelf emperor at Antioch, ibid. Whether really adopted by Trajan, 596. His extract and education, 607. Prodigious memory, 608. Learning, 609. Clemency and Liberality, ibid & ſeq. Mild government, 611. Letter to the Senate, 613. Modeſt entry into Rome, 615. Generous remittances, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Scythians, ibid. Severity to ſome worthies, 616. Progreſs through the empire, 617. Narrow eſcape in Spain, 618. Return to Rome, 619. To Athens, ibid. Into the Eaſt, ibid. To Africa, 620. Syria and Egypt, 621, 622. Obſervations on that country, ibid. Unnatural Love to Antinous, 624. Exaſperates the Jews, 625, 626. Severity againſt them, 628, 629. Stay and Munificence at Athens, 633. Return to Rome, 634. Sickneſs, 635. Names Verus his ſucceſſor, ibid. Cruelties, 637. Adopts Antoninus, 638. Suffers intolerable pains, 639. Dies at Bajæ, 641. His Verſes to his Soul, ibid. Year of his death, ibid, n. Funeral, buildings, &c. 642. Huge Mauſoleum, 643. Character, laws, &c. 644. Writings, 647, n. Temple built by Antoninus, 669.

Ægyptians maſſacreed by the Jews, 590.

Ælia Petina divorced by Claudius, 102.

Ælia,

Ælia Capitolina, Jeruſalem ſo named by Adrian, 630.

Ælian's, Writings and Character, 655, n.

Æmilia and two other veſtals put to death, 598.

Æmilius Pacenſis reſtored by Otho, 347. Put to death by the Soldiers of Vitellius, 403.

Ætna mount viſited by Adrian, 620.

Afranius the poet's comedy intitled Incendium, acted before Nero, 222.

——Quinctilianus conſpires againſt Nero, 236.

Africa, faithful to Vitellius againſt Veſpaſian, 382. Honoured by Adrian, 620.

Africanus Jul. arraigned, 6.

Agerinus ſent by Agrippina to Nero, 197. Seized and impriſoned, 198.

Agreſtis Jul. begs to go and view the deſolations of Cremona, 396. His report of it miſconſtrued, 397. Kills himſelf, ibid.

Agricola, the mother of Julius, her tender care of him, 443. Killed by the ſoldiers of Otho, 444.

——Julius, his excellent character, pedigree, &c. 443. Sent into Britain, ibid, & ſeq. Serves under Cerealis, 445. Promoted by Veſpaſian, ibid. His ſwift ſucceſs againſt the Britons, 446. Recovers the iſland Angleſey, ibid. Redreſſes the grievances of the Britons, 447. His ſingular modeſty, ibid. Wholeſome regulations, ib. & ſeq. His ſecond campaign in Britain, 460. Suppoſed to have croſſed over into Scotland, 461. Debauches the Britons ſimplicity, 462. Skill in fortifying, 463. Diſcipline, ib. Farther conqueſts, 464. Deſign upon Ireland, 473. Succeſs in Caledonia, 474. Speech, to his army 481. Routs the Enemy, 484. Conquers Britain, 487. Recalled, 488. Obtains triumphal honours, ib. Leads a private and retired life, 489. Refuſes the proconſulſhip of Aſia, 492. His death, 507. Whether natural or by Poiſon, ibid. His character, 508, & ſeq.

Agrippa Vibulenus put to death, 22.

——, the grandſon of Herod, impriſoned by Tiberius, 29. Releaſed by Caligula, 43. Made tetrarch by him, 46. Buries the murdered emperor, 96. Perſuades Claudius to accept of the empire, 108. Advanced by him, 113, & ſeq. By Nero, 171. Goes to ſalute Galba, 302. Declares for Veſpaſian, 379. Inſulted by the Alexandrian Jews, 708, & ſeq. Letters to Joſephus, 695, n.

——Fonteius's ſucceſs againſt the Dacians, 410.

——, the ſon of Felix, deſtroyed by mount Veſuvius, 460.

Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, her death, 14. Honours done her by Caligula, 42.

——— the daughter of Germanicus, highly honoured by Caligula, 43. Debeauched by Lepidus, and baniſhed, 75, & n. Recalled, 113. Murders her huſband, 141. Propoſed to Claudius, ibid. & n. Married to him, 142. Her deſpotic ſway, 102, 143. Horrid cruelties, 144. Treachery to Stat. Taurus, 161. To Lepida, 163. Poiſons her huſband, 165, & n. Helliſh policy againſt Britannicus, 166, 167. Cruelty and ambition, ibid. Harſh behaviour to Nero, 171. Fawns on him, 174. Cabals againſt him, 179. Accuſed by Silana, 180. Acquitted, ibid. Unnatural proſtitution, 193. Journey to Baiæ, 195. & ſeq. Eſcapes being drowned by Anicetus, 197. Diſſembles her reſentment, ibid. Her laſt words and death. 199. Funeral, 200.

——Cn. Domitius's conſulſhip 3, 4, & n.

Alabarch of the Jews, his Office, 683.

Alani where ſituate, 440. Irruption into Media, &c. ibid. Carry off a great booty, ibid.

Albanians ſubdued by Trajan, 580. Refuſe to come to Adrian, 622.

Albinus Lucius murdered by the Moors, 307, & ſeq.

Albium Intemelium plundered by Otho, 349.

Albucilla's condemnation and puniſhed, 24, 25.

Alexander Tiberius governor of Egypt, 379. A friend to Veſpaſian, ibid.

——the Jewiſh alabarch impriſoned, 689, 690 & ſeq.

Alexandrians baſe condeſcenſion to Caligula, 60. and the appendix. Flattery to Nero, 224. Ingratitude to Adrian, 623.

Alexandria built by Adrian, 623.

——the Muſeum, 623.

Allobroges oppreſſed by Valens, 357.

Alphabet, how far inlarged by Claudius, 100, & 101, n.

Alpinus Jul. put to death by Cæcina, 339.

Ancona the port of made by Trajan, 588.

Andromachus's poem on theriac, 293.

Angleſey taken by the Romans, 206. Some brutiſh cuſtoms of its inhabitants, ibid. Loſt, and retaken by Agricola, 446.

Anicetus's contrivance to drown Agrippina, 194. Defeated 197. Sent to diſpatch her, 198. Murders her 199. Acknowledges a criminal correſpondence with Octavia, 220. Baniſhed into Sardinia, dies there. 221.

——— king Polemon's freed-man, raiſes a revolt revolt in Pontus, 411. Defeated, ibid. His death, ibid.

Annæus Serenus, a confident of Nero's amours with Acte, 174. His character, ibi.

——Cornut. baniſhed by Nero, 269. His excellent character and writings, ibid. & 270, n.

Anſibarii driven out by the Chauci, 190. Their Miſerable end, 191.

Anteius aſſaſſinated, 105.

——Publ. made governor of Syria, 181. betrayed by Soſianus, 257. His death, ibid.

Anthemiſia, ſubdued by Trajan, 586.

Antinous's death, an account of. 624.

Antiochus reſtored to his kingdom by Caligula, 40. Accompanies him into Gaul, 72.

——king of Comagne, defeated, 440. Deprived of his kingdom, ib.

Antioch damaged by an earthquake, 587. By fire, 671. Rebuilt by Antoninus, ibid.

Antiſtius the prætor, baniſhed for a ſatire againſt Nero, 215, 216.

——Luc. timely advice to Plautus rejected 218 & ſeq. & n.

Antonia, the daughter of Anthony, her cruel death by Caligula her grandſon, 50, 51.

——daughter of Claudius, married to Cn. Pompeius, 102, 112. To Fauſtus Sylla, 127. Refuſes to marry Nero, 253. Put to death, ib.

Antonius Honoratus, his noble ſpeech againſt Nymphidius. 305, 306, ——Novellus made general under Otho, 347.

——Primus baniſhed for forgery, 214. Declares for Veſpaſian, 381. His character, ibid. & ſeq. Perſuades the Illyrians to march againſt Vitellius, 383, Enters Italy, 384. Takes many conſiderable cities, ibid. & ſeq. Advances to Bedriacum, 388. His bravery and ſucceſs againſt the Vitellians, at Cremona, 389. Attacks the city and takes it, 392, & ſeq. Pardons the Vitellians, 393. Advances to Fano, 397. Paſſes the Apennines, 399. Haſtens to ſave the capitol, 404, & 405, n. Anſwer to Vitellius, 406. Drives his troops into the city, ibid. & ſeq. Takes it 407. His unmerciful plunder of it, 410. Conſular dignity, ibid. Untimely envied by Mucianus, 418. Over-reached by him, 430, Sinks in his character, ibid. His reception by Veſpaſian, 431.

——L. revolts in Germany againſt Domitian, 502. Defeated and killed, ibid.

Antoninus that name why eſteemed by the Romans, 667.

——Arrius's ſpeech to Nero, 548.

—Pius's firſt conſulſhip, 617. Adopted by Adrian, 596. His love for him, 640. Speech to the Senate, 642. Why ſurnamed Pius, 643, 662. His extract, 648. Second conſulſhip, 657. Iſſue 658. Excellent character, 659. Why and when adopted by Adrians, 661. Made high Pontiff, 663. His meekneſs and generoſity. 664. Love for learned men, 665. Buildings, ibid. Highly eſteemed by all nations, 666. Letters in favour of the chriſtians. 670. Sickneſs and deaths, 671. Funeral honours, 672.

Ape an, reportedto be born of a woman, 145, n.

Apion's character, and embaſſy againſt the Jews, 683. Writings, 691, n.

Appian's writings and character, 672, n. & ſeq. n.

Apollo's temple dedicated by Caligula 60.

Apollones foretels Caligula's death, 92, n.

Appollonius Saturn taxed nine millions by Caligula 67.

——Tyanæus come to Rome, 516. How received there, ib. Stirs up Nerva againſt Domitian ibid. An account of his life, travels, &c. 526. & ſeq. Ordered to be ſeized by Domitian, 538. His defence before him, 539. Invited to Rome by Nerva, 540. Diſappears, ib. Foreſight of his death, ibid. Refuſes Nerva's invitation, ibid. His end uncertain, ibid. Pretended miracles and high character, confuted, ibid, & ſeq. Honoured by ſeveral emperors, &c. 543. His worke, 544. perſuades Nerva toaſſume the purple, 546.—— The Stoics haughty behavsour to Antoninus, 660, 661.

Apollodorus famous bridge, 571, 572. Other great Works, 597. Mortified by Adrian, 621. Baniſhed and put to death, bid. & ſeq.

Aponius one of Nero's informers, 289.

——Marcus triumphs over the Roxolanians, 343.

——Saturnius gives notice of Veſpaſians revolt, 382. Declares for him, 384.

Aqueducts made by Claudius, 157.

Aquilia Vedius, commander of a Legion, inſulted by the ſoldiers, 358, 359.

Aquinas the murderer of Capite, 316.

Aquitani, declares for Vitellius, 342.

Arabia Petrea invaded by Palma, 575.

—Felix invaded by Trajan, 588.

Arabia

Arabia Endemon, why ſo called, 589.
Arbela, taken by Trajan, 585.
Arriminum, taken by Fuſcus, 397.
Ariſtides prefers an apology, in favour of the Chriſtians, 647.
Arius Antoninus his excellent character, 653.
Ariſtobulus promoted by Nero, 171.
Armenians plead before Nero, 171. Subdued by Domit, Corbulo, 191.
Armenia ſubjected the Romans, 579, Allowed to chooſe a king, 614.
Arretinus Clemens promoted by Mucianus, 431.
Arrian writes Trajan's hiſtory, 580. His books loſt, 582. An account of his work, 651, n.
—— governor of Cappadocia ſuppreſſes the Maſſagetes, 631. Inſtructions and order of battle, 632. March round the Euxine ſea, ibid. Whether the ſame with the hiſtorian, 651, n.
Arria's heroic conſtancy and death, 119, & n.
——her daughter prevented following her example, 262. Baniſhed by Domitian, 514.
Arruntius Lucius betrayed by Macro, 24. Bleeds himſelf to death, 25.
Artabanus king of Parthia, makes peace with Vitellius, 47.
Artemidorus the philoſopher, baniſhed by Domitian, 516.
Artificers taxed by Caligula, 67.
Arviragus's war with Domitian, 487.
Aruntius Stella, promoted by Nero, 181.
Aruſcius Lucius put to death, 21, 22.
Aſcletarion makes good his prediction againſt Domitian, 522.
Aſiaticus, Vitellius's baſe freed-man, knighted, 367. Exceſſive wealth and ſway, 376. Put to death like a ſlave by Mucianus, 418.
Aſinius Pollio, his death, 12. & 13, n.
—— Marcellus baniſhed for forgery, 214.
Aſper Sulpitius conſpires againſt Nero, 236. His conſtancy and death, 246, 247.
Aſprenas Lucius, killed by Caligula's guards, 105.
Aſſyria reduced by Trajan, 585.
Aſtrologers, expelled by Claudius, 156. By Vitellius, 369. Proclaim an edict againſt him, ibid. Foretel Domitian's death, 522.
Athenians highly favoured by Adrian, 619, 633.
Athens beautified by Adrian, 633. How governed under him, 634.
—— New built, 634. Its famous aqueduct finiſhed, 667.
Atticus Julius boaſts himſelf the murderer of Otho, 327.
— Quinct. the conſul, loaded with chains by the Vitellians, 403. Takes the odium of burning the capitol, 404.
— Aulus, bravery and death, 485.
Attilius Verus, his bravery and death, 390.
Atticus finds a treaſure in his Houſe, 550. How bid to uſe it, ibid.
Atra beſieged by Trajan, 593.
Auguſtus, the temple of, rebuilt by Adrian, 618.
Aulus Gellius, a diſciple of Favorinus, 649, n. His character of Epictetus, 650, n. Of Calviſius, 674, n. Of Fronto, 675.
Aurelian family, an account of, 651. & ſeq.
Aurelius Marcus, his character of Antoninus, 664. Created Cæſar by him, 667. Choſen conſul, 668. Highly eſteemed by Antoninus, 669. Appointed his ſucceſſor, 671.
Aurum coronarium, what, 662.
Aventine mount burnt, 21.
Avitus drives out the Friſians, 189, 190. Harſh behaviour to the Anſibarii, 191.
Auſpex's pacific counſel to the Gauls, 425.
Auſtin, St. judgment of Veſpaſian's miracles, 432.

B.

BAbilus an aſtrologer's bloody advice to Nero, 235.
Babylon, its ruined ſtate in Apollonius's time, 534, 535. Falſely deſcribed by Philoſtratus, ibid. Taken by Trajan, 585. Entered by him, 586.
Bactrians ally with Adrian. 622. Embaſſy to Antoninus, 666.
Baiæ, the famous bridge of, built by Caligula, 64, & ſeq.
Balbilius C. made governor of Egypt, 181. His character, writings, &c. 293, n.
Balbus Lælius, a ſenator, degraded, 26.
Bactrians allies with Adrain, 622. Embaſſy to Antoninus, 666.
Barcokebas, a falſe Meſſiah, ſtirs up the Jews, 626. Defeated and impriſoned, 628.
Baſilides's prediction of Veſpaſian's grandeur, deur, 415, n. Appears to him at at Alexandria, 432.

Baſſus Cæſius a lyric poet, deſtroyed by mount Veſuvius, 293, n. 460.

—— Lucius declares for Veſpaſian, 386. Cauſes a revolt in the fleet, 387.

Batavian cohorts ſent into Britain, 370. Diſmiſſed, 372.

Batavians revolt againſt the Romans, 418. Their ſucceſs againſt them, 420. Defeated, 421. Forgiven and left in ſtatu quo, 429. Bravery againſt the Caledonians, 483.

Bathybius, one of the conſpirators againſt Caligula, his behaviour, 92, 93.

Bauli, the villa of, deſcribed, 195, n.

Bedriacum, where ſituate, 356. The battle of, 357.

Beneventum, the highway of, made by Trajan, 583.

Benignus Orphid. defeated and killed, 358. Buried, 359.

Bericus, a fugitive, ſtirs up Claudius to the conqueſt of Britain, 122.

Beryllus, Nero's Greek ſecretary, 170.

Beſancon beſieged by the Gauls, 281. Relieved by the Romans, ibid.

Beſſus Salvius, his poetic works, 453, n.

Betaw iſland, where ſituate, 419. Ravaged by the Friſians, ibid.

Bether taken from the Jews, 627.

Bithynians oppreſſed by J. Cilo, 159. By Bæbius Maſſa, 510.

Bithynia adorned by Arian, 619. And reſtored, 620.

Blæſi, the two, fall by their own hands, 22.

Blæſus Jun. declares for Vitellius, 336. Furniſhes him with a ſuitable equipage, 368. Hated by him for it, ibid.

Boadicea ill-treated by the Romans, 207. Heads the Britons againſt them, 209. Her ſucceſs at firſt, ibid. Speech to the army, 211. Defeated poiſons herſelf, 212.

Bœtica, the province of, inlarged by Otho, 343.

Boiacalus leader of the Anſibarii his brave ſpeech to Avitus, 190. His noble behaviour and his diſintereſtedneſs, ibid.

Bolanus Vet ſent into Britain, 370. Inclines to Veſpaſian, 382.

Bononia relieved by Nero's means, 160.

Boſporus king of, ſubmits to Trajan, 580.

Bramans converſe with Apollonius Tyan, 535.

Brigantes in Britain, who, 151. Subdued by Oſtorius, ibid. Reduced by the Romans, 668.

Briganticus Jul. goes over to Vitellius, 425. Joins Felix, 426.

Brinio ridicules Caligula's mock expedition, 73.

— heads the Friſians againſt the Romans, 419.

Britain invaded by Claudius, 121, & 122. n. Greatly oppreſſed by the publicans, 447. Eaſed by Agricola, ibid. How diſcovered to be an iſland, 476. Totally conquered by Agricola, 477. Viſited by Adrian, 618. Walls built in it by him, ibid.

Britains diſarmed by Plautius, 123, & ſeq. Revolt, 150. Defeated by Oſtorius, ibid. & ſeq. Make a general revolt, 207, & ſeq. Encouraged to it by ſome prodigies, 209, Defeat the Romans, ib. & ſeq. 80,000 killed by Paulinus, 212. Subdued by Agricola, 446, & ſeq. Debauched into Roman luxury by him, 462. Totally ſubdued, 477.

Britannicus, the ſon of Claudius, born, 102. Ill-treated by Agrippina and Nero, 146, 166. Hated by Nero, 176. His deſtruction reſolved, he is poiſoned, 177, 178. Honoured by Titus, 454.

Britons puniſhed for offering human ſacrifices. 598.

Bructarians defeated in Germany, 560. Where ſeated.

Burrhus Afr. advanced to be captain of the prætorian bands by Agrippina, 149. Promotes Nero's election, 166. Made his military governor, 168. Blamed for his remiſſneſs to him, 173, 179. Accuſed of treaſon and acquitted, 181. Advice about Agrippina, 198. Condeſcenſion to Nero, 200, 203. His death, 216. Whether a natural one, ibid.

Byzantium made a Roman province, 441.

C.

CAdicia, Scevinus's wife, baniſhed by Nero, 249.

Cæcina Alienus declares for Vitellius, 333 Sent againſt Otho, 336. Commits dreadful havock in Helvetia, 338. Succeſs in Italy, 350. Beſieges Placentia, 351. Succeſs at Caſtores, 352. Defeats Otho, at Bedriacum, 358. Sent againſt Veſpaſian, 385, & ſeq. Declares for him, 386. Clapt in irons, ib. Releaſed, 387. Conſpires againſt Veſpaſian, 449, Put to death by Titus, ibid.

Cæſarea Germanica, by whom built, 46.

Cæſareana, Mauritania whence ſo called, 498, 499.

Cæſarea, rebuilt by Adrian, 620.

Cæſianus L. Apronius's conſulſhip, 61, & n.

Cæſonia ſuſpected of turning Caligula's brain, 48. Made prieſteſs to him, 60. Married to him, 78, & n. Murdered by Chærea, 95.

Cæſonius Max. baniſhed by Nero, 249.

Caledonians invaded by Agricola, 474. Attack the ninth legion, and are repulſed, 475. Brave defence, 478. Defeated and routed 482, & ſeq. Their deſpair, 486. Recover their liberty, ibid.

Calenus Jul. carries the news of Vitellius's defeat into Gaul, 394.

Caligula Caius, married to Claudia, 16. Whether nominated to ſucceed Tiberius, 29. Saved by Macro, 30, & ſeq. Reception at Rome, 39, 40. When and where born, 39, n. Whence ſurnamed Caligula, ib. Declared emperor 40. Piety to his mother, &c. 41. Mild beginining, 44. Conſulſhip and ſpeech to the ſenate, 45. Generoſity and honours, 46. Strangely altered after his illneſs, 48. Aſſumes unbecoming titles, 49. Cruelty to young Tiberius, ibid. To Antonia, 50. To all who come in his way, 52, & ſeq. Abandons himſelf to all wickedneſs, 50. Conduct to Ganinius Julius, 53. Exceſſive grief for his inceſtuous ſiſter, 56. Marriages and divorces, 57. Aſſumes divine honours, 58. Mad impieties, 59. Ridiculed by an honeſt Gaul, ibid. n. His inhuman wiſh, 61, 62. Whimſical honours to his horſe, 62. Biting ſpeech to the ſenate, 63. Stupendous bridge, 64. Throws great numbers into the ſea, 65. Horrid extortions, 66. Depoſes the two Conſuls, 70. His mock invaſion of Gaul, 72. Boaſting letter to the ſenate, 74. Cruelty to the Gauls, ibid. Conſpired againſt, ib. Turns broker, 76. His extravagance and luxury, ib. Marries Cæſonia, 78. Defeats the Germans, ibid. Splendid ſhews at Lyons, 80. Cruelty to Ptolemy, 82. Mock expedition againſt Britain, ib. & ſeq. Returns to Rome, and to his butcheries, 83. Cruelty to Proculus and others, 85. Surpriſing fickleneſs, 86, & n. Affronts to the brave Chærea, 88. Conſpired againſt, 87. Strange fondneſs for dancing, &c. 91, & n. Aſſaſſinated, 95, & n. Burial and diſhonours, 96. Perſecution of the Alexandrian Jews, 676.

Callinicus Sutorius's writings and character, 673, n.

Calviſia's generoſity treated by Pliny, 605, n.

Calviſius Taurus's writings and character, 673, n.

Calpurnia a courteſan informs againſt Meſſalina, 135.

Calviſius the accuſer of Agrippina, 180. Baniſhed, 181.

Camelodunum taken by the Romans, 123.

Camillus Furius, plots againſt Claudius, 118. Abandoned by his ſoldiers, and aſſaſſinated, ibid.

Campania ruined by an earthquake, 222. By the eruptions of mount Veſuvius, 459.

Cangi in Britain ſubdued, 151.

Caninius put to death for his advice to Caligula, 53. His intrepidity under it, ibid.

Capito Coſſutius baniſhed, 185.

Capitol ſet on fire by the Vitellians, 402, 403. And rebuilt by Veſpaſian, 435.

Capito Titius's writings and character, 605, n.

Capitoline games exhibited, 576.

Capitolinus Jul. account of Antoninus, 663.

Caractacus's valour againſt the Romans, 152. Defeated, 153. Brave ſpeech to Claudius, ibid. Juſt reflection on the Romans, 154.

Cardueni ſubjued by Trajan, 586.

Carinas a tool of Nero's rapines 234.

Cariomerus driven out of his kingdom by the Cattans, 490. Left in the lurch by Domitian, ib. & ſeq.

Carthage the ſquare of, reſtored by Antoninus, 671.

Cartiſmandua's treachery to Caractacus, 153. To her own huſband, 155, 156. Marries his armour-bearer, ibid.

Cartrou, father's, partiality animadverted, 38, n.

Caſperius raiſes a tumult againſt Nerva, 553. Puniſhed, ibid.

Caſſianus, biſhop of Jeruſalem, 630.

Caſſius Dion's judgment about Adrian's Adoption, 596.

Caſtration forbid by Nerva, 550.

Caſſius Chærea conſpires againſt Caligula, 87, & ſeq. His intrepidity, 91. Murders him, 95, & n. Conceals himſelf, 105. Put to death by Claudius, 111. & n.

——Cai. Longinus baniſhed by Nero, 253. & ſeq.

Catamites publicly encouraged by Nero, 225.

Catans, who, and where ſituate, 418. Invaded by Domitian, 477.

Celer. the murderer of Jul. Silanus, 184. Shamefully acquitted by Nero, ib.
— one of Nero's architects, 230. His projected canal, 231.
— Ignatius condemned, 430.
Celsus Junius his death, 10.
— Marius strives to quell the revoltess againſt Galba, 326. Repulsed by them, ib. Saved by Otho, 331. Pardoned and raiſed by him, 348. Sent againſt Vitellius, 352. Succeſs againſt Cæcina, 353. Removed, ib. Wholeſome advice to Otho, 354, 356.
— Juvenius's conſpiracy againſt Domitian, 517, & ſeq. His narrow eſcape, ib.
Celsus put to death, 616.
Celeſtis dea, her anſwer to Antoninus Pius, 663.
Centum Portæ, by whom built, 570.
Cephalenæ iſland given to the Athenians, 633.
Cephiſus the bridge of, built by Adrian, 619.
Cerealis Petilius defeated by the Britons, 209. Endeavours to relieve the capitol, 404. Defeated, 405. Sent againſt the revolted Germans, 426. Succeſs againſt them, ib. Forgives the mutinous Legions, 427. Bravery againſt the Treverians, ib. Narrow eſcape, 428. Revenge, ib. Tampered in vain by Domitian, 469.
— Anicius put to death, 257.
— Turull. goes over to Vitellius, 351.
— Civicus put to death by Domitian, 492.
Certus's baſeneſs to Helvidius, 513. Degraded, ib. Dies in the utmoſt terror, ibid.
Certus, a ſenator impeached by Pliny, 551. Dies of grief, ib.
Chaiſes port, by whom invented, 597.
Chaldea ſubdued by Trajan, 585.
Chærea Caſſ. vid. Caſſius, 87, & ſeq.
Chalcis the kingdom of, united to the empire, 506.
Charicles diſcovers Tiberius's illneſs, 27.
Chauci ſubdued by Corbulo, 132.
Cheruſci oppreſſed by Italicus, 132.
Chilo Vett. put to death, by Galba, 304.
Chriſt crucified, 17.
Chriſtians perſecuted by Nero, 232, & ſeq. Confounded with the Jews by Tacitus, ib. n. Hated by Domitian, 494. Perſecuted, 518.
Chriſtians tolerated by Nerva, 549. Perſecuted by Trajan, 598. By the Jews, 626. Delivered and parted from them, 630. Perſecuted by Adrian, 646. Favoured by Antoninus, 670.
Chryſoſtom Dion. forced to a private and laborious life, 516. Appeaſes the tumultuous Getæ at Domitian's death, 525, 226.
Ciaconius's account of Trajan's column, 597.
Cilicia made a Roman province, 441.
Cilo Jun. accuſed of extortions, 159. Cleared by Narciſſus's impudence, 160.
Cincian law, what, 130, & 131, n.
Civilis Claud. vid. ſub Claudius, 419, & ſeq.
Claſſicanus's treachery to Suetonius, 212.
Claſſicus heads the revolted Gauls, 423. Cauſes Vocula to be murdered, 424. And the Romans to ſubmit, ib. His ſucceſs and ſeverity againſt them, ib. Total overthrow, 428.
Claſſicus accuſed of extortion, 564. Kills himſelf, ib.
Claudia daughter of Silanus, married to Caligula, 16.
— daughter of Claudius, diſowned by him, 102.
Claudius the emperor choſen conſul, by Caligula, 45. Deſpiſed, 50. Affronted by him in Gaul, 77. His pedigree, character and private life, 96, & ſeq. Univerſally deſpiſed, 97. His learning and writings, 100. & ſeq. & n. Proclaimed emperor, by the ſoldiery, 107. & ſeq. By the ſenate, 109. His great moderation, &c. 111. Renders him contemptible, 113. Builds a new haven at Oſtia, 116, & n. Shameful Cowardice, 112, 117, & n. Succeſsful expedition againſt Britain, 121, & ſeq. Triumph over them, 124, & n. Enacts ſome wholeſome laws, ib. Informed of his wife's lewdneſs, &c. 135. Reſolves upon a ſecond marriage, 140, & 141, n. Pitches upon Agrippina, 142. Enlarges the city, 145. His kindneſs to Caractacus, 154. Aqueduct, canal and ſea-fight, 157, & ſeq. Omens before his death, 162, & n. Poiſoned by his wife, 165. His character vindicated againſt Seneca, ib. & ſeq. Funeral honours, 167. Apotheoſis, 171.
— Civilis raiſes a revolt in Batavia, 418, & ſeq. Joined by the Cninefates, 419. Succeſs againſt the Romans, 420. Diſſimulation to Veſpaſian, ib. & ſeq. Reſolves to ſhake off the Roman yoke. 421. Beſieges their camp, 422. Surpriſes them, 427. Totally overthrown, 428. Supriſes Cerealis's camp, ib. Forgiven, and ſubmits to him, ib.
Claudius enlarges Alexander's Muſeum, 623.

——Maximus's writings and Character, 674 n.

Clemens Agrippa, Plots againſt Caligula, 89, & n.

—Suedius made general by Otho, 347.

—Flavius choſen Conſul, 517. Martyred under Domitian, 518. His character, 519. Wrongly confounded with Clement, biſhop of Rome, ib. His children martyred with him, 520.

Cluvius M. Ruf. acquitted and honoured by Vitellius, 370. His character and works, 453, n.

Clyde, the iſthmus of, fortified by the Romans, 464.

Coans infranchiſed by Claudius, 160, & 161, n.

Cocceius Nerva ſtarves himſelf, 448.

Cœnus's ſtratagem in favour of the Othonians, 365. His death, ibid.

Cogidunus rewarded by the Romans, 151.

Cohorts how regulated by Adrian, 644.

Colchis ſubmits to Trajan, 580.

Cologn, whence ſurnamed Agrippina, 147. Declares for Vitellius, 335.

Comagene, the kingdom of, reſtored to Antiochus, 46.

Comet appears in Nero's reign, 204.

Commo, Commum the birth-place of Pliny, 604, n. His benefactions to it, ib.

Commodus L. Verus ſee under Verus, 638.

Confidus Proculus, put to Death, 12.

Conſulate ſhortened to three months, 563.

Corbulo depoſed from his conſulſhip, 61, n. Kills himſelf, ib.

——Domit. his excellent character, 268. Put to death by Nero, 269.

Corinth, the iſthmus of, in vain attempted by Caligula, 78, n. And by other emperors, 267.

Corelia, Pliny's generoſity to, 605.

Cornelia, a veſtal buried alive, 474.

Cornutus Annæus vid. ſub. Annæus 269.

Coſſitanus the falſe accuſer of Thraſea, 260.

Coſſius's wonderful ſecrecy, 16.

Cos overturned by an earthquake, 671. Repaired by Antoninus, ib.

Coſrhoes invaded by Trajan, 577. Forced to ſubmit, 582. Slips away, 586. His golden throne ſaiz'd by Trajan, ib. Recalled by Adrian, 614.

Cotta Meſſalinus's trial and character, 5, & n. Pardoned by Tiberius, ib.

Cottius, M. Jul. advanced by Claudius, 124.

Cotys king of Thrace, made king of Arabia, 51.

Counts of Africa, their origin, 71.

Craſſus Frugi put to death by Meſſalina, 127.

Craſſus's conſpiracy againſt Nerva, 552. Baniſhed, ib.

—— againſt Trajan, 576.

Cremona ſet on fire by Primus, 392. Surrendered to him, ib. Plundered and burnt, 393. When founded, ib. n. Rebuilt 394. The battle of, 389.

Criſpinilla, one of Nero's bawds, 315. Her plot to famiſh Rome, 316. Pardoned by Galba, ib.

Criſpinus Ruf. turned out by Agrippina, 148. Put to death by Nero, 257.

——a centurion murders Fonteius Capito 316. Put to death, 336.

——Varius the innocent cauſe of a ſedition, 344. And of his own death, ib.

Cteſiphon taken by Trajan, 386.

Cumæ damaged by an earthquake, 459.

Curiatius Matern. his dramatic works, 453, n.

Curtius Rufus advanced by Claudius, 132. Whether the ſame with Q. the hiſtorian, 133, n.

Cutylæ, the waters of, extremely cold, 450.

Cyclades, the province of, what, 441.

Cyprus, 250,000 Jews revolt at, 591. All deſtroyed, ib. & 592.

D.

DAcians revolt againſt the Romans, 410. Suppreſſed by Mucianus, ibid. Their character, 496. Country, ib. Invade the Romans, 497. Force them to make peace, 500.

—— war with Trajan, 566. Ravaged by him, 567, 572. Subdued, 573.

Damis a diſciple of Apollonius Tyan, writes his life, &c, 534. Sent by him to Nerva, 540.

Danube the famous bridge over, deſcribed, 571.

Decebalus made king of the Dacians, 497. Defeats Fuſcus ibid. Proud meſſage to Domitian, 498. Succeſs againſt him, 499. Defeated by Julianus, ibid. Outwits him, ibid. & ſeq. Forces Domitian to a ſhameful Peace, 500. Acknowledged by him as king, ibid.

Decebalus wars with the Romans, 566. Defeated, 567. Sues for Peace, ibid. Revolts, 570. Treachery, ibid. Subdued, 573. Kills himſelf, ibid. His vaſt treaſures diſcovered, ibid, & 574.

Decianus Catus's extortions in Britain, 208. Cowardly flight, 209.

Demetrius a cynic, mortified by Vespasian, 436. Entertains Apollonius, 536, 538.

——— Alexand. a disciple of Favorinus, 650. Beloved by Adrian, ibid. n.

Diogenes's, writings and character, 655, n.

Dion Cassius's account of Adrian, 648, n. Life of Antoninus lost, 663.

Dionysius a famed geographer, when he flourished, 36. n.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, his writings and character, 654. n. Why surnamed Atticus, ib.

Dividurum, now Metz, plundered by the Vitellians, 337.

Dodwell's sentiment about Adrians adoption examined, 596, & 641, n.

Dolabella Corn. confined at Aquitanium, 347. Accused of treason, 369. Massacred by Vitellius, ib.

Dolphins, a fight between them and crocodiles exhibited, 293, n.

Domitia Longina married to Domitian, 468.

Domitian the son of Vespasian, 413, His narrow escape out of the capitol, 403, & n. Saluted Cæsar, 409. First indices of his debauchery, 410. Chosen prætor, ibid. Takes the prætorship of the city upon him 429. First appearance in the senate, 430. Suspected of poisoning his brother, 465. His ingratitude to him, 466. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. His private life and character, 467. Gallic expedition diverted by Mucianus, 468. Studies poetry, &c. 469. Why surnamed Germanicus, 470. Reviles the memory of his brother, ibid. His generous conduct upon his first exaltation, ibid, & seq. Publick buildings, 471. Repairs the libraries, 472. Diversion in catching of flies, ibid. Wholesome laws, ibid. Cruelty to Sabinus, 473. Sham triumph over the Cattans, 477. Envy and dissimulation to Agricola, 488. Recalls him from Britain, ibid. Sham victories in Sarmatia, 490. Cruelties, 491. Universal jealousy, 492. Rapines and extortions, 494. Assumes divine honours, 495. Institutes the capitoline sports, 496. Loses his armies in many provinces, 497. Jealous of Agricola, 498. Marches against the Dacians, ibid. Treachery to the Quadi and others, 500. Shameful flight ibid. Forced to a shameful peace with the Dacians, ibid. His mock triumph over them, 501. Celebrates the secular games, ibid. Butcheries at Rome, 502, 503. His land and naval shews, 505. Ghastly entertainment to the senators and Knights, ibid. & seq. Edict against the growth of vines, 506. Of what duration, ibid. Suspected of poisoning Agricola, 507. Expedition against the Sarmatians, 511. Horrid cruelties and butcheries, ibid. & seq. Hatred against philosophers, 515. Conspired against, 517. Outwitted by Celsus, ibid. Repairs several roads, 518. Persecutes the christians, ibid. & seq. Threatened by prodiges, 521. Lives in perpetual terrors, 522. Has some notice of his death, 524. Murdered, 525. His private funeral 526. The authors that flourished in his time, 527, n & seq. n.

— the son of Flavius Clemens, 518, 519.

Domitillæ, one the mother, the other the sister of Domitian, 413. Martyred under him, 519, & seq.

Domitius After succeeds D. Carbulo, 61 n. His politic escape, 68 n. Consulship, 71.

Domitian's jealousy of Nerva, 547.— Death, ibid.

——Corbul. vid. sub Corbulo, 61, n.

——the son of Agrippina, marries Octavia, 144, Adopted by Claudius, 145, & n. Takes the name of Nero, &c. 146. The rest see sub Nero, 263, & seq.

Doryphorus why poisoned by Nero, 221.

Drilli, a fierce northern people, 632.

Druids encourage the Gauls against the Romans, 423.

Drusilla married to L. Cassius, 11. Privileges granted to her by Caligula, 43. Her death and incest with him, 56. Apotheosis, ibid & seq.

—the pretended daughter of Caligula born, 79. Presented by him to the gods, ibid.

Drusus Cruel death, 13.

——an impostor detected, 18.

Duras generously resigns the Dacian crown to Decebalus, 497.

E.

EArthquake in Asia destroys several cities, 572. In Galatia, 584. At Antioch, a dire one described, 587.

Edemon raises a revolt in Mauritania, 82.

Edessa taken and burnt by the Romans, 592.

Edictum perpetuum, when and by whom first published, 622.

Eleazar, a gigantic Jew, sent to Rome 47.

Eleasiane damaged by an overflow of the Cephisus, 619.

Emerita, Auguſta, new coloniſed by Otho, 343.

Emponia's ſignal fidelity to her huſband Sabinus Julius, 448. Cruelly put to death, by Veſpaſian, 449.

Epaphroditus, Nero's ſecretary, put to death, 521.

—the grammarian an account of, 533, n.

Epicharis promotes the conſpiracy againſt Nero, and animates the conſpirators, 237. Baffles her accuſers, 238. Her wonderful conſtancy on the rack, 240. Strange death, 241.

Epictetus as a philoſopher baniſhed by Domitian, 515.

Epictetus, the famed philoſopher, an account of, 650. n.

Ethnarch, among the Jews, what, 680.

Eunuchs, the making of, ſuppreſſed by Domitian, out of envy to Titus, 474.

Evodius ſent to kill Meſſalina, 139.

Euphrates falls out with Apollonius Tyan, 537. Juſtified againſt Philoſtratus, 542, & ſeq. His death, works, &c. 543.

Euphrateſiana, the kingdom of, whence ſo called, 440.

Eutropius's abridgment imperfect, 582.

Euxine ſea deſcribed by Arrian, 632.

Exiles Roman, put to death by Caligula, 69, n.

Exidares reſigns his crown to Trajan, 577.

F.

FAbius Hiſpan. baniſhed for extortion, 564.

———Marcellus's hiſtory, loſt, 582.

———Fabius Ruſticus, an account of his writings, 291, n.

Fabricius Veiento baniſhed for libelling the ſenate, 216. His writings doomed to the flames, ibid.

Fadilda, Aur. Antoninus's daughter, 658.

Fannia the wife of Senecio, baniſhed into a deſert iſland, 514.

Faventius Cl. cauſes Vitellius's fleet to revolt, 398.

Fovor, the pantomime's taunt at Veſpaſian's funeral, 451.

Favorinus's pleaſantry to Adrian, 609. An account of him and his works, 649, n. Sarcaſm againſt the Athenians, 650, n.

Fauſtina Annia married to Antoninus Pius, 658. Created Auguſta, 663. Her avarice checked by her huſband, 664. Death and lewd character, 667, 668.

———Married to M. Aurelius, 658, 667.

Felix's great ſway with Claudius, 103. Who he was, ib. n.

Felix Sextillius defeats the revolted Treverians, 426.

Feneſtella, the poet, when he flouriſhed 38, n.

Fenius Rufus captain of the guards conſpires againſt Nero, 237. His treachery and cruelty to the conſpirators, 241, & ſeq. 243. Prevents the execution of the deſign, ib. Accuſed by Scævinus, 246. His unmanly death, 247.

Flaccus Veſculator, put to death by Tiberius, 8.

——Verrius the grammarian, his writings, &c, 38 n.

——governor of Egypt, put to death 69, n.

——Herodonius ſucceeds Virginius in Gaul, 303. Oppoſed by the German troops, 317. His character ibid. His cowardice there, 334. Inclines to Veſpaſian, 382. Murdered by his ſoldiers, 412.

——Avilius governor of Egypt encourages the horrid perſecution of the Jews at Alexandria, 676. Declares them aliens, 678. Arreſted by Baſſus, and carried to Rome, 681. Baniſhed to a deſert iſland, 682. Put to death, ib.

———Valer Setin. Balb. his poems, 529, n.

Flavian Family, the origin and riſe of, 412.

——colony, by whom founded, 451.

——temple and ſtatues overturned by ſtorms, 521.

Flavius Nepos Subrius conſpires againſt Nero, 236. Prevented by the cowardly Fenius, 442.

———Sabinus made governor of Rome, 331.

——Scævinus conſpires againſt Nero, 236. Betrayed by his ſervant, 239, 240. Confeſſes the fact, 240. Accuſes Fenius Rufus, 246. Brave ſpeech at his trial, ibid. Intrepid death, ibid.

——Luc. an account of his writings, 657, n. Verſes to and from Adrian, 658.

Fonteius Capito murdered in Germany, 316. His character, ibid.

Freed-men of Claudius, their great ſway, 161.

Friſii ſeize on the Roman lands, 189. Driven out of them, 190.

Frontinus Jul. convokes the ſenate for Veſpaſian, 429. Reſigns his office, of city prætor, to Domitian, ibid.

Frontiuus's treatiſe on aqueducts, 563. His writings and character, 600, n.

Fronto's

Fronto's bold ſpeech againſt Nerva, 552. Choſen conſul, 563. His writings and character, 575, n.

Fucinus the lake of, drained by Claudius, 157, 158.

Fulvius Marc. Aurel. conſulſhip, 504.

Furius Camillus's conſulſhip, why eraſed, 4, n.

Furnilla Martia divorced by Titus, 454.

Fuſcus Cornel. advances into Umbria, 397. Choſen prætor, 410. His character, 498. Sent againſt the Dacians, ib. Deſpiſed by them, 499. Defeated and killed, ib. His ſtately monument, 501.

——put to death by Adrian, 637. Dreadful wiſh on him, ib.

G.

GAbinius P. Secund. ſucceſs againſt the Chauci, 114.

Gadavenus Theodore's character of Tiberius, 34, n.

Gaieta, the port of, made by Auſonius, 665.

Galba Serv. Sulpit. choſen conſul, 11, & n. Highly eſteemed by Claudius, 113, n. 123. Defeats the Catti, 114. Encouraged to revolt in Spain, 275. His ſpeech to his troops againſt Nero, 276, & ſeq. Saluted emperor, declines the title, 277. Proſcribed by Nero, 280. Retaliates upon him, ib. In a dangerous caſe, 283. An account of his progenitors, 297. Adopted by Livia Ocell. 298, 299, & n. His private life recapitulated, 299. Severity in Spain, 300. Saluted emperor, 301. Marches towards Rome, 302. Complimented by the embaſſadors at Narbonne, 303. Severity to the Spaniards, 304. And at Rome, 307. Governed by three rapacious Miniſters, 308. Inſtances of his own parſimony, 313. Reſumes Nero's profuſe liberalities, 314. Becomes hateful to the ſoldiery, ib. & ſeq. Severity againſt falſe informers, 315. Incenſes ſome German legions, 317. Adopts Piſo for his ſucceſſor, 318. His ſpeech to him on that occaſion, 319. Conſpired againſt by Otho, 322. Warned of him by an augur, 324. Strives to quell the revolt, 325. Deceived by falſe reports, 326, & ſeq. Forſaken by his guards, 328. Murdered, ib. His head carried in triumph, 329, 330. Buried with his body, 332. His character ib. & ſeq.

— Caius the brother of the former put to death, 22.

Galerianus Calphurn. murdered by Mucianus, 418.

Galerius Trach, ſaved by Galeria, 368.

Galena Annia married to Antoninus, 658.

Galgacus's noble ſpeech to the Caledonians, 478.

Gallio's flattery puniſhed by Tiberius, 4. Merry ſaying on Claudius's apotheoſis, 171.

Gallus treaſon and baniſhment, 125.

——Caninus ſharply reproved by Tiberius, 9, & n.

——Aul. Didius ſucceeds Oſtorius in Britain, 155. Ill ſucceſs there, ib. & ſeq.

——Glicius impeached by Quinctianus, 240.

——Ceſtius defeated by the Jews, 267.

——Rubrius obtains a pardon for the Othonians, 365.

——Herennius defeated by the Batavian cohorts, 420.

Games ſecular exhibited under Domitian, 501.

Gaming encouraged by Caligula, 67.

Ganda, a German propheteſs, pays a viſit to Domitian, 490.

Gaugamela taken by Trajan, 585.

Gavius twenty years captain of the guards, 664. Monumental inſcription on Antoninus, 667.

Gauls greatly oppreſſed by Caligula, 74. Revolt againſt Nero, 274. Defeated, 281. Declare for Vitellius, 336. Revolt from Veſpaſian, 432, & ſeq. Agree upon a peace, 435.

Gaul, viſited by Adrian, 617.

Geminius Livius's impious flattery to Caligula, 56.

Geminus Vireius quells a revolt in Pontus, 411, & ſeq.

Germany, viſited by Adrian, 617,

Geta Luſ. ſucceſs in Mauritania, 115, & n. Sent to ſeize on Silius, 136. Turned out by Agrippina, 148.

Getæ different from the Dacians, 496.

Getulicus Lentul. commander in Germany, accuſed to Tiberius, 18. Noble letter to him, ib. Put to death by Caligula, 75.

Glabrio, the conſul, forced to fight a large lion, 504. Baniſhed and murdered by Domitian, ib.

Goleſes's brave anſwer to Narciſſus, 119.

Gothofredus's account of poſt-chaiſes, 597.

Grampius mons, the battle of, 478. Where ſituate, 485, n.

Granius Martian. accuſed, 20. Kills himſelf, 21.

Graptus, the falſe accuſer of Corn. Sylla, 188, n.

Gratianus put to death, 20, & ſeq.

Gratus Epir. diſcovers Claudius's concealment, 107.

Grecinus father to Agricola. put to death by Caligula, 55, n. His excellent character, ibid.

Greece made a Roman province, 441.
Greeks, their flattery to Nero, 264. Infranchiſed by him, 265, & ſeq. And famiſhed, ibid. And plundered by him, 268.
Greeks horrid flattery to Adrian, 624.
Gymnoſophiſts whom that title properly belongs to, 537.

H.

HAlotus Claudius's taſter poiſons him, 164 & n. His crimes and extortions, 312. Screened from puniſhment by Vinius, ibid.
Harpocras, a favourite of Claudius, 103, 104 & n. Whether the ſame as Calliſthus, ib.
Hegeſippus, an account of his writings, 161. Falſly attributed to St. Ambroſe, ib.
Helico, Caligula's favourite, bought by the Alexandrians againſt the Jews, 685.
Helius, the murderer of Silanus, 168. Inſtrument of Nero's cruelties, 268, & ſeq. Makes horrid havock at Rome, 271.
Heliodorus in and out of favour with Adrian, 650, n.
Helvetii laid waſte by Cæcina, 338, & ſeq. Pardoned by Vitellius, 339.
Helvidius Priſcus's character, 441. Baniſhed by Veſpaſian, ibid. Put to death againſt the inclination of Veſpaſian, 442.
Herculanum deſtroyed by an earthquake, 459.
Hercules's temple at Rome burnt, 229.
Herennius Senecio, pleads againſt Bebius Maſſa, 510. Accuſed by him of treaſon, and put to death, ibid. & ſeq.
Herennius Philo, his writings and character, 654, n.
Hermippus's writings and character, 654.
Hermogenes put to death by Domitian, 515.
Herod Antipas diſobliges Vitellius, 47. Baniſhed by Caligula, 80. Advanced by Claudius, 113.
—— king of Batanea, accompanies Caligula into Gaul, 72.
Herodes Atticus, a diſciple of Favorinus, 649, n. Generoſity to Polemon, 653, n. Conſulſhip and high character, 668.
Heteriæ, at Rome what, 599.
Hippocentaur caught and brought to Arian, 649, n.
Hiſpalis, new colonied by Otho, 343.
Hog, a carved one over Jeruſalem's gates, 631.
Hooke's work commanded, 39, n.
Horeſtians, where ſituate, 487.
Hormus, Veſpaſian's freedman, knighted, 429.
Hyrcania ſends an embaſſy to Antoninus 666.

I.

JAnus's temple ſhut up under Nero, 263. Under Veſpaſian, 439.
Jaſon's hiſtory of Greece, 665, n.
Iazyges, who, 384. Taken in Veſpaſian's pay, ib. Joins the Suevi againſt Domitian, 490.
—— invaded by Decebalus, 570.
Iberians ſubmit to Trajan, 580, Refuſe to come to Adrian, 622.
Iceland iſland diſcovered by Agricola, 487.
Icelus Marcian, a great favourite of Galba, 308. His character, 309. Execution, 331.
Iceni in Britain, who, 150. Defeated by the Romans, ib. & ſeq. Revolt 208, & ſeq.
Icæus's character, &c. 606, n.
Jeruſalem viſited by Adrian, 614. Profaned by him, 626. Taken and razed, 627. How rebuilt and altered by him, 630.
Jews refuſe to worſhip Caligula, 60. Oppreſſed by their governors, 263. Conquered by Titus, 439. Raiſe an inſurrection at Alexandria, 441. Their temple there demoliſhed, ibid. Perſecuted by Domitian, 494. Their dreadful perſecution at Alexandria, 676.
—— revolt againſt Trajan, 590, Commit many horrid cruelties, 591. Defeated, ibid. Revolt againſt Adrian, 625. Defeat and dreadful puniſhment, 628. Whether excluded, Judæ, 629.
Ignatius, St. martyred, 583.
Ilienſes infranchiſed by Nero's means, 160.
Illyrian troops declare for Veſpaſian, 381. Their ill-timed march into Italy, 383.
Incitatus, Caligula's horſe, made his prieſt, 60. Promoted to other extravagant honours, 62.
India, whether any part of it ſubdued by Trajan, 590. Sends embaſſadors to Antoninus, 666.
Informers proſecuted by Nerva, 549, 563.
John, St. baniſhed into Pathmos, 520. Writes his apocalypſe there, ibid.
Jornandes confounds the Dacians and Goths, 497. His account of the Dacian war, ib. & ſeq.
Joſephus's prediction of Veſpaſian's reign 414, 415. His writings, 694, 695, & ſeq. In great eſteem, 696.
Iſidorus ſtirs up the Syrian governor againſt the Jews, 677. Turns evidence againſt Baſſus, Baſſus, 682. Invectives againſt the Jewiſh nation, 687.

Italicus made king of the Cheruſci, 132,

——king of Suevia, declares for Veſpaſian, 384.

——Silius the poet, an account of 531, n.

Italy greatly oppreſſed by the army, 366. Relieved by Vitellius, 370. Divided between him and Veſpaſian, 397.

Iturius accuſes Agrippa, 180. Baniſhed, ibid.

Jobones damaged by ſubterranean fire, 191. Their mad way of quenching it, ib.

Julia wife of Nero, marries R. Blandus, 16. Put to death, 121.

——daughter of Germanicus, married to Vinicius, 11. Highly honoured by Caligula, 43. The ſame with Livilla, ibid. Baniſhed for lewdneſs, 75, & n. Recalled, and baniſhed afreſh, 113, 114. Put to death 121.

Julianus Claud. treachery to Vitellius, 398. Scourged and put to death by Lucius, 404.

——Tertius broke for defection, 429. Reſtored, 430.

——Antonius an account of his writings, 693.

Julius Marinus put to death, 8.

Julianus Salvius publiſhes his perpetual edict, 622.

Julius made prince of Aſpites, 580.

——Paulus, his writings and character, 672, n.

June the month of changed, 255.

Junia, the ſiſter of Silanus, 142.

Junius Priſcus put to death, 67.

Jupiter's temple burnt, 229.

Juſtus, an account of his writings, 692.

Juſtin Martyr, his ſarcaſm on the heathens idolatry, 625. Preſents his apology to Antoninus, 670.

——the abridger of Trogus, his character, 672, n. Not the ſame with the martyr, ibid.

Juvenal the famed ſatiriſt, an account of, 531, n.

Juvenales, games inſtituted by Nero, 203.

K.

KNights Roman, their high power revived by Claudius, 162. Forbid the gladiatorial function, 369. Hated by Domitian. 505.

Knights when firſt uſed for ſecretaries, 644.

L.

LAco, a favourite of Galba, made captain of the pretorian guards, 305, 308. Styled his pædagogue, 308. His character, 309. Promotes Piſo's intereſt, 319. Put to death by Otho, 331.

Lamia Ælius's death and character. 16. Put to death by Domitian for a jeſt, 491.

Lampo inſtigates Flaccus to perſecute the Alexandrian Jews, 676. Turns evidence againſt Baſſus, 682.

Lamprias's account of Plutarch's writings, 652, n.

Langres revolts againſt Galba, 334, 335.

Largus C. choſen conſul, 114.

Largius Macedo murdered by his ſlaves, 565.

Lateran, the Baſilica of, whence ſo called, 236.

Lateranus Paulus reſtored by Nero, 173.

——Plaut. conſpires againſt Nero from a love of his country, 236, 239. His death and intrepidity, 242.

Lazi ſubmit to Antoninus, 666.

Leander Nicanor's writings and character, 665 n.

Lenas Vipſanius baniſhed, 183.

Lepida Domitia, her character, 163. Put to death by Agrippina, ibid.

——the wife of Caſſius, condemned, 254, 255.

Lepidus Manius, his death and character, 16.

——M. Æmil. debauches Caligula's ſiſter, 75, & n. Put to death for it, ib.

Libyans 200,000 maſſacred by the Jews, 591.

Licinus Mucianus, his writings, 452, n.

Ligur Var. accuſed to Tiberius, 17.

Lingones made free of Rome, 343.

Livilla ſiſter of Caligula, vid. Junia, 43, n.

Lochore, the frith of, near Edinburgh. 475. The battle of, ibid.

Locuſta, the poiſoner of Claudius, 164. Prepares poiſon for Britannicus, 177. Put to death by Galba, 310.

Lollia Paulina married to Caligula, 57. Divorced, by him, ib. Her great beauty, ib. & n. Propoſed to Claudius, 140. Put to death by Agrippina, 144, & n.

Lollius Urbicus's ſucceſs and works in Britain, 668.

London abandoned to the mercileſs Britains 210.

Longinus Caſſ. the tribune murdered for his attatchment to Galba, 326.

—— over-reached by Decebalus, 571, Poiſons himſelf, ib.

Lorium the palace of, built by Antoninus, 665.

Lucan the poet conſpires againſt Nero, 236. His poems forbidden by Nero, ib. Informs againſt his own mother, 240. And ſome others, ib. His intrepid death and laſt words, 248, & n. Writings, 293, n.

Lucilla born to M. Aurelius, 669.

Lucius the brother of Vitellius, detained by Otho, 347. Sumptuous banquet to his brother, 377. Sent againſt Veſpaſian, 398. Succeſs againſt his marines, 404. Surrenders himſelf and is put to death, 409. His character ib.

Lucius Quietus's extract and bravery under Trajan, 583. Made governor of Paleſtine, ib. & 592. Defeats the Jews, 592. Depoſed by Adrian, 614. Put to death, ib.

Lucullus Saluſt put to death by Domitian for calling lances after his own name, 491.

Lucus burnt by Valens, 338.

Lupus Jul. ſent to kill Cæſonia, 96. Put to death by Claudius 111, & n.

——Jun. baniſhed by Agrippina, 149.

Lycians disfranchiſed by Claudius, 120, & n. By Veſpaſian, 441.

Lyons, the city of, in Gaul, when burnt, 256. n. Declares for Vitellius, 338.

Lyſia viſited by Adpian, 616.

M.

MAcaon's ſtrange prophecy and death, 51.

Macer's extortions and revolt in Afric, 315. His revolt and death, ibid. & 316.

——Mar. ſucceſs againſt Vitellius, 351. Defeated and degraded, 355. Faithfulneſs to Vitellius, 382.

Macrian legion, by whom raiſed, 315.

Macro appointed to guard the emperor, 11. Treachery to Scaurus, 17. To Aruntius, 24. Ungratefully murdered with his family by Caligula, 54.

Majeſty, the laws of, renewed by Caligula, 63. Aboliſhed by Titus, 458.

——— the laws of, repealed, 549, 563, 616.

Malaſſes interview with Adrian, 621.

Manſuetus unfortunately killed by his own ſon, 390, 391. A ſcene of horror thence enſuing, ibid.

Mantinea, the infamous temple and oracle of, 624.

Marcellus Eprius ſhamefully acquitted by Nero, 184.

——— condemned for treaſon, 449. Kills himſelf, ibid.

———the falſe accuſer of Thraſea, 260.

——Cornel. put to death by Galba, 304.

Marc. St. Biſhop of Jeruſalem, 630.

Marciana's good character, 562.

Marcomanni, invaded by Domitian, 500. Put him to a ſhameful flight, ibid. Subdued by Trajan, 586.

Marines, a legion of, formed by Nero, 308. Maſſacred by Galba for mutiny, ibid. Join with Otho againſt him, 396. Puniſhed by Veſpaſian to walk without ſhoes, 434.

Marius Sextus executed, 12.

Marius Maximus his hiſtory loſt, 582.

Martialis Cornel. repulſed by Vitellius, 402. Killed by his ſoldiers, 403.

———M. Valer. the famous epigrammatiſt, an account of him, 529 n.

Maſſa Bebius, one of Domitian's informers, 491. Condemned for extortion, 510. Accuſes Senecio of treaſon, ib.

Materius, a famous philoſopher, put to death by Domitian, for declaiming againſt tyranny, 492.

Maturus Marin's fidelity to Vitellius 395.

Mauritania ſubdued by Geta, 114. Declares for Vitellius, 367.

Mauritanians defeated by the Romans, 114.

Mauricus's free ſpeech to Nerva, 551.

Maximus Appius defeats L. Antoninus, 502. Burns his papers to ſave his friends, 503.

Mebarſarpes's treachery to Adrian, 581.

Meſſa Ann. Jul. put to death by Nero, 257.

Melitene becomes an opulent city, 580.

Meſſala L. Corvin. generouſly raiſed by Nero, 185.

——— Vipſanus commands the ſeventh legion, 387.

Meſſalina married to Claudius, 102. Her great ſway with him. ib. & 113, 114. Procures the baniſhment of Seneca, 114. Cruelty and incontinency, 116, 117. Murders, &c. 127. Marriage to Silius, 135. Her accuſation and great diſtreſs, 136. Death, 139.

———Statilia, married to Nero, 253.

Meſſalinus Catul. one of Domitian's informers, 491. His death, ibid.

Meſene iſland taken by Adrian, 588.

Meſomenes ſtripped of his penſion by Antoninus. 665.

Meſopotamia ſubdued by Trajan, 581. Put under tribute, 586.

Metius Carus, one of Domitian's informers, 491.

Milan declares for Vitellius, 339.

Miletum, the temple at, begun in honour of Caligula, 60.

Milichus diſcovers a conſpiracy againſt Nero, 239. & ſeq. His reward 249.

Minerva's target, a large diſh ſo ſtyled by Vitellius, 377.

Mithridates king of Armenia, baniſhed by Caligula, 82.

——— of Iberia, reſtored by Claudius, 113. Put to death by Galba, 307.

Mneſter, a comedian, debauched by Meſſalina, 138, & n. Put to death, 139.

——— Agrippina's freedman, ſtabs himſelf at her funeral, 200.

Modicratus, the philoſopher, his works, 453, n.

Mœſians declare for Vitellius, 381, 382.

Montanus Traulus, one of Meſſalina's gallants, put to death, 139.

——— Julius almoſt kills Nero in one of his revels, 183. Diſcovered, forced to kill himſelf, ibid.

——— Alpinus ſent into Germany with the news of Vitellius's death, 394.

Moon's temple at Rome burnt, 229.

Moors repulſed and defeated by the Romans, 669.

Mopſueſtia preſerved by Antoninus, 667.

More majorum, the puniſhment what, 287.

Mucianus ſent governor of Syria, 267. Declares there for Otho, 342, 378. Confederates with Veſpaſian ib. Marches againſt Vitellius, 380. Untimely jealouſy of Primus, 405, n. Entry into Rome, 417. Motly character, ibid. Arbitrary ſway, 418. Cruelty, ibid. Treachery to Primus, 430. Puts to death the ſon of Vitellius, 431. Pleads in favour of informers, 430. Aſſumes greater authority than he ought, 436.

Municianus An. conſpires againſt Caligula, 90. Judged worthy of the empire, 110, n. Againſt Claudius, 118. Kills himſelf, ib.

Mutius Thermus turns informer, 6.

N.

NAar-malcha, the canal of, by whom made, 586.

Narbonnenſis Gaul forced to declare for Vitellius, 342.

Narbonne burnt, 671. Reſtored by Antoninus, ib.

Narciſſus ſecretary and favourite of Claudius, 104, & ſeq. A tool of Meſſalina, 117. Affronted by the Gauliſh army, 122. Betrays Meſſalina, 135. Haſtens her execution, and puts her to death, 139. Impriſoned by Agrippina, 167. Kills himſelf, ib. & ſeq.

— Nero's freedman executed, 310.

Naſamonians revolt againſt Domitian, 494. Cut off by Flaccus, ib. Whether, totally or no, ib.

Natalis Anton. confeſſes the conſpiracy againſt Nero, 239. Pardoned by him, 249.

Neapolis, Shechem whence ſo called, 451.

Nepos Licinius's decrees about ſees, 569.

Neratius Priſcus, a great lawyer, in favour with Trajan, 595.

Nero Tiber. Gemel. vid. ſub Tiberius, 27.

—— the emperor born, 51. Advanced to the toga, &c. 148. Marries Octavia, 160. His firſt orations, ib. & ſeq. Proclaimed emperor, 167. His funeral oration on Claudius penned by Seneca, 169. Firſt ſpeech to the ſenate, 170. New regulations, 171. Modeſty and moderation, 172. Slights the authority of his mother, 173. Intrigues with Acte, ib. & ſeq. Caſts off his mother's government, 174. Poiſons Britannicus, 178, & ſeq. His hypocriſy, 179. His affected clemency, 181, & ſeq. Gives a looſe to debauchery, 182, & ſeq. Generoſity, good-nature, &c. 184. Falls in love with Popea, 186. Deſign to ſuppreſs all taxes, 188. Triumphs over the Armenians, 192. Contrives his mother's death, 194. Falſehood and ſhew of filial piety, 195. Perpetrates it, 199. Letter to the ſenate upon it, 201. Grand entry into Rome, 202. Inward remorſe, 202. Gives himſelf up to muſic, plays, &c. 203. Treacherous anſwer to Seneca, 217. Murders Sylla and Plautus, 218. Baniſhes and murders Octavia, 220. Marries Poppea, 219. Joy and grief on the birth and death of his daughter, 222. Exhibits profuſe ſhews, ib. & ſeq. Turns ſtage ſinger, 223. Drops his Grecian and Egyptian expedition. 225. & ſeq. Commits the moſt unnatural obſcenities, 226. Behaviour at the burning of Rome, ibid. & ſeq. His golden palace built and deſcribed, 229, & n. Drops his projected canal, 231. Horrid plunders and extortions, 234. & ſeq. Threatened by ſeveral prodigies, 235 & n. Conſpired againſt, 236. Condemns the conſpirators, 240, & ſeq. Cruelty to their families, 248. Reſumes his harp, 251. Kills Poppea, 253. Puts many worthy perſons to death, 257. Crowns Tiridates, 263. Mad expedition to the Olympic games, 264. Wins or buys eighteen hundred prizes, 265. 266. Infatuated by the Delphic, oracle, oracle, 266. Strips Apollo's temple, ibid. His vain attemt on the Corinthian iſthmus, 267. Rapines and cruelties, 268. Puts Corbulo to death, 269. Fetched back to Rome by Helius, 271. Shipwrecked, ib. Pompous entry into Naples, Rome, &c. deſcribed, ibid. Reſumes his muſic, plays, &c. 272. Method of preſerving his voice, ibid. A new conſpiracy, 273. His ſhameful unconcern at it, 278. Mad reſentment againſt Vindex, ib. & ſeq. Againſt Galba, 279. Drops his deſperate deſigns, 280. Aſſumes the faſces, ib. His bloody deſign, ib. Incenſes the people, 284. His deſperate condition, ib. & ſeq. Abandoned by his guard, 285. Retires from Rome, 286. His diſtreſs, and deſpair, ib. & ſeq. Condemned by the ſenate, 287. Cowardice and baſeneſs, 288. Death, ib. What day he died on, 289. His funeral, character, &c. ib. Several pſeudo Neroes after him, 290. Strange opinions concerning him, 291. Writers that flouriſhed under him, ib. n. & ſeq. n. His obſequies performed by Vitellius, 377.

Nero, an impoſtor in Aſia, betrayed by the Parthians, 503.

Nerva M. Cocceius ſtarves himſelf to death, 15, 16.

——— choſen conſul, 81 & n. Amply rewarded by Nero, 250.

——— the emperor's life ſaved by an aſtrologer 491. Choſen conſul, 504. Baniſhed to Tarentum, 516. Stirred up to revolt by Apollon Tyan. 517, 538. Invites him to Rome 540.

Nerva Cocceius, the beginning of his reign, 545. Origin, ib. & ſeq, Excellent character, 546. Fearful of Domitian, 547, 548. Happy reign, 548, Generoſity, 550. Lenity, ib. & 552. Adopts Trajan, 553. His death, 554.

New Year's Gift at Rome, by whom introduced, 15.

Nicea Flavia, her monument to Pierius, 468.

——— the colony of, by whom founded, 451.

Nicea rebuilt by Adrian, 620.

Nicomedia repaired by Adrian, 620.

Nicopolis in Dacia, by whom built, 575.

Nigrinus Domit. put to death, 616.

Ninos, Nineve, taken by Trajan, 585.

Niſibis taken by Trajan, 581.

Niſmes, the antiquities of, by whom built, 618. The birth-place of Antonius, Pius, 648.

Nonius Rec. repulſed by the German revolters, 334. His death, 336.

Norbanus Caius aſſaſſinated 105.

Novara, &c. declares for Vitellius, 339.

Novius put to death for treaſon, 133.

Nymphidius Sabinus raiſed by Nero, 250. His treachery to him, 285, & ſeq. Aſſumes the ſovereign power againſt Galba, 304. & ſeq. Attempts on the prætorian guards, 305. Slain by the ſoldiers, 306.

O.

OBeliſk brought from Egypt by Caligula, 77 n.

Octavia, daughter of Claudius born, 102. Married to Domitius, 144. To Nero, 160. Accuſed of adultery falſely, 219. Divorced and baniſhed, ibid. Murdered, 220. Her character, 219, n.

Octavius's character of Claudius, 98 n. His laws inforced by Claudius, 114.

October, the month of, why called Domitian, 495.

Oloaritus, one of Agrippina's aſſaſſins 199.

Olympius, Jupiter, the temple of, at Athens, finiſhed, 663.

Omulus's ſurly anſwer to Antoninus, 660.

Onomaſtus conſpires in favour of Otho, 323.

Ordoves in Britain, who, 151. Bravery againſt the Romans, 15, 22.

Ordovices, who, 446. Cut a Roman ſtation in pieces, ibid. & ſeq.

Orfitus conſpires againſt Domitian, 516. His baniſhment and death, ibid.

Orfitus governor at Rome under Antoninus, 664.

Origen, whether acquainted with Cornutus's writings, 270, n.

Oriſtilla, Livia, raviſhed from Piſo, 57.

Orkney iſlands diſcovered and conquered by Agricola, 487.

Oſcus intruſted with Otho's fleet, 347.

Oſrhoene, where ſituate, 589. Subdued by Trajan, ibid.

Oſtia the haven of, where, 116, n.

——— the tower of, ibid.

Oſtorius Scapula's ſucceſs againſt the Britons, 149, 150, & n. Triumph over them, 154. Ill ſucceſs and death, 215.

——— betray'd by Soſianus, 257. His death, ibid.

Otho the emperor, becomes a favourite to Claudius, 119, 120. To Nero, 173. His character, ibid. Debauches him, 182. Marries Poppea, 186, 187, & n. Upright government in Luſitania, ibid. &c. Declares for, and aſſiſts Galba, 277. Accompanies companies him to Rome, 302. Is set aside from the succession, 318. Induced to conspire against him, 322, & seq. Saluted emperor by the camp, 325, 327. The zeal of the soldiery for him, 328. His orders to the revolters, ib. & seq. Saves Celsus, 331. Acknowleged by the Senate, ib. Conspired against by Vitellius, 333. His dissimulation and policy towards him, 340. Strives to gain the people's affections, ib. Pardons Celsus Marius, 341. Messages to and from him, ibid. Drops the hated name of Nero, 343. Quells with difficulty the mutinous soldiers, 344, 345. Marches against Valens, 347. Takes many noblemen with him, ibid. His success in Gallia Narbonens. 349, & seq. Advances against Cæcina, 353. Removes Paulinus and Celsus, ibid. Resolves to engage Cæcina, 354. Whilst he secures himself at Brixellum, 355. Sends his rash orders to engage, 356. Totally defeated, 358. Prevented by his soldiers from murdering himself, 360. His speech to them before his death, 361. Calm and obliging behaviour all that while, 362. Consolatory letters to his friends, 363. Stabs himself ibid. His hasty funeral, ibid. Character, 364.

Ovidius's faithfulness to Cæsonius, 249, n.

Ozogardene, Trajans tribunal at, 586.

P.

PAcarius Decimus put to death, 349.

Paconianus Sext. turns informer, 5.

Pacorus king of Media, invaded by the Alani, 440.

Pacorus joins with the Dacians, 566.

Pætus Cæcina's cowardly death, 119.

———Thrasea bravely leaves the slavish senate, 201. His generosity to Antistius, 215, 216. Falsely accused, 259. Condemned, 261. Great constancy in death, 262.

———banished, 181. Remarkable behaviour at his death, 439.

———treachery to Antiochus, 439.

Pallas great favourite of Claudius, 103. Persuades him to marry Agrippina, 140. Honoured by the slavish senate for his two laws, 157. Acquitted of treason, 181. His death, 221.

Pallantium, why made a free city, 665.

Palma chosen consul 561. Succeis in Arabia, 575. Put to death, by Adrian, 616.

Pamphila's history in 336 Books, 293, n.

Pamphylia visited by Adrian, 619.

Pannonian legions to declare for Vespasian, 381.

Panettenion, the temple of, at Athens 634.

Pantheon, destroyed by lightning, 584. Rebuilt by Adrian, 643.

Papinius kills himself, 26.

———the tribune, plots against Caligula, 89.

Parthenius conspires against Domitian, 523, Helps to murder him, 525

Pastor cruelly used and put to death by Caligula, 52.

Parthemasiris made king of Armenia, 577. Letter to Trajan, 579. Submission and speech to him ibid. Deposition and death, 580.

Parthamaspates made king of Parthia, 593. Driven out of it, 594.

Parthenius killed by the mutineers, 553.

Parthians invaded by Trajan, 576. Subdued, 579, 585. Continued faithful to him, 593. Revolt, 594. Recal Cosrhoes 614. Great regard for Antoninus, 666.

Patrobius put to death by Galba, 310.

Paulina, Seneca's wife, resolves to die with him, 244. Repents her bargain, 245.

Paulinus Suetonius's success in Mauritania, 114. In Britain and isle of Anglesey, 206, & seq. Signal victory there, 212. Undermined by Cassicanus, 212, 213. Recalled, ib. Defeats Cæcina, 352. Blamed for his conduct, 353. Degraded ib. Just advice to Otho, ib. & 356. Defeat and flight, 358. Mean and unworthy defence before Vitellius, 368. His character, writings, &c. 452, n.

———Pompeius's works in Germany, 189.

Paulina's death and obscure funeral, 625.

Paulus of Tyre favoured by Adrian, 655, n.

Paxea kills himself, 17.

Peace the temple of built, 439.

Pedanius Secundus murdered by a slave, 214.

Pelago sent to murder Plautus, 219.

Peponilla, vid. Emponia, 448.

Persius's high regard for his master Annæus, 270. Writings, character, and death, 292, n.

Petinus put to death by Galba, 310.

Petræ, two Roman knights, put to death, 130.

Petronius P. succeeds Vitellius in Syria, 69.

———Caius his lewd character, 258. Prudent government ib. His calm and uncommon manner of dying, 259.

Petronius Turpilianus put to death by Galba, 307.

——encourages Nerva, to the purple, 547. Killed by the mutineers, 553.

Pharasmenes ravages Armenia, 631. Comes to Rome, 635. Kind reception from Adrian, ib. Great respect for Antoninus, 666.

Phædrus the fabulist, when he flourished 37, n.

Phaon's fidelity to Nero, 286.

Phasis river, Adrian's observations on it, 632.

Philo the Jew's account of the Alexandrian persecution, 676. Supposed to be somewhat exaggerated, 681. His character, 683. Successless embassy to Caligula, ib.

Philosophers expelled Rome, 436, 442, 517.

Philostratus's fabulous account of Apollonius Tyanæus, 515, 526. Of Babylon, 534. And of the Parthian kingdom, 535. Exploded, 540.

Phidemon's fidelity to Trajan, 595.

Phlegon's account of an eclipse, 17.

——account of two strange births, 598. An account of his works, 649, n. Story of an Apparition, ib.

Phœbus's brutishness to Vespasian, how requited, 436.

Phœnix the appearance of one in Egypt, 19, n. The antients opinion of that fabulous bird, 20, n.

Phonascus, a new employ given by Nero, 273.

Phrygia, adorned by Trajan, 619.

Phyllis's piety to the Flavian family, 526.

Pia and Pialia the games of, 668.

Piso the governor of Rome, dies, 9, & n.

——Caius, head of the conspiracy against Nero, 236. His character, ib. Put to death, 242.

——Licinianus adopted by Galb, 318. His character, ib. His behaviour on that occasion, 321. Speech to the cohorts in favour of the Emperor, 325. Murthered by Otho, 329. Buried by his wife, 332.

Placentia the garrison of, tumultuous sally against the Vitellians, 350. Besieged by Cæcina, 351. Drive him off, ib.

—the large amphitheatre of, burnt, 351.

Placidus Jul. the discoverer of Vitellius, 408.

Plautius Firmus dissuades Otho from killing himself, 360.

Plautus sent into Britain, 122. His success there, ib. Obtains an ovation for it, 132.

——Rubellius his high descent and merit, 204. Gives umbrage to Nero, and is sent into Asia, ib. Assassinated there, 218, 219, & n.

Plautilla Nerva's mother's descent, 546.

Players driven out of Italy, 183. Recalled, 204.

Players forbid by Trajan, 563. Recalled 568.

Pleaders, lawyers, their extortions complained of to the senate, 130. Truncated, 132.

Pleaders deprived of their fees, 569.

Pliny the elder, destroyed by mount Vesuvius, 460. His judgment of Domitian's poems, 469.

——junior, his character of Verginius, 283. Pleads for the Bithynians against B. Massa, 510. His intrepidity when accused by him, 511. Pleads in favour of Helvidius, 513. His generosity to Artemidorus, 516. Suspected by Domitian, ib.

——panegyric on Trajan, 565. Speech against lawyers fees, 569. Sent governor into Pontus, 570. His writings and character, 603, n. Character of Suetonius, 655, n.

Plotius primus promoted by the soldiery, 331.

Plotina, Trajan's wife, her excellent character, 561. Raises Adrian to the empire, 596. Obsequies of her husband, 595. Death and funeral honours, 620.

Plutarch contemporary with Favorinus, 650, n. Account of him and his works, 652, n.

Poemius, Posth. kills himself, 212.

Polemon, made king of Pontus, 51.

——Remmius a master of rhetoric under Nero, 292, n.

Polemon an arrogant Sophist under Adrian, 653, n. Buries himself alive, ib. His ill manners to Antoninus how requited, 660.

Pollutia's constancy and death, 255.

Pollio Annius impeached by Senecio, 240.

——Asinius murdered by the Moors, 367.

——F. Ann. Ver. raised by Vespasian, 464.

Polybius's great sway with Claudius, 103.

Polycletus's despicable expedition into Britain, 213. Put to death by Galba, 310.

Pompeia Macrina banished, 12. Her family put to death, ib, & seq.

Pompeii, the city of, overturned by an earthquake, 222.
Pompeius Germinus put to death by Tiberius, 10.
——Cn. Mag. put to death by Meſſalina, 127.
—— Propinq. put to death, 336.
Pompey's tomb repaired by Adrian, 622.
Pomponia Græcina turns chriſtian, 184. Tried by her huſband and acquitted, ib.
Pomponius Secundus choſen conſul, 87. Aſſembles the Senate, 106. Reſpected by Claudius, 110. Succeſs and triumph againſt the catti, 147. His poems, ib.
—— Flaccus's death, 16.
—— Labeo's death, 17.
Pompoſianus Met. baniſhed into Corſica, 491. Put to death by Domitian. ib.
Ponticus Valer. a cheating lawyer, baniſhed, 124.
Pontius Pilate's account of Chriſt's crucifixion, 23.
——— Fregellanus degraded, 26.
Pontiff of Alexandria who, 623.
Pontine marches, Trajan's cauſway over, 576.
Poppea Sabbina put to death by Meſſalina, 130.
—— her daughter marries Criſpus afterwards Otho, 186. Captivates Nero, ib. Her lewd character, ib. Supplants Agrippina, 192. Married to Nero, 219. Treachery to Octavia, ib. Honours decreed her on the birth of a daughter, 222. Her death and pompous funeral, 253. Her ſtatues, &c. ſet up afreſh by Otho, 343.
Poſſides's great ſway with Claudius, 103, & n.
Præneſte the oracle of, ominous to Domitian, 521.
Praſuatagus leaves Nero joint heir with his daughters, 207.
Primus Anton. vid. ſub. Antonius, 381.
Priſcus Tarquit. accuſes Statilius Taurus, 161. Expelled the ſenate houſe, ib.
——— Julius's great ſway with Vitellius, 376. Sent to guard the Apennine paſſes, 397.
Priſcianus accuſed of treaſon, 666. Kills himſelf, ib.
Priſcus Marius condemned for extortion, 564.
Probus Bebius puniſhed for extortion, 564.
Proculus conſpires againſt Galba, 323. Raiſed by Otho, 331. His inexperience in war, 347. Succeeds Celſus, 353. Raſh advice to Otho, 554. Defeat and ſhameful flight, 558. Mean defence to Vitellius, 368.
—— the aſtrologer foretels the day of Domitian's death, 522. Rewarded by Nerva, ib.
Propedius accuſed to Caligula, 89. Acquitted, ib.
Proſtitutes at Rome, encouraged by Caligula, 67.
Protogenes, a tool of Caligula's cruelty, 85.
Provinces how far regulated by Adrian, 646.
Ptolemy king of Mauritania, moſt treacherouſly maſſacred by Caligula, 82. His deſcent, ib. n.
—— a friend of Otho ſtirs him up againſt Caligula, 323.
Ptolemeus Chennus's writings and character, 653, n.
—— the aſtrologer, his writings, 674, n.
Publicans ſuppreſſed by Nero, 128.
Publicola Gell. choſen conſul, 81.
Pudens at thirteen years of age, wins the prize of poetry, 576.
Puteoli damaged by an earthquake, 459.
——— the monſtrous bridge of, 64.
——— the games of inſtituted, 668.
Pylades an excellent gladiator, 568.
Pythagoras, Nero's catamite and huſband, 226.
Pithia's admirable conſtancy, 220, n.

Q.

QUadi invaded by Domitian, 500. Put him to a ſhameful flight, ib.
Quadi ſubmit to Antoninus, 666.
Quadratus Seius's arraignment, 6. Apology for the chriſtians, 647.
Quintilianus conſpires againſt Nero, 236, Promiſed his pardon, informs againſt his accomplices, 240.
Quinctilia an actreſs, her ſingular bravery, 89.
Quinctilian reproved by Tiberius, 6.
Quinctili, the two brothers, their conſulſhip and high character, 670.
Quinquatrus the feſtival of, 194.
Quintus Severus, governor of Comagene, ſaves himſelf by informing, 6.
Quirinalis Clodius convicted of cruelty, 183. Kills himſelf, ib.

R.

RApax the legion's furious defeat of the Adjutrix, 358. Defeated by Primus, 389.

Rebilus Caninius, tired of old age, kills himſelf, 183.

Regulus Roſcius, his one days conſulſhip, 395.

——Marcus, the accuſer of Jun. Ruſticus, 514, 515.

Remora, a ſhell-fiſh, ſtops Caligula's gally, 86, n.

Reſmagas's interview with Adrian, 622.

Rheims, the ſtates of, convoke thoſe of Gaul to them, 425. Reſolve upon peace, ibid.

Rhemetalces reſtored by Caligula, 51.

Rhetoric encouraged by Veſpaſian 438.

Rhodes made a Roman province, 441.

Rhodes, the coloſſus of, its firſt ſhake, 622.

——the city of, overturned by an earthquake, 671. Reſtored by Antoninus, ib.

Rhodians disfranchiſed by Claudius, 124. Reſtored by Nero's intereſt, 160.

Roman legions mutiny and outrages in Gaul, 422. Swears allegiance to the Gauls, 424. Their dreadful end, ib. & 425.

Romans degenerate under Nero, 203.

Roman empire diſmembered after Trajans death, 594. Afflicted with other calamities, 598. By who divided into provinces, 646.

Roman Fortune, the temple of, built, 621. Deſtroyed, ib.

Romanus poiſoned by Nero, 221.

Rome under a great famine, 60. For want of horſes to grind, 76. A freſh one under Claudius, 115. The city enlarged by him, 145. Degenerates under Nero, 203, 222. Burnt, 226. Whether by his order, 228. Rebuilt in a new form, 231. Under a grievous plague, 256. And famine, 284. Affronting behaviour to Nero, ibid. & ſeq. Great joy at his death, 288. Suffers by an earthquake at Galba's entering it, 308. In a panic at Vitellius's approach, 340. From a miſtaken ſedition, 344. By prodigies, famine, &c. 346. Its dreadful caſe after Vitellius's death, 410. Beautified by Veſpaſian, 435. A new cenſus, 442. Burnt, 461. Repaired by Titus, ib. Under a grievous peſtilence, 462. Its diſmal condition undes Domitian, 511, & ſeq. Suffers by water, fire, and famine, 671.

Rouillé, father, his partiality animadverted, 38 n.

Roxolonians defeated by the Romans, 343.

Rualdus's cenſure of Suetonius, 657, n.

Rufinus Cæcil. a ſenator, degraded for dancing, 472.

Rufus Tinn. his ſucceſs againſt the Jews, 626. Razes Jeruſalem, 627.

Ruſticus Junius put to death by Domitian, 492, 514.

——Aurulenus inſulted by the Veſpaſians, 405.

Rufus Trebellius put to death, 20 & ſeq.

——Fenius promoted by Nero, 181. Made his prætorian captain, 216. Prevents the death of Nero, 242. Accuſed, apprehended and put to death, 246, 247.

——Muſonius a Stoic knight, inſulted by the Veſpaſians, 406 n.

——Petilius choſen conſul, 473.

S.

Sabina Julia, Titus's daughter, 466.

Sabina married to Adrian, 665, 508, Ill uſed by him, 613. Her character ibid. Death. ib.

Sabinus his death and character, 21.

Sabinus Cornel. plots againſt Caligula, 90. Aſſiſts in putting him to death, 95. Pardoned by Claudius 111. Scorning to outlive Chærea, kills himſelf, ibid.

——Obultronius put to death by Galba, 304.

——Flavius ſucceeds Macer in the government of Rome, 355. His cowardly indolence there, 400 & 401 n. Whether thro' envy, ib. Takes arms but is defeated, 401. Beſieged in the capitol, ibid. Taken priſoner 403. Murdered, 404. His character, ib.

——Publius's great ſway with Vitellius, 376. Put in irons by him, 395.

——Julius heads the revolted Gauls, 423. Proclaims himſelf Cæſar, 424. His defeat and eſcape, ibid. Nine years concealment and adventures, 448. Diſcovery and barbarous execution by Veſpaſian, 449.

——Flavius choſen Domitian's collegue, 472. Put to death by him, 473. His character, 518. Pretended crime, 519.

——Flav. baniſhed, 518.

Sacerdos Graſidius, baniſhed, 26.

Salaces overthrown by Geta, 114.

Salamis burnt by the Jews, 591.

Salvius Coccianus put to death by Domitian, 492.

Salus, a temple to, decreed by the ſenate, 251.

——Secundus, the ſuppoſed ſucceſſor of Agricola in Britain, 489.

Samos diſfranchiſed by Veſpaſian, 441.

Sanguinius Max. conſulſhip, 61 n.

Saracens whether ſubdued by Trajan, 589.

Sarmatians quelled by Domitian, 511.
Sarmatia ſubmits to Trajan, 580.
Sarmatians defeated by Adrian, 615.
Saturninus ſeizes on the forum and capitol, 106. Speech to the ſenate, ib.
Saturninus Pomporius, his writings and character, 605, n.
Sauromates's embaſſy to Trajan, 570.
Scæva Memor. the dramatic poet, an account of, 532, n.
Scaurus Æmilius kills himſelf, 17.
Scaurus a grammarian under Adrian, 658, n.
Scevinus Flavius the conſpirator, vid. Flavius, 236, & ſeq.
Scots invaded by Agricola, 461. The reſt, vid. ſub Caledonia, ib. & ſeq.
Scribonia the wife of Craſſus, put to death, 127.
Scribonius Proculus murdered by the ſenate, 85.
Secular games under Adrian, 669.
Secundus Carinas, a tool of Nero's rapines, 234.
——— Julius his works, 452, n.
Sedochus's treachery to Anicetus, 411.
Sejanus L. affronting behaviour to Tiberius, 8.
Seleucia ſubdued by Trajan, 586.
Sempronius Gracchus, a valiant and faithful friend to Galba, 329. His death ibid.
Senate, Roman, groſs flattery to Caligula, 60, 64, 77. Cruelly requited by him, 84. Make a puſh for liberty, 88. Outwitted by Agrippa, 108, & n. Proclaim Claudius emperor, 110. Slaviſhneſs to Pallas, 157. To Nero, 201, 219, 221, 250. To Nymphydius, 304. To Otho, 330.
Senates partiality to their own body, 551, Honours to Trajan, 586, 590. Influenced in favour of Adrian, 642, 662. Honours to Antoninus, 663.
Senators carried away by Otho, 347. Ill-treated by the ſoldiers, 365. Increaſed to a thouſand by Veſpaſian, 434.
Senators honoured by Antoninus, 666.
Seneca's unworthy adoration of Druſilla, 56. Narrow eſcape, 70. Character of Caligula, 94. Baniſhed by Claudius, 114. Recalled by Agrippina, 143. His unjuſt Character of Claudius, 166. Made one of Nero's governors, 168. Reſtrains Agrippina's fury, 169. Blamed for his too great complaiſance to him, 173, 179. Charged with divers ſhameful crimes, 185. His advice about Agrippina's murder, 198. Extortions on the Britons, 207. Whether ever choſen conſul, 215. Accuſed to Nero, 217. Retires 218. Cloſe confinement and abſtinence, 235. Accuſed by Natalis, 240, 242. His death and character, 243, & ſeq. Whether in the conſpiracy againſt Nero, 425. An account of his works, 293, n. Life and blemiſhes, 294, n. & ſeq. n. Date of his works, 296, n. Forged letters to and from St. Paul, 297, n.
Senecio, a lewd favourite of Nero, 173.
——Tullus conſpires againſt Nero, 237. Turns informer, 240.
———Put to death by Domitian, 513. His crime, ibid.
———choſen conſul, 561.
Sentius's bravery in Parthia, 581.
September, the month of, why called Germanicus, 495.
Sequani, faithfulneſs to the Romans, 425.
Seras, an informing Philoſopher executed, 549. Found innocent, 551.
Servianus's conſulſhip, and character 578, Succeſs in Pannonia, ib. Put to Death by Trajan, ib.
——His ill offices to Adrian, 608. Put to death, 637.
Servilia the daughter of Thraſea, tried, 261. Noble defence to the ſenate, ib. Death, ib. & 262.
Servilius Nonianus, an account of his writings, 292, n.
Severus, one of Nero's architects, 230.
Severus Cattus made governor of Syria, 614.
——Julius ſent againſt the Jews, 627. Ends the war with them ib. & ſeq. Equity to the Bithynians, 637.
Sextia's conſtancy and death, 254, 255.
Sextilia honoured with the title of Auguſta, 375.
Seſtius Caius a degenerate ſenator, 6.
Sibylline books, a new one propoſed by Gallus, 9 n.
Sicily viſited by Adrian, 620.
Sido, king of Suevia, declares for Veſpaſian, 384.
Si'ana divorced by Silius, 134. Accuſes Agrippina, 180, & ſeq. Her character, ib. Baniſhment, 181.
Silanus Appius, betrayed to death, by Meſſalina, 116.
—— Lucius betrothed to Octavia 142. Betrayed by Vitellius, ib Diſgraced, kills himſelf, 143.
—— Junius put to death by Agrippina, 168.
—— Torquatus put to death by Nero, 253, & ſeq.

Silius Caius's ſpeech againſt the pleaders, 130. Becomes Meſſalina's ſtallion, 134. Deſigns to marder Claudius, marries her, ib. Put to death. 138.

——Italicus choſen conſul, 274.

—— the poet an account of, vid. Italicus, 531, n.

Sillanus M. put to death by Caligula, 55.

Silvanus Gran. one of Nero's conſpirators, 237. Kills himſelf, 249.

Silures in Briton, who, 151. Treachery to the Romans, ib. & ſeq. Succeſs againſt them, 155, & ſeq.

Similis promoted by Adrian, 613. His character, ib. Reſigns and retires, 617.

Slaves a ſevere law againſt them, 184. 400 of them executed purſuant to it, 214, 215. Forbid to inform againſt their Maſters, 549. Adrian's laws concerning them, 645.

Sohemus made king of Sophene, 171.

——— king of Edeſſa, declares for Veſpaſian, 379.

Soldiers, Roman, raiſe Otho to the empire, 328. Become too powerful under him, 331. Relieved from a grievous impoſt, ib.

Sophronius Tigellin. baniſhed by Caligula, 78.

Soranus Bareas unjuſtly accuſed, 259. Condemned, 261, 262. His intrepidity and death, ib.

Soſibius, the falſe accuſer of Valerius, 128, & n. Put to death by Agrippina, 146.

Soſtratus foretells Titus's advancements, 378.

Spain viſited by Adrian, 618.

Spintriæ driven from Rome, 45.

Sporus a catamite, married to Nero, 226. Accompanies him in his flight, 286.

Spurinna, Veſtrius commands in Placentia for Otho, 350. Defeats Cæcina, ib.

Staquinſam's interview with Adrian, 622.

Statilia, vid. Meſſalina, 253.

Statilius falſely accuſed, 161. Kills himſelf, ib.

Statius, the poet, an account of, 530, n.

Statues, the exceſs of them regulated, 124.

Stephanus conſpires againſt Domitian, 523. Stabs him, 525, Killed in a fray, ib.

Strabo, an account of his writings, 36, n.

Strathern, the battle of 484, 485, & n.

Suburbanus, Trajan's ſpeech to, 558.

Suetonius Paul, vid. Paulinus, 114.

——— diſgraced by Adrian, 618. An account of him and his writings, 655, n.

Suevi invade the Romans, 490.

Suilius's trial and baniſhment, 185. His character, ib.

Sulpicia writes a bitter ſatyr againſt Domitian, 517.

Sulpitius, Apollinar. His writings and character, 674, n.

Sura choſen conſul, 568. His extract, character, &c. ib. A great confident of Trajan's, ib. & ſeq. His death, 569.

Suſa taken by Trajan, 589.

Syila Cornel. unjuſtly baniſh'd by Nero, 187. Aſſaſſinated by him, 218.

Syracuſe a three-headed monſter, born at, 317. How interpreted, ib.

T.

TAcitus's character of the chriſtians, 232, & ſeq. & n. His own, 234. A ſad chaſm in his annals, 262. Speaks Verginius's funeral oration, 283. Character of his father-in-law Agricola, 508. & ſeq.

——— choſen conſul, 552. His account of the German defeat, 560. His writings and character, 601, n.

Tagonius Gall. his flattery to Tiberius, 4.

Taragona viſited by Adrian, 618.

Taſter, the office of, whence, 164, & n.

Tatianus's friendſhip to Adrian, 596. Severe advice to him rejected, 609. Promoted by him, 613. Made a ſenator, 616.

——— Attil. baniſhed for treaſon, 666.

Taxes regulated by Nero, 188.

Teleptus's writings and character, 674, n.

Teleſinus Lucius baniſhes himſelf from Rome, 515.

Temples at Rome ſtripped by Nero, 234.

Temple of Jeruſalem demoliſhed and ploughed, 627. His materials uſed to build a heathen temple, 631.

Terracina's port repaired by Antoninus, 665.

Terentianus, an account of, and of his writings, 532 n.

Terentius Marc. accuſed as a friend to Sejanus, 6. His noble defence before the ſenate, 7. Abſolved, 8.

Tertulla married to Titus, 454 n.

Tertullian's judicious remarks on Trajan's perſecution, 599.

Thrace made a Roman province, 441.

Thraſea Pætus, vid. ſub Pætus, 259.

Thraſyllus, a famed aſtrologer deceives Tiberius 26, & n. His death, works, and character, 37 n.

Thule iſland diſcovered, 487.

Tiber overflows part of Rome, 22. Under Otho, 346.

—— overflowed, 598. Afreſh, 671.

—— Adrian's bridge over, 643.

Tiberius, his dreadful condition, 5, 6, & n. Makes him murder all his old friends, 8. Makes a ſham approach towards Rome, 10. Seizes on Marius's eſtate, 12. His baſeneſs and cruelty, 13, 14. His mean behaviour to Druſus, ibid. Generoſity to ſome Roman ſufferers, 21. Public buildings, 23, n, Taken ill out of Caprea, 24 & n. Deceived by an aſtrologer, 26, & n. How and whether he ſettled the ſucceſſion, 28 & ſeq. Foretels Gemellus and Calligula's deaths, 31. Stifled by Macro, ib. & ſeq. Burial, 33. Character, ib. & ſeq. & n. Anniverſary inſtituted, 82.

—— Gemellus Nero, whether named to ſucceed his grandfather, 27, 28. Adopted by Caligula, 49. His diſmal end, ib.

Tigellinus baniſhed by Caligula, 78. Sumptuous banquet for Nero, 225. Judges the conſpirators, 241, 246. His reward, 250. Treachery to Nero, 285. Eſcapes due puniſhment by bribery, 311. His death, 341.

Tigellinus promoted by Nero, 216. Lewd character, ib. Bloody advice to him, 218.

Tigranes put to death by Tiberius, 22.

—— promoted by Nero, 205. His deſcent, ibid.

Tigris Trajan's bridge over, 581.

Timidius the accuſer of Propidius, 88.

Tingis, Tangier Metropolis of Mauritania, 115 & n.

Tiridates crown'd by Nero, 263. Flattery to him, ib. Narrowly eſcapes the Alani, 440.

Titianus Salvius left with the government of Rome, by Otho, 349. Sent to ſucceed Paulinus, 353. Raſh advices to Otho, 354. Defeated, 358. Surrenders, 359. Pardoned by Vitellius, 368.

Titus narrowly eſcapes poiſon from Nero, ſent to congratulate Galba, 302, 378. Is promiſed the empire at Paphos, ib. Choſen conſul with his father, 410. Left to carry on the Jewiſh war, 416. Triumphs over Judæa, 439. His triumphal arch ſtill extant, ib. Saluted emperor, ib. & ſeq. His private life recapitulated, 454. Pathetic apology for his worthleſs brother, 455. Private character abhorred by the people, 456. His public one as much admired, ib. Diſcards his dear Berenice, ib. Profuſe generoſity and clemency, 457, 458. Triumphs over Britain, 460. Generoſity to the Campanians, 461. To the city of Rome, 462. His ſtately amphitheatre dedicated, ib. Other famous buildings, &c. ib. His death, univerſally lamented, 465. Excellent character, 466.

Tivoli Adrian's palace at, deſcribed, 643.

Torquatus Silanus condemned to death by Nero, 224.

Tracalus Gater. choſen conſul 274.

Trajan Ulpius adopted by Nerva, 553. Created Cæſar, ib. His extract, 555. character, 556. Failings, 558. Whence ſurnamed Panetarius, 559. Saluted emperor, ib. Entry and Reception at Rome, 561. Intitled Optimus, 562. His ſingular generoſity, ib. Modeſty, 563. Impartiality, 564. Firſt war with the Dacians, 566. Triumps over them, 568. Finiſhes the port of Centum-Cellæ, 570. Wars againſt Decebalus, ib. & ſeq. Builds a bridge over the Danube, 571. Subdues Dacia, 573. Cities built by him there, 574. Triumph and conqueſts 575. Conſpired againſt, 576. Expedition againſt Parthia, 577. Entry into Antioch, ib. Preſents brought to him there, 578. New conqueſts, 580. Whether he returned to Rome, 582. Second Expedition into Parthia, 586. Thence ſurnamed Parthicus, ib. Vaſt and ſwift conqueſts, ib. & ſeq. Hurt by an earthquake, 587. Sails to the Perſian gulf, 588. His triumphal arch, 590. Expedition againſt the Hagarenes, 393. Narrow eſcape before Atra, ib. Falls ill and embarques for Italy, 594. His death obſequies, &c. ib. & ſeq Stately works, 597. Square and column, ib. Misfortune following his death, 598. His character, ib. & ſeq. Cotemporary authors, 600 n.

Trajanapolis, Selinus, whence ſo called, 594.

Treves revolts againſt Galb, 334.

Trebiſond, the temple of Mercury at, by whom built, 632.
— the port of, begun, 633.
Trio Fulcin. put to death, 20. His ſatire againſt Tiberius read in the ſenate, ibid.
Trogus Pomp. an account of his work, 672. n.
Turbo's ſucceſs againſt the Jews, 591. Made governor of Pannonia, 617.
Turnus, the ſatiriſt, an account of, 532 n.
Turpentine tree, why abhorred by the Jews, 628.
Turpilianus Petron's cowardly inaction in Britain, 213. Honoured by Nero, 250. Cruelly put to death by Galba, 307.
Tutor Jul. heads the revolted Gauls, 423. His ſucceſs againſt the Romans, 424. Defeated by Felix, 426. By Cerealis 428.
Tyaneans worſhip their Apollonius, 543. Spared by Aurelian on his account, ibid.

V.

VAlens Fabius aſſaſſinates Capito, 316. Stirs up Vitellius to revolt, 333. Saluts him emperor, 335. Sent againſt Otho, 336. His ſucceſs through Gaul, 337, & ſeq. Extortions and degeneracy, 338. Paſſes the Alps, 340. Defeated, 349. Joins Cæcina, 353. Repulſed at Bedriacum, 357. Odered to take the field, 385. Retires into Hetruria, 395. His deſign to raiſe Gaul againſt Veſpaſian fruſtrated, ib. Taken priſoner. 396. His head ſtruck off, and publicly expoſed, 399.
Valentinus Tullus excites the Treverians againſt the Romans 425. Defeated and taken priſoner, 426.
Valerius Maximus, an account of his writings, &c. 36 n.
—— Aſiaticus's brave ſpeech to the ſenate, 106. Judged worthy of the empire, 110 n. Accuſed of treaſon, 128. His brave defence, 129. Condemned by the treachery of Vitellius, ib.
—— Marinus ſet aſide by Vitellius, 374
—— Feſtus cabals in favour of Veſpaſian, 382, 383.
Vannius made king of the Suevi, 147. Driven out, ib.
Vardanes, when he reigned in Parthia, 535.
Varius Alphenus defeats Otho's gladiators, 358. Sent to guard the Apennine paſſes, 397.
Varo Cingon. put to death by Galba, 307.
Varus Arrius defeated by Vitellius, 388. Choſen prætor, 410. Undermined by Mucianus, 431.
—— a man of wretched character, 224, & n.
Velleius Paterculus, an account of him and his writings, 35 n.
Venus Verticordia, her temple at Paphos, 378.
Venutius's bravery againſt the Romans, 156.
Vergetianus kil'ed by an earthquake, 587.
Verginius marches againſt the Gauls, 281. Succeſs againſt them ib. Unſpotted character, 282. Refuſes the empire, ib. Faithfulneſs to the ſenate, 301, 303. Coldly received by Galba, 303. Undermined by Titus Vinius, ib. Saved by Otho, 363. Refuſes a ſecond offer of the empire, 364, 365. In danger for it, ib. Saved by Vitellius, 372.
Verulamians maſſacred by the Britons, 210.
Verus Aurel. Commod. adopted by Adrian, 635. Conſulſhip, 637. Sickneſs and death, 638. Apotheoſis and ſad character, ib.
——L. his ſon adopted by Antoninus, 639, 662. Takes the manly robe, 668. Deſpiſed by Antoninus, 669. Made quæſtor, 671. Conſul, ib.
Veſpaſian Flavius's baſe flattery, to Caligula, 77, 80. Bravery in Britain, 123: In danger from Nero, 253. Sent againſt the Jews, 267. Sends ſix thouſand of them captive to Nero, 268. Sends his ſon to congratulate Galba, 302. Declares for Otho, ib. & 378. Diſſimulation to Vitellius, ib. Saluted emperor at Alexandria, 379. By Judæa, Syria, &c. ib. Prepares to encounter the Vitellians, 380, 383. Succeſs againſt them, 389. At Cremona, ib. Proclaimed in Spain, &c. 396. By the Samnites, &c. 399. By the ſenate, 410. His pedigree and private life, 412. Prodigies foretelling his advancement, 414, & ſeq. & n. Gratitude to his friends, 416. Timely ſupplies Rome with corn, 417. Second conſulſhip, 429. Miracles at Alexandria, 431. Conſults the gods there, 432. March to and reception at Rome, 433. Wholeſome regulations there, ib. & 434. Cenſorſhip, ib. Beautifies the city, 434. Recovers three thouſand records, 435. Clemency and contempt of titles, ib. Of informers, 436.

436. Of injuries ib. Love of money, 437. Jokes upon it, ib. Inſtances of his generoſity, &c 438. Triumphs over Judæa, 439. His publick edifices, ib. Kindneſs to Antiochus. &c. 440. Diſobliges Vologeſes, 441. Reduces ſeveral provinces, ib. Takes a new cenſus, 442. Severity to Sabinus, 449. To two conſpirators, ib. Death and character, 450. Funeral, 451. Colonies, ib. Authors contemporary with him, 452. & n. & ſeq. n. His converſation with Apollonius Tyaneus, 537.

Veſta, the goddeſs, affrights Nero, 225. Her temple burnt, 229.

Veſtals four of them condemned for inceſt, 474.

Veſtals deflowered and put to death, 598.

Veſtilius kills himſelf, 8.

Veſuvius, a dreadful eruption of, 459.

Veterans ſhamefully diſmiſſed by Caligula, 72.

Veturius conſpires againſt Galba, 323.

Vetus his noble project obſtructed by Gracilis, 189. Put to death by Nero, 254.

Vezina's narrow eſcape, 499.

Vibidia intercedes for Meſſalina, 136.

Vitellius goes to view the dead body of Nero. 288. His wonderful ſpeed to bring Galba the news, 301.

Victims, human, offered by the Romans, 598. Forbid by Adrian, 645. The prieſts of them crucified, ib. & ſeq. When utterly aboliſhed, ib.

Vienne fined and diſarmed by Valens, 337.

Vindex Julia's character, 274. Revolt in Gaul, ib. & ſeq. Biting edicts againſt Nero, 278. Contempt of him, 279. Interview with Virginius, 281. Defeat and death, ib.

Vinicius poiſoned by Meſſalina, 125.

—— form a conſpiracy againſt Nero, 273.

Vinius confirms the news of Nero's death, 302. Treachery to Virginius, 303. Ill advice to Galba, 304. Great influence over him, 308. His motley character, ib. & ſeq. Cabals in favour of Otho, 317. Aſſaſſinated by his troops, 329 & ſeq.

Virginius Rufus's conſulſhip and death, 552.

Vitellius L. choſen conſul, 17. Sent into Syria, 19. Forces the Parthians to peace, 46. Saves himſelf by his baſeneſs, 68, 69. Left governor of Rome, 122 n. Fulſome flattery to Meſſalina, 126 & n. Treachery to Valerius, 129. To Claudius, 137. To Silanus, 142. Accuſed of high treaſon, 149.

—— Aulus the emperor, made governor of Lower Germany, 316. On the bare merit of his gluttony, ib. & ſeq. His behaviour there, 333. Revolt againſt Otho, ib. & ſeq. Saluted emperor, 334. Takes the office on him, 335. Diſplays his voluptuouſneſs and ſloth, 337. Meſſages to and from Otho, 341. Gains many cities in Italy, 350. Defeats Otho's army, 358. Congratulated on it by the ſenate, 366. Comes to Lyons, 368. Severity to the Othonian centurions, ib. To Dolabella, 369. His monſtrous gluttony, ib. Cauſes a degeneracy and diſcord in his army, 371. & ſeq. Diſbands part of it, 372. Inhuman pleaſure in viewing his ſlain enemies, ib. Another inſtance of his cruelty, 373. Shameful imitation of Nero, ib. Cauſes a general corruption in his army, 374. Which murder the innocent populace in their cups, 375. His entry into Rome, ib. Awkard function of the pontifical office, ib. Swayed by two ſychophants, 376. Profuſeneſs in gluttony, ib. Prepares againſt Veſpaſian, 382, 385. His ſtatues overthrown, 387. Cavalry routed, 389. Army defeated at Cremona, 390. Reſumes his gluttony, 394. Conceals his defeats from the ſenate, &c. 396. Sends to guard the Apennine paſſes, 397. Marches to Mevania, 398. Threatened by divers omens, ib. n. Returns to Rome in a fright, ib. Firſt aſſumes the title of Cæſar, 399. Exhorted to reſign the empire, 400. Hindered by the people, 401. Treachery to Sabinus, 402. Burns the capitol, 403. His offers to Primus rejected, 406. Forſaken and diſcovered, 407. Grievouſly inſulted, 408. Executed, ib. His character, ib. His ſon murdered by Mucianus, 409.

Vitia barbarouſly executed, 8.

Vocontii, who, 338. Oppreſſed by Valens, ib.

Vocula Dell. ſent againſt the revolted Batavians, 421. Defeated by them, ib. Fortifies his camp, 422. Marches againſt Civilis, ib. Betrayed and murdered by his troops, 424.

Vologeſes refuſes Nero's invitation to Rome, 263.

Vologeſes's complaint to Adrian, 634.

—— embaſſy to Veſpaſian, 417. Kindneſs to Antiochus's ſons, 440.

Volusius Quint: extreme old age and death, 184.
—— Proculus discovers the conspiracy against Nero, 237, & seq.
—— Caius's bravery before Cremona, 392.
Vopiscus's character of Suetonius, 657 n.

W.

Wight, the Island of, taken by Vespasian, 123.
Women Roman, their degeneracy under Nero, 203.
Workhouses among the Romans abused, 645 Regulated by Adrian, 646.

X.

Xenophon Claudius's physician, highly extolled by him, 162.
———— a commander under Arianus, 632.
Xiphilin's account of Dion Cassius imperfect, 582. His account of Antoninus Pius, 663.

Z.

Zamolxis, a Dacian philosopher and law-giver, 496.
Zenobius's writings and character, 654, n
Zermisegethusa, by whom founded, 574.
Zydretæ, where situated, 622.

FINIS.

Directions to the Book-binder.

1. NERO's golden Palace Page, 229.
2. The Effigies of four Cæsars, viz. CLAUDIUS, NERO, GALBA and OTHO. 107
3. Ditto of VITELLIUS, VESPASIAN, TITUS and DOMITIAN. 366
4. General Map of the ROMAN empire, shewing the Situation of all its Provinces, and the Seats of the barbarous Nations on their Frontiers. 545.

AN UNIVERSAL

HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

COMPILED FROM

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

MAPS, CUTS, NOTES, Chronological, and other TABLES.

VOL. XV.

Ισοίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ καλανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Baſil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed for R. OWEN, S. HYDE, G. RISK, J. LEATHLEY, G. and A. EWING, W. SMITH, J. SMITH, P. CRAMPTON, G. FAULKNER, A. BRADLEY, T. MOORE, E. EXSHAW, C. WYNNE, C. CONNOR, O. NELSON, P. WILSON, W. POWELL, I. KELLY, T. BUTLER, and W. BRIEN, Bookſellers.

M DCC XLV.

1931

CONTENTS

OF

VOLUME XV.

THE Roman history from the death of Trajan, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, when the power of the Roman empire began to decline Page 1

From the death of M. Aurelius, to the death of Alexander, when the empire was first transferred without the consent of the Senate 52

From the death of Alexander Severus to the captivity of Valerian, when the empire was usurped by thirty persons at once, commonly called the thirty tyrants 181

From the captivity of Valerian, to the resignation of Diocleſian 229

From the resignation of Diocleſian to the removal of the imperial Seat to Conſtantinople, by Conſtantine the great 330

From the removal of the imperial Seat to Conſtantinople to the death of the emperor Julian 408

From the death of Julian, to the death of Valens 563

DIRECTIONS to the BINDER, for placing the CUTS.

HISTORICAL Pillar, the Serpentine, the Porphyry Pillar, the Pillar of the Emperor Marcian; and the Hippodrome, with the Theban Obelisk and Engines, by which it was erected. Page 479

The Thracian Bosphorus, with Constantinople divided into Wards; the outside Prospect, and the whole View of the Church of Sancta Sophia, 511

AN

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent.

CHAP. XXI. Continued.

The hiſtory of Rome, from the death of Trajan, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, when the power of the Roman empire began to decline.

MARCUS AURELIUS is by all the antients reckoned the beſt prince that ever ſwayed a ſceptre, and his reign commonly ſtyled The golden age; for he made good the ſaying which he had borrowed of Plato, and had often in his mouth, viz. That ſtates would be happy when princes were philoſophers [e]. He was of the Annian family, which ſome writers derive from Numa Pompilius. However that be, it is certain, that his great-grandfather Annius Verus, originally of Succubæ, a city of Bætica in Spain, was the firſt ſenator of the Annian family, and afterwards created prætor. His ſon, who bore the ſame name, was Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, ſurnamed The Philoſopher.

His extraction, preferments.

[e] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 815. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 33.

was by Veſpaſian raiſed to the rank of a patrician, appointed governor of Rome, and honoured twice with the conſulſhip. He had three children, Annius Verus, the father of M. Aurelius; Annius Libo, who was conſul; and Annia Galeria Fauſtina, who was married to the emperor Antoninus Pius. Annius Verus married Domitia Calvilla, called alſo Lucilla, the daughter of Calviſius Tullus, who had been twice conſul, and had by her M. Aurelius and a daughter named Annia Cornificia. M. Aurelius was born in Rome, during his grandfather's ſecond conſulſhip, on the 26th of April of the year 121, which was the fourth of Adrian's reign. His firſt name was Catilius Severus, that of his mother's grandfather, who had been governor of Rome, and twice conſul. Upon the death of his father, who died in his prætorſhip, he was adopted by his grandfather M. Annius Verus, and took his name. The emperor Adrian uſed to call him M. Annius Veriſſimus, on account of his great ſincerity; and under that name Juſtin the martyr addreſſes him in his ſecond apology. When he was adopted by Antoninus, he took the names of M. Ælius Aurelius Verus, the name of Aurelius being peculiar to the family of Antoninus, and that of Ælius to the family of Adrian, into which Antoninus had been adopted. Upon his acceſſion to the empire, he left the name of Verus to L. Commodus, his brother by adoption, and took for himſelf that of Antoninus; but is generally diſtinguiſhed from his predeceſſor, either by the prænomen of Marcus, or the ſurname of philoſophus; which was given him by the unanimous conſent of hiſtorians, and not by any public act or decree of the ſenate [f]. He was from his tender years brought up by the emperor Adrian, whom Dion Caſſius calls his kinſman [g]. That prince would have willingly adopted him, and named him for his ſucceſſor; but choſe in his room, as he was then too young, T. Antoninus, who had married his aunt, obliging him to adopt his nephew [h]. Annius Verus, his grandfather, committed the care of his education, while he was yet an infant, to a matron, who lived in his houſe; but M. Aurelius thanks the gods, that he was but a ſhort while under her tuition [i]; for Adrian taking him from his grandfather, brought him up in the palace, employing the greateſt men of that age to inſtruct him in every branch of literature. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy under the celebrated ſophiſt Apollonius

His education.

His ſtudies and learning.

[f] Dio, l. lxix. p. 797. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. Juſtin. apol. ii. Grut. p. 300. [g] Dio, ibid. [h] Jul. Cap. p. 23. Eutrop. [i] M. Aur. de ſeip. l. i. c. 14.

Apollonius Sextus of Chæronea, Plutarch's nephew, Junius Rusticus, Claudius Maximus, Cinsia Catullus, and Claudius Severus; to that of eloquence under Herodes Atticus and M. Cornelius Fronto; and to the study of the law under L. Volusius Metianus, or, as some style him, Mæcianus, the most learned civilian of that age. M. Aurelius is said to have excelled in all these branches of learning, and to have been one of the greatest orators, philosophers, and civilians of his time. He delighted chiefly in the study of philosophy, was thoroughly acquainted with the tenets and principles of the different sects, and, when he was but twelve years old, entered himself among the philosophers, wore their habit, and practised all their austerities, lying on the ground, fasting, and abstaining from several meats. He shewed, even after he was emperor, great respect to those who had instructed him, especially to Junius Rusticus, of whom we have spoken in our notes; transacted nothing without his advice (for he was a person well versed in the arts both of peace and war); saluted him always before the captains of the guards; raised him twice to the consulship; and, after his death, prevailed upon the senate to erect him a statue. He shewed no less gratitude and veneration towards his other masters, setting up in his closet their images in gold, visiting frequently their sepulchres, and adorning them with crowns, victims, and flowers. His great application to the study of philosophy, and the austerities he practised, impaired his health to such a degree, that he became very weak and infirm, tho' naturally of a robust constitution [k]. To strengthen his stomach, greatly weakened by fasting, when he was but a youth, he used to take every day some treacle, which was made up for him by one of his physicians, named Demetrius, and, after his death, by the celebrated Galen [l]. As he led a very regular life, he lived, notwithstanding his bad health, almost to the age of sixty, and performed great things, applying himself to the dispatch of business with more care and assiduity, than any of his predecessors had done. He had an utter aversion to all sorts of shews, sports and diversions, being naturally grave and serious; but nevertheless appeared at them sometimes, tho' very seldom, that he might not seem to condemn those who frequented them. He used, while he was emperor, to read, write or talk to his ministers about public affairs, during the whole time of the sports, for which he was often rallied by His respect to his preceptors.

Practises the austerities of the philosophers.

His aversion to shews, and all diversions.

[k] Jul. Cap. ibid. M. Anton. l. i. c. 3. [l] Galen. prog. p. 460. de antidot. c. 2. & lib. de ther. p. 457.

the populace, but deſpiſed their ralleries [m]. When he was but ſixteen, he made over his paternal eſtate to his ſiſter, ſaying, that his grandfather's eſtate was enough for him. Adrian adopted Antoninus Pius, as we have related above, upon condition, that he ſhould adopt M. Aurelius, at that time eighteen years old, and L. Commodus, who was only in the ſeventh or eighth year of his age, but already Adrian's grandſon by adoption, being the ſon of L. Ælius Cæſar. Theſe adoptions happened, in all likelihood, on the ſame day that Antoninus was adopted, that is, on the twenty-fifth of February of the year 138. M. Aurelius was ſo far from being elated with his new dignity, that, on the contrary, he could not help betraying great uneaſineſs and concern, telling thoſe who came to congratulate him upon his promotion, that they knew not how difficult and dangerous a thing it was to command. Adrian at the ſame time appointed him quæſtor for the enſuing year, tho' he had not yet attained the age required by the laws of Rome for the diſcharge of that dignity [n]. The ſame prince had betrothed to him, when he was but fifteen, the daughter of L. Verus Cæſar, named, as is commonly believed, Fabia; and appointed, that Antoninus ſhould give his daughter Annia Fauſtina to young Lucius. But upon the death of Adrian, Antoninus propoſed a match between his daughter and M. Aurelius, who agreed to it, married her ſome years after, and had a daughter by her in the year 147, the ninth of Antoninus's reign, named Lucilla, who was married to L. Verus in 164, and afterwards to Pompeianus. He had ſeveral other daughters by her, of whom three were ſtill alive in the year 193, and one was put to death by Caracalla in 212. Annia Fauſtina brought him likewiſe ſeveral ſons, viz. Commodus, who was afterwards emperor, Antoninus Geminus, Severus, or rather Verus, ſtyled on ſome medals Annius Verus, T. Aurelius Antoninus, and T. Ælius Aurelius. Commodus and Antoninus Geminus were twins, born on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt of the year 161, the firſt of their father's reign [o]. In the year 139, Antoninus named M. Aurelius conſul for the enſuing year, declared him Cæſar, lodged him in the palace of Tiberius, and took him in a manner for his partner in the empire. M. Aurelius, without being in the leaſt elated with theſe extraordinary honours, purſued his former courſe of life, viſited his friends, as if he had been a private vate perſon, frequented the ſchools of the philoſophers, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek and Latin eloquence, &c. In the beginning of the year 147, Antoninus inveſted him with the proconſular and tribunitial power, and thenceforth tranſacted nothing without his advice, which he generally followed, as he entertained an high opinion of his integrity, penetration, and extraordinary accompliſhments [p].

His iſſue by Fauſtina, the daughter of Antoninus.

[m] Jul. Cap. p. 23. [n] Jul. Cap. p. 24. [o] Jul. Cap. ibid. & in L. Ver. p. 39. Herodian. l. i. p. 46. & l. iv. p. 546. Grut. p. 253. Pagi. p. 180.

ANTONINUS having declared, a little before he died, M. Aurelius his ſucceſſor, and recommended to him the empire and his daughter in the preſence of the chief officers of the court, the ſenate, as ſoon as he expired, obliged M. Aurelius, ſays the author of his life, to accept the ſovereignty, and take upon him the management of affairs, without ſo much as mentioning L. Verus, who was likewiſe the ſon of Antoninus by adoption, but very different in his temper and conduct both from his father and brother, being entirely abandoned to all manner of debauchery, and more inclined to tread in the footſteps of Nero and Caligula, than to imitate the virtues of T. Antoninus and M. Aurelius [q], Antoninus, who was well acquainted with his temper, had never inveſted him with any power, nor even conferred upon him the title of Cæſar. However, M. Aurelius immediately declared him not only Cæſar, but Auguſtus, and his partner in the ſovereign power; ſo that Rome ſaw herſelf then for the firſt time governed by two ſovereigns at once. As they were at the ſame time conſuls, this year, the 1611ſt of the chriſtian æra, is diſtinguiſhed in the Faſti and inſcriptions by the conſulate of the two Auguſti. This action of Marcus Aurelius is cried up by Ariſtides as the greateſt, and the moſt heroic and magnanimous, that is recorded in hiſtory of any prince [r]. In raiſing Lucius to the empire, he gave him the name of Verus; ſo that he was thenceforth named Lucius Verus, inſtead of Lucius Commodus: he added that of Antoninus, which he aſſumed himſelf; whence he is ſtyled in moſt antient inſcriptions M. Aurelius Antoninus [s]. The two emperors went together from the ſenate to the camp of the prætorian guards, where they promiſed the ſoldiers a bounty of twenty thouſand ſeſterces, M. Aurelius ſpeaking for both. They performed afterwards with great pomp the funeral of their deceaſed father, cauſed him to be ranked among the gods, and inſtituted a new college of prieſts, called Aureliani, (from the name of his family) or Aurelian prieſts. They both governed with great mildneſs and unity, Lucius behaving himſelf rather as Aurelius's lieutenant, than his partner in the ſovereignty. Their adminiſtration was ſuch, that no one had occaſion to regret the loſs of Antoninus, whoſe meaſures were purſued by both princes. That their union might be the more laſting, M. Aurelius betrothed his daughter Lucilla to L. Verus, and on that occaſion both princes added a great number of children to thoſe who were ſupplied with corn at the public expence [s]. But the tranquillity and happineſs, which Rome and the whole empire enjoyed under the two ſovereigns, was ſoon interrupted by a dreadful inundation of the Tiber, which happened in the beginning of the following year, when Ruſticus and Aquilinus were conſuls, overturned many private houſes and public buildings in the city, carried away great numbers of people and cattle, and laid under water the neighbouring country to a great diſtance. This inundation was followed by earthquakes, conflagrations in ſeveral provinces, and a general infection of the air, which produced an infinite number of inſects, that deſtroyed what the flood had ſpared, and occaſioned a famine in Rome. Theſe calamities were in a great meaſure allayed by the care and preſence of the two emperors, who, at their own expence, ſupplied the diſtreſſed city with corn, and made good the loſſes ſuſtained by particulars [t]. At the ſame time, the Parthian war broke out, the Catti made irruptions into Germany and Rhœtia, and the Britons began to revolt. Againſt the latter was diſpatched Calpurnius Agricola, and Aufidius Victorinus againſt the Catti: but it was thought proper, that L. Verus ſhould march in perſon againſt the Parthians, while M. Aurelius continued at Rome, where his preſence was judged neceſſary. The good emperor was not diſpleaſed to have ſuch a ſpecious pretence of removing his collegue from Rome, hoping that a warlike life would give him a diſtaſte to the idle amuſements and debaucheries of the town: but he was therein greatly diſappointed, as we ſhall ſee anon [u]. What ſucceſs attended Agricola and Victorinus, we are no-where told. All we know of the wars with theſe nations is, that Didius Julianus, who reigned after Pertinax, is ſaid to have overcome the Chauci and likewiſe the Catti, who had made inroads into the Roman dominions. The war in Britain muſt have likewiſe laſted a long time; for it was not ended eight years after, when that of the Marcomanni bróke broke out [w]. As for the Parthians, they had at this time for their king Vologeſes, probably the ſon of Coſrhoes, who reigned in the times of Trajan and Adrian. Antoninus had refuſed to reſtore to him the golden throne, which had been ſeized by Adrian. This perhaps occaſioned the war; for before Antoninus died, the Parthian had made vaſt preparations, and ſoon after his death appeared in the field at the head of a formidable army [x]. Great diſturbances, of which we find but a very confuſed account in the antients, happened likewiſe at this time in Armenia, raiſed, in all likelihood, and fomented by the king of the Parthians. Sohemus, king of Armenia, was driven from the throne, and the king of the Henochii, a people dwelling between the Caſpian and Euxine ſeas, was killed by a petty prince, named Tiridates, who was afterwards taken priſoner by the Romans, and by M. Aurelius confined to Britain [y]. Severinus, a native of Gaul and governor of Cappadocia, having entered Armenia at the head of ſeveral legions, was there attacked by the Parthians near a place called Elegia, and cut off with all his men: we are told, that not a ſingle perſon of the whole army eſcaped the general ſlaughter. Dion Caſſius aſcribes this victory to Vologeſes; but he obtained it by Oſrhoes, or, as Lucian calls him, Othryades, who commanded the army, and was in all likelihood ſome prince of the royal family of Parthia, on whom Vologeſes deſigned to beſtow the crown of Armenia [z]. Vologeſes, elated with this victory, entered Syria at the head of a very numerous army, committing dreadful ravages both in that province and in Cappadocia, which he likewiſe invaded, after having put to flight Antidius Cornelianus, who commanded in Syria.

He takes L. Verus for his partner in the ſovereignty.

They both govern with great mildneſs and magnanimity.

[p] Jul. Cap. p. 25. Ariſtid. orat. 9. p. 107. [q] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur p. 25. & in Ver. p. 36. [r] Ariſtid. orat. 16. p. 421. [s] Vide Goltz. p. 34.

Many calamities happen in the beginning of their reign.

[s] Jul. Cap. p. 25. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Idem in Ver. p. 37.

The Parthians declare war.

Diſturbances in Armenia.

Vologeſes king of the Parthians invades Syria.

Againſt ſo formidable an enemy, it was judged proper, that one of the emperors ſhould march in perſon; and accordingly L. Verus ſet out from Rome this year for Syria. M. Aurelius accompanied him as far as Capua, whence he was ſcarce returned to Rome, when news was brought him, that his collegue had been ſeized at Canoſa with a violent diſtemper, occaſioned by the debaucheries and diſorders to which he had abandoned himſelf on the road: for the luxurious prince, inſtead of purſuing his march with all poſſible expedition, and haſtening to ſave Syria, which was over-run by the Parthians and ready to revolt from Rome, ſtopt in all the cities through which he paſſed, ſpending his time in banquets and revels,

L. Verus goes into the eaſt.

His debaucheries on the road.

[w] Spart. in Julian. p. 60. [x] Ariſt. orat. ix. p. 119. Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 25. [y] Dio. l. lxxi. p. 832. [z] Lucian. pſeud. p. 485. & hiſt. p. 347. Dio, p. 802.

and plunging himſelf into the moſt infamous debaucheries. Upon the news of his illneſs, M. Aurelius cauſed vows and ſacrifices to be offered for his recovery, and took a ſecond journey to ſee him. When he began to recover, M. Aurelius returned to Rome, and L. Verus ſoon after purſued his journey, paſſing over into Greece, and from thence into Aſia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia. As he ſtopped in every place that could afford him any kind of diverſion, he arrived, when the year was already far ſpent, in Syria; and chuſing Antioch for the place of his reſidence, abandoned himſelf there to all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery, while the officers who commanded under him carried on the war. Theſe were Statius Priſcus, Avidius Caſſius, Martius Verus, Saturninus, Fronto, and Tatianus, all perſons of great experience, and generally eſteemed the beſt commanders of that age. As for the emperor Verus, he was ſo taken up with his pleaſures and diverſions, that tho' the war laſted four years, he never once appeared at the head of his army, which conſiſted of the flower of the Roman troops; but wallowed in all manner of lewdneſs at Antioch, Daphne, and Laodicea, while his officers were ſignalizing themſelves in the field [a]. All we know of this war is, that many great exploits were performed in Armenia, Syria, Meſopotamia, Media, and upon the banks of the Tigris [b]; that the Romans beſieged Edeſſa in the province of Oſrhoene, and gained many ſignal victories [c]; that Oſrhoes was once forced to ſave himſelf by ſwimming croſs the Tigris [d]; that the Parthians received a dreadful overthrow at Europa, a city of Syria on the Euphrates, a little below Zeugma [e]; and that in the end, Oſrhoes, who commanded the Parthian troops, having loſt his army, was obliged to conceal himſelf in a cave [f]. Lucian, who wrote about this time, is not aſhamed to tell us, that in the above-mentioned battle three hundred and ſeventy thouſand of the enemy were killed; and that the Romans loſt only two men, and had but nine wounded [g].

He abandons himſelf to all manner of pleaſures, and ſuffers his lieutenants to carry on the war.

The Parthians overthrown.

WHILE L. Verus wallowed in all ſorts of pleaſures at Antioch, M. Aurelius made it his whole ſtudy to reform, by his example and ſeveral wholſome laws, the manners of the Romans, to redreſs abuſes, to reward the virtuous, and reclaim, rather by gentle means than ſeverity, the vicious. The people enjoyed under Rome happy under M. Aurelius.

[a] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 26. & in Ver. p. 37. Philoſt. ſoph. xxvii Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 775. & l. lxxi. p. 802. [b] Lucian. hiſt. p. 362. [c] Idem, p. 358. [d] Idem, p. 356. [e] Idem, p. 361. [f] Idem, p. 356. [g] Idem hiſt. p. 357.

under his mild adminiſtration all the bleſſings of liberty, and were truly no leſs free than their anceſtors had been in the beſt times of the republic. He paid a greater deference to the ſenate than Antoninus himſelf had ever done, referring to them the deciſion of ſuch cauſes as belonged to his own tribunal, and undertaking nothing without their advice, to which he readily ſubmitted, ſaying, It was more reaſonable for him to follow the advice of ſo many wiſe men, than for ſo many wiſe men to follow his. He never failed attending the ſenate, delivering his opinion there like a private ſenator. He adminiſtered juſtice in perſon with great aſſiduity and impartiality; heard with patience ſuch as complained of his miniſters, and endeavoured, ſo far as was conſiſtent with equity, to diſmiſs no one from his preſence diſſatisfied. He ſuffered no criminal to be condemned or executed, till he had examined with great care and attention the charge, and heard what the perſon accuſed could alledge in his defence. He was naturally inclined to mercy; but nevertheleſs puniſhed ſuch as were guilty of any enormous crime with the utmoſt rigor. However, we have innumerable inſtances of his clemency, and very few of his ſeverity. Aurelius Victor tells us, that he obliged the inhabitants of Nicea to ſend yearly to Rome a certain quantity of corn, for having beaten one of their citizens, by name Hipparchus, a man of great learning and extraordinary accompliſhments [h]. They continued to pay this tribute to the time of Conſtantine, by whom it was remitted.

His clemency and good-nature.

THE following year, L. Ælianus, or Lælianus, and Paſtor, being conſuls, Statius Priſcus made himſelf maſter of Artaxata, and a place called The new city, which ſoon became, ſays Dion Caſſius, the firſt city of Armenia. Priſcus being ſoon after ſent againſt the Parthians, Martius Verus took upon him the command of the troops in Armenia; and partly by force, partly by his wiſe conduct and obliging behaviour, prevailed upon the Armenians to ſubmit to the Romans, and to reſtore Sohemus to the throne, who, being driven out by Vologeſes, had reſided ſome time at Rome, and had been there created ſenator, and honoured with the conſulſhip [i]. On ſeveral medals of this year mention is made of the reduction of Armenia by Verus, who, in ſome inſcriptions, is ſaid to have given a king to Armenia [k]. Though he had no ſhare, as we have related above, in that conqueſt; yet the ſenate diſtinguiſhed both him and M. Aurelius with the title Artaxata taken by the Romans.

Armenia reduced.

[h] Aur. Vict. in Conſtant. Ariſtid. orat. ix. Dio. p. 804. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 26. [i] Dio. ibid. [k] Occo. p. 302, 303.

title of Armeniacus, and both aſſumed this year that of imperator [l], no doubt, for the reduction of Armenia. The following year, when Macrinius and Celſus were conſuls, M. Aurelius ſent his daughter Lucilla into Syria, to be married there to L. Verus, to whom ſhe had been for ſome time betrothed. She was attended by her ſiſter Cornificia, by Civica Pompeianus, uncle to L. Verus by the father, and by many other perſons of diſtinction. M. Aurelius would have willingly accompanied her in perſon into the eaſt, but parted with her at Brunduſium, and returned to Rome, that he might not ſeem to aſſume to himſelf the glory of finiſhing the Parthian war [m]. The next year, the fourth of M. Aurelius's reign, Gavius Orfitus and L. Arrius Pudens being conſuls, Vologeſes, having attacked the Romans at the head of a very numerous army, was utterly defeated by Caſſius; who, purſuing the advantages of his victory, advanced to Cteſiphon, took that city, and laid the palace of the Parthian monarchs in aſhes. He likewiſe made himſelf maſter of Edeſſa, of Babylon, and all Media. The city of Seleucia on the Tigris opened its gates to him, and received the Romans as friends; but nevertheleſs Caſſius ordered the inhabitants, to the number of four hundred thouſand ſouls, to be inhumanly maſſacred, and the city to be utterly demoliſhed. Some writers aſcribe this calamity to the treachery of the inhabitants; others to the cruelty of Caſſius, who thus retaliated upon the Parthians the dreadful ſlaughters which the Romans had in former times ſuffered from them. On his return, he loſt great numbers of his men, who died of diſtempers, or periſhed for want of proviſions [n]. For theſe ſucceſſes the ſenate beſtowed on L. Verus, though he had never ſtirred from Antioch, the glorious title of the conqueror of the Parthians and Medes, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions and medals of this and the following year [o]. Of this war the antients give us no farther account; but from Rufus Feſtus [p] and Dion Caſſius [q] it appears, that towards the end of the reign of Commodus, the provinces of Oſrhoene and Adiabene, with the city of Niſibis in Meſopotamia, were ſubject to the Romans. Many Greek hiſtorians immediately publiſhed accounts of this war; but were guilty, it ſeems, of conſiderable miſtakes; which prompted Lucian to compoſe his treatiſe on the manner of writing writing hiſtory [r]. The war being ended, Lucius Verus appointed kings over the foreign nations which had ſubmitted to Rome, and left the ſenators who had attended him, governors of the Roman provinces. M. Aurelius had ſent Annius Libo his couſin-german into Syria, to govern that province in quality of lieutenant, while L. Verus reſided there; but he dying ſuddenly, L. Verus, upon his leaving Syria, appointed Cæſonius Vectilianus governor of that province in his room. Libo was ſaid to have been poiſoned by Verus, not able to bear with his haughty and imperious temper. But Antoninus gave no credit to that report; nay, at the requeſt of Verus, he ſuffered Agaclytes, one of his collegue's freed-men, to marry Libo's widow, and even aſſiſted at the nuptial ceremonies, though no ways pleaſed with the marriage [s].

M. Aurelius marries his daughter Lucilla to L. Verus.

The Parthians utterly defeated by Caſſius, who takes moſt of their cities, &c.

[l] Occo. ibid. [m] Jul. Cap. p. 26. [n] Dio. p. 802. Lucian. hiſt. p. 358. Ammian. l. xxiii. [o] Occo. p. 283. Birag. p. 218, 236. [p] Feſt. p. 551. [q] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 848.

The death of Annius Libo.

The next year, Q. Servilius Pudens and L. Fufidius Pollio being conſuls, L. Verus returned to Rome, which he entered in triumph with M. Aurelius, who took his children with him in the triumphal chariot. The title of Parthicus was given by the ſenate to both emperors, and both aſſumed that of Father of their country, which M. Aurelius had declined till the return of his brother. L. Verus, after his triumph, begged, that the title of Cæſar might be conferred on the two ſons of M. Aurelius, viz. Commodus and Annius Verus; who accordingly received it on the twelfth of October of this year. The return of L. Verus proved fatal, we may ſay, to the whole world; for he carried the plague into all the provinces through which he paſſed; ſo that the infection not only ſpread through Italy, but extended to the moſt diſtant countries that were ſubject to, or had any communication with, Rome, or the Romans. We are told by Ammianus Marcellinus, that this plague firſt broke out at Seleucia, where the ſoldiers, pillaging the temple of Apollo, found a little golden coffer under ground, which, upon their opening it, caſt out ſuch a peſtilentious air, as immediately infected the neighbouring country, and ſoon ſpread into moſt parts of the world [t]; but thoſe who wrote at this very time, and before the infection reached the provinces of the Roman empire, aſſure us, that it began in Æthiopia, and was thence carried into Egypt, and from Egypt into the country of the Parthians, where it infected L. Verus's army [u]. Be that as it will, it was, without all doubt, brought into Italy by the troops troops which had been employed againſt the Parthians, and made a dreadful havock in all the provinces of the empire, raging with great violence for ſome years, eſpecially in Italy and at Rome, where it carried off many thouſands, and among the reſt great numbers of illuſtrious perſons. M. Aurelius cauſed ſuch of the common people as died, to be buried at his own expence, and enacted on that occaſion ſome laws concerning burials and ſepulchres, which were ſtill in force in Dioclefian's time [w]. The plague was followed by a dreadful famine, by earthquakes, inundations, and other calamities. At the ſame time, the Marcomanni one of the moſt warlike nations in Germany, invaded the empire, having firſt drawn into their alliance all the barbarous nations which bordered on the Roman dominions, from Gaul to Illyricum, viz. the Nariſci, the Hermonduri, the Quadi, the Suevians, the Sarmatians, the Victovales, Roxolani, Baſternæ, Coſtobochi, Alani, Vandali, Iazyges, and ſeveral other nations. This war, which by the hiſtorians of theſe times is called one of the greateſt wars Rome ever ſuſtained, was kindled while the flower of the Roman troops were yet employed in the eaſt againſt the Parthians; but ſuſpended for ſome time by the addreſs of the commanders on the frontiers, that Rome might not be at the ſame time engaged in two ſuch dreadful wars. The affairs of the eaſt were no ſooner ſettled, and L. Verus returned to Rome, than M. Aurelius acquainted the ſenate, that a war with the Marcomanni was inevitable, and of ſuch conſequence, that it required the preſence of both emperors; for M. Aurelius did not care to commit the whole management of the war to Verus, judging him unfit to carry it on with ſucceſs; and was, on the other hand, unwilling to leave him at Rome, where he began to be daily more and more deſpiſed on account of his enormous debaucheries. The ſenate approved his propoſal; ſo that both emperors, after having offered an infinite number of ſacrifices, and implored by all ſorts of ceremonies, both foreign and Roman, the protection of the gods, left Rome about the cloſe of the year, in their military apparel, and haſtened to Aquileia, to make the neceſſary preparations there for taking the field early in the ſpring [x].

L. Verus returns to Rome and triumphs with M. Aurelius.

A dreadful plague rages in all the provinces of the empire.

[r] Lucian. de hiſt. p. 347. [s] Dio, p. 811. & Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 22, & Ver. p. 38. [t] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 251, 253. [u] Lucian. de hiſt. p. 355.

And is followed by a famine, by earthquakes, &c.

War with the Marcomanni.

Both emperors ſet out from Rome.

THE next conſuls were the emperor L. Verus, the third time, and M. Quadratus, nephew to the emperor Antoninus Pius. Early in the ſpring the two emperors took the field, and their approach ſtruck the enemy with ſuch terror, that they [w] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 28. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 15. [x] Idem. ibid. p. 23, & 89.

they repaſſed the Danube and even put to death the authors and promoters of the war. The Quadi, whoſe king was dead, promiſed not to crown the perſon whom they had choſen in his room, without the conſent and approbation of the emperors. Moſt of the nations who had taken arms diſpatched embaſſadors either to the emperors or their generals, to make their ſubmiſſions, and aſk pardon for having diſturbed the peace of the empire. Hereupon Verus, who had left the diverſions of the city much againſt his will, and panted after them, was for returning immediately to Rome; but M. Aurelius, ſuſpecting the ſincerity of the barbarians, continued ſome time at Aquileia, fortifying that place with new works, and then paſſed, together with Verus, the neighbouring Alps; provided with great care for the ſafety of Italy and Illyricum, and returned to Rome about the end of this year [y]. The following year, Apronianus and Paulus being conſuls the ſecond time, the war ſeems to have broke out a-new; for it appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, that both princes took this year, the eighth of their reign, the title of imperator; which was never done but on occaſion of ſome victory [z]: and in the chronicle of Euſebius we read, that the Romans gained this year a ſignal victory over the Marcomanni, Quadi, Sarmatians, and Dacians [a]. The next year in the conſulate of Q. Soſius Priſcus and P. Cœlius Apollinaris, the Germans, notwithſtanding their late defeat, renewed the war with more vigour than ever; inſomuch, that both emperors left Rome in the depth of winter, and returned to Aquileia, with a deſign to attack the barbarians early in the ſpring; but the plague beginning to rage there with great violence, they thought it adviſeable to leave the place and haſten back to the metropolis. As they were on the road in the ſame coach, L. Verus being ſeized with an apoplexy near Altinum, M. Aurelius cauſed him to be immediately taken out of the coach and blooded, by which means he brought him alive to Altinum, where he lay three days ſpeechleſs and then died, after having lived thirty-nine years, and reigned eight and ſome months [b]. M. Aurelius conveyed his body to Rome; cauſed it to be interred with extraordinary pomp, by that of his father L. Cæſar, in the mauſoleum of Adrian; prevailed upon the ſenate, notwithſtanding the hatred they bore him, to rank him among the gods; appointed him prieſts, ſacrifices, &c. and took particular care of all his relations;

The Marcomanni and other German nations ſue for peace.

But renew the war with great vigour.

L. Verus dies.

[y] Dio, p. 808. Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 28. [z] Occo. p. 285, & 300. [a] Euſeb. chron. p. 136. [b] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 28. & in Ver. p. 30. Galen. prog. t. iii. p. 459.

lations; nay, even of his wicked and debauched freed-men, whom, however, he removed from the court, retaining only one of that herd, by name Eclectus, who afterwards murdered his ſon Commodus, as we ſhall relate hereafter. L. Verus was a prince entirely abandoned to all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery, paſſing his whole time in revels and banquets, and often ſcouring the ſtreets in the night-time, as Nero had formerly done, and committing great diſorders in the public-houſes and ſtews, which he uſed to frequent in diſguiſe, and mix with the mob, by whom he was often roughly handled. During his four years ſtay in Syria, he was ſo taken up with pleaſures and lewd amours, that he was with much-ado prevailed upon by his officers to march twice to the banks of the Euphrates, whence he haſtened back to Daphne, one of the ſuburbs of Antioch, a place ſo infamous for all manner of lewdneſs, that to live after the manner of Daphne was become a proverb to expreſs the moſt diſſolute and luxurious way of living, and that all who had any regard to their reputation avoided appearing there. In that place Verus abandoned himſelf without reſtraint to all ſorts of abominations, while his generals were carrying on the war againſt the Parthians and their allies; which gave occaſion to many ſevere lampoons, the Antiochians being greatly addicted to ſatire. But Verus preferred his pleaſures to his reputation: he brought with him out of Syria a great number of comedians, players, buffoons, &c. and paſſed moſt of his time in their company. Soon after his return to Rome, he is ſaid to have ſpent at one entertainment ſix millions of ſeſterces; for he preſented each of the gueſts, who were twelve in number, with crowns of gold, and with all the gold and ſilver plate, great part of which was ſet with jewels, which they had made uſe of during the banquet, and likewiſe with golden boxes filled with precious ointments; and at their parting he gave to each of them a chariot, and mules richly capariſoned, to carry them home. He turned the court, ſays the writer of his life, into a tavern; for after he had ſupped with M. Aurelius, he uſed to withdraw to his own company, and paſs the whole night in drinking with his debauched companions and lewd women. He was ſo fond of a horſe named Celer, or the Swift, that he erected a ſtatue to him in gold, fed him with raiſins and almonds, covered him with purple, ordered him to be kept in a room of the palace, and, when he died, erected a ſtately monument to him on the Vatican. He ſuffered his ſlaves to be as free with him at all times, as they were with their maſters, according to the Roman

His character.

His debaucheries, revels, banquets, &c.

man cuſtom, during the feaſt of Saturn, and was entirely governed by them, his freed-men, and his concubines. He built a magnificent villa on the Clodian way; and there ſpent moſt of his time in revelling with his freed-men and ſuch women as were infamous for their lewdneſs. He once invited thither M. Aurelius, who complied with his invitation, and ſtaid five days with him, hoping to reclaim him from his vices by the example of his regular and blameleſs conduct; but finding he was not to be reclaimed, the good emperor bore with him patiently, diſſembled his diſorders, concealed them as much as lay in his power, and even endeavoured to excuſe them. However, it was privately whiſpered abroad, that Verus's horrible exceſſes, and his arbitrary manner of proceeding after his return from the eaſt, occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between him and M. Aurelius, who was thought to have intimated in his ſpeech to the ſenate, that he was not much grieved for the death of his collegue, which enabled him to do good to all without controul or reſtraint; nay, as the beſt of princes are often maliciouſly cenſured, M. Aurelius was ſaid to have delivered himſelf from ſo troubleſome a collegue, either by poiſon, or by ordering his phyſician Poſidippus to let him blood unſeaſonably [c]. Dion Caſſius ſeems inclined to believe, that M. Aurelius thought it expedient to prevent by that means Verus from raiſing diſturbances in the ſtate [d]; for he is ſaid to have formed a conſpiracy, with a deſign to murder M. Aurelius, and reign alone [e]. But it is a crime, ſay other hiſtorians, to imagine, that ſuch a prince as M. Aurelius, to whom flattery itſelf has never equalled any other, would by any means contribute to the death of his brother, whatever his life and actions might deſerve [f]. Only ſuch fratricides as Caracalla, and perſons guilty of the moſt enormous crimes, can entertain ſuch thoughts of Aurelius [g]. Some charged the empreſs Fauſtina with his death, as if ſhe had poiſoned him for having diſcovered to his wife his inceſtuous converſation with her. Others ſaid, that he was poiſoned by his wife Lucilla, jealous of the great paſſion he had for his own ſiſter Fabia, whoſe power ſhe could not brook [h].

M. Aurelius ſaid by ſome to have cauſed him to be murdered.

But cleared from that aſperſion by others.

M. Aurelius, now delivered from ſo vicious and troubleſome a partner, made it his whole ſtudy to oblige all with his engaging behaviour and unbounded generoſity. He ſeemed to to excel not only his predeceſſors, but even himſelf, governing with ſuch moderation and mildneſs, as can hardly be expreſſed [i]. The neceſſary preparations for the war with the Marcomanni ingroſſed at this time his whole care and attention. His lieutenants gained, it ſeems, ſome advantages over that formidable enemy in the very beginning of the enſuing year, while M. Cornelius Cethegus and C. Erucius Clarus were conſuls; for ſoon after the death of L. Verus, and before the twenty-fifth of February of this year, he took upon him the title of imperator, as appears from ſeveral medals and inſcriptions [k]. However, the Marcomanni ſoon reſumed their courage, and falling upon Vindex, captain of the guards, cut both him and moſt of his men in pieces [l]. After this victory, they approached the Roman territories, where they were met by the flower of the troops of the empire. Hereupon a bloody battle enſued, which laſted many hours, both the Romans and barbarians fighting with incredible courage and reſolution; but at length the Romans were utterly defeated, and put to flight, after having loſt near twenty thouſand men. The Marcomanni purſued the fugitives to the very walls of Aquileia; which city they had taken, had not the Roman generals rallied their men with great ſkill and conduct. The barbarians entered Italy itſelf, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, and committing every-where moſt dreadful devaſtations [m]. The news of this fatal overthrow filled Rome with terror and conſternation. As the plague, which ſtill raged in moſt provinces of the empire, had greatly weakened the army, ſlaves, gladiators, and even the banditti of Dalmatia and Dardania, were admitted into the army. Beſides, M. Aurelius prevailed upon ſome mercenary Germans to ſerve againſt their countrymen. Thus a conſiderable army was ſoon raiſed; but as money was wanting to pay them, and defray the other charges of ſo dangerous a war, the good-natured emperor, not being able to prevail upon himſelf to burden his people with new taxes, expoſed to public ſale the furniture of the palace, the gold and ſilver plate, all the valuable pictures and ſtatues belonging to the crown, and even his wife's rich garments embroidered with gold, and a curious collection of pearls, which Adrian had purchaſed during his long progreſs through the provinces of the empire, and lodged in a particular cabinet, called Adrian's cabinet. The ſale laſted two months, and produced ſuch an immenſe ſum,

[c] Jul. Cap. p. 28—34. [d] Dio, p. 802. [e] Philoſt. ſoph. xxvii. p 548. [f] Jul. Cap. in Ver. p. 39. [g] Herodian. l. iv. p. 645. Aur. Vict. [h] Jul. Cap.

M. Aurelius prepares for the war againſt the Marcomanni.

The Romans defeated with great ſlaughter.

M. Aurelius ſells the plate, jewels, and rich furniture of the palace, to defray the charges of the war.

[i] Idem, p. 29. Eutrop. [k] Birag. p. 221. [l] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 805. [m] Idem ibid. & Lucian. pſeud. p. 493.

ſum, as enabled the emperor to relieve the people this year, when proviſions were very dear, with an extraordinary largeſs; to defray the charges of a five years expenſive war; and to buy back, when the war was ended, part of what he had ſold, allowing, however, the buyers full liberty to keep their purchaſes, or return them and take their money again [n]. When he was upon the point of ſetting out from Rome, he married his daughter Lucilla, the widow of L. Verus, to Claudius Pompeianus, who was originally of Antioch, and the ſon of a private Roman knight, but a perſon of extraordinary merit, and famed for his wiſdom and integrity, which M. Aurelius ever preferred to wealth and nobility [o]. Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate, blames M. Aurelius for having left the empire to his ſon Commodus, and not to Pompeianus, who was every way qualified for it; whereas Commodus was altogether unfit for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt [p]. However, neither Lucilla herſelf nor her mother Fauſtina were pleaſed with the match. Lucilla retained the title of Auguſta, and all the badges of ſovereignty [q]. Before the emperor left Rome, his ſon Annius Verus Cæſar died at Paleſtrina, in the ſeventh year of his age. M. Aurelius loved him with all the tenderneſs of a father; but nevertheleſs bore his death with great firmneſs, comforting the empreſs Fauſtina, and the phyſicians, who are ſaid to have occaſioned his death by opening unſeaſonably a ſwelling under his ear [r]. The emperor ſet out at length for Germany, whither he ſhewed a great deſire of carrying Galen with him; but that celebrated phyſician chuſing to ſtay at Rome, the good-natured prince would not preſs him to leave it. He left likewiſe at Rome his ſon Commodus, under the care of Pitholaus, his chiefc hamberlain, enjoining him to employ none but Galen, in caſe his ſon ſhould be taken ill during his abſence [s].

Annius Verus, the emperor's ſecond ſon, dies.

THE antients compare this war to the Punic and Cimbrian wars; but, at the ſame time, give us a very ſuccinct and confuſed account of it. The barbarians, ſay they, laid waſte ſeveral provinces of the empire; defeated great armies. The Marcomanni and the Vandals made themſelves maſters of Pannonia, and held it for ſome time. The Ca-

The barbarians overrun ſeveral provinces of the empire.

ſtobochi

[n] Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 29. Eutrop. & Birag p. 221. [o] Lamprid. in Comm. p. 48. Herodian. l. i. p. 464. [p] Julian. Cæs. p. 13. [q] Jul. Cap. p. 31. Herodian. l. i. p. 427. [r] Jul. Cap. p 31. [s] Galen. prog. 459. & 461.

ſtobochi over-ran Greece, and advanced as far as Elatea, a famous city of Phocis in Achaia; they overturned cities, and committed every-where dreadful devaſtations [t]. However, they were at length overcome by M. Aurelius, who, during this bloody and deſtructive war, gave innumerable inſtances of an extraordinary prudence and intrepidity, chuſing rather to prolong the war and tire out the enemy, than expoſe his men to unneceſſary dangers. The ſoldiers, animated by the example of their leader, behaved with uncommon bravery; and the captains of the guards, as well as the other generals, ſignalized themſelves in a very eminent manner [u]. The Marcomanni, Quadi, Sarmatians, and Vandals were conſtrained to abandon Pannonia and retire beyond the Danube. The emperor purſued them, and, coming up with them as they were paſſing that river, gave them a dreadful overthrow. The Iazyges were twice defeated, firſt in Pannonia, and the ſecond time as they were croſſing the Danube on the ice. A Roman ſoldier, who was upon guard, during the night, near the Danube, hearing one of his comrades, who had been taken by the barbarians, crying on the other ſide in an affecting manner, threw himſelf, armed as he was, into the river, croſſed it, reſcued his fellow-ſoldier, and returned with him to his poſt [w]. Dion Caſſius tells us, that the Roman ſoldiers having demanded of the emperor a largeſs after a bloody battle, in which they had behaved with extraordinary valour and obtained a complete victory, he refuſed it, telling them, That he could not enrich them, without impoveriſhing their parents and relations; and adding, as they ſeemed diſſatisfied with this anſwer, That their complaints gave him no uneaſineſs or concern, ſince he was well appriſed, that the gods alone diſpoſed of empires [x]. Pompeianus, the emperor's ſon-in-law, who commanded a body of troops, deſiring to have Pertinax joined in the commiſſion with him, M. Aurelius readily complied with his requeſt, tho' he had, not long before, upon ſome complaints, deprived Pertinax of an employment which he had in Dacia. Pertinax was attended with great ſucceſs in his new commiſſion, which induced the emperor to admit him into the ſenate. Being ſoon after convinced, that the complaints brought againſt him were quite groundleſs, to repair the injury he had done him, he honoured him with prætorial ornaments, and appointed

M. Aurelius carries on the war in perſon with great ſucceſs.

His firmneſs and intrepidity.

Pertinax created a ſenator.

[t] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 425. Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 29. Pauſan. l. x. p. 352. [u] Jul. Cap. p. 31. Ariſtid. orat. ix. p. 117. [w] Dio. l. lxxi. p. 804, 805. Aur. Vict. p. 31. [x] Dio, p. 803.

appointed him governor of Rhœtia and Noricum, whence he had drove the Germans, who had broke into that province, and was on that account, notwithſtanding the meanneſs of his birth, raiſed by the emperor to the conſular dignity [y]. The emperor, during his firſt expedition againſt the Marcomanni, reſided for the moſt part at Carnuntum, a city of Upper Pannonia upon the Danube, which ſome take to be the preſent village of St. Perronel in Auſtria [z].

Diſturbances in Egypt.

BEFORE the war with the Marcomanni was ended, another broke out in Egypt, the robbers and ſhepherds of that country, who were numerous, taking up arms, at the inſtigation of their prieſts, and committing dreadful diſorders. Being headed by one Iſidorus, a man of great reſolution and intrepidity, they killed a Roman centurion and ſome ſoldiers, by treachery; and afterwards, the Egyptians joining them in great numbers from all parts, they defeated the Roman troops in a pitched battle; over-ran the whole country, and would have made themſelves maſters of Alexandria itſelf, had not Caſſius, whom M. Aurelius had appointed governor of Syria, marched againſt them. Caſſius was reckoned the beſt commander of his age, and had ſignalized himſelf both in the Parthian and German wars. However, he did not think it adviſeable to engage ſo bold and deſperate an enemy; but having found means to ſow diviſions among them, as he was a man of great craft and addreſs, he obliged them at laſt to ſubmit and lay down their arms [a]. Caſſius, having thus quelled the diſturbances in Egypt, marched into Armenia and Arabia, where he performed great exploits; but neither of them, nor of this year, which ſeems to have laſted ſome time, any farther mention is made in hiſtory. At the ſame time, the Moors over-ran almoſt all Spain, ravaging that country with fire and ſword; but were in the end driven out by the emperor's lieutenants. Severus, afterwards emperor, was at that time quæſtor of the province of Bœtica [b]. There were likewiſe ſome diſturbances in the country of the Sequani, now the Franche-Comté; but theſe the emperor compoſed with his authority and ſeaſonable ſeverity [c]. The next conſuls were Herennianus and Severus, uncle to the emperor of that name, who, at his requeſt, was by M. Aurelius admitted

Which are ſuppreſſed by Caſſius.

Spain invaded by the Moors, who are driven out.

[y] Idem, p. 810. Jul. Cap. in Pertin. p. 54. [z] Dio, ibid. Baudrand. p. 165. [a] Dio, p. 803. Vulcat. Gallican. in vit. Caſſ. [b] Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 31. & Spart. in Sever. [c] Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32.

mitted into the ſenate [d]. During their adminiſtration, a great diſpute ariſing between Herodes Atticus and the city of Athens, the emperor ſeemed inclined to favour the latter; which ſo provoked Herodes, who was a man of a violent and fiery temper, that when the cauſe was to be decided by the emperor then reſiding at Sirmium, now Sirmich, in Pannonia, inſtead of pleading with his uſual eloquence, tranſported with rage, he launched into bitter and ſcurrilous invectives againſt the emperor, telling him amongſt other things, that he ſuffered himſelf, which was highly unbecoming an emperor, to be governed by a woman and an infant only three years old; for the empreſs Fauſtina and her young daughter, inſtructed by her, had interceded with the emperor in behalf of the Athenians. When he had done railing againſt the emperor, Baſſæus, captain of the guards, told him, That his inſolent behaviour might perhaps coſt him his life. But Herodes, without ſhewing the leaſt concern or remorſe, anſwered, That a man of his age had nothing to fear, and immediately withdrew. As for the emperor he heard him the whole time quite unconcerned; and when he withdrew, addreſſing the Athenian deputies, You may alledge your reaſons, ſaid he, tho' Herodes has not been pleaſed to alledge his. He heard them with great attention, and could not help ſhedding tears, when they deſcribed the cruel and arbitrary proceedings of Herodes and his freed-men, who had uſurped a kind of ſovereignty over the city, and oppreſſed the people in a tyrannical manner. However, the emperor did not condemn Herodes, but only his freed-men; and the puniſhment which he inflicted upon them was very ſmall, ſays our hiſtorian, and no-ways anſwerable to their crimes [e]; nay, to all he remitted part of it, and to one of them, named Alcimedon, the whole, thinking him ſufficiently puniſhed by the death of his two daughters, killed by a flaſh of lightning after their arrival at Sirmium. Some time after, Herodes wrote to the emperor, complaining, that he did not honour him, as he had done formerly, with his letters; and the good-natured prince immediately ſent him an anſwer, filled with the moſt tender and ſincere expreſſions of friendſhip, condeſcending, in a manner, to beg his pardon for having condemned perſons belonging to him [f]. Baſſæus, captain of the guards, whom we have mentioned above, is by Dion Caſſius ſtyled M. Rufus Baſæus.

The emperor bears patiently the reproaches of Herodes Atticus.

[d] Onuph. in faſt. p. 231. Noris. epiſt. conſul. p. 108.
[e] Dio, ibid. Philoſt. ſoph. xxvii. p. 558—561. [f] Idem. ibid.

Baſæus. He was, according to that writer, a common peaſant; but being forced into the ſervice, gave ſuch proofs of his courage and integrity, that the emperor created him captain of the guards, tho' he was quite deſtitute of learning and ſpoke ſo broad, that he could hardly be underſtood [g]. The following year, when Maximus and Orfitus were conſuls, M. Aurelius gained, it ſeems, conſiderable advantages over the Germans; for, on all the medals of this year, mention is made of his victories in Germany, and on ſome he is ſtyled Germanicus; which title was given to his ſon Commodus this very year, on the fifteenth of October [h]. The next conſuls were M. Aurelius Severus, the ſecond time, and T. Claudius Pompeianus, during whoſe adminiſtration nothing happened, which hiſtorians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity. But the enſuing year, when Gallus and Flaccus were conſuls, M. Aurelius, by an event altogether miraculous, eſcaped being cut off with his whole army. This happened beyond the Danube, in the country of the Quadi, where M. Aurelius was this year making war, and near the river Gran, which riſing from the mountains of North Hungary falls into the Danube over-againſt the antient city of Strigonium, to which the Gran gives its name [i]. This memorable battle was begun by the enemy's ſlingers and archers, who, from the oppoſite banks of the Gran, galled the Romans to ſuch a degree, that the emperor thought it adviſeable to paſs the river, and diſlodge them; which was done accordingly, not without great ſlaughter on both ſides; but the enemy retiring in good order, as it had been concerted among them before-hand, drew the Romans, who advanced with more bravery than conduct, into a diſadvantageous place, among barren mountains, quite deſtitute of water. The Romans cloſing their ranks, defended themſelves with great bravery, and repulſed the enemy, who thereupon, giving over the attack, ſeized the avenues, and blocked them up on all ſides, hoping to reduce by thirſt thoſe whom they could not overcome by force of arms. The Romans, finding themſelves thus ſhut up among barren mountains, quite ſpent with their wounds and the fatigues of the battle, oppreſſed with heat, and tormented with an inſufferable drought, attempted to open themſelves a way through the midſt of the enemy; but all their efforts proving unſucceſsful, they found themſelves oblig-

M. Aurelius in great danger of being cut off with his whole army by the Marcomanni.

[g] Dio, p. 803, & in excerpt. Val. p. 717. [h] Birag p. 223, 225. Lamprid. in Comm. p. 50. [i] Onuph. in faſt. p. 232. Tertul. apol. c. 5. Dio, l. lxxi. p. 805. Baudr. p. 330.

ged to continue under arms, expoſed to the rays of the ſun, and oppreſſed with a violent thirſt, without being able either to fight or retire. In this deplorable extremity, both ſoldiers and officers began to abandon themſelves to deſpair, while the emperor, more affected with the miſeries of the ſoldiers than his own, flew through all the ranks, endeavouring to inſpire them with courage, and raiſe their drooping ſpirits; but as they ſaw no poſſible means of eſcaping the preſent danger, his words were to no purpoſe, and nothing was heard but groans and lamentations, nothing ſeen but marks of the utmoſt deſpair. In this diſtreſs, when they expected every moment to be either cut in pieces, or to become a prey to the barbarous enemy, who ſurrounded them, clouds appeared all on a ſudden gathering in the air; the ſky was overcaſt, and, to their inexpreſſible joy, rain fell in great plenty; which the fainting ſoldiers received, holding their mouths, helmets, and bucklers up to heaven, as they are repreſented on the famous column of Antoninus at Rome. In this poſture the barbarians fell upon them; ſo that they were obliged at the ſame time to drink and fight; for they were ſo oppreſſed with drought, that ſuch of them as were wounded drank their own blood mixed with water which they had received in their helmets. As they were more eager to quench their thirſt than to repulſe the enemy, they had been all cut in pieces, had they not been miraculouſly ſuccoured by a dreadful ſtorm of hail, attended with thunder and lightning, which diſcharged itſelf upon the barbarians, as they advanced againſt them. Thus were ſeen at the ſame time fire and water deſcending from heaven; water to refreſh the Romans, and fire to deſtroy their enemies; for either no fire fell upon the Romans, or what fell was immediately extinguiſhed; and the rain which fell upon the barbarians was ſo far from overcoming the flames which conſumed them, that, on the contrary, it doubled their violence, as if it had not been water, but oil. The enemy, thus deſtitute of water in the midſt of a heavy ſhower, were obliged either to wound themſelves, in order to extinguiſh with their blood the devouring flames, or to have recourſe to the Romans, and throw themſelves upon the mercy of M. Aurelius, who received and entertained them in a friendly manner [k]. Thus Dion Caſſius relates this memorable event, ſo much celebrated by Apollinaris, Tertullian, Euſebius, Julius Capitolinus, Themiſtius in his oration before Theodoſius, St. Jerom, Gregory of Nyſſa, the poet Claudian,

They are relieved by a miraculous ſhower.

[k] Dio, ibid. p. 805, 806.

an, and the chronicle of Alexandria. It was engraved on the famous column of Antoninus, with the other exploits of M. Aurelius during the Marcomannic war, and on another which Themiſtius tells us he had ſeen [l]. The truth of this miraculous event has been univerſally acknowledged both by the chriſtian and pagan writers, who nevertheleſs diſagree as to the authors of it. Dion Caſſius aſcribes it to a celebrated magician of Egypt, named Arnuphis, who attended the emperor in this war [m]; Suidas to a magician, by name Julianus, who was originally of Chaldæa, and wrote ſeveral books of magic [n]. Julius Capitolinus [o], Themiſtius [p], and the poet Claudian [q] pretend, that this miraculous ſhower was owing to the emperor's own prayers. In the above-mentioned column of the Antonini it is by the pagans aſcribed to their thundering Jupiter. But all the chriſtian writers aſſure us, that ſo ſignal a favour was granted by heaven to the prayers of the chriſtian ſoldiers, who ſerved in the Roman army. This Euſebius aſſerts upon the authority of Apollinaris biſhop of Hierapolis, which ought to be of great weight, ſince this miraculous deliverance happened in his time [r]. The chriſtians, by whoſe prayers the army was ſaved, belonged to the legion Melitina, mentioned by Dion Caſſius [s], or, as Xiphilin expreſſes it, to the legion that had been raiſed or quartered at Melitine; for the legions, as is well known, often borrowed their names from the places where they were quartered. Melitine was one of the chief cities of Armenia Minor, and ſtood on the banks of the Euphrates. This legion, which, according to Xiphilin, conſiſted entirely of chriſtians, and had been prompted by a viſion, if Gregory of Nyſſa is to be credited [t], to embrace the true religion, was in all likelihood the twelfth, which by Titus had been quartered in the city of Melitine in the year 70, [u] and was in Cappadocia in the year 230, the ninth of Alexander Severus's reign [w]. The province of Cappadocia probably comprehended at that time Armenia Minor; ſo that we may ſuppoſe it to have been ſtill at Melitine; for there we find it placed in a notitia imperii, or ſtate of the empire, publiſhed many years after the death of Severus. The twelfth legion was diſtinguiſhed by the ſurname of the thundering [x]; and Apollinaris, as quoted by Euſebius [y], tells us, that the le-

Which was obtained by the prayers of the chriſtian ſoldiers.

The legion Melitina.

[l] Themiſt. orat. xv. [m] Dio, ibid. [n] Suid. p. 439. [o] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 32. [p] Themiſt. ibid. [q] Claud. in conſ. Honor. 6. p. 183. [r] Euſeb. l. v. c. 5. [s] Dio, p. 806. [t] Greg. Nyſſ. orat. 2. de quadraginta. martyr. [u] Joſeph. bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 4. [w] Dio, l. lv. p. 565. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Euſeb. l. v. c. 5.

gion Melitina was honoured with that title by the emperor, by way of reward for the above-mentioned miracle. The ſame thing we read in Xiphilin, and in Onuphrius, who maintains, that till the time of M. Aurelius no mention is made of the thundering legion [z]. But from an antient inſcription it appears, that the twelfth legion was diſtinguiſhed by that ſurname even in Trajan's time [a]. Of this legion, which ſtill ſubſiſted in the time of Euſebius [b], were the forty martyrs of Sebaſte, ſo much ſpoken of by the eccleſiaſtic writers of the primitive times [c]. But what moſt of all confirms the truth of the above-mentioned miracle is, the letter which the emperor himſelf wrote to the ſenate, giving them an account of it, and of the victory he gained on that occaſion [d]. Tertullian aſſures us, that in his letter he aſcribed, tho' in a doubtful manner, his deliverance to the prayers of the chriſtians; Having obtained rain, ſays he, as quoted by Tertullian, perhaps by the prayers of the chriſtians. He expreſſed himſelf to the ſenate with great caution and circumſpection, as the reader may obſerve; but of his being in his own mind fully convinced, that his ſafety was owing to the chriſtians, he gave ſoon after a very ſtrong proof, by enacting, that ſuch as ſhould thenceforth accuſe a chriſtian on account of his religion, ſhould be puniſhed with the utmoſt rigor, that is, as Euſebius underſtands it, with death [e]. As Tertullian quotes the emperor's letter in writing againſt the pagans, we cannot doubt but he had ſeen it, nor call in queſtion what he ſays of it. Euſebius quotes ſome paſſages of it out of Tertullian, and ſpeaks of it in his chronicle as a thing that was ſaid to have been. But St. Jerom, in tranſlating that paſſage of Euſebius, poſitively affirms, that it was ſtill extant. Oroſius and Xiphilin only ſay, that it was thought to be extant in their times [f]; whence it is manifeſt they had not ſeen it. A letter aſcribed to M. Aurelius concerning the victory, which he obtained by the prayers of the chriſtians, has reached our times. It is commonly annexed in Greek to the apologies of Juſtin the martyr, and is to be found in Latin in Onuphrius [g] and Baronius [h], tranſlated, as they tell us, from the Greek text, which was itſelf a tranſlation from the original Latin. They both look upon it as an authentic piece; but, notwithſtanding

M. Aurelius acknowledges himſelf indebted to the chriſtians for his deliverance.

[z] Onuph. in faſt. p. 233. [a] Vide Baron. ad ann. 176. & Euſeb. chron. p. 233. [b] Euſeb. ibid. [c] Greg. Nyſſ. de quadrag. martyr. [d] Dio, l. lxxi p. 806. [e] Euſeb. l iii. c. 5. Tertull. apol. c. 5. [f] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 7. Dio, p. 806. [g] Onuph. faſt. p. 234. [h] Baron. ad ann. 176.

ing their judgment, it is by the beſt critics rejected as ſpurious, to whoſe opinion we readily ſubſcribe, finding it frequently contradicts all the hiſtorians who have deſcribed the reign of M. Aurelius [i]. After ſo glorious a victory, M. Aurelius was proclaimed emperor the ſeventh time, and the empreſs Fauſtina was honoured by the ſenate with the title of mater caſtrorum, or the mother of armies [k]. This memorable victory was gained by the Romans in the year of the chriſtian æra 174, the fourteenth of M. Aurelius's reign. Great numbers of the enemy were cut in pieces, many were taken priſoners, and the reſt put to flight and diſperſed.

MARCUS AURELIUS could not, however, be yet prevailed upon by his friends to leave Germany, and return to Rome, being deſirous to reduce the countries of the Marcomanni and the Sarmatians, to Roman provinces, not out of vanity and ambition, ſays Dion Caſſius, but becauſe he found by experience, that he could not rely upon their fidelity. This he would have compaſſed, had he not been interrupted in the midſt of his conqueſts by the revolt of Caſſius, which we ſhall relate anon. He continued in Germany great part of the following year, when Piſo and Julianus were conſuls; and having placed twenty thouſand men in the countries of the Quadi and Marcomanni, harraſſed theſe two nations to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved to abandon their native ſoil and ſettle elſewhere. But M. Aurelius, having received timely notice of their deſign, prevented them from putting it in execution; ſo that their fields being laid waſte, and all communication with the neighbouring nations cut off, they were in the end conſtrained by famine to ſend embaſſadors to the emperor and ſue for peace. The Quadi ſent with their embaſſadors all the Roman deſerters, and thirteen thouſand priſoners, whom they had taken during the war; and by that means obtained a peace, upon condition, that they ſhould not for the future traffic within the Roman dominions, nor ſettle within ſix miles of the Danube. But this peace was ſhort-lived; for the Quadi, inſtead of executing the articles of their agreement, joined the Iazyges, who were ſtill in arms, and drew over the Marcomanni. At the ſame time, they drove out Furtius, their king, for diſapproving their meaſures, and, of their own authority, appointed one Ariogeſes in his room; which M. Aurelius reſented to ſuch a degree, that tho' the Quadi promiſed to ſet at liberty fifty thouſand Roman captives, upon condition,

The Marcomanni and Quadi ſue for peace.

[i] Vide P. Pagi, p. 174. & Scalig. in chron. Euſeb. p. 223.
[k] Dio, p. 806.

condition, that he concluded a peace with them, and confirmed to Ariogeſes the title of king, the emperor would not hearken to the propoſal, but on the contrary proſcribed the new prince and ſet a price upon his head. Hereupon the Quadi, being joined by the Marcomanni, the Iazyges, the Buri, the Nariſci, and many other nations, of whom we find no farther mention in hiſtory, attacked the Romans, but were, after a long, bloody, and obſtinate diſpute, put to the rout and utterly defeated. Ariogeſes himſelf was taken priſoner and brought to the emperor, who, notwithſtanding his late menaces and reſentment, generouſly ſpared his life, and contented himſelf with confining the captive to the city of Alexandria, the metropolis of Egypt [l]. After this victory, moſt nations in Germany ſent deputies to ſue for peace, offering to ſubmit to ſuch terms as the emperor ſhould think fit to impoſe upon them. The Quadi ſeem to have continued in arms till the reign of Commodus. The Marcomanni, after ſo many loſſes, ſubmitted and obtained a peace, upon condition, that they ſhould not ſettle within five miles of the Danube. Zantiches, king of the Iazyges, came in perſon to wait on M. Aurelius, attended by all the great men of the nation, and was by him received into favour, but obliged to retire with his people farther from the Danube than the Marcomanni. They were a very powerful and warlike people, and had taken above an hundred thouſand priſoners, during this war, whom they ſet at liberty upon the concluſion of a peace, this being in all likelihood one of the articles of it. Beſides, they ſupplied M. Aurelius with a body of eighty thouſand horſemen, of whom he immediately ſent five thouſand into Britain, where the Romans were threatened with a new war. The Buri, Nariſci, and other German nations, obtained a peace upon ſuch terms as the emperor would never have granted, had he not been obliged by all means to put an end to this war, in order to lead his troops againſt Caſſius, whoſe revolt was likely to bring dreadful calamities upon the empire, as it had already raiſed the courage of the barbarians.

They receive a great overthrow.

The Marcomanni and other nations obtain a peace.

Avidius Caſſius revolts.

His extraction.

AVIDIUS CASSIUS, whom we have frequently mentioned in deſcribing the Parthian and Egyptian wars, was, as ſome authors write, deſcended by the mother from the antient family of the Caſſii. His father, by name Avidius Severus, raiſed himſelf, according to the author of his life [m], from the degree of a centurion to the firſt employments in the ſtate; and was, or [l] Dio, p. 808. & in excerpt. Val. p. 717. [m] Vulcat. Gallican. in Caſſio.

on account of his extraordinary parts, highly favoured by the emperor M. Aurelius, but died before the revolt of his son. Such is the account which Vulcatius Gallicanus gives us of his extraction. But another historian writes, that Cassius himself owned, that he had nothing, except the name, common to him with the famous Cassius who killed Cæsar the dictator; and adds, that he was originally of Cyrrhum in Syria, and the son of one Heliodorus, who had the good fortune to raise himself by his eloquence to the government [n]. One of Adrian's secretaries was named Heliodorus, and him a modern writer takes to have been the father of Cassius [o]. He was remarkable for maintaining discipline among the troops; but his severity, according to Vulcatius, savoured of cruelty; for if any soldier was found to take but the least thing by violence from the people of the provinces, he caused him to be immediately crucified in the place where the fact was committed: some he ordered to be burnt alive; others, chained together, to be thrown into some river or into the sea. He used to punish deserters with cutting off their hands and legs, saying, that the sight of a criminal living in misery, made a deeper impression than his being put to death at one blow. As he had been attended with wonderful success against the Parthians, M. Aurelius, in his first war with the Marcomanni, sent him against the Sarmatians their confederates. As he was encamped near the Danube, some auxiliaries of his army, upon intelligence, that the enemy lay carelessly on the banks of that river, went without his knowledge to attack them, killed three thousand of them, and returned to the camp loaded with booty. Their centurions, who had put them upon this enterprize, and headed them in the action, expected some great reward from Cassius for having with an handful of men killed such a number of the enemy, while the tribunes and other officers had neglected so favourable an opportunity. But Cassius, looking upon this as a bad precedent, which might be attended with worse consequences, instead of rewarding the centurions, caused them all to be seized and crucified like slaves. This severity occasioned a mutiny in the army; but Cassius, without betraying the least fear, appeared naked and unarmed in the midst of the incensed multitude, crying aloud to them, Kill me, and, to your neglect of duty, add, if you dare, the murder of your general. This intrepidity allayed their fury; and no one daring to utter a single word of complaint, they

His severity towards the soldiers.

A signal instance of it.

[n] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 810. Aristid. orat. 26. [o] Vales. in excerpt. Dionis, p. 103.

they all returned to their tents, and thenceforth made it their whole ſtudy to learn and obſerve the military laws, knowing they ſerved under a general who could not by any fears or menaces be prevailed upon to wink at their faults, or ſuffer them to paſs unpuniſhed. This inſtance of ſeverity made ſuch a deep impreſſion on the minds of the Sarmatians, that deſpairing to conquer a people thus obſervant of military diſcipline and the rules of war, they immediately ſent embaſſadors to the emperor to beg peace for an hundred years [P]. After the firſt Marcomannic war, he was by M. Aurelius appointed governor of Syria, the emperor judging him the beſt qualified of any in the empire to reſtore the antient diſcipline entirely neglected by the troops quartered in that province (F). Nor was he miſtaken in his judgment; for in a few months the moſt diſſolute were reclaimed from their pleaſures and luxurious manner of living, the antient diſcipline revived, and the Appointed governor of Syria.

He reſtores the military diſcipline among the troops.

[P] Vulcat. Gall. ibid. p. 46.

(F) The emperor, upon his appointing him governor of Syria, wrote the following letter to his lieutenant in that province: "I "have given to Avidius Caſſius the command of the legions in "Syria, which Cæſonius Vectilianus found, as he informs me, "diſſolved in luxury, and abandoned to all ſorts of pleaſures. He "is, you know, a ſtrict obſerver of the antient diſcipline, with-"out which the ſoldiers can never be kept to their duty. You "remember the old verſe,

"Moribus antiquis res ſtat Romana virilis,

"And truly the ſtrict obſervance of the antient diſcipline is the "chief ſupport of the empire. Take care that ſufficient provi-"ſions be got ready for the legions, which, if I am not deceived "in Avidius Caſſius, will not be miſapplied." To this letter the lieutenant returned the following anſwer: "You could not prefer "to the command of the legions in Syria a man better qualified "for that important truſt than Avidius Caſſius: for only an officer "of his ſeverity can reclaim them from their voluptuous manner "of living, and put them out of conceit with the pleaſures of the "effeminate Greeks, to which they have entirely abandoned "themſelves. He will ſhake their flowers off of their heads, and "teach them their duty. The neceſſary proviſions for the le-"gions are already laid up; and nothing can be wanting, ſo "long as they have ſuch an excellent commander as Avidius Caſ-"ſius (14).

(14) Vulcat. Gall, in vit. Caſſ.

the whole army thoroughly reformed. Caſſius, upon his arrival at Antioch, ordered all the ſoldiers and officers to repair forthwith to their colours, publiſhed a proclamation forbidding them, on pain of being caſhiered, to appear at Daphne, every ſeventh day examined their cloaths, arms, and equipages, and frequently obliged them to perform their exerciſes all in a body, ſaying, It was a ſhameful thing that wreſtlers and gladiators ſhould be continually exerciſed, and not ſoldiers, whoſe labours are leſſened in proportion as they become accuſtomed to them [q]. As for Caſſius's other qualities, the author of his life repreſents him as a man endowed with great virtues, which, however, were allayed with no leſs vices, inſomuch, that he was by ſome called a ſecond Catiline. But to us that writer ſeems to contradict himſelf in the character he draws of Caſſius; for in one place he paints him not only as ſevere, but cruel and inhuman towards his ſoldiers; and in another tells us, that he was greatly beloved by them. How can his being ſtyled a ſecond Catiline, on account of his virtues and vices, his good and his bad qualities, be reconciled with what he writes elſewhere, viz. that had he attained the empire, he would have proved an excellent prince, a prince of great clemency and moderation [r]. Dion Caſſius ſpeaks of him, not only as an eminent commander, but as a perſon equal to, and in every reſpect worthy of, the ſovereign power [s]. He always abhorred an abſolute and monarchical government, and is by ſome thought to have had nothing in view, when he revolted, but to reſtore the commonwealth to its former authority. He had been charged in the reign of Antoninus Pius with a deſign of depoſing that prince; but his father, who was a man of great intereſt at court, having prejudiced the emperor in his favour, the accuſation was dropt. However, he was thenceforth looked upon as a ſuſpicious and diſaffected perſon. When he commanded in the Parthian war under L. Verus, that prince, ſuſpecting him, and indeed not without reaſon, wrote the following letter concerning him to M. Aurelius, his partner in the empire. "Avi-
"dius Caſſius ſeems to me to aſpire at the empire, as it is "well known he did in the reign of our father Antoninus
"Pius. I therefore adviſe you to keep a watchful eye over "him. He cenſures and condemns all our actions, grows
"exceeding rich, and ſpeaks of us both with the utmoſt con"tempt, calling you a doating philoſopher, and me a luxu"rious fool. Conſider what is to be done: I bear no hatred to
"the

Is an enemy to monarchy.

L. Verus's letter concerning him.

[q] Idem. p. 47. [r] Idem, p. 41—45. [s] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 810.

" the man, but would have you to reflect, that by in" veſting ſuch a perſon with power, and truſting him with " the command of the troops, by whom he is greatly be" loved, you may injure both yourſelf and your chil" dren." Nothing can give us a greater idea of the virtue truly heroic of this excellent prince, than his anſwer to this letter, which was couched in the following terms : " I " have peruſed your letter, in which you betray greater fear
" and uneaſineſs than becomes an emperor, or is conſiſtent
" with the equity of our reign. If the empire is allotted by " heaven to Avidius Caſſius, it will not be in our power to " cut him off. You know the ſaying of our grandfather A" drian that no man cuts off his ſucceſſor. If Caſſius is " not deſtined to the empire, he will fall of himſelf, with" out our cruelty, into the fatal ſnare. Beſides, we cannot in " juſtice treat a perſon as a criminal, who is accuſed by none,
" and is, as you write, beloved by the army, and conſe-" quently a man of merit and a good commander. In caſes of " treaſon, even when the crime is proved, the world is apt
" to think the ſufferer injured ; which made your grandfather
" Adrian complain of the hard fate of emperors, who are " never thought to have been in danger till they are killed.
" I chuſe to name Adrian rather than Domitian, who was " the firſt author of this ſaying, becauſe a thing, however
" well ſaid, has not its due weight and authority when it " comes from a tyrant. Let therefore Avidius Caſſius purſue
" his own meaſures ; he is an excellent officer, and a man " of great courage, and uſeful to the ſtate. As for my chil" dren, to whoſe ſafety you would have me to ſacrifice him,
" if he deſerves to be more beloved than they, if his life
" promiſes greater advantages to the ſtate than theirs, let A" vidius Caſſius live, let the children of M. Aurelius periſh [t]."
The good-natured emperor took no farther notice of what Verus had wrote to him ; for upon the return of Caſſius from the eaſt, where he had performed great exploits, he put him at the head of an army, which he ſent againſt the Sarmatians, and afterwards appointed him governor of Syria, as we have related above. In the mean time the Marcomanni and other German nations, renewing the war with great vigor, Caſſius laid hold of that opportunity to ſeize the empire.
Some authors write, that the empreſs Fauſtina, being well appriſed, that her ſon Commodus was no-ways qualified for the ſovereign power, and fearing that ſome one might ſeize it,

M. Aure-lius's anſwer.

[t] Idem, p. 40. 41.

it, who would deſtroy her and her little children, ſollicited Caſſius to declare himſelf emperor as ſoon as he ſhould hear the news of M. Aurelius's death, and promiſed in that caſe to marry him. They add, that a report being ſpread of the emperor's death, Caſſius immediately cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed in his room, and that, tho' the rumour proved afterwards falſe, he found himſelf too far engaged to recede. Others clear Fauſtina from being any ways privy to the deſign of Caſſius (G), and tells us, that the report of the emperor's death was ſpread abroad by Caſſius himſelf, in order to induce the governors of the eaſtern provinces to join him, M. Aurelius being greatly beloved, and his ſon no leſs hated [u]. Be that as it will, he ſoon became maſter of all the countries beyond mount Taurus, and of Egypt itſelf, Flavius Calviſius, governor of that province, having declared in his favour. The troops in Bithynia were likewiſe inclined to ſide with him, but reſtrained by Clodius Albinus, their commander, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. Several foreign princes and nations eſpouſed his cauſe, but none with more zeal than the Jews [w].

He aſſumes the title of emperor.

And is joined by moſt of the eaſtern nations.

MARTIUS VERUS, governor of Cappadocia, was the firſt who gave the emperor notice of this revolt. M. Aurelius concealed it for ſome time; but when he found it divulged by [u] Vulcat. Gall. in Caſſ. p. 42, 43. [w] Idem ibid. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 718. Albin. vit. p. 81.

(G) Vulcatius Gallicanus, to clear the empreſs from this charge, produces two letters written by her to M. Aurelius on occaſion of this revolt. In one ſhe expreſſes herſelf thus: "My mother "Fauſtina, in the time of the defection of Celſus, adviſed your "father Antoninus Pius to ſhew his kindneſs, in the firſt place to "his own family, and next to others. And truly it is incumbent "upon every good prince to take care of his wife and children. "Your ſon Commodus is yet very young, and your ſon-in-law "Pompeianus is ſtricken in years and a ſtranger. Do not there-"fore ſpare men, who, had they conquered, would neither have "ſpared you, nor your wife and children. You will hear from "Cæcilius, whom I ſhall ſend to you, what reports have been "ſpread of you by the wife of Caſſius, by his ſon and his ſon-in-"law, &c." In the other letter ſhe preſſes him to purſue Caſſius and his accomplices with the utmoſt ſeverity, if he loves her and his children, aſſuring him, that if he neglects to oppreſs them, they will not fail to oppreſs him (15).

(15) Idem ibid.

by public fame, he acquainted the ſoldiers with it in a very judicious and modeſt ſpeech, only complaining of the ungrateful return which Caſſius made him for the kindneſs he ever had, and ſhould ever have, for him, notwithſtanding his revolt, as he hoped to ſhew as ſoon as he had brought him to a ſenſe of his duty. Neither did Caſſius on his ſide utter any injurious reflections againſt M. Aurelius, but only charged him with neglecting the moſt important affairs of the ſtate to attend the ſtudy of philoſophy, and with ſuffering, thro' an exceſs of goodneſs, many diſorders which it was incumbent upon him as emperor to correct [x]. In the mean while, M. Aurelius having terminated the war with the Marcomanni and other German nations, as the time approached for his ſon Commodus to put on the manly robe, he ſent for him from Rome and gave him it, with the uſual ceremonies, on the ſeventh of July, ordering on that occaſion conſiderable ſums to be diſtributed among the Roman people [y]. At Rome the ſenate were no ſooner informed of the revolt of Caſſius, than they declared him a public enemy and confiſcated his eſtate, which the emperor ordered to be returned, not into his private coffers, as his predeceſſors had done, but into the public treaſury.

M. Aurelius marches againſt him.

At length M. Aurelius left Germany and ſet out for Illyricum, with a deſign to purſue his march thence into the eaſt and meet Caſſius, declaring, that he was ready to reſign the empire to him, if the gods ſhould judge it expedient for the public good, that Caſſius ſhould reign, and not M. Aurelius: For it is not, added he, any private intereſt or ambition, but the public welfare, that prompts me to undergo ſo many labours, to expoſe myſelf to ſo many dangers.

Caſſius is killed;

He was not advanced far on his march, when news was brought him, that Caſſius had been killed by a centurion named Antonius, and another officer of a ſtill inferior rank, who had the command only of ten men [z]. Dion Caſſius gives us but a confuſed account of his death; and Vulcatius Gallicanus promiſes to inform us how he was killed, and where he was overcome, but is not ſo good as his word. However, from what he writes, it is plain, that a battle or encounter happened between him and the emperor's troops, probably commanded by Martius Verus; for on his bravery the emperor chiefly relied, and had therefore ſent him before him into Syria, giving him the government of that province, inſtead of the government [x] Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32. Dio. l. lxxi. p. 809. 812. [y] Lamprid. in Commod. p. 45. & Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 32. [z] Dio, p. 812.

government of Cappadocia. We are told, that a great many letters, written to Caſſius by his friends and correſpondents, falling into Verus's hands, the generous commander committed them to the flames, ſaying, he did not doubt but that would pleaſe M. Aurelius; and if it did not, that he choſe, however, to ſave many lives at the expence of one [a]. Others write, that theſe letters were brought to M. Aurelius, who ordered them, ſealed as they were, to be immediately burnt in his preſence [b]. With Caſſius was killed his captain of the guards, and ſoon after his ſon Metianus, whom he had appointed governor of Egypt, to ſecure that important province. No other perſon of diſtinction, at leaſt of the ſenatorial order, periſhed on account of his rebellion; nay, theſe were put to death without the emperor's knowledge and againſt his will; for he was greatly concerned that the blood of any ſenator ſhould have been ſhed during his reign: hence, when the head of Caſſius was brought to him, he expreſſed great ſorrow, turned his eyes away, and cauſed it to be honourably interred, complaining, that he had been robbed of an opportunity of ſhewing his mercy. The reign of Caſſius, or rather his dream, as Dion Caſſius ſtyles it, laſted but three months and ſix days [c]. M. Aurelius himſelf would neither try, impriſon, nor condemn any ſenator concerned in the conſpiracy; but referred the whole to the ſenate, appointing the criminals a day to appear before their judges. In the mean time, he wrote a letter to the ſenate, wherein, after acquainting them, that he had appointed Pompeianus, his ſon-in-law, conſul for the enſuing year, he thus exhorts them to proceed, rather with clemency than rigor, againſt thoſe whom they were to try: "As for what concerns the defec-
" tion of Caſſius, I beg and conjure you, conſcript fathers, " to have a tender regard to your characters and to mine: let
" no one ſenator be put death; let the blood of no perſon of " diſtinction be ſpilt; let ſuch as have been already baniſhed
" return, nay, and enjoy their eſtates. I wiſh I could raiſe
" from the dead thoſe who periſhed in the firſt heat of the " war. Revenge is never commendable in an emperor; it ill " becomes him in his own cauſe, let it be never ſo juſt. You " will therefore pardon the children of Avidius Caſſius, his " ſon-in-law, and his wife. But why do I ſay pardon, when " they have committed no crime? Let them live in ſafety
" and

And his head brought to the emperor, who is concerned for his death.

His letter to the ſenate.

[a] Dio, p. 813. [b] Val. in excerpt. Dio. [c] Dio, p. 815. Vulcat. Gall. in Caſſ. p. 43. Noris ep. conſ. p. 110.

" and enjoy their paternal eſtate, with all their father's plate " and furniture. Let them have full liberty to live where " they pleaſe, that they may be ſo many inſtances of your " clemency and of mine. I further beg and deſire, that all " the ſenators and Roman knights in general, who have been " privy to this rebellion, be by your authority exempted from " death, proſcription, infamy, in ſhort, from all kind of " puniſhment. Allow it to be ſaid to your honour and mine,
" that in this rebellion ſuch only periſhed as were killed in the
" hurry of the war" [d]. The ſenate not only complied with his requeſt, but returned him thanks for the regard he had ſhewn even to the moſt undeſerving members of their body.

His kindneſs to the children of Caſſius.

As for the children of Caſſius, the emperor took them under his protection, forbidding any one to reproach them with the misfortunes of their family, and ſeverely puniſhing ſuch as did. Vulcatius tells us, that he even raiſed the ſons of Caſſius and Druncianus or Druentianus, who had married one of his daughters, by name Alexandra, to great preferments, which was the more commendable, as the emperor was well appriſed, that Caſſius's wife, children, and ſon-in-law, had, with many ill-natured reflections, endeavoured to bring him into diſcredit with the people and ſoldiery. Of the many perſons concerned in this revolt, only a few centurions were executed, and ſome officers of greater diſtinction baniſhed. Among the latter was Flavius Calviſius, governor of Egypt, who was confined to an iſland; but the emperor would not ſuffer his eſtate to be confiſcated. An impoſtor, who pretended to be inſpired by the gods, and was ſaid to have foretold the revolt of Caſſius, was baniſhed to the iſland of Scyros in the Archipelago. All the accomplices of Calviſius were pardoned, as were likewiſe the cities that had declared for Caſſius. The empreſs Fauſtina, in a letter which ſhe wrote to her huſband on occaſion of this revolt [e], preſſed him to purſue the accomplices of Caſſius with the utmoſt ſeverity. But the emperor, hearkening only to the impulſe of his own good nature, returned her the following anſwer: " I have read your letter

His letter to Fauſtina on this occaſion.

" my dear Fauſtina, wherein you adviſe me to treat the ac-
" complices of Caſſius with the utmoſt ſeverity, which you " think they well deſerve. This I look upon as a pledge of " the love you bear to your huſband and children. But give " me leave, my dear Fauſtina, to ſpare the children of Caſſius,

[d] Vulcat. Gall. ibid. p. 44. & Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 33. [e] Vide not. G.

" ſius, his ſon-in-law, and his wife, and to write to the ſe-
" nate in their behalf. Nothing can more recommend a Ro" man emperor to the eſteem of the world, than clemency.
" This placed Cæſar among the gods; this conſecrated Au" guſtus; this procured to your father the title of Pius. I
" I am grieved even for the death of Caſſius, and wiſh it " had been in my power to ſave him. Be therefore ſatisfied,
" and don't abandon yourſelf to fear or revenge. Marcus
" Antoninus is protected by the gods" [f]. Some of his friends openly blaming his clemency, and taking the liberty to tell him, that Caſſius would not have been ſo generous, had fortune proved favourable to him, the emperor immediately replied, We have not lived nor ſerved the gods ſo ill, as to think they would favour Caſſius: he added, that the misfortunes of ſome of his predeceſſors were entirely owing to their own ill conduct and cruelties, and that no good prince had ever been overcome or ſlain by an uſurper. Nero, Caligula, and Domitian, ſaid he, deſerved the doom that overtook them; neither Otho nor Vitellius were equal to the empire; the downfal of Galba was occaſioned by his avarice, an unpardonable fault in a prince [g]. Thus the rebellion of Caſſius ſerved only to give new luſtre to the unparallelled clemency, good-nature and generoſity of M. Aurelius, who could not prevail upon himſelf to take away the lives of thoſe who had conſpired againſt his and that of his ſon.

THE rebellion being quaſhed at once by the death of Caſſius, M. Aurelius wrote a letter to the ſenate, acquainting them, that he had named Pompeianus, his ſon-in-law, conſul againſt the enſuing year; adding, that he would have honoured him long before with that dignity, had he not thought himſelf obliged in juſtice to confer it firſt upon ſeveral perſons of extraordinary merit, and well-deſerving of the republic. The ſenate, in their anſwer to the emperor's obliging letter, begged him to return to Rome, and to inveſt his ſon Commodus with the tribunitial power [h]. With the latter requeſt he complied, as appears from ſeveral inſcriptions. But as for the other requeſt, the emperor either did not return to Rome, or his ſtay there was very ſhort; for we are told, that, immediately after the death of Caſſius, he went into the eaſt, and that he had begun his march thither even before Commodus inveſted with the tribunitial power.

[f] Vulcat. Gall. p. 32. [g] Idem ibid. [h] Idem in Caſſ. p. 45. [i] Onuph. in faſt. p. 235. P. Pagi, p. 218. Noris de de votis decennalib. imperator. c. 3. & ep. conſul. p. 120.

he had received that news [k]: it is not therefore likely, that he interrupted it to return to Rome. He had ſent Pertinax before him into Syria to make head againſt the rebels; but upon the news of the death of Caſſius, he recalled him, and appointed him governor of Illyricum, in which province he had gained no leſs reputation by his prudence and moderation, than by his many victories over the Germans during the Marcomannic war; ſo that he was greatly eſteemed and revered both by the Romans and foreigners, nay, even by the enemies of the Roman name [l]. The emperor took with him into the eaſt his ſon Commodus and his wife Fauſtina, who died ſuddenly in a village called Halala, at the foot of mount Taurus. She was a woman of a looſe and wanton life, and altogether unworthy of having ſuch a father as Antoninus, ſuch a huſband as M. Aurelius, whom ſome did not believe to be father of Commodus [m]. Dion Caſſius writes, that it was queſtioned whether ſhe died of the gout, or laid violent hands on herſelf, to avoid the ſhame of being named among the accomplices of Caſſius, who, according to that writer, was chiefly prompted by her to take arms and revolt [n]. Her chief gallants were Tertullus, Utilius, Orfitus, and Moderatus, whom nevertheleſs Antoninus, either not giving credit to what was ſaid of the empreſs, or diſſembling her irregular conduct, preferred to ſeveral employments. Her lewdneſs and her intimacy with the above-mentioned perſons, eſpecially with Tertullus, were ſo publicly known, that a mimic having one day aſked his companion upon the ſtage, in the preſence of the emperor, what was the name of the perſon who was too familiar with his wife? the other repeated the name of Tullus three times; whereby the whole audience perceived, that he meant Tertullus, the firſt ſyllable of his name ſignifying three times [o]. Some of the emperor's friends adviſed him to divorce her; but he anſwered, if I divorce her, I muſt return her her dower, that is, the empire, which I have received of her father. In one place he commends her free and open temper, her ſincerity in friendſhip, and her acquieſcence to his will [p]. He bewailed her, according to the emperor Julian [q], after her death, more than was becoming, in a man of his gravity, for a woman of the moſt unblemiſhed character. He pronounced himſelf her funeral oration, and begged the ſenate to rank her among

The emperor goes into the eaſt.

Fauſtina dies.

Her character.

Extraordinary honours paid her by the emperor and the ſenate.

[k] Dio, p. 813. Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32. [l] Idem in Pertin. [m] Idem in M. Aur. p. 30. [n] Dio, p. 813. [o] Jul. Cap. ibid. [p] M. Antonin. de ſeip. l. i. c. 14. [q] Julian Cæs. p. 13.

among the gods; for which he is deſervedly expoſed and ridiculed by the above-mentioned emperor [r]. He founded a ſociety of young women, whom he brought up at his own expence, and called after the empreſs's name. The village where ſhe died he made a colony and a city, ſtyling it Fauſtinopolis, and erected a temple in it to her honour, which was afterwards conſecrated to Heliogabalus, the moſt lewd and debauched of all the Roman emperors. The ſenate, out of flattery and complaiſance to the emperor, not only ranked among the goddeſſes a perſon unworthy of a place among women of any modeſty and reputation, but erected ſtatues to her and to M. Aurelius, with an altar, ordaining, that young women, immediately after their marriage, ſhould repair to it, and there offer a ſolemn ſacrifice [s]. By this ſcandalous inſtitution, they deſerved that their daughters ſhould all reſemble Fauſtina and their ſons Commodus. Fauſtina being dead, Fabia, the ſiſter of L. Verus, who had been formerly betrothed to M. Aurelius, did all that lay in her power to induce him to marry her; but he, not thinking it adviſeable to ſubject his children to the authority of a ſtep-mother, took in the room of a lawful wife the daughter of one of the deceaſed emperor's domeſtic's [t]; for to that purity, which the chriſtian religion requires and commands, even the moſt virtuous among the pagan philoſophers were utter ſtrangers. As the Syrians, looking upon Caſſius as their countryman, had readily joined him, a law paſſed at this time, enacting, that no one ſhould be ſent with the character of governor into his own country [u].

THE next conſuls were T. Vitraſius Pollio and M. Flavius Aper, both for the ſecond time [w]. Claudius Pompeianus, the emperor's ſon-in-law, and Clodius Albinus, who had reſtrained the legions in Bithynia from joining Caſſius, as we have related above, were likewiſe conſuls this year. M. Aurelius, arriving in the eaſt, freely forgave all the cities and communities there, which had ſided with Caſſius, except Antioch, the inhabitants of that metropolis having diſtinguiſhed themſelves above all the reſt by their zeal for Caſſius and their hatred to him. He therefore publiſhed a ſevere edict againſt them, deprived them of all their privileges, ſuppreſſed their public aſſemblies, and took from them their ſhews and ſpectacles, to which they were greatly addicted. But his anger being ſoon appeaſed, before he left Syria, he reſtored them to their former condition, and even condeſcended to viſit their city. From Syria he paſſed into Egypt, where he not only forgave, but enriched with ſeveral privileges the city of Alexandria, which had likewiſe ſided with Caſſius. Having viſited moſt of the chief cities in the eaſt, and given every-where innumerable inſtances of his humanity and good-nature, he ſailed from Smyrna, where he had ſtaid ſome time, and had ſeveral conferences with the celebrated ſophiſt Ariſtides, and arrived at Athens, where he was initiated in the Eleuſinian myſteries. He conferred many favours on the city of Athens, and eſtabliſhed there public profeſſors of all ſciences, with handſome allowances to be paid them yearly out of the exchequer [x]. From Athens he ſailed for Italy; and landing at Brunduſium, commanded his ſoldiers immediately to reſume, as he did himſelf, the Roman gown; for neither he, nor any of his officers nor ſoldiers, ever appeared in Italy in a military habit. He returned to Rome with his ſon Commodus, whom he named conſul, tho' at that time but ſixteen, for the enſuing year. Soon after, he honoured him with the title of imperator, which he himſelf aſſumed for the eighth time, probably on account of ſome victory gained by Pertinax, governor of Illyricum, over the Germans. At length, on the twenty-third of December, both he and his ſon Commodus entered Rome in triumph, diſtributing on this occaſion large ſums among the people and ſoldiery, that is, as many pieces of gold a head as he had been years abſent, which, according to Dion Caſſius, were eight [y], but, according to the calculation of others, in our opinion more exact, only ſix. At the ſame time, he exhibited moſt pompous and magnificent ſhews, tho' he took no pleaſure himſelf in ſuch diverſions. The following year Aurelius Commodus Cæſar and Quintillus being conſuls, Commodus was honoured by the ſenate with the title of the father of his country, and by the emperor with that of Auguſtus; on which occaſion M. Aurelius remitted whatever was due from particulars, either to the emperor or to the treaſury, ever ſince the time in which Adrian had forgiven all ſuch debts [z]. The ſame year he preſented the inhabitants of Smyrna with large ſums, enabling them by that means to rebuild their city, which was almoſt utterly ruined by a dreadful earthquake deſcribed at length by Ariſtides in one of his orations [a]. As the emperor continued all

The emperor's clemency and goodneſs to the cities that had ſided with Caſſius.

[r] Idem ibid. p. 50. [s] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 813. [t] Vulcat. Gall. p. 34. [u] Dio, ibid. p. 813. [w] Idat. Onuph. &c.

He returns to Rome;

Which he enters in triumph with his ſon Commodus.

Inſtances of his generoſity and good-nature.

[x] Dio, p. 814. Philoſtr. ſoph. xxxvii. Ariſtid. orat. [y] Dio, ibid. Jul. Cap. p. 29. [z] Dio, ibid. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 15. Euſeb. chron. [a] Ariſtid. orat. 20.

all this year at Rome, or in the neighbourhood of that city, he reformed, partly by his example and partly by wholſome laws, ſeveral abuſes. He could not ſuppreſs the combats of gladiators without diſobliging the people; however, as he was an enemy to all cruelty and bloodſhed, he allowed the combatants only blunt ſwords, in the nature of our foils, ſaying, that with them they might equally diſplay their ſkill and dexterity [b]. The next year, when Orfitus and Julianus Rufus were conſuls, the Marcomanni and their confederates renewing the war with great vigor, the emperor reſolved to march againſt them in perſon. But before he left Rome, he married his ſon Commodus to Criſpina, the daughter of Bruttius Præſens; and repairing to the ſenate, deſired leave to take out of the public treaſure the neceſſary ſums for carrying on the war, ſaying, that an emperor had nothing of his own, not even the palace he lived in, but that all belonged to the ſenate and people [c]. He then went to the capitol, where he declared upon his oath, that, ſince his acceſſion to the empire, no ſenator had been put to death by his orders; that ſuch as had periſhed in the rebellion, had been killed without his knowledge; and that he would have ſpared them all, Caſſius himſelf not excepted, had it been in his power ſo to do. As he was eminently ſkilled in philoſophy, many perſons of learning earneſtly entreated him to explain to them, before he left Rome, the moſt difficult and intricate points of the different ſects of philoſophers, which he did accordingly, ſpending therein three whole days. They ſeemed to apprehend, that by his death this knowledge might have been loſt; which ſhews how thoroughly he was verſed in the different tenets of the various ſects of philoſophers [d]. At length he ſet out from Rome, with his ſon Commodus, on the fifth of Auguſt of the year 178, the eighteenth of his reign. The following year, Commodus Auguſtus and T. Annius Aurelius Verus being conſuls the ſecond time, M. Aurelius gained a ſignal victory over the Marcomanni, Hermonduri, Quadi, and Sarmatians; for which both he and his ſon Commodus, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions, took the title of imperator [e]. All we know of this action is, that the Roman army was commanded by Paternus, and the Germans were utterly defeated [f]; inſomuch, that all Germany, and the different nations

He marches againſt the Marcomanni,

And gains a ſignal victory over them.

[b] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 718. [c] Dio, p. 814. [d] Jul. Cap. in Caſſ. p. 41. [e] Spart. in Comm. p. 50. & Dio, p. 814. [f] Dio, p. 810, Birag. p. 227. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 34. [g] Dio, p. 810. & 814.

inhabiting it, would have been obliged to ſubmit to the Roman yoke, had not Antoninus been prevented by death from crowning his conqueſts with the reduction of ſo powerful and extenſive a country. He died the following year, Præſens and Sex. Quintilius Condianus being conſuls, on the ſeventeenth of March, after having lived fifty-eight years, ten months, and twenty-two days, and reigned, from the death of Antoninus Pius, nineteen years and ten or eleven days [h]. Dion Caſſius poſitively affirms, that he was diſpatched by his phyſicians, deſirous to curry favour with Commodus; and adds, that when the tribune came to him the laſt time for the parole, he bid him go to Commodus, and court, not the ſetting, but the riſing ſun [i]. On the other hand, Julius Capitolinus ſeems to aſcribe his death to a contagious diſtemper; for he tells us, that the plague ſtill raged in the army; and adds, that the emperor, with much ado, prevailed upon his ſon and his friends not to abandon him; which he took ſo much amiſs, that he abſtained from all ſort of nouriſhment. Two days before he died, he recommended his ſon Commodus to the army, and conjured his friends to aſſiſt him with their advice. On the ſeventh day of his illneſs, he deſired to ſee his ſon again, but immediately diſmiſſed him, leſt he ſhould be infected with the ſame diſtemper. When he was gone, he compoſed himſelf, as if he deſigned to ſleep, and expired the following night [k]. He died, according to Tertullian [l], at Sirmium, now Sirmich, in Sclavonia; according to the two Victors, at Vendebona, now Vienna, in Auſtria. We need not mention the concern of the ſoldiery and Roman people for the loſs of ſo good and ſo great a prince. His body, or rather his aſhes, were conveyed to Rome, and depoſited in the monument of Adrian. He was immediately ranked among the gods, a temple was erected to him, and an order of prieſts appointed to his honour. Whoever had not ſome image or ſtatue of M. Aurelius in his houſe, was judged a ſacrilegious perſon, ſays Julius Capitolinus, in whoſe time, that is, in the reign of Diocleſian, he was ſtill worſhipped in moſt families among their domeſtic gods [m]. He was, without all doubt, one of the greateſt and beſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. His only fault was, according to Dion Caſſius, his too great goodneſs; for tho' he rewarded with great generoſity the good and virtuous, yet he did not reſtrain and puniſh with due ſeverity the

His death.

He is ranked among the gods.

His fault.

[h] Idem ibid. & Theoph Antioch. l. iii. p. 137. Chron. Alex. p. 614. [i] Dio, p. 814. [k] Jul. Cap. p. 34. [l] Tertul. apol. c. 25. [m] Jul. Cap. p. 54.

the vicious and wicked; whence ſome governors of provinces, preſuming upon his good-nature, plundered and often with impunity, the people committed to their care. Julius Capitolinus blames him for winking at the monſtrous exceſſes of his wife, and for promoting to the ſovereign power L. Verus, whom he muſt have known to be quite unequal to, and altogether unworthy of, that high dignity, ſince Antoninus Pius had not ſo much as honoured him with the title of Cæſar. The emperor Julian prefers M. Aurelius to Cæſar, to Auguſtus, and to all the other princes who had reigned till this time; but at the ſame time finds fault with him, for bequeathing the empire to his vicious ſon Commodus, and not to his ſon-in-law Pompeianus, who was a perſon of extraordinary parts, and well qualified for ſo great a truſt [x]. The meditations of M. Aurelius, which have reached our times, are highly commended by all the antients, as an epitome of the beſt rules, which human reaſon or philoſophy can ſuggeſt for the conduct of a virtuous life. Some have queſtioned, whether what has been tranſmitted to us be the whole work, or only an abſtract of it, ſeeing it conſiſts of looſe and unconnected ſentences, whereof the ſenſe is not always complete. But the ableſt critics are of opinion, that M. Aurelius left the work ſuch as it is at preſent, having compoſed it only for his private uſe [y]. It conſiſts of twelve books, of which the firſt ſeems to have been compoſed in the height of the Marcomannic war, while he was encamped on the banks of the Gran in the country of the Quadi [z]. He ended the ſecond book at Carnuntum, of which city we have ſpoken above, where he reſided, according to Eutropius, three whole years. He ſeems to have put the laſt hand to this work before the death of Fauſtina; for in the ninth book he ſpeaks of her as yet living, and ready to ly-in; that is, before the end of the year 175, the fifteenth of his reign [a]. We muſt not confound this book with another, intitled horologium principum, which was publiſhed under the name of M. Aurelius, but is thought to have been compoſed by Antonius Guavara a Spaniſh biſhop [b]. As M. Aurelius was a great encourager of learning, many eminent writers, eſpecially philoſophers, flouriſhed in his reign. Tatian, the diſciple of Juſtin the martyr, tells us, that the pagan philoſophers were ſo far from practiſing the poverty which they recommended

His meditations.

[x] Julian. Cæſ. 13, 14, 22, 23, 41, 49. [y] Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 14. [z] M. Aurel. l. i. c. 15. [a] Idem. l. ix. c. 3. [b] Prol. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc.

recommended to others, that, on the contrary, many of them enjoyed large penſions, receiving of the emperor above ſix hundred pieces of gold a year, without rendering any ſervice to the ſtate, or being commended by any other merit, but that of wearing long beards [c]. But of the writers who flouriſhed about this time, we ſhall give a particular account in our notes (H).

[c] Tatian, p. 157.

(H) The moſt celebrated among the philoſophers were, Creſcentius, Celſus, Lucian, Demonax, Alexander the famous impoſtor, Sextus the ſtoic, Sextus the empiric, Numenes, Hermogenes, Ariſtides, &c. Creſcentius was a Cynic philoſopher, and according to the character which Tatian draws of him, entirely abandoned to all manner of lewdneſs (16). He inveighed with great virulence againſt the chriſtians, whom he charged with impiety and atheiſm, tho', in ſeveral conferences and diſputes, he had been convinced of the truth by Juſtin the martyr, who was chiefly at his inſtigation crowned with martyrdom (17.) We do not know that he left any writings behind him. We find two philoſophers bearing the name of Celſus, and both of the ſect of Epicurus, mentioned by Origen (18). Of theſe one flouriſhed under Nero, and the other under Adrian, and his immediate ſucceſſors (19). The laſter wrote ſeveral books againſt magic, much commended by Lucian, who inſcribed to him his hiſtory of the celebrated impoſtor Alexander, which he undertook at his inſtigation (20). Some diſtinguiſh this writer from the author of the diſcourſes againſt the chriſtians, whom Origen confuted; but Baronius, and moſt critics, aſcribe to the ſame writer the books againſt magic, and thoſe againſt the chriſtian religion. It is certain that Celſus, whom Origen anſwers, lived long before his time; but not before the reign of M. Aurelius: for he not only ſpeaks of the Marcioniſts, who firſt appeared about the year 142, the fifth of the reign of Antoninus Pius, but of the followers of Marcellina, a woman of the ſect of Carpocrates, who came to Rome in the year 157, the twentieth of M. Aurelius's reign (21). He probably publiſhed his work againſt the chriſtians during the perſecution of M. Aurelius; for he repreſents them as reduced to conceal themſelves through fear of being dragged to execution (22). Chryſoſtom mentions one Celſus, no doubt the ſame writer, who publiſhed ſome pieces againſt the chriſtian religion before fore the time of Porphyrius of Batanea (23). Celſus intitled his work againſt the chriſtians, true diſcourſes; but Origen ſhews, that he aimed at nothing leſs than truth, and confutes him with great learning, piety, and judgment. Many writers look upon Origen's anſwer to Celſus, as the beſt apology for the chriſtian religion that ever was publiſhed (24). Euſebius thinks it contains whatever was, or ever will be, ſaid upon that ſubject (25). Origen wrote in the reign of the emperor Philip, who was killed in the year 249 (26.)

(16) Tatian p. 157. (17) Euſeb. l. iv. c. 16. (18) Orig. in Celſ. l. i. p. 8. (19) Idem ibid. (20) Lucian pſeud. p. 498. (21) Orig. in Celſ. l. viii. p. 424. & l. v. p. 272. Iren. l. i. c. 24. (22) Idem. ibid.

The works of Lucian have reached our times, and are deſervedly admired for the eloquence and purity of the ſtyle; but filled with impious and atheiſtical ſentiments: whence he had the ſurname of the Atheiſt, or the Blaſphemer (27). He was a native of Samoſata in Syria, and of a mean deſcent. In his youth he declaimed, and pleaded cauſes, and was in his old age regiſter to the governor of Egypt (28). Suidas writes, that he was thought to have been devoured by dogs, for having ridiculed the chriſtian religion, without ſparing even the author of it; but of ſuch a death no mention is made by any writer who flouriſhed before Suidas. Some ſay, that he embraced, and afterwards renounced the chriſtian religion; but this opinion is founded only on a wrong tranſlation of the word δημηγόρος in Suidas by concionator, and upon Lucian's being better acquainted with the tenets and doctrine of the chriſtians than other pagans. He wrote the life of Soſtrates of Bœotia, a famous philoſopher, who practiſed great auſterities (29); but that work has not reached us. Some have, againſt all reaſon and authority, aſcribed to him the life of Apollonius Tyanæus, which was done by Philoſtratus (30). He wrote, according to Eunapius (31), the life of the philoſopher Demonax, whoſe diſciple he had been. He repreſents him as the greateſt philoſopher of his time; but after all, he was only a Cynic, ſomewhat more poliſhed and civilized than the reſt of his brethren. What we find moſt commendable in him is, that tho' he was of a noble family, rich, eloquent, and well verſed in moſt branches of learning; yet he lived in poverty, practiſed great auſterities, and would not ſuffer any one to attend him. When he grew old, and could no longer live without being aſſiſted by others, he choſe rather to die of hunger, than to ſuffer any one to perform the leaſt office about him. He was a native of Cyprus; but lived at Athens, where he was highly eſteemed

(23) Chryſ. in 1 Corinth. hom. vi. (24) Vide Du Pin. tom. 1. p. 388, 389. (25) Euſeb. l. vi. c. 36. (26) Idem ibid. & Hier. p. 433, 434. (27) Suid. p. 55. (28) Lucian. hiſt. p. 359. & apol. p. 262. (29) Idem, in vit. Demonac. p. 546. (30) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 15. (31) Lucian. in vit. Demonac. p. 546—555.

eſteemed in his life-time, and equally regretted after his death. The Athenians intending to eſtabliſh in their city a combat of gladiators, he told them That they ought firſt to overturn and utterly demoliſh an altar which they had erected to Mercy. The emperor having deſired ſome of his friends to aſk him in his name, what was the beſt method of governing, he anſwered, To ſpeak little, to hear much, and to fall upon no provocation into a paſſion. Lucian, in his dialogue on friendſhip, ſpeaks of ſeveral wars between the Scythians, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, and the other northern barbarians, eſpecially thoſe of Boſphorus, who were in Lucian's time governed, firſt by Leucanor, and afterwards by Eubiotes his natural brother. Leucanor probably ſucceeded Rhæmetalces, who was king of Boſphorus in the reign of Antoninus Pius. The ſhips which ſaved Lucian, as we ſhall relate anon, were carrying the embaſſadors of Eupator, king of the ſame country, to Pontus, either to pay there the money which was yearly owing from them to the Romans, or to receive that which the Romans annually paid to them; for the words ἐπὶ κομιδῇ are capable of both ſenſes. Eubiotes, in his war againſt the Scythians, led with him all the Greeks, according to the expreſſion of Lucian (32); that is, as we ſuppoſe, the inhabitants of the Greek cities on the Cherſoneſus, which confirms the opinion of thoſe who maintain, that the kings of Boſphorus were maſters of that country. The account which Lucian gives us of the celebrated impoſtor Alexander is very diverting. He was a native of Abonitichos, a maritime city of Pamphylia, and generally revered on account of his pretended predictions, and counterfeit miracles, as a prophet. Lucian, however, who was not eaſily deceived, looked upon him as an impoſtor, ridiculed his miracles, and expoſed him in all companies; which ſo provoked the pretended prophet, that he endeavoured to ſtir up his countrymen, the inhabitants of Abonitichos, againſt him. Alexander nevertheleſs, ſome time after, pretended to be reconciled to him, and even offered him a ſhip to convey him to Amaſtris in Pontus, whether his affairs called him. Lucian accepted the offer; but was not a little ſurpriſed, when, at a great diſtance from land, he obſerved the pilot burſting all at once into tears, and making various ſigns to the mariners. Lucian imagined the veſſel to be in danger; but was more terrified, when the pilot frankly owned to him, that he had received poſitive orders from Alexander to throw him into the ſea; but could not prevail upon himſelf, after having lived ſo long without reproach, to commit a murder in his old age. He left him, however, in a deſert and barren iſland, where he muſt have ſoon periſhed, had he not been ſaved by the veſſels of the king of Boſphorus, which happened to ſail by. He was for proſecuting Alexander before the governor of of Pontus and Bithynia; but that magiſtrate diſſuaded him from it, telling him, that he could not condemn Alexander, without incurring the diſpleaſure of Rutilianus, who was very powerful at court, and had in his old age married the daughter of the impoſtor, believing the moon to be her mother. Thus Lucian had no other means left of being revenged on Alexander, but by writing his life, and painting him in his true colours. This piece, however, he did not publiſh till the impoſtor's death, which ſeems to have happened in the reign of M. Aurelius.

(32) Idem, Toxar. p, 631—638.

Sextus was a native of Chæronea in Bœotia, by ſect a Stoic, and had been preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus. Moſt writers ſuppoſe him to have been nephew to Plutarch. M. Aurelius went frequently to hear him after he was emperor, and owns in his meditations, that he was indebted to him for many excellent rules relating to the conduct of a moral and virtuous life (33). Apuleius glories in being deſcended from him by his mother (34). At the ſame time flouriſhed another philoſopher bearing the ſame name, but a native of Libya, and by ſect a Pyrrhonian (35). He is ſtyled by Galen and Diogenes Laertius the empiric. Some of his works have reached our times (36). Suidas confounds him with the other Sextus, and the other with Sextus Condianus, who was conſul in 180. There are ſtill extant four hundred and thirty ſentences of a philoſopher named Sextus or Xyſtus, which were tranſlated into Latin by Rufinus of Aquileia, under the name of St. Sixtus, pope and martyr (37). St. Auſtin was for ſome time deceived by them (38). But St. Jerom, in ſeveral places of his works, aſcribes them to ſome philoſopher of the ſect of Pythagoras (39). About this time Numenes is likewiſe ſuppoſed to have flouriſhed, whoſe writings are often quoted by Euſebius and Theodoretus againſt the pagans. St. Clement of Alexandria quotes him for this famous ſaying, that Plato was but Moſes ſpeaking Greek (40). He was, according to Suidas (41), a native of Apamea in Syria. He ſhews, that Plato copied from Moſes what he wrote concerning God and the forming of the univerſe (42). He has been blamed by the pagans for explaining the myſteries of Ceres and Proſerpine; which goddeſſes are ſaid to have appeared to him in the attire of common proſtitutes, to reproach him by that means with the ſtate to which he had reduced them, by acquainting the world with the ceremonies practiſed in the celebration of their myſteries; which is not much to their honour. He publiſhed ſeveral works, which are frequently quoted by Origen, Euſebius, Eunapius, Theodoretus, (33) M. Ant. l. i. c. 6. (34) Apul. meta l. i. p. 103. (35) Ruald. vit. Plutarch. c. 5. (36) Vide Jonſ. l. ii. c. 1. (37) Bib. patr. p. 565. (38) Aug. retract. l. ii. c. 42. (39) Hier. ad Cre. c. 2. in Ezech. xviii. &c. (40) Clem. ſtrom. 1. (41) Suid. p. 242. (42) Idem, ibid.

retus and Heſychius; but none of them have reached us (43). He ſeems to have joined together the tenets of Plato, and Pythagoras: whence he is by ſome ranked amongſt the followers of Plato; by others among the Pythagoreans (44). Crones, Ariſtocles, Antiochus, Alexander, Hermogenes, Ariſtides, and Phrynicus, were all contemporaries with Numenes. Crones was one of his diſciples, and wrote a treatiſe of the generation of things, which we find quoted by Origen and Plotinus (45). Ariſtocles was a native of Pergamus, and firſt a Peripatetic philoſopher; but afterwards he abandoned the ſtudy of philoſophy, and applied himſelf to that of eloquence under the celebrated Herodes Atticus. He declaimed in his own country; but did not meet with the applauſe he expected (46). Antiochus was a native of Ægæ in Cilicia, by profeſſion a ſophiſt, and one of the diſciples of Dionyſius the Mileſian, of whom we have ſpoken in the reign of Adrian. Philoſtratus ſeems to have entertained a great opinion of him, and not undeſervedly; for he is ſaid to have had an utter contempt for riches, and to have ſpent his whole eſtate in purchaſing corn for his poor countrymen during a famine (47). Alexander was likewiſe by profeſſion a ſophiſt, and is greatly commended by Philoſtratus. He was born in Seleucia, compriſed at that time in Cilicia; but afterwards raiſed to the metropolis of Iſauria. His mother, tho' married, was thought to have had him by a criminal converſation with Apollonius Tyanæus (48), whoſe chaſtity has, by ſome writers, been mightily cried up. He was one of the diſciples of Favorinus, Adrian's great favourite, and afterwards ſecretary for the Greek tongue to M. Aurelius. Hermogenes, a native of Tarſus, gained ſuch reputation among the ſophiſts, when he was but fifteen years old, that M. Aurelius went in perſon to hear him, was greatly taken with his extraordinary genius, and loaded him with preſents; but as he ſurpaſſed moſt men when he was but a child, ſo when he attained to man's eſtate, he deſerved to be ranked among children, ſays Philoſtratus (49). However, he lived to a great age, deſpiſed by thoſe who had once admired him (50). Ariſtides, one of the moſt celebrated ſophiſts of his time, was a native of Adrianothera in Myſia. He is highly commended, on account of his eloquence, by Phrynicus his contemporary (51), by Philoſtratus (52), and generally by all the antients; but if he excelled, as he is ſaid to have done, all the other ſophiſts, ſeveral of his orations, which have reached our times (53), convince us, that we have no reaſon to regret the loſs of their works. He was ſubject to various infirmities, and conſtantly ſtantly indiſpoſed. We read in his journal, which he entitles ſacred diſcourſes, many things relating to maladies and their remedies, which he pretends to have learnt of Æſculapius in his dreams (54). Notwithſtanding his infirmities, he lived to a great age, and died in the reign of Commodus.

(43) Vide Jonſ. l. iii. c. 10, (44) Idem ibid. (45) Idem ibid. (46) Philoſtr. ſoph. xxix. (47) Idem ſoph. xxxi. (48) Idem ibid. (49) Idem ibid. (50) Dio, l. lxxi. p. 802. (51) Phot. c. 158. (52) Philoſ. ſoph. xxxv. (53) Vide Phot. c. 246, &c.

Lucius, or, as he is ſtiled by others, Saturantius Apuleius, was a native of Madaura, a Roman colony, on the borders of Numidia and Getulia, the ſon of one of the chief men of that city, and of Salvia, one of the deſcendents of Plutarch (55). He paſſed his childhood partly in Greece, (for his mother was originally of Theſſaly) and partly at Carthage, where he learnt, without the aſſiſtance of an inſtructor, the Latin; but not without much labour, as he himſelf owns. From Carthage he went to Athens, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, geometry, dialectics, and muſic, and thoroughly informed himſelf of the different tenets of the various ſects of philoſophers; but embraced that of Plato, which, however, did not prevent him from ſtudying magic with great application. He is even ſaid to have been ſo well ſkilled in that art, as to work ſeveral miracles, which the Pagans oppoſed to thoſe of our Saviour (56). Theſe miracles, however, are not well atteſted; and Apuleius himſelf, being accuſed as a magician before Claudius Maximus proconſul of Africa, endeavoured to clear himſelf from that charge, as from an enormous crime, by an excellent diſcourſe, which has reached our times (57). He is thought to have ſtudied that art in Theſſaly, where it was in great requeſt (58). St. Auſtin (which to us ſeems very ſtrange) doubts whether what Apuleius writes of his being, by a magic potion, transformed into an aſs, was true or fabulous (59). The pagans themſelves look'd upon his metamorphoſes as only fit to amuſe children (60). He wrote with great elegance both in Greek and Latin; but his ſtyle is ſomewhat affected: he is fond of antiquated words, coins new ones, and frequently gives new ideas to old ones. He was reckoned one of the moſt eloquent men of his age; but neither his eloquence, nor his other extraordinary accompliſhments, ever raiſed him to any dignity in the empire, tho' he was far from deſpiſing honours, as appears from the manner in which he ſpeaks of a ſtatue erected to him at Oca, a city of the province of Tripolitana, where he married a woman named Pudentilla; and of the office of pontiff conferred upon him in his own country, which gave him a right to exhibit combats of gladiators and wild beaſts. Several pieces of Apuleius's are ſtill extant, and ſome fragments of others, which have been long ſince loſt.

(54) Philoſt. ibid. Suid. p. 426. (55) Apul. met. l. ii. p. 115. & prol. p. 29. (56) Hier. pſ. lxxx. Lax. l. v. c. 3. Aug. epiſt. cxxxvi. (57) Apul. apol. (58) Vit. Apul. p. 15. (59) Aug. civit. Dei l. xviii. c. 18. (60) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. Macrob. in ſom. Scipion. l. i c. 2.

loſt. Of the former ſome are but a bare tranſlation of Ariſtotle, or of other antient writers (61). He is often quoted by the antients, as appears from the collection of ſuch quotations prefixed to his works, but eſpecially by St. Auſtin, who takes great pains to confute his falſe theology (62).

Amongſt the hiſtorians who flouriſhed under M. Aurelius, thoſe of chief note are Polyænus a Macedonian, who inſcribed to M. Aurelius and L. Verus the eight books of ſtratagems publiſhed by Caſaubon (63). He left other works, (and among the reſt a deſcription of the city of Thebes) which have been long ſince loſt (64). Amyntianus wrote and addreſſed to M. Aurelius the hiſtory of Alexander the Great, which was not much admired. He likewiſe publiſhed the life of Domitian, and the lives of ſome other Latin and Greek princes (65); but none of his works have reached our times. Thoſe of Damophilus have undergone the ſame fate: He was a philoſopher and ſophiſt, brought up, as Suidas informs us (66), by Julianus, who was conſul in the year 173, the fifteenth of M. Aurelius's reign. He is frequently quoted by the emperor Julian, who ſuppoſes him to have been a native of Bithynia. Some of his works he inſcribed to Lollius Maximus (67). The hiſtory of Greece written by Pauſanias in ten books has reached us. The author deſcribes with great care and exactneſs the ſituation and antiquities of each city, and all the curioſities which in his time were to be ſeen in a country once ſo famous; but ſome critics find fault with him for interweaving his hiſtory with ſo many fables, which, however, are of great uſe for the right underſtanding of the antient writers (68). It appears from the quotations of Stephanus the geographer, that he deſcribed after the ſame manner Phœnicia and Syria. He beſtows mighty encomiums upon Antoninus Pius, and mentions his wars with the Germans, Sarmatians, and other barbarians; whence it is plain, that he had not done writing in the year 175 (69). He relates nothing poſterior to the reign of M. Aurelius; whence we may conclude, that he either died or ended his work under that prince. Philoſtratus ſpeaks of one Pauſanias a ſophiſt, a native of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, and diſciple of Herodes Atticus. Of this Pauſanias he obſerves, that he ſpent the greateſt part of his life at Rome; that in ſpeaking he changed all the quantities, and did not diſtinguiſh the letters that had a like ſound; which however was common to all the Cappadocians (70). Philoſtratus aſcribes to him only ſome declamations; whence he ought, in our opinion, to be diſtinguiſhed from the hiſtorian of that name, tho' Voſſius and Sylburgius (61) Apul. prol, (62) Aug. civ. Dei. l. viii. c. 14. (63) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 14. (64) Suid. p. 559. (65) Phot. c. 131. (66) Suid. p. 640. (67) Vide Jonſ. l iii. c 11. (68) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 14. (69) Pauſ. l. viii. p. 272. (70) Philoſt. ſoph. xxxix.

gius take the author of the hiſtory and of the declamations to be one and the ſame writer (71); for we cannot think, that Philoſtratus would have paſſed over in ſilence ſo great and important a work, had the ſophiſt been the author of it. Suidas ſpeaks of another Pauſanias, by birth a Lacedæmonian, who wrote the hiſtory of his own country; but we muſt diſtinguiſh him too from the author of the hiſtory of Greece, who rebukes the Lacedæmonians with great liberty, and whoſe dialect comes nearer the Ionic than the Doric, which was the dialect of the Lacedæmonians (72). In the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius flouriſhed one Iamblicus, by birth a Babylonian, and by profeſſion a magician He publiſhed ſeveral works in Greek, and among the reſt one ſtyled Babylonica (73), which is ſaid by Tennulius to be ſtill preſerved in the famous library of the Eſcurial in Spain (74). Perhaps it was conſumed by the late conflagration; for that was the fate of many ineſtimable manuſcripts lodged in that famous library. Leo Allatius publiſhed a fragment of it. Voſſius takes Iamblicus's Babylonica to be nothing elſe but the ſilly romance, of which Photius has been at the trouble of giving us too long an abſtract. Suidas ſeems to inſinuate the ſame thing. Photius tells us, that Iamblicus was originally a ſlave, and relates ſeveral particulars concerning him, copied from an unknown author (75). Theophilus of Antioch has tranſmitted to us a table of the Roman emperors, from Julius Cæſar to the death of M. Aurelius, with the years, months and days of their reſpective reigns. This table was made by one of M. Aurelius's freed-men, named Chryſores, and not Crator, as Voſſius calls him, led into that miſtake by the text of Theophylus, where we read ὃν ὁ μὲν Κρατωρ inſtead of γομενικλάτωρ, as it is corrected by Scaliger (76). The above-mentioned table was copied from a work of Chryſores, containing the names and chronology of all thoſe who had ruled in Rome, from the foundation of the city to the time of M. Aurelius. Scaliger has added it to the chronology of Euſebius. It is likewiſe to be found in the works of Clement of Alexandria, free from moſt of the faults which have crept into that of Theophilus. Æmilius Parthenianus compoſed the hiſtory of all thoſe who attempted to uſurp the ſovereign power. He did not end his hiſtory before the year 175, for he wrote the life of Avidius Caſſius. He is quoted by Vulcatius Gallicanus, who flouriſhed under Dioclefian. Voſſius ranks him among the Latin hiſtorians (77). The grammarian Proculus, who inſtructed M. Aurelius in the Latin grammar, and was on that account raiſed by him to the conſulſhip, publiſhed a work on foreign countries, or, or, as ſome read it, religions, de regionibus, or religionibus (78). He was by birth an African ; but thoroughly verſed in the Latin tongue (79). Hepheſtion and Harpocration, who inſtructed L. Verus in the Greek tongue (80), have both left ſome works behind them. An excellent piece de re metrica, which ſeems to be very antient, and bears the name of one Hepheſtion, a grammarian of Alexandria, has reached our times, and is commonly aſcribed to Hepheſtion the preceptor of L. Verus. Suidas mentions ſeveral other works publiſhed by him (81). Another learned piece is ſtill extant on the ten orators of Athens, done by one Valerius Harpocration, ſuppoſed to have been preceptor to L. Verus (82). At this time flouriſhed Apollonius of Alexandria, ſurnamed Dyſcoles, who publiſhed ſeveral grammatical pieces. Some of his works have reached our times, viz. four books on the ſyntax, to which is prefixed his life, done by an anonymous writer, and another piece, intituled, ſome falſe hiſtories, or rather wonderful hiſtories (83). He was father to one Herodianus, who lived, according to Suidas, in the time of M. Aurelius, and publiſhed ſeveral grammatical pieces (84). Ammianus Marcellinus reckons him among the many great men for whom the world was indebted to the muſeum of Alexandria (85). Sylburgius takes him to be the hiſtorian Herodianus, who wrote the lives of the emperors, from the death of M. Aurelius to the reign of Gordian ; that is, to the year 238 (86). But Voſſius ſpeaks of the grammarian and hiſtorian as two different perſons: and truly the hiſtorian might have been born in the reign of M. Aurelius, but cannot be ſaid to have flouriſhed under that prince, ſince he was ſtill writing fifty-eight years after his death (87). Artemidorus, author of ſeveral books on the interpretation of dreams, lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius ; for he is quoted by Lucian ; and he himſelf tells us, that he was acquainted with one who had entered the liſts in the combats that were exhibited by Antoninus Pius at Puteoli, in honour of Adrian. He was a native of Epheſus, and in his other works ſtyled himſelf Artemidorus the Epheſian ; but in that on the interpretation of dreams, he took the ſurname of Daldianus, from Daldis, a ſmall city of Lydia, the birth-place of his mother. He wrote four books on the interpretation of dreams, which have reached us, with a fifth, wherein he relates the iſſue of ſeveral dreams. Of theſe books he inſcribed the three firſt to one Caſſius Maximus a Phœnician, who, it ſeems, was a man of great eloquence, and his particular friend ; and the two others to

(71) Voſſ. ibid. (72) Suid. p. 466. (73) Phot. c 49. (74) Voſſ. ibid. l. iv. p. 582. & Samuel. Tennul. in not. ad Iambl. arith. Arnemiæ, an. 1668. (75) Phot. p. 241. (76) Vide Scal. in chron. Euſeb. p. 396. (77) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii.

(78) Treb. Pollio. hiſtor. trigin. tyrannor. p. 195. (79) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. i. c 12. (80) Jul. Cap. in vit. Ver. p. 35. (81) Suid. p. 1209. (82) Idem, p. 441. (83) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 14. (84) Suid. p. 379. (85) Ammian. l. xxii. p. 235. (86) In Herodian prol. (87) Voſſ. ibid. l. i. c. i.

to his ſon, named likewiſe Artemidorus (88). Beſides theſe books he wrote ſome others, according to Suidas (89), who ſtyles him a philoſopher, on the manner of foretelling events by birds, and by the lines of the hand. For the compiling of his books on dreams, he read all the authors who had handled the ſame ſubject, and were very numerous; he ſpent many years in travelling through all the provinces, and viſiting all the cities of the empire; he conferred with all thoſe who pretended to any knowledge in divination (90); and the fruit of ſo many labours, journies, enquiries, conferences, &c. was a work the moſt uſeleſs and trifling that ever was publiſhed, as is owned by thoſe who have been at the pains of illuſtrating it with notes (91). The ſame author wrote ſome books on phyſic (92). Marcellus of Ida in Pamphylia wrote, in the reign of M. Aurelius, forty-two books in hexameter verſe on phyſic, and is quoted by St. Jerom (93). Marullus, a Latin poet, wrote ſome ſatires in the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius, not ſparing that prince, nor his predeceſſor Antoninus Pius; but he patiently bore his railleries (94). Apuleius ſpeaks of a poet who lived in his time, and had begun an excellent poem upon Alexander the Great (95). This is probably the writer, whom he calls elſewhere (96) Corvinus Clemens, and who was quæſtor. Aulus Gellius, or Agellius, muſt have flouriſhed about this time; for he was diſciple to Titus Caſtricius, to Favorinus, to Herodes Atticus, and to Cornelius Fronto, who all lived under Adrian and Antoninus Pius (97). Cornelius Fronto had been conſul when Aulus Gellius was yet a youth (98). He beſtows great encomiums on the celebrated philoſopher and apoſtate Peregrinus; but does not mention his death, which rendered him more famous than any thing he had done in his life-time; for he publicly burnt himſelf at the ſports of the two hundred and thirty-ſixth olympiad: whence we conclude, that Aulus Gellius had done writing before that time, that is, before the year 165 of the chriſtian æra, the fifth of the reign of M. Aurelius and L. Verus. He ſtudied grammar at Rome, and philoſophy at Athens, under Calviſius Taurus, whence he returned to Rome. He left no work behind him, except his Noctes Atticæ; for thus he ſtyled the collection of ſeveral memorable and amuſing events, which he compiled for the uſe of his children (99). St. Auſtin commends him on account of his eaſy and elegant elocution (100); but moſt critics find fault with his antiquated words, his harſh and improper expreſſions, and, above all, with want of judgment, in chuſing for his collection ſuch events as are for the moſt part of no impor-

(88) Artemidor. l. i. c. 28. l. iii. c. 67. (89) Suid. p. 442. (90) Idem. p. 3, (91) Voſſ. ibid. l. ii. c. 22. (92) Artemidor. prol. p. 4. (93) Voſſ. ibid. (94) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 52, (95) Apul. flor. p. 344. (96) Idem, apol. p. 338. (97) Aul. Gell. l. xiii. c. 21. (98) Idem, l. xix. c. 8. (99) Idem, præfat. (100) Aug. civit. Dei, l. ix. c. 4.

importance, and only contain ſome grammatical and trifling remarks. Macrobius, however, often copies him. The annals of Gellius are frequently quoted by the writers of the Roman hiſtory; but the author of theſe annals, by name Cn. Gellius, lived about the year 620 of Rome, and was contemporary with Cicero (1).

(1) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. 1. c. 8. Macrob. ſaturnal. l. i. c. 16.

CHAP. XXII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of M. Aurelius, to the death of Alexander, when the empire was firſt transferred without the conſent of the ſenate.

Commodus. COMMODUS was the firſt emperor that was born in his father's reign, and the ſecond that ſucceeded his father in the empire. He was born on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt of the year 161, and raiſed to the empire on the ſeventeenth of March of the year 180. He is commonly called L. Ælius Aurelius Commodus, and ſometimes Commodus Antoninus. He was educated with great care by his father; but nevertheleſs proved one of the moſt lewd, cruel and wicked tyrants that ever diſgraced a throne; which confirms in ſome degree the opinion of thoſe, who believed him to be the ſon of a famous gladiator, with whom his mother Fauſtina was

His cruelty. ſaid to have have had a criminal converſation [d]. He gave, when only twelve years old, a remarkable inſtance of his cruelty at Centumcellæ, now Civita Vecchia; where finding the water in which he bathed ſomewhat too warm, he commanded the perſon who attended the bath to be thrown into the furnace; nor was he ſatisfied, till thoſe who were about him pretended to have put his order in execution [e]. After his acceſſion to the empire, he equalled, if he did not exceed, in cruelty Caligula, Domitian, and Nero himſelf, playing, we may ſay, with the blood of his ſubjects and fellow-creatures, of whom he cauſed great numbers to be racked and butchered in his preſence, merely for his diverſion. The antients relate.

[d] Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 30. [e] Lamprid. in Commod.

late ſeveral inſtances of his cruelty, very odd and monſtrous: he cauſed one to be thrown to the wild beaſts, for reading the life of Caligula written by Suetonius, becauſe that tyrant and he had been born on the ſame day [f]. Seeing one day a corpulent man paſs by, he immediately cut him aſunder, partly to try his ſtrength, in which he excelled all men, and partly out of curioſity, as he himſelf owned, to ſee his entrails drop out at once. He took pleaſure in cutting off the feet, and putting out the eyes, of ſuch as he met in his rambles through the city, telling the former, after he had thus maimed them, by way of raillery, that they now belonged to the nation of the Monopodii; and the latter, that they were now become Luſcinii, alluding to the words luſcinia, a nightingale, and luſcus, one-eyed. Some he murdered, becauſe they were negligently dreſſed; others, becauſe they ſeemed trimmed with too much nicety. He pretended to great ſkill in ſurgery, eſpecially at letting blood; but ſometimes, inſtead of eaſing by that means thoſe whom he viſited, or who were prevailed upon to recur to him, he cut off, by way of diverſion, their ears or noſes. He aſſumed the name and habit of Hercules, appearing publicly in a lion's ſkin, with an huge club in his hand, and ordering ſeveral perſons, tho' not guilty of any crime, to be diſguiſed like monſters, that, by knocking out their brains with his club, he might have a better claim to the name of the great deſtroyer of monſters. In ſhort, the ſhedding of blood ſeemed to be his chief diverſion [g]. As for his lewdneſs, the author of his life tells us, that even in his father's reign he turned the court into a brothel; and, upon his death, he abandoned himſelf, without reſtraint or ſhame, to all manner of abominations, ſpending whole days and nights in public-houſes amongſt the meaneſt of the people, and in the company of gladiators, buffoons, common proſtitutes, &c. He kept conſtantly three hundred concubines, and the like number of catamites. He debauched all his own ſiſters, and murdered one of them, by name Lucilla, after he had forced her to comply with his inceſtuous deſires. But to give a detail of his infamous practices and pollutions is beneath the dignity of an hiſtorian, and what we cannot help blaming in Suetonius and the Auguſtine writers. He took great delight in ſhooting with the bow, and gave innumerable proofs of his dexterity and ſkill in that art, which we ſhould look upon as fabulous, were they not atteſted by all the antients. He excelled all men in ſtrength, and is ſaid to have run an elephant thro' with his ſpear, and to have once killed in the amphitheatre an hundred lions, one after another, and each of them at one blow. Forgetful of his rank and dignity, he entered the liſts with the common gladiators, having learnt with them in the common ſchools the uſe of their weapons. He is ſaid to have fought in the public amphitheatre ſeven hundred and thirty-five times, and to have always come off conqueror; whence he often ſubſcribed himſelf in his letters, The conqueror of a thouſand gladiators. He ſeemed to be more pleaſed with the applauſe of the populace on theſe occaſions, than any of the antient Roman captains had ever been with a triumph. Imagining one day, that the people rather derided than applauded him, he ordered them all to be maſſacred upon the ſpot, and the city to be ſet on fire; which barbarous ſentence had been put in execution, had not the captain of the prætorian guards with much ado appeaſed him. Having with his extravagancies ſoon drained and exhauſted his exchequer, he betook himſelf to all manner of rapine; loaded the people with taxes; ſold the governments of the provinces and other employments; exempted criminals from the puniſhment due to their crimes, upon their paying him a ſum of money, and allowed others to murder whomſoever they pleaſed; ſo that the city, and indeed the whole empire, was filled with blood and maſſacres, every one purchaſing of the emperor the liberty of murdering ſuch as he feared or hated [h]. But to proceed to the hiſtory of his reign according to the order of time.

His lewdneſs and debaucheries.

His ſkill in archery.

[f] Idem ibid. [g] Idem ibid.

He enters the liſts with the common gladiators.

His avarice.

COMMODUS, a few days after his father's death, went to the camp, attended by all the chief officers; and there, after a plauſible and popular ſpeech to the ſoldiers, preſented them with the uſual donative. He was for returning immediately to Rome, panting after the diverſions of the city; but Pompeianus, who had married his ſiſter, repreſenting to him how dangerous and ſhameful a thing it would be for him to return before he had ended the war, he was with much-ado prevailed upon to continue ſome time in Pannonia, where he is ſaid to have gained ſome advantages over the Quadi, which muſt have been very inconſiderable, ſince he did not on that ſcore take upon him the title of imperator. However, both the Quadi and Marcomanni, imagining that he was reſolved to purſue the war, and finding themſelves no longer in a condition to make head againſt his victorious troops, ſent embaſſadors to him, with propoſals of an accommodation; which which he readily hearkened to, and granted them a peace upon the following terms: 1. That they ſhould not ſettle within five miles of the Danube. 2. That they ſhould deliver up their arms, and ſupply the Romans with a certain number of troops when required. 3. That they ſhould aſſemble but once a month, in one place only, and in the preſence of a Roman centurion. And, 4. That they ſhould not make war upon the Iazyges, the Buri, or the Vandali, without the conſent of the people of Rome. On the other hand, Commodus promiſed to abandon, which he did accordingly, all the caſtles and fortreſſes which he held in their country, except ſuch as were within five miles of the Danube [i]. With the other German nations, which his father had almoſt entirely reduced, he concluded a very diſhonourable peace; nay, of ſome he purchaſed it with very large ſums. Having thus rather abandoned than ended the war, he haſtened back to Rome, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and honoured with a triumph, with the ſurname of Pius, and with all the marks of diſtinction that had ever been conferred upon the moſt deſerving princes. Having viſited the capitol and other temples, and returned thanks to the ſenate, the people, and the ſoldiery, for their fidelity and attachment to him during his abſence, he was conducted by them to the palace on the twenty-ſecond of October [k].

[h] Idem ibid.

He concludes a peace with the Marcomanni, Quadi, &c.

THE following year, Commodus entered upon his third conſulſhip, having for his collegue one Birrus, or Burrhus, probably Antiſtius Burrhus, who had married his ſiſter [l]. On one medal of this, and on ſeveral of the following, year, Commodus bears the title of Felix, the Happy; whence it is manifeſt, that Lampridius, whom moſt modern antiquaries follow, was miſtaken, when he wrote, that this title was not by the ſenate decreed to him till the death of Perennis, which happened five years after; that is, in the year 186 [m]. The next conſuls were Mamertinus and Rufus, during whoſe adminiſtration Commodus took the title of imperator for the fifth time, on account of ſome advantages gained by his lieutenants, Albinus and Niger, over the barbarians who dwelt beyond Dacia [n]. The above-mentioned conſuls were ſucceeded by Commodus, the fourth time conſul, and Victorinus the ſecond time. During their conſulſhip, the Caledo-

[i] Dio, l. lxxii. p. 817. Herodian. l. i. p. 461. Aur. Vict.
[k] Lamprid. ibid. Dio, p. 818. Herod. p. 471. Goltz p. 81.
[l] Vit. Commod. p. 48. Onuph p. 238. [m] Birag. p. 246.
[n] Goltz. p. 81. Birag. ibid. Dio, p. 820.

The Caledonians invade the Roman territories; but are repulſed by Ulpius Marcellus.

nians, having paſſed the wall which parted them from the Romans, committed dreadful devaſtations, and cut in pieces a Roman army, with their general; but were in the end repulſed with great ſlaughter, by Ulpius Marcellus, a man of a mean deſcent, but an excellent commander and a ſtrict obſerver of the military diſcipline. Of this war the antients give us no particular account, but only tell us, that it proved very bloody; that the emperor, for the great advantages gained by his lieutenant, took the title of imperator the ſixth time, with the ſurname of Britannicus; and that Ulpius Marcellus, by his gallant and prudent conduct, gained ſuch credit and reputation, that Commodus envying him the glory he had acquired, deſigned to put him to death; but in the end ſpared him [a]. This year Commodus, who had hitherto followed the advice of his father's friends and counſellors, began to deſpiſe them, thinking himſelf ſufficiently qualified to govern without ſo many tutors about him, as he expreſſed it. He therefore diſcharged them all, employing in their room either his debauched companions, or ſuch as were recommended to him by them. Thus Peſcennius Niger was preferred to the command of the armies in Syria, at the recommendation of the wreſtler Narciſſus; and many others were raiſed to great employments by means of the emperor's freedmen, ſlaves, concubines, &c. whoſe imperious and arrogant behaviour drew upon the young prince the hatred and contempt of the ſenate; which he being well appriſed of, began in his turn to put to death, under various pretences, ſome of the moſt eminent members of that illuſtrious body. His ſiſter Lucilla, ſeeing him abhorred, on account of his cruelties, by all the great men in Rome, formed a conſpiracy againſt him, with a deſign to place in his room a perſon whom ſhe favoured, and was thought to love both above her brother and her huſband Pompeianus. She had the title of empreſs, and all the honours attending it, being the widow of the emperor Lucius Verus; but nevertheleſs was obliged to give place to Criſpina, the wife of Commodus; which her haughty ſpirit could not bear. She therefore drew into a conſpiracy Claudius Pompeianus, to whom ſhe had betrothed her daughter, Quadratus, and many other ſenators of diſtinction. It was agreed among the conſpirators, that they ſhould fall upon the emperor while he was going to the amphitheatre through a narrow and dark paſſage; and that Pompeianus ſhould give him the firſt blow. Accordingly they aſſaulted him

Commodus diſmiſſes his father's friends and counſellors.

A conſpiracy formed againſt him by his ſiſter Lucilla and others,

[a] Dio. l. lxxii. p. 821. & in excerpt. Val. p. 725.

him in the appointed place; but Pompeianus ſhewing him, inſtead of ſtriking at once, the naked dagger, and crying out, This preſent the ſenate ſends you, the guards had time to reſcue the emperor and ſeize the conſpirators, who were ſoon after put to death. The emperor baniſhed his ſiſter to the iſland of Capreæ, where he afterwards ordered her to be privately murdered [p]. Herodianus tells us, that one Quinctianus was to give the firſt blow; and Ammianus, who follows him, adds, that Quinctianus actually wounded the emperor, who, by the loſs of blood, fainted away [q]. But we have choſen to follow ſuch writers as lived neareſt thoſe times. This ſame year the empreſs Criſpina was likewiſe confined to the iſland of Capreæ, and there murdered, by the emperor's order's, for imitating him in his debaucheries [r]. Quadratus had a concubine, by name Marcia, and a favourite freed-man, named Eclectus. The latter the emperor created his chief chamberlain; and the former, who was a woman of great beauty, he kept for his concubine, and diſtinguiſhed her with all the honours that were peculiar to the empreſſes, except that of having fire or torches carried before her [s]. She is ſuppoſed to have been a great friend to the chriſtians; and to her power at court, and authority with the emperor, is commonly aſcribed the profound tranquillity, which the church enjoyed in the midſt of ſo many cruel executions [t]. One Anterus, or, as others call him, Saoterus, a native of Nicomedia and the emperor's favourite freed-man, was thought to have put him upon the wicked meaſures which he was purſuing; for he bore a great ſway with the prince. Wherefore the captains of the guards cauſed him to be murdered by one Cleander, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. The emperor expreſſed greater concern for his death, than he had done for the conſpiracy formed againſt himſelf; and being informed, that Tarruntinus Paternus, one of the captains of the guards, was privy to it, he removed him from his employment, under colour of creating him a ſenator, and a few days after cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated, with Salvius Julianus, to whoſe ſon the daughter of Paternus had been betrothed, pretending, that they had both conſpired to depoſe him and ſeize the empire for themſelves [u]. Salvius Julianus was grandſon to the famous civilian of that name under

Who are all put to death.

The captains of the guard cauſe his favourite freedman to be murdered.

[p] Vit. Commod. p. 46. Herod. p. 474. Dio, p. 818.
[q] Ammian. l. xxix. [r] Dio, ibid. [s] Herod l. i. p. 486.
[t] Vide Baron. ann. 112. [u] Vit. Commod. p. 47. Dio, p. 819.

under Adrian, and uncle to Didius Julianus, who was afterwards emperor. The ſame year were falſly accuſed of treaſon, condemned and executed, Velius Rufus, Egnatius Capito, and the two Quintilii, Maximus and Condianus, who had been all conſuls. Sextus Condianus, the ſon of Maximus, who had been conſul in the year 180, and was a young man of extraordinary parts, was condemned with his father and uncle; but eſcaped, at leaſt for ſome time, by cauſing a report to be ſpread, that he was dead; but many atteſting that he was ſtill alive, diligent ſearch was made after him. Many perſons, who had never ſeen him, were accuſed of having harboured and concealed him in their houſes, and, upon that charge, either put to death or baniſhed. Of Sextus himſelf we find no further mention in hiſtory. Emilius Junctus and Attilius Severus were both baniſhed in their conſulſhip, which they held, it ſeems, during the two laſt months of this year, and with them many ſenators and knights of great diſtinction. Under the ſucceeding conſuls, M. Eggius Merullus and Cn. Papirius Ælianus, was accuſed of aſpiring at the empire and put to death, the emperor's favourite miniſter Perennis. He was captain of the prætorian guards, an excellent commander, and, according to Dion Caſſius, a man without reproach [w]. But Herodianus and Lampridius give him a quite different character, and ſpeak of him as one who abuſed the great authority he had with the emperor, ſticking at no violence, murder, or injuſtice, to fill his own coffers, while Commodus was wholly intent upon his pleaſures and diverſions, in which he encouraged him, that he might govern with an abſolute ſway; which he did but for a ſhort while, as we ſhall ſee anon [x]. This year Commodus took the title of imperator the ſeventh time, probably on account of ſome advantages gained by his lieutenants in Britain; for the diſturbances there were not yet entirely quelled [y]. The next conſuls were Commodus the fifth time, and Acilius Glabrio the ſecond [z]. This year, while Commodus was aſſiſting at the Capitoline ſports, inſtituted by Domitian in 86, a perſon in the habit of a Cynic philoſopher, appeared unexpectedly in the midſt of the theatre; and addreſſing the emperor, told him aloud, That while he minded nothing but his pleaſures and diverſions, he was in danger of loſing

Several perſons condemned and executed.

Perennis, the emperor's favourite miniſter, put to death.

His downfal and death differently reported.

[w] Dio, l. lxxi. p. 819. Vit. Comm. p. 47. [x] Dio, p. 821. [y] Herod. l. i. p. 472. Vit. Comm. p. 48. [z] Biſrag. p. 248. Vit. Comm. ibid. [a] Norie. epiſt. conſul p. 116.

loſing both his life and the empire, by the wicked practices of Perennis and his children. Perennis cauſed the pretended Cynic to be immediately ſeized as a madman, who diſturbed the public ſports, and ſoon after ordered him to be burnt alive; which gave the emperor no ſmall jealouſy. Not long after, ſome ſoldiers arriving at Rome from Illyricum, where the ſon of Perennis commanded, ſhewed to Commodus, in a private audience, ſome medals, on which was engraved the image of the ſon of Perennis, as if he had been already emperor; which ſo alarmed the prince, that he commanded the traitor to be immediately put to death [b]. Thus Herodian. But Dion Caſſius and Lampridius relate his downfal in a quite different manner. According to them, the army in Britain, diſſatisfied, either becauſe he had puniſhed them with too great ſeverity on account of ſome ſedition, or becauſe he had removed ſeveral ſenators, and given their poſts in the army to Roman knights his creatures, ſent deputies to Rome, fifteen hundred, ſays Dion Caſſius, (which ſeems altogether incredible) to complain of him, and charge him with a deſign of raiſing his ſon to the empire. They were backed by Cleander and the emperor's other freed-men, who could not brook the arbitrary and haughty conduct of the favourite miniſter. Hereupon Commodus, naturally timorous, abandoned the traitor to the rage of the provoked ſoldiery, who, after a thouſand outrages, tore him in pieces. His wife, his ſiſter, and his two ſons underwent the ſame fate. To his eldeſt ſon, who commanded the army in Illyricum, the emperor wrote an obliging letter, enjoining him to come with all poſſible expedition to Rome, to receive there new marks of the eſteem and affection he had for him and his father. As the young man was an entire ſtranger to what had paſſed, and not yet in a condition to revolt openly, he readily complied with the invitation; but had no ſooner entered Italy, than he was cut in pieces by the ſoldiers who attended him, purſuant to the private orders they had received from Rome [c]. The other brother was probably killed at Rome with his father. Perennis was ſucceeded in the poſt of prime miniſter by Cleander; for the emperor himſelf was ſo taken up with his pleaſures and diverſions, that he could not beſtow one minute on the affairs of the ſtate: he would not even be at the trouble of ſigning his diſpatches; and in ſeveral letters to his friends all he wrote was, Vale, Farewel. Cleander was by birth a Phrygian, and originally a ſlave,

His wife and children undergo the ſame fate.

Perennis is ſucceeded by Cleander.

[b] Herodian. ibid. p. 474, 475. [c] Dio, p. 821. Vit. Commod. 48.

ſlave, having been ſold as ſuch in Rome by auction, as were in thoſe days moſt ſlaves. He belonged at firſt to M. Aurelius, and afterwards to Commodus, who, favouring him above the reſt of his ſlaves, gave him leave to marry Demoſtracia, one of his concubines, brought up the children he had by her in the palace, preſented him with his liberty, and appointed him his chamberlain. He is thought to have procured the death of Perennis, that he might engroſs all the power to himſelf; which he eaſily compaſſed, and abuſed his authority in a more flagrant manner than Perennis had ever done. By him all things were openly ſet to ſale, offices, provinces, public revenues, public juſtice, and the lives of men both innocent and guilty. Antiſtius Burrhus, who had married one of the emperor's ſiſters, took the liberty to acquaint the prince with the unaccountable conduct of his miniſter; but that liberty coſt him his life, Cleander having charged him with aſpiring at the empire, and prevailed upon the emperor, whom he blindly controuled, to condemn him, and all thoſe who eſpouſed his cauſe, or attempted to defend him. Among theſe was Ebutianus captain of the guards, in whoſe room Cleander perſuaded the emperor to ſubſtitute himſelf, and two others whom he named to him. Upon the death of Perennis, that employment had been given to one Niger, who held it only ſix hours; another enjoyed it but five days, and ſeveral others not ſo long, the timorous emperor changing the captains of his guards daily and hourly. Moſt of theſe officers loſt their lives with their employment, being accuſed of treaſon by Cleander, who courted, and at laſt obtained that important poſt for himſelf [d]. After the death of Perennis, the emperor pretended to be greatly concerned for many things that had been done during his adminiſtration, in order to throw the whole odium upon him. He wrote an obliging letter to Pertinax, whom Perennis had baniſhed into Liguria, his native country, and kept there for the ſpace of three years, appointing him commander of the troops in Britain, which had mutinied, and raiſed great diſturbances in that iſland, neither the Roman ſoldiers, nor the Britons, being able to brook the tyrannical government of Commodus. Upon the arrival of Pertinax, the ſoldiers preſſed him to aſſume the ſovereignty; but he rejected the offer with indignation, brought by degrees the mutinous ſoldiery to a ſenſe of their duty, and reſtored tranquillity to the province, but not without great trouble and danger; for one of the legions openly revolting, much

Who abuſes his authority.

The captains of the guards changed daily and hourly

The Roman ſoldiers in Britain mutiny.

[d] Herod. p. 475. Dio, p. 822. Vit. Com. ibid.

much blood was ſpilt, and Pertinax himſelf was left upon the ſpot for dead. As his ſeverity drew upon him the hatred and ill-will of the ſoldiery, he deſired to be recalled; but the emperor did not comply with his requeſt till three years after *. This year Commodus took the title of imperator for the eighth and laſt time, on account of the advantages, as is conjectured, which Clodius Albinus is ſaid to have gained about this time over the Friſians [e].

The war of the deſerters under the conduct of Maternus.

UNDER the next conſuls, Criſpinus and Ælianus, a common ſoldier, by name Maternus, having fled from his colours, and being joined by many others guilty of the ſame crime, grew in a ſhort time ſo powerful, the banditti flocking to him from all parts, that he over-ran and plundered great part of Gaul and Spain, ſtormed the ſtrong cities, and ſtruck the emperor and people of Rome with ſuch terror, that troops were raiſed and armies diſpatched againſt him. Peſcennius Niger was ſent to make head againſt him in Gaul, where he became very intimate with Severus, who was then governor of the country of Lyons, and wrote a letter to the emperor, commending the prudent conduct and gallant behaviour of Niger in purſuing the rebels and deſerters [f]. Maternus, finding himſelf reduced to great ſtreights by the brave Niger, divided his men into ſeveral ſmall bands, and marched privately with them by different ways into Italy, having nothing leſs in view than to murder the emperor, during the ſolemnity which was kept annually in honour of the mother of the gods, and, upon his death, to ſeize the empire. They all arrived at Rome undiſcovered; and ſome of his men had already mixed themſelves with the emperor's guards, when others of his own party betrayed him. He was immediately ſeized and executed, and his death put an end to the diſturbances, which ſome of his followers had begun to raiſe in other provinces [g]. The ſame year, broke out the moſt dreadful plague, ſays Dion Caſſius, that had been known. It laſted two or three years, and raged with moſt violence in Rome, where it frequently carried off two thouſand perſons a day. The emperor, to avoid the contagion, retired to Laurentum, a city of Latium, on the ſea-ſide [h]. The following year, Fuſcianus and Salinus being both conſuls for the ſecond time, the emperor gave out, that he deſigned to paſs over into Africa; but having, under that pretence, exacted very conſiderable ſums, and even

Who is ſeized and executed.

ſuffered

* Vit. Com. ibid. & Pertin. p. 54. [e] Albin. vit. p. 81.
[f] Nig. vit. p. 75. [g] Herod. l. i. p. 575. Vit. Com. p. 51.
[h] Idem. ibid.

ſuffered the people to offer up vows for his ſafe return on the fifth of April, he ſpent the money in banquets and revels, and continued at Rome and in the neighbourhood [i]. About this time, Severus was tranſlated from the government of Pannonia to that of Sicily, whence he returned to Rome, to clear himſelf of a crime with which he was charged, viz. of conſulting the aſtrologers, as if he entertained thoughts of uſurping the ſovereignty. His cauſe was heard by the captains of the guards, the collegues of Cleander; and, as Commodus was hated, ſays Spartian, Severus was cleared, and his accuſer crucified [k]. This year, great part of the capitol, a famous library, and ſeveral contiguous buildings, were utterly deſtroyed by lightning [l]. Euſebius ſays, it conſumed whole quarters of the city, and in them ſeveral libraries. At the ſame time, the city was afflicted with a dreadful famine, occaſioned, as ſome authors write, by Cleander, who, having now nothing leſs in view than the ſovereignty, bought up under-hand all the corn, in order to raiſe the price of it, and gain the affections of the ſoldiery and people, by diſtributing it among them [m]. Other writers tell us [n], that Papirius Dionyſius, whoſe province it was to ſupply the city with proviſions, contributed towards the famine, in order to make the people riſe againſt Cleander. Be that as it will, the populace aſcribed all their calamities and misfortunes to the hated miniſter, who now began to act in a more arbitrary manner than ever, putting to death and pardoning, baniſhing and recalling from exile whom he pleaſed. Several manumitted ſlaves he created patricians, and gave them a place in the ſenate; others he made governors of provinces, and raiſed to the firſt employments. But his reign was ſhort-lived; for the following year, in which Rome ſaw for the firſt, and indeed for the laſt time, twenty-five conſuls, all named by Cleander, and moſt of them his creatures, while the people were celebrating the Circenſian games, a troop of children, having at their head a young woman of an extraordinary ſtature and a fierce aſpect, entering the circus, began to utter aloud many bitter invectives and dreadful curſes againſt Cleander; which being for ſome time anſwered by the people with other invectives and curſes, the whole multitude roſe all on a ſudden, flew in a tumultuous manner to the palace of Quintilius in the neighbourhood of Rome, where the emperor was then reſiding

Severus accuſed and acquitted.

Cleander acts in an arbitrary manner.

The people riſe againſt him.

[i] Vit. Com. p. 49. [k] Spart. in Sever. [l] Euſeb. in chron. Oroſ. l. viii. c. 16. [m] Dio, p. 823. [n] Vit. Com. p. 51.

reſiding with Cleander; and, renewing their curſes and imprecations, demanded the head of the perfidious wretch, by whom they had been ſo grievouſly and tyrannically oppreſſed. Hereupon Cleander ordered the prætorian cavalry to charge the multitude; which they did accordingly, driving them with great ſlaughter into the city; but there the populace diſcharging ſhowers of ſtones, bricks, and tiles from the tops of the houſes and from the windows, and the city-guards, who hated Cleander, joining the multitude, the prætorian horſe were forced to give way and ſave themſelves by a diſorderly flight. The people purſued them to the palace of Quintilius, where the emperor was paſſing his time in the company of ſome lewd women, utterly unappriſed of the tumult, Cleander having forbidden thoſe who were about him to acquaint him with it. However, Marcia, his favourite concubine, thought it incumbent upon her to inform him of what had paſſed; and his ſiſter Fadilla, entering his apartment in a great fright and with her hair diſhevelled, cried out to him aloud, That all was loſt, unleſs he abandoned Cleander to the fury of the incenſed populace. Hereupon the emperor, ſtruck with terror and amazement, ſent for Cleander; and having cauſed his head to be ſtruck off that inſtant, ſent it to the people, the ſight of which put an end to the combat, which ſtill continued with great ſlaughter. His head and body were by the incenſed populace inſulted in a moſt outrageous manner. His wife, his children, and moſt of his creatures were at the ſame time maſſacred, and their bodies firſt dragged through the ſtreets, and then thrown into the common ſewer [n]. Lampridius tells us, that the people were chiefly provoked againſt him, for having cauſed Arrius Antoninus to be falſly accuſed of treaſon and put to death, becauſe he had, while proconſul of Aſia, condemned one of his creatures, by name Attalus [o]. Julianus and Regillus were appointed captains of the guards in the room of Cleander and his collegues; but the emperor cauſed them both to be ſoon after put to death, though he had ever ſhewn a particular kindneſs and affection for Julianus, whom he uſed to ſtyle his father [p]. About the cloſe of this year, Pertinax was, at his own requeſt, recalled from Britain, and charged with the care of ſupplying the city with proviſions in the room of Papirius Dionyſius, who was likewiſe put to death, with all thoſe who had any ways contributed to the raiſing the price of corn.

The prætorian horſe fall upon them; but are put to flight.

The emperor cauſes his head to be ſtruck off.

THE

[n] Dio, l. lxxii. p. 823. Herod. l. i. p. 479—481. Vit. Comm. p. 48. [o] Vit. Comm. ibid. [p] Idem ibid. & Dio, p. 823.

The following year, Commodus entered upon his ſixth conſulſhip, having Petronius Septimianus for his collegue. The ſeveral conſpiracies, which had been formed againſt himſelf and his miniſters, filling him with jealouſies and ſuſpicions, he abandoned himſelf without controul to bloodſhed and cruelty. He put to death, beſides many others mentioned by Spartian and other writers, Petronius Mamertinus, who had married one of his ſiſters; his ſon Antoninus; Annia Fauſtina, couſin-german to M. Aurelius; Sulpicius Craſſus, proconſul of Aſia, and ſix conſulars on one day. He cauſed all thoſe who were any-ways related to Avidius Caſſius, of whom we have ſpoken above, to be burnt alive. Among the multitudes of all ranks and conditions, who were doomed to be inhumanly maſſacred this year, Dion Caſſius gives us a particular account of the death of one Julius Alexander, a native of Emeſa in Syria, who being informed that the emperor had ſent thither a centurion with a band of ſoldiers to murder him, ſurpriſed them in the night, and killed them all to a man, with ſeveral others, whom he ſuſpected to be his enemies. Having thus filled the city with ſlaughter, he retired on horſe-back, with a deſign to take refuge among the barbarians; and would have made his eſcape, had he not been retarded by a friend of his, who could not keep up with him, and whom he could not find in his heart to leave behind him. Being therefore overtaken by thoſe who purſued him, he firſt killed his friend, that he might not fall into their hands, and afterwards himſelf [q]. This year Severus, who had been one of the twenty-five conſuls of the preceding year, was appointed commander of the troops in Illyricum, and Pertinax was ſent into Africa with the character of proconſul. The following year, Apronianus and Bradua being conſuls, a fire broke out in the night-time in the celebrated temple of Peace, preceded, and, as ſome writers ſuppoſe, produced by a ſmall earthquake; for no thunder was heard [r]. Dion Caſſius writes, that it began in the adjoining houſes. Be that as it will, the temple, with all the buildings round it, was reduced to aſhes. That magnificent ſtructure had been raiſed by Veſpaſian after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and enriched with all the ſpoils and ornaments of the temple of the Jews. The antients ſpeak of it as one of the moſt ſtately buildings in Rome. There men of learning uſed to hold their aſſemblies and lodge their writings, as many others did their jewels, and whatever elſe they had of great value. It was likewiſe made uſe of as Commodus cauſes many illuſtrious perſons to be put to death.

The temple of Peace conſumed by fire.

[q] Dio, ibid. [r] Herodian. l. i. p. 485. Dio, p. 829.

as a kind of magazine for the ſpices that were brought by the Roman merchants out of Egypt and Arabia; ſo that many rich perſons were at once reduced to beggary, all their valuable effects and treaſures being conſumed, in one night, with the temple [s]. Galen complains, that many of his books were loſt by this misfortune [t]. The fire ſpread with great violence to other quarters of the city, and conſumed a great number of ſtately edifices; among the reſt, the temple of Veſta. The veſtals fled to the palace with the ſtatue of Pallas, which was ſuppoſed to have been brought from Troy, and had never before been expoſed to public view; but the flames ſeized the palace itſelf, and reduced great part of it to aſhes, before their rage could be ſtaid. However, the public papers and regiſters were with much-ado preſerved. The conflagration laſted ſeveral days, in ſpite of the utmoſt endeavours of the people, the ſoldiery, and the emperor himſelf, who, returning on that occaſion from the country, expoſed his own perſon, in order to encourage others to exert themſelves by his example. It ceaſed at length of itſelf, or was extinguiſhed by a ſudden and violent rain, which they all looked upon as ſent by the gods [u]. This year, Pertinax was preferred from the government of Africa to that of Rome, and Didius Julianus ſent to govern Africa in his room. The next conſuls were Commodus, the ſeventh time, and Helvidius Pertinax, the ſecond. This year, the Roman troops were defeated by the Saracens, whom we find now mentioned for the firſt time in hiſtory [w]. Commodus being told, that Severus, who commanded in Illyricum, and Nonius Murcus, who had the command of ſome other army, aſpired at the empire, appointed Clodius Albinus, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence, governor of Britain, and wrote a letter to him with his own hand, ſays Julius Capitolinus, giving him leave to aſſume the title of Cæſar, and the ornaments peculiar to that dignity, in caſe any diſturbances ſhould ariſe in the empire. Albinus, adds the ſame writer, prudently declined that honour, fearing to be involved in the ruin of Commodus, which he apprehended to be at hand [x]. The account, which Dion Caſſius and Herodian gives us of the latter end of this prince's reign, is nothing but a detail of his follies, and the ſhews which he exhibited, and in which he himſelf acted the chief part.

And the temple of Veſta with many other buildings.

The emperor's folly, and public ſhews.

Both

[s] Dio, & Herod. ibid. Galen de libris ſuis, p. 363. [t] Galen. ibid. [u] Herod. p. 482. [w] Vit. Nigr. p. 77. [x] Vit. Albin. p. 79.

Both these historians were present; and the former, who assisted at the above-mentioned shews in quality of senator, tells us, that he and the other senators chewed the whole time bay-leaves, that by their bitterness they might be diverted from laughing at the prince's folly; which would have cost them their lives. However, he owns, that the address and skill which the emperor displayed in shooting with the bow, was universally admired and applauded; for a panther having seized a man, and being ready to devour him, Commodus let fly an arrow against the beast with so much skill and force, that the panther fell dead to the ground, before the man received the least hurt [r]. A few days before his death, he changed the names of some of the months, calling August Commodus, September August, October Hercules, November Invincibilis, December Exuperatorius, and January Amazonius; which last title he himself assumed, because he had first fallen in love with Marcia upon seeing her painted in the dress of an Amazon. He was likewise for changing the name of the city itself, and calling it Colonia Commodiana, or The colony of Commodus. Upon this head he wrote to the senate, styling himself in the letter, Imperator Cæsar Lucius, Ælius, Aurelius, Commodus, Antoninus, Augustus, Pius, Felix, Sarmaticus, Germanicus, Maximinus, Britannicus, Pacator orbis terrarum, Invictus Romanus Hercules, Pontifex Maximus, Tribunitiæ Potestatis XVII. Imperator VIII. Consul VII. Pater Patriæ, &c. The senate readily complied with his desire, and not only styled Rome Colonia Commodiana, but the house in which they assembled, The house of Commodus. They had given him before, by way of derision, says Lampridius, the title of Pious, upon his raising to the consulship one of his mother's gallants; the title of Happy, for having compassed the death of Perennis; and that of Hercules, in consideration of his extraordinary strength, and his killing many thousand wild beasts in the amphitheatre. He had often appeared on the public stage in the Amazonian and other fantastical dresses; but this year he was not ashamed to enter the lists with the gladiators, to act, and to dance in the theatre quite naked. Not satisfied with these follies, he resolved to appear on the first day of the ensuing year 193, as consul, and at the same time as gladiator, and, in order to that, to cause Erucius Clarus and Sosius Falco, the two consuls elect, to be murdered. This design he imparted

He changes the names of some months.

His vanity.

He acts and dances in public quite naked.

He designs to appear on the first of January like a consul and gladiator.

[r] Dio, p. 484. Herod. p. 826.

imparted to Marcia, the night before it was to be put in execution, telling her, that the conſuls were to be murdered the following night; and that he intended to march in proceſſion, not from the palace, and with the enſigns of the imperial dignity, as was uſual on the firſt of January, but from the ſchool of the gladiators, armed like one of them, and attended by them alone. Marcia threw herſelf at his feet, and conjured him, with tears in her eyes, to reflect on the danger to which he expoſed his life, by truſting it to men deſtitute of all honour and probity. But Commodus, without giving ear to her remonſtrances, ordered Lætus, captain of the guards, and Eclectus, his chief chamberlain, to get ready the apartment which he had built for himſelf in the houſe where the gladiators belonging to the public were lodged. Theſe two officers did likewiſe all that lay in their power to divert him from ſo ſtrange a reſolution; but to no purpoſe: for the emperor, inſtead of yielding to their entreaties, flew into a great paſſion; and, retiring to his chamber, as if he deſigned to repoſe a little, it being then about noon, he ſet down on a piece of paper the names of many illuſtrious ſenators and other perſons of diſtinction, whom he deſigned to murder, in order to enrich himſelf with their eſtates, and at the head of the fatal liſt the names of Marcia, Lætus, and Eclectus. Having left this paper upon his bed, when he went to bathe before dinner, according to the Roman cuſtom, a little child, with whom he uſed to amuſe himſelf, entering his bed-chamber, innocently took it up to play with it; but Marcia meeting him, ſnatched it out of his hand, imagining it to be ſome writing of conſequence. She was greatly ſurpriſed when, upon viewing it, ſhe found herſelf, Lætus, and Eclectus doomed with the reſt to deſtruction. She immediately acquainted Lætus and Eclectus with the danger that threatened them, who thereupon reſolved to be before-hand with the tyrant [z]. Such is the account which Herodian gives us of this conſpiracy. But Dion Caſſius, who had already related the death of Domitian with theſe very circumſtances, tells us only in this place, that Lætus and Eclectus, no longer able to bear the cruelties and follies of Commodus, and terrified with his menaces, agreed with Marcia to diſpatch him. Julius Capitolinus writes, that they acquainted Pertinax with their deſign, who did not ſtrive to divert them from it [a]. But Dion Caſſius [b] and Herodian [c] aſſure us, that he was altogether

He dooms Marcia, Lætus, and Eclectus to death;

Who conſpire againſt him.

[z] Herod. l. i. p. 486, 487. [a] Jul. Cap. in Pert. p. 55.
[b] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 830. [c] Herod. l. ii. p. 490.

together unappriſed of their attempt, the conſpirators not having time to think of any thing but diſpatching the tyrant and ſecuring themſelves. Be that as it will, the conſpirators agreed, that the ſafeſt and moſt expeditious way was to diſpatch him with poiſon; which was accordingly adminiſtered to him by Marcia, as he returned very hot from bathing, after having killed ſome wild beaſts. The emperor, being ſoon after ſeized with an heavy ſlumber, retired to refreſh himſelf with a ſhort ſleep (for he ſlept, as hiſtorians obſerve, at all hours); and Eclectus, laying hold of that opportunity, ordered the company to retire, hoping by that means to conceal the cauſe and manner of his death; but Commodus awaking, when the company was ſcarce gone, was ſeized with a violent vomiting; and, ſuſpecting that poiſon had been given him, began to threaten all about him with immediate death. Hereupon the conſpirators, fearing he ſhould void the poiſon and eſcape, ſent in haſte for his great favourite Narciſſus, the famous wreſtler, who, being gained over by them with great promiſes, threw himſelf upon the emperor, and, ſeizing him by the throat, ſtrangled him [d]. Thus died Commodus, the laſt night of the year 192, after having lived thirty-one years and four months, and reigned twelve years, nine months, and fourteen days. He was murdered in a palace which ſtood on mount Cælius, where he then reſided, becauſe he could not ſleep, as he ſaid, in the imperial palace [e]. His body was privately conveyed away and buried in the fields; but was afterwards taken up by Pertinax, who ſucceeded to the empire, and depoſited in the monument of Adrian. The conſpirators gave out, that he died of an apoplexy: which Eutropius ſeems to have believed. His death was no ſooner known, than the ſenate aſſembled, without waiting for the return of day, and declared him a public enemy, loaded him with curſes, ordered his ſtatues to be broke to pieces, his name to be razed out of all public inſcriptions, and demanded his body, that it might be dragged through the ſtreets and thrown into the Tiber. When Pertinax, who had already been declared emperor, anſwered that it was buried, they deſired to know who had been ſo bold as to pay that honour to a gladiator, to a parricide, to a more cruel and bloody tyrant, than Nero or Domitian [f]. Though he was thus generally abhorred as a monſter of cruelty and an enemy

He is murdered.

His ſtatues are pulled down, and his acts annulled.

[d] Idem, l. i. p. 488. Dio, p. 828. Comm vit. p. 52.
[e] Vit. Com. p. 51. Euſeb. chron. p. 226. [f] Vit. Com. p. 53. Dio, p. 830.

enemy to mankind, yet the emperor Severus ſtyled himſelf his brother, cauſed him to be ranked among the gods, appointed prieſts and ſacrifices to his honour, and ordered the anniverſary of his birth to be obſerved with great ſolemnity [g]. However, the empire was greatly indebted to him for eſtabliſhing a company of merchants, and a fleet for conveying corn from Africa to Rome, when any misfortune ſhould befal the fleet that tranſported it from Egypt [h]. Another action we find recorded of his, truly worthy of the ſon of M. Aurelius: One Manilius, who had been ſecretary to Avidius Caſſius and privy to his conſpiracy, having made his eſcape, and concealed himſelf ever ſince his death, was apprehended in the beginning of the reign of Commodus, to whom he offered to diſcover many things of great importance: but Commodus would not ſo much as hear him; nay, he burnt all his letters, without opening any one of them [i]. But this happened in the very beginning of his reign, when he followed the advice of the wiſe counſellors whom his father had placed about him. No mention is made in hiſtory of his children; but it appears from an antient medal, that he had ſome, who muſt have died very young [k]. Of the authors who wrote in his reign, we ſhall give an account in our note (I).

[g] Vit. Com. ibid. & Dio, p. 824. [h] Vit. Com p. 52.
[i] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 725. [k] Spart. l. vii. p. 659.

(I) Julius Pollux inſcribed to Commodus, when he had only the title of Cæſar, his onomaſticon, which is ſtill extant, and conſiſts of ten books. It is a collection of ſynonymous words uſed by the beſt Greek writers to expreſs one and the ſame thing. He was one of the preceptors of Commodus, who, being chiefly taken with his fine and harmonious voice, honoured him with the profeſſorſhip of eloquence lately founded in the city of Athens (41). He was, according to Philoſtratus, who ranks him among the ſophiſts, well acquainted with the Greek tongue, and a good judge of the writings of others, but no great writer himſelf, his ſtyle being quite flat and lifeleſs. He was a native of Naucratis, once a famous city of Egypt, on one of the arms of the Nile, to which it gave its name (42). He died in the fifty-eighth year of his age (43). In the library of the duke of Bavaria is lodged a manuſcript chronicle done by one Julius Pollux, and

(41) Philoſt. ſoph. xxxviii. p. 590 (42) Idem, p. 488.
(43) Suid. p. 559.

Lætus and Eclectus offer the empire to Pertinax.

COMMODUS being dead and his body privately conveyed away, Lætus and Eclectus repaired without delay to the houſe and extending from the creation to the reign of the emperor Valens, which plainly ſhews, that it is not the work of this Julius Pollux, but of another, who flouriſhed near two hundred years after his time (44). Phrynicus was contemporary with Pollux, and likewiſe inſcribed to Commodus, when he was only Cæſar, a work, of which Photius had read thirty-five or thirty-ſix books. It was a collection of words, phraſes, and ſome ſentences, extracted out of the beſt Greek writers and alphabetically digeſted. But theſe thirty-ſix books might have been reduced, according to Photius, to ſix or ſeven, by retrenching the author's uſeleſs digreſſions and repetitions. In ſome of theſe books Phrynicus addreſſed himſelf to Commodus; in others to Baſilides a ſophiſt of Miletus, and to his other friends (45). A collection of Attic words, done by Phrynicus, has reached us, with a letter to one Cornelianus prefixed to it, wherein he mentions another work compiled by him at the requeſt of Cornelianus, which contained a collection of many Greek words commonly uſed, but not quite pure and Attic. He owns, that ſome of them are to be found in the antients; but maintains, that they were therein faulty, and ought not to be imitated (46). We find one Attidius Cornelianus governor of Syria, in the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius; and to him in all likelihood, the above-mentioned letter is addreſſed (47). Phrynicus is not mentioned by Suidas. Philoſtratus ſpeaks of one Ariſtænetus of Byzantium, who flouriſhed under Commodus, and ranks him amongſt the moſt eloquent men of his time (48). As for Ariſtænetus, the author of ſome letters that are ſtill extant, it is manifeſt, that he wrote after the foundation of New Rome; that is, either under Conſtantine, or after his time. Both he and Apollinaris Sidonius ſpeak of a celebrated mimic, by name Caramallus; whence ſome writers conjecture, that theſe two authors lived at the ſame time; that is, about the middle of the fifth century (49). The author of the letters was, as is evident, a pagan, tho' in his time paganiſm was almoſt utterly aboliſhed, his work being a confuſed heap of follies and abſurdities, altogether unworthy of one who had the leaſt tincture of chriſtianity (50). Thoſe who have been at the trouble of illuſtrating theſe letters with comments, diſtinguiſh the author of them from

Ariſtænetus

(44) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 17. (45) Phot. c. 158. (46) Vide Petr. Hallicum de vit. S. Albericii, p. 114. Duacii, ann. 1636. (47) M. Aur. vit. p. 25. (48) Philoſt. ſoph. xxxvii. p. 587. (49) Voſſ. rhet. p. 115. (50) Vide Ariſtænet. l. i. epiſt. 26. Pariſ. ann. 1686.

houſe of Helvius Pertinax, whom they judged the moſt deſerving perſon in the ſenate and the moſt worthy of the empire. As the death of the emperor was not yet publicly known, Pertinax, rouſed out of his ſleep, (for it was about mid-night) by their entering his houſe, did not doubt but they had been ſent by Commodus to murder him. However, he ordered his domeſtics to let them into his room; and upon their appearing there, without riſing from his bed or betraying the leaſt concern, he told them, That as Pompeianus and he were the only friends of M. Aurelius left alive, he had long expected every day to fall a ſacrifice to the cruelty of the tyrant, and with great firmneſs bid them ſtrike and put their orders in execution. Lætus, admiring his conſtancy and intrepidity, told him, that the tyrant was dead, and that they were come to offer the empire to him, as the perſon in the ſenate the moſt worthy of it. Pertinax, ſuſpecting ſome treachery, even after they had acquainted him with all the circumſtances of the death of the tyrant, ſent ſome of his friends to the place where his body lay; and upon their return, no room be-Ariſtænetus quoted by Stephanus the geographer (51), and from another of the ſame name, who was conſul with Honorius in the year 404, and frankly own, that they know not who he was. They even ſeem inclined to think it a mere rhapſody, publiſhed under the name of Ariſtænetus, which was prefixed to the firſt letter. The whole work ſeems to be a collection of ſeveral paſſages copied out of Plato, Lucian, and others, and jumbled together, if we may be allowed the expreſſion. Athenæus, whoſe work, entitled, Deipnoſophiſta, has reached our times, lived under Commodus; but did not begin to write, as we may well judge from the liberty with which he ſpeaks of him, till after his death (52). But he muſt have been then very old; for he had known Pancrates, a famous poet in the reign of Adrian, ſince Caſaubon pretends, that Athenæus himſelf ſpeaks in that place, and not Callixenes, whom he had quoted before (53). Suidas, who ſuppoſes him to have flouriſhed under M. Aurelius, ſtyles him a grammarian, and tells us, that he was a native of Naucratis in Egypt (54). We have but an abridgment of his Deipnoſophiſta, made, according to Caſaubon, at Conſtantinople five or ſix hundred years ſince. This writer is highly eſteemed, and not undeſervedly, by ſuch as are fond of the Grecian antiquities. He publiſhed other works; but none of them have reached our times (55).

(51) Steph. p. 203. (52) Athen. l. xii. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 15. (53) Athen. l. xv. p. 677. (54) Suid. p. 111. (55) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 15.

ing left for any further doubt, he yielded to their entreaties, accepted the empire, and went to the camp of the prætorian guards with Lætus their captain, cauſing, in the mean time, a report to be ſpread in the city, that the emperor was dead of an apoplexy, and that Pertinax reigned in his room. The ſoldiers were greatly ſurpriſed to ſee him appear in the camp at that time of night; but Lætus aſſembling them, told them, that the emperor being dead of an apoplexy, he brought them a new prince, the moſt deſerving perſon in the ſenate, who, he was ſure, would be received with great joy, and acknowledged by all the armies of the empire, ſince he had every where given ſignal proofs of his courage, prudence, and other princely virtues. Pertinax himſelf ſpoke after Lætus, and in his ſpeech promiſed to each ſoldier three thouſand drachmas, which would have gained them over to his intereſt, had he not added very unſeaſonably, that he hoped by their means to reform ſeveral abuſes; for they concluded from thence, that he deſigned to reſtore the antient diſcipline, and deprive them of many privileges, which had been granted them by Commodus. This occaſioned an univerſal diſcontent, which, however, they diſſembled for the preſent; and a ſmall number having at firſt ſaluted him with the title of emperor, the reſt followed their example, took the oath of allegiance to him, and, after the uſual ſacrifices, accompanied him, crowned with laurel, to the ſenate; where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable by the new conſuls Quintus Sofius Falco and Caius Julius Erucius, and by all the magiſtrates and other ſenators, who had aſſembled upon the firſt news of the death of the tyrant. Among the reſt came Pompeianus, who, in congratulating him upon his new dignity, could not help bewailing at the ſame time the unhappy end of his brother-in-law Commodus; which Pertinax was ſo far from reſenting, that he preſſed him to accept the empire, and would have willingly yielded it to him, ſays Capitolinus, could Pompeianus have been prevailed upon to accept it. When the ſenators had taken their places, Pertinax, before they had conferred upon him the title of Auguſtus, earneſtly entreated them not to lay ſo heavy a burden on him in his old age, but to pitch upon ſome other more able to diſcharge ſuch an important truſt, and better qualified by his nobility and birth for ſo high a ſtation [t]. He was not ſatisfied with begging them in general to chuſe another,

Who is acknowledged by the prætorian guards, and by the ſenate.

[t] Herod. l. iv. p. 482—493. Dio, lxxiii. p. 830. Vit. Pert p. 55.

ther, but particularly named Acilius Glabrio, who had been twice conſul, and pretended to derive his pedigree from Anchiſes the father of Æneas, took him by the hand, and earneſtly entreated him to place himſelf upon the imperial throne; but Glabrio, and with him all the reſt, declaring, that they would acknowledge no other prince but Pertinax, he was in the end obliged to yield [m]. Capitolinus, though no ways favourable to Pertinax, cannot, however, help owning, that he was raiſed to the empire againſt his will, and that he had ever ſhewn an utter averſion to the ſovereignty, and to all the badges of the ſovereign power; in confirmation of which, he alledges a letter written by Pertinax himſelf, and recorded by Marius Maximus [n]. After the ſenate had ſaluted him with the title of Auguſtus, he returned them thanks in an oration ſuited to the occaſion, which was received with loud acclamations both of the ſenate and people, who were come in crouds to pay their homage to the new prince, whom they highly eſteemed and revered. The conſuls pronounced, according to the cuſtom, his panegyric: after which Falco, who was one of them, upon the emperor's commending Lætus, captain of the guards, and owning himſelf indebted to him for the empire, is ſaid by Capitolinus to have rebuked the new prince, with great freedom, for countenancing one who had been the chief miniſter of the crimes of Commodus. Pertinax heard him without the leaſt emotion, and only told him, when he had done ſpeaking, that he was young, and had not yet learnt to obey; that Lætus had put the orders of Commodus in execution againſt his own inclination, and ſhewn, as ſoon as he was at liberty to act as he pleaſed, what were his private ſentiments [o]. Pertinax received, with the title of Auguſtus, all the other titles peculiar to the imperial dignity, that of the father of his country not excepted, which is ſaid to have never before been given to any prince on the firſt day of his reign [p]. To the reſt he deſired that the title of the prince of the ſenate might be added, which had been laid aſide ever ſince the times of the republic [q]. At the ſame time, the ſenate decreed the title of Auguſta to his wife Flavia Titiana, and that of Cæſar to his ſon. But he could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept that honour for his wife, whoſe conduct he diſliked; and as to his ſon, he told the ſenate, that he ſhould enjoy the title they had decreed him, when he deſerved it. He would not even ſuffer his ſon,

He accepts the empire againſt his will.

Is honoured with all the titles peculiar to the imperial dignity.

[m] Herod. Dio, ibid. [n] Vita Pert. p. 59. [o] Idem. p. 55. [p] Idem. ibid. [q] Dio, l. lxxii. p. 832.

ſon, who was yet very young, to live with him in the palace; but ſent him and his ſiſter to the houſe of Flavius Sulpicianus, their grandfather by the mother, to be brought up there far from the gaieties and licentiouſneſs of the court. From the ſenate, the emperor went to offer the uſual ſacrifices in the capitol, viſited the other temples, and then, amidſt the loud acclamations of the people, repaired to the palace, where he gave a great entertainment, as it was the firſt day of the new year, to all the magiſtrates and the chief men of the ſenate, purſuant to an antient cuſtom, which had been neglected by Commodus [r]. Dion Caſſius ſaw that day, for the firſt time, Pompeianus in the ſenate; for, during the laſt three years of Commodus's reign, he had lived conſtantly in the country, alledging his old age and the weakneſs of his eyes for not aſſiſting at the deliberations of the ſenate. But theſe complaints, ſays Dion, ceaſed when Pertinax was raiſed to the empire, and returned as ſoon as he died [s].

The birth and education of Pertinax.

THUS Pertinax began his reign, to the great ſatisfaction of Rome, and of all the provinces of the empire, where he was proclaimed emperor with extraordinary demonſtrations of joy, no one doubting, but he would ſoon reſtore the ſtate to its former luſtre, and redreſs the abuſes and diſorders introduced by Commodus. He was born on the firſt of Auguſt of the year 126, the tenth of Adrian's reign, in a little village called Villa Martis, at a ſmall diſtance from Alba Pompeia, now Alba, in the duchy of Montferrat. He is commonly ſtyled, by hiſtorians and in moſt inſcriptions, Publius Helvius Pertinax. His father by name Helvius Succeſſus, had either been a ſlave himſelf, or was the ſon of an enfranchiſed ſlave [t], and followed the mean profeſſion of drying wood and making charcoal. We are told, that he gave the name of Pertinax to his ſon on account of his obſtinately adhering for ſome time to the ſame calling, which, however, he was afterwards perſuaded to abandon, and to keep a grammar-ſchool in Rome, his father having taken care to have him inſtructed, when very young, in the Greek and Latin languages. But that profeſſion not anſwering his expectation, he betook himſelf to a military life, and ſerved firſt in Syria, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, as a common ſoldier; but was ſoon raiſed to the rank of a centurion, by the intereſt of Lollius Avitus, or rather Lollius Gentianus, his father's patron. Having in that poſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf under Lucius Verus, M. Aurelius's collegue

His riſe and preferments.

[r] Herod. l. ii. p. 194. Vit. Pert. p. 55. [s] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 729. [t] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 831. Vit. Pert. p. 52. Vict. epit.

collegue in the empire, during the Parthian war, he was rewarded with the command of a cohort in Syria, and afterwards employed in Britain, or as ſome read Bithynia, Mœſia, Italy, and Germany, in which laſt place he commanded the Roman fleet. From Germany he was ſent into Dacia, and there, upon ſome falſe information, deprived of his employment, whatever it was, by M. Aurelius, notwithſtanding the eſteem he had for him. Capitolinus writes, that he was governor of Dacia, and charged with aſpiring at the empire. Be that as it will, M. Aurelius, being ſoon after convinced of his innocence, created him ſenator, honoured him with the enſigns of prætor, and gave him the command of the firſt legion, which he led againſt the Germans, who had made themſelves maſters of Rhœtia and Noricum. Theſe countries he recovered in one campaign, for which eminent ſervice M. Aurelius made him conſul. He was afterwards ſent into Syria againſt Avidius Caſſius; and upon his death recalled from thence to guard the banks of the Danube, and command the army in Illyricum. Having acquitted himſelf in that office to the general ſatisfaction both of the Romans and barbarians, he was afterwards preferred to the government of the two Mœſias, then to that of Dacia, and laſtly to the government of Syria, which he held to the reign of Commodus, when he returned to Rome; but did not continue long there, being ordered by Perennis, who then governed with an abſolute ſway, and ſuſpected all men of merit, to quit the city and retire to Liguria, his native country, where he lived, as it were, in exile, three whole years; during which he embelliſhed the place where he was born with a great number of fine buildings; but would not ſuffer his father's cottage, or rather ſhop, which ſtood in the midſt of them to be pulled down, or any-ways altered. After the downfal of Perennis, he was by Commodus ſent into Britain, to reſtore the antient diſcipline among the troops there, that were ready to revolt; which he compaſſed, not without expoſing himſelf to great dangers. He was recalled from thence at his own requeſt, and upon his return charged with the care of ſupplying the city with proviſions; then appointed proconſul of Africa, and laſtly governor of Rome, which employment he held when Commodus was killed [u]. The conſpirators judged him, as we have related above, of all the great men in Rome, the moſt worthy of the empire. And truly truly he was, according to Herodian, in every reſpect well qualified for ſo important a truſt, being a man of great wiſdom, extraordinary valour, and a blameleſs character [w]. Dion Caſſius cries him up on account of his mild temper, his goodneſs, and his application to buſineſs; and adds, that he was grave without being ſullen, mild without indolence, prudent without craft, exact without affectation, frugal without avarice, and great without pride or arrogance [x]. Aurelius Victor ſtyles him a perſon thoroughly acquainted with mankind, and one who admired and imitated the manners of the antient Romans [y]. The other Victor ſays, that he was an enemy to all pomp and outward appearance; that he received perſons of every rank and condition with great affability, and treated them as his equals. Julius Capitolinus is the only writer who gives him but an indifferent character, and charges him with avarice and want of ſincerity; but that writer lived an hundred years after Pertinax, whereas both Dion Caſſius and Herodian were perſonally acquainted with him. The emperor Julian charges him only with having been privy to the conſpiracy [z]; but even from that charge he is cleared by the above-mentioned writers.

[u] Vit. Pert. p. 54, 55. Herod. l. ii. p. 493. Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 183. Vict. epit.

His character.

As he found the exchequer quite drained, he ordered all the ſilver ſtatues of Commodus, which had been pulled down by a decree of the ſenate, to be melted and turned into money; and ſold by auction all his concubines and catamites, his arms, his horſes, his gold and ſilver plate, and all his rich moveables; among which particular mention is made of chariots ſo contrived as to ſhew the hour and meaſure the way [a]. By this means he raiſed money wherewithal to pay the prætorian guards what he had promiſed them, to diſcharge ſeveral debts contracted by Commodus, and to give a bounty to the people. At the ſame time, he reſtored to the lawful owners whatever had been unjuſtly taken from them by Commodus, recalled ſuch as had been baniſhed for the pretended crime of treaſon, put them in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe who had been any-ways acceſſory to their misfortunes. He publicly declared, that he would accept of no legacies or inheritances from ſuch as had children or lawful heirs of their own, ſaying, I had rather be poor, than wallow in riches acquired by diſhonourable methods. He aboliſhed all the taxes laid by Commodus on the rivers, ports, and high-ways; and would not ſuffer his name to be ſet up, according

His conduct and excellent adminiſtration.

[w] Herod. ibid. [x] Dio. p. 832. & in excerpt. Vall. p. 743.
[y] Aur. Vict. [z] Julian. Cæſ. p. 14. [a] Vit. Pert. p. 56.

according to cuſtom, in ſuch places as belonged to the emperors, ſaying, that they did not belong to him, but to the public [b]. Thus by the mildneſs of his government, by his equity and moderation, he gained the affections both of the ſenate and people; but by attempting to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of the prætorian guards, he diſobliged both them and their commander Lætus, who at firſt had been ſo zealous in his cauſe. The private men, not doubting, but he would reſtore the antient diſcipline among them, had, three days after his acceſſion to the empire, attempted to ſet up another, viz. Triarius Maternus Laſcivius, a ſenator of an illuſtrious family; but he, eſcaping from them while they were carrying him to the camp, fled to Pertinax, aſſured him of his loyalty, and then withdrew from Rome. This obliged the emperor to confirm to them all the privileges which had been granted them by Commodus. However, he kept them to their duty, which they, inured to the licentiouſneſs of the preceding reign, not being able to brook, attempted to raiſe Falco, the conſul, to the empire. Pertinax, who was then at Oſtia giving the neceſſary orders for ſupplying the city with proviſions, returned in great haſte to the palace; and repairing from thence to the ſenate, complained there of Falco, whom the ſenators were for condemning immediately as a traytor and a public enemy. But Pertinax, riſing up, cried out, that in his reign no ſenator, however guilty, ſhould be put to death; and publicly declared, that he forgave him. Falco, being thus diſmiſſed, retired to his eſtate, where he lived in ſafety. Some writers pretend, that he was utterly unacquainted with the deſign of the prætorian guards, who had agreed to make him emperor, without imparting their reſolution to him. However that be, the ſoldiers, highly exaſperated againſt Pertinax, who laboured to revive the antient diſcipline, and ſtirred up underhand by Lætus, who did not think his former ſervices ſufficiently rewarded, began openly to mutiny, and declare, that they would no longer obey the orders of Pertinax, nor acknowledge him for emperor. To exaſperate them ſtill more, Lætus cauſed ſeveral of them to be publicly executed as privy to the late conſpiracy, pretending, that he obeyed therein the orders of Pertinax, though the prince was quite unapprized of theſe proceedings. By this means the mutiny encreaſing daily, on the twenty-eighth of March a body of about three hundred of the mutineers, more bold than the reſt, leaving the

The prætorian guards diſſatisfied with him.

They revolt, and attempt to raiſe Falco to the empire.

Three hundred of them march to Rome, and enter the palace.

[b] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 832. Vit. Pert. p. 56—59. Herod. l. ii. p. 496.

the camp, and paſſing through the ſtreets of Rome with their drawn ſwords, went ſtrait to the palace, which they entered without oppoſition, the emperor's freed-men and officers either betaking themſelves to flight through fear, or treacherouſly opening all the gates to them. Pertinax, in the mean time, knew nothing of what paſſed, till his wife, in a great fright, brought him word, that the prætorian guards had revolted, and were already in the palace. Hereupon the emperor diſpatched Sulpicianus, his father-in-law, whom he had appointed governor of Rome, to appeaſe the tumult in the camp, and ordered Lætus to ſtop thoſe who had entered the palace. But Lætus, covering his face, that he might not be known, inſtead of obeying the emperor's orders, retired to his own houſe. As the mutineers ſtill advanced, ſome of the emperor's friends, who had remained with him, adviſed him to retire, and conceal himſelf, till the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, could come to his aſſiſtance. But Pertinax rejected their advice, ſaying, that to ſave his life by flight was a thing altogether unworthy of an emperor. He therefore reſolved to go forth and meet them in perſon, believing that, awed by his preſence, they would return to a ſenſe of their duty. Accordingly he appeared unexpectedly before them, and aſked them, without betraying the leaſt fear or concern, whether they, whoſe duty it was to defend the emperor's perſon, were come with an intent to betray and murder him? At the ſame time, he repreſented to them the heinouſneſs of their crime, the ignominy which it would caſt upon their memories, and the fatal conſequences of ſo black a treaſon, with ſuch ſpirit and energy, that many of them, moved by his words, began to ſheath their ſwords and retire. But a Tungrian, by name Tauſius, darting his javelin at the emperor's breaſt, and crying out, The ſoldiers ſend you this, the reſt fell on with great fury, and diſpatched him with many wounds. The emperor made no reſiſtance; but covering his head with his robe, and calling upon Jupiter the avenger, received their blows. Eclectus alone remained with him, and endeavoured to defend him; but after having killed two of the ſoldiers, was himſelf run through, and left dead by his maſter, for whoſe ſafety he had ſacrificed his life. The ſoldiers cut off his head, and carried it upon the point of a ſpear, as it were in triumph, to the camp, whither they retired with great precipitation, before the people could aſſemble, who, they knew, would not fail to revenge the death of a prince whom they ſo tenderly loved. And truly it was no ſooner known, that Pertinax had been murdered, than the enraged

The intrepidity of Pertinax.

His death.

populace

populace flocked together from all quarters of the city; and uttering dreadful menaces againſt the authors of his death, ran up and down the ſtreets in queſt of them. The ſenators were no leſs concerned for his death, than the people; the more, becauſe they were now convinced, that the ſoldiers would ſuffer none to reign but tyrants. However, as they had more to loſe than the common people, they did not offer to revenge his death, but either ſhut themſelves up in their houſes, or in thoſe of the ſoldiers of their acquaintance thinking themſelves there moſt ſafe [c]. Such was the unfortunate and moſt-lamented end of Publius Helvius Pertinax, after he had lived ſixty-ſix years, and ſeven months, and twenty-ſix or twenty-eight days; and reigned, according to Dion Caſſius, eighty-ſeven days, that is from the firſt of January to the twenty-eighth of March [d]. His body, together with his head, was interred with great pomp by Didius Julianus, his ſucceſſor, in the burying-place of his wife's family. The emperor Septimius Severus, with the title of emperor, took the name of Pertinax, which he knew would, above any thing elſe, recommend him to the army in Illyricum and to the Roman people. He puniſhed with great ſeverity all thoſe who had been acceſſory to his death, diſbanded the prætorian guards, honoured his memory with a moſt magnificent funeral, at which was carried the effigies of the deceaſed prince, pronounced himſelf his panegyric, and cauſed him to be ranked in the number of the gods, appointing the ſon chief prieſt to his father. The day of his acceſſion to the empire was yearly celebrated with the circenſian games; and his birth-day, for many years after, with other ſports [e]. He performed great things, ſays Herodian, during his ſhort reign, and would have reſtored the empire to its former luſtre, had he reigned longer [f].

He is univerſally lamented.

Honours paid to him after his death.

PERTINAX had ſent, as we have related above, Flavius Sulpicianus, his father-in-law, to appeaſe the tumult in the camp of the prætorian guards; but, in the mean time, the news of his death reaching the camp, and the three hundred ſoldiers arriving ſoon after with his head ſtuck on a ſpear, Sulpicianus was not aſhamed to apply to the murderers of his ſon-in-law for the empire, and to offer them money for it. But they, reſolved to make the moſt of it, cauſed it to be proclaimed on the ramparts of the camp, that the empire was expoſed

The empire expoſed to ſale.

[c] Dio, p. 834, 835. Herod. l. ii. p. 498. Vit. Pert. p. 58.
[d] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 834. [e] Dio, p. 840—842. Vict. epit. Vit. Pert. p. 59. Herod. p. 495. [f] Herod. ibid.

expoſed to ſale, and the beſt bidder ſhould have it. When news of this ſcandalous proclamation was firſt brought to Rome, Didius Julianus, the wealthieſt man in the city, was entertaining ſome of his friends at a banquet, who, in the midſt of their mirth and jollity, adviſed him, as he had more ready money, than any man in Rome, not to loſe the opportunity of making ſo valuable a purchaſe. Julianus, raviſhed with the dazzling proſpect of rule and empire, hearkened to their advice, roſe from table, and haſtened to the camp; where he repreſented to the ſoldiers, whom Sulpicianus was haranguing in his own behalf, that his competitor would not fail one day to revenge the death of his ſon-in-law; and gave them it under his hand, that he would reſtore all things to the condition they were in under Commodus. This pleaſed the licentious and diſſolute ſoldiery, who had committed in that prince's reign all ſorts of diſorders with impunity. However, they would hear what they both offered, and ſuffered them to bid upon one another, Sulpicianus in the camp, and Julianus at the gate; till the latter, riſing at once from five thouſand drachmas a man to ſix thouſand two hundred and fifty, to be immediately paid, ſilenced the other, was admitted into the camp, and proclaimed emperor, on condition, that he ſhould forgive his competitor, and never take the leaſt notice of his aſpiring at the empire [g]. Spartian relates his acceſſion to the empire in a different manner: according to him, the ſenate aſſembled upon the news of the emperor's death; but Julianus coming too late, and finding the doors ſhut, was accoſted by two tribunes, P. Florianus and Vectius Aper, who encouraged him to ſeize on the empire. Julianus, believing that Sulpicianus had been proclaimed emperor by the prætorian guards, anſwered, that the empire was already diſpoſed of; but they nevertheleſs carried him to the camp againſt his will, where, upon his warning them not to chuſe one who would undoubtedly revenge the death of Pertinax, and his promiſing to reſpect the memory of Commodus, he was proclaimed Auguſtus upon the above-mentioned condition *.

And purchaſed by Didius Julianus.

His extraction, preferment.

M. Didius Severus Julianus, thus raiſed to the empire, was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, come originally from Milan, in which city his grandfather was born. The emperor was the ſon of Petronius Didius Severus and Æmilia Clara, the grand-daughter of the celebrated civilian Salvius Julianus, who flouriſhed under Adrian, and compiled the perpetual edict. He was born on the twenty-ninth or thirtieth of of January of the year 133, the ſixteenth of Adrian's reign, and brought up by Domitia Lucilla, the mother of M. Aurelius. That prince, who had a particular affection for him, created him firſt quæſtor, then ædile, afterwards prætor; and when the time of his prætorſhip expired, gave him the command of the twenty-ſecond legion, quartered at that time in Germany. Not long after, he appointed him governor of Belgic Gaul, where, with the few forces he had under his command, he drove back the Chauci, who had made an irruption into the Roman territories; for which ſervice he was rewarded with the conſulſhip. After he had diſcharged that office, he was ſent into Illyricum, which country he defended with great valour againſt the neighbouring barbarians, and was on that account preferred to the government of Lower Germany; whence he was recalled to Rome, and charged with the care of ſupplying the city with proviſions. He narrowly eſcaped being put to death in the reign of Commodus, as privy to the pretended conſpiracy of Salvius Julianus, his uncle by the mother, and was for ſome time confined to the city of Milan. But Commodus, aſhamed of having cauſed ſo many other ſenators to be inhumanly maſſacred, not only diſcharged Julianus, but preferred him to the government of Bithynia, and afterwards to the conſulſhip, in which he had Pertinax for his collegue, whom he ſucceeded in the proconſulſhip of Africa. Hence Pertinax uſed to call him his collegue and his ſucceſſor, which was afterwards interpreted as a preſage of his being ſucceeded by Julianus in the empire [h].

[g] Dio, p. 835. Herod. p. 499. * Spart. in Jul. p. 60.

His character.

ALL authors agree, that Didius Julianus was poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth; but diſagree as to his character. Dion Caſſius, who had been named by Pertinax to the prætorſhip, charges him with avarice and gluttony, and paints him as one who was wholly intent upon amaſſing riches by any means, however ſhameful and unjuſt, and at the ſame time ſparing no expence to pleaſe and ſatisfy his palate. He ſpoke without judgment, ſays that writer, and uttered ſuch things in public as made him be pitied by all men of ſenſe. He was underhand a great encourager of diſturbances and troubles in the ſtate, and is ſuppoſed to have privately ſtirred up the ſoldiers againſt Pertinax, though his nephew had married that prince's daughter. Dion Caſſius adds, that he himſelf in pleading had often reproached him in public with his crying injuſtices [i].

Herodian

[h] Spart ibid. [i] Idem. vit. Jul. p. 61. [k] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 835.

Herodian writes, that he was generally deſpiſed on account of his diſorderly life, and that he thought of nothing but his pleaſures and diverſions [l]. Spartian, on the other hand tells us, that in all his governments and employments under M. Aurelius, he acquitted himſelf with great integrity; from which, however, he was ſaid to have ſwerved in the reign of Commodus. He adds, that he was ſo covetous, as not to allow himſelf ſometimes any other food but roots and greens; which is point-blank contrary to what we read in Dion Caſſius and Herodian, both which writers lived at that time in Rome. Spartian, however, owns, that Julianus was charged with eating and drinking to exceſs, with gaming, and uſing ſuch weapons as were peculiar to the gladiators, though in his youth he had never been addicted to any of theſe vices [m]. He ſhewed himſelf, according to that writer, kind, affable, and obliging to all men; and was ſo far from being elevated with his new dignity, that, on the contrary, he ſeemed rather to debaſe himſelf too much. As ſoon as he was declared emperor, he appointed, at the requeſt of the prætorian guards, Flavius Genialis and Tullius Criſpinus their commanders. At the ſame time, he accepted the name of Commodus, which they begged him to take upon him; and this name is ſtill to be ſeen on ſome of his medals [n]. After the uſual ceremonies, the prætorian guards accompanied him in battle-array to the ſenate. The people did not offer to oppoſe their march; but no acclamations were heard; ſome, who were at a diſtance, even uttered invectives againſt him. As for the ſenators, thoſe among them who were the moſt grieved to ſee him emperor, were the moſt forward in congratulating him with feigned joy on his acceſſion to the empire. Among theſe was, as he himſelf owns, Dion Caſſius the hiſtorian [o]. Julianus made a ſpeech in the ſenate, ſays Dion, who was preſent, worthy of himſelf, wherein he deſired them to confirm what the ſoldiers had done, as if he would hold the empire of them; but told them at the ſame time, that he was the fitteſt perſon they could chuſe. The ſenate immediately paſſed a decree declaring him emperor and his family patrician, and inveſting him with the tribunitial and proconſular power. At the ſame time, his wife Manlia Scantilla and his daughter Didia Clara were honoured with the title of Auguſtæ. From the ſenate he repaired to the palace, where he found the body

He takes the name of Commodus.

He is acknowledged by the ſenate.

[l] Herod. l. ii. p. 498, 262. [m] Julian. it. p. 63. [n] Birag. p. [o] Dio, ibid.

body of Pertinax, which he cauſed to be honourably interred, and paſſed the night in great agonies, reflecting on the fate of Pertinax, which he apprehended might in the end be his own. Thus Capitolinus; Dion Caſſius, who was an eye-witneſs of what paſſed at Rome under Julianus, tells us, that the new prince, entering the palace, and deſpiſing the frugal ſupper which had been prepared for Pertinax, (for that prince was murdered, and he declared emperor, on the ſame day) ordered a magnificent feaſt to be got ready, and paſſed the night in mirth and jollity, leaving the body of the deceaſed prince in the place where he had been murdered [q]. The next morning, the ſenate and the Roman knights coming to wait upon him, he received them in a moſt obliging manner, calling them, ſays Capitolinus, according to their age, his father, his brother, or his ſon. He went afterwards to the ſenate, and returned them thanks for having admitted him to adminiſter, in conjunction with them, the ſovereign power, and for the honours they had conferred on his wife and daughter. On this occaſion he received, according to Capitolinus, the title of the father of his country, which, however, does not appear on any of his medals. From the ſenate he went to the capitol to offer there the uſual ſacrifices, the ſenators, who attended him, ſtriving to ſhew great joy in the height of their grief. But the people, ſtrangers to all diſſimulation, openly loaded him with curſes and reproaches, hoping by that means to oblige him to reſign the power, which he had purchaſed of the ſoldiery in ſo ſhameful a manner. They even diſcharged ſhowers of ſtones at him, and wiſhed aloud, as he was ſacrificing in the capitol, that he might never obtain any favour of the gods. The emperor endeavoured to appeaſe them with great promiſes; but they anſwered boldly, that they ſcorned to receive any thing from ſuch an uſurper and parricide: inſomuch, that to diſperſe them, (for they ſtopt up the way) he was obliged to order the ſoldiers to fall upon thoſe who ſtood neareſt; which they did accordingly, and killed or wounded great numbers of them. This exaſperated the people to ſuch a degree, that they all took arms; and in the circus, where the emperor aſſiſted at the public games, renewed their curſes and imprecations both againſt him and the prætorian guards, imploring aloud the aſſiſtance of the other armies and generals, namely, of Peſcennius Niger, who at that time commanded a powerful army in Syria. All this Julianus bore with great patience, ſays Spartian; and, during his ſhort reign, gave many inſtan-

He receives them in a very obliging manner.

He is hated, and openly curſed, by the people.

[p] Vit. Pert. p. 61. [q] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 836.

ces of an extraordinary ſweet temper [r]. He appointed Re-
His government. pentinus his ſon-in-law, captain of the prætorian guards, in the room of Sulpicianus, father-in-law to the deceaſed emperor; and, to gratify the ſoldiery, re-eſtabliſhed many things, which had been appointed by Commodus and aboliſhed by Pertinax.

Among the many great captains, who commanded at this time the Roman armies in the different provinces of the empire, the moſt famed were Peſcennius Niger in Syria, Septimius Severus in Illyricum, and Clodius Albinus in Britain.
Clodius Albinus, his extraction and preferment. Clodius Albinus was a native of Adrumetum in Africa, but deſcended from the Poſthumian and Ceionian families, two of the moſt illuſtrious in Rome. His father Ceionius Poſthumus gave him the name of Albinus, becauſe at his birth he appeared whiter than new-born children uſually are, the Latin word albus importing white. He was brought up in Africa, where he ſtudied the Greek and Latin languages, in which he was well verſed. The antients cry up his knowledge and learning, and mention with great commendations a treatiſe which he compoſed on agriculture. But his martial genius did not allow him to purſue the peaceable profeſſion of letters. When he was yet very young, he was often heard to repeat, among the children of his age at ſchool, that verſe of Virgil,---Arma amens capio, nec ſat rationis in armis; --- eſpecially the firſt part of it, Arma amens capio, that is, I am for following the profeſſion of arms, right or wrong; I am for a military life at all events. He therefore entered into the ſervice very early, and, by the intereſt of Lollius Serenus, Bæbius Mætianus, and Ceionius Poſthumianus, men of rank and nearly related to him, was firſt raiſed to the command of a troop of Illyrian horſe, and ſoon after to that of the firſt and fourth legions. He commanded the army in Bithynia in the year 175, the fifteenth of the reign of M. Aurelius, and reſtrained them from joining, as they deſigned, Avidius Caſſius, for which ſervice he was rewarded with the conſulſhip. In the reign of Commodus he was appointed governor of Gaul, where he gained great advantages over the Friſians and other neighbouring nations. From Gaul he was tranſlated into Britain which government he held at this time. The emperor Commodus ſuſpecting that Septimius Severus, governor of Illyricum, and Nonius Murcus, who commanded an army in ſome other province, deſigned to revolt, in order to engage Albinus in his cauſe, wrote a letter to him, if Capitolinus is to be credited giving giving him leave to aſſume, if he ſaw occaſion, the title of Cæſar and all the badges of that dignity; which he prudently declined, fearing to be involved in the ruin of that tyrant, which he apprehended to be at hand (K). The ſame writer adds, that ſome time after, a falſe report of the death of Commodus being ſpread in Britain, Albinus, giving credit to it, encouraged his ſoldiers to aboliſh monarchy, and re-eſtabliſh the antient republican government; which gained him the affections of the ſenate, but provoked Commodus to ſuch a degree, that he immediately ſent Junius Severus to ſucceed him in the government of Britain; but he did not arrive there before the death of Commodus was publicly known in that province [t]. M. Aurelius had a particular value for him, and thought him, as appears from one of his letters to the captains of the guards quoted by Capitolinus [u] (L), well qualified, on [t] Idem ibid. p. 79. [u] Idem, p. 83.

[r] Vit. Pert. p. 61. [s] Vit. Alb. p. 79—84.

(K) This letter was conceived in the following terms: Beſides the other letters, which I have written to you concerning your ſucceſſor, and the affairs of the public, this you ſee, is a familiar letter, written with my own hand; in which I give you leave, whenever you ſhall ſee occaſion, to take upon you at the head of the army the name and quality of Cæſar. For I hear, that Septimius Severus and Nonius Murcus ſpeak ill of me to the army, in order to eſtrange from me the minds of the ſoldiery, and pave themſelves a way to the throne. I give you leave, when you think fit, to aſſume the name of Cæſar and to preſent the ſoldiers with a donative of three pieces of gold a man. I ſend you letters for my receivers, ſealed with the head of an Amazon, which you will deliver to them, when you have occaſion for the money; otherwiſe they will not ſupply you with it out of the treaſury. That you may not be without the badges of the dignity to which I raiſe you, I give you leave to wear a ſcarlet robe even in my preſence: the purple you ſhall have the firſt time I ſee you, but not enriched with gold, which my great grandfather Ælius Verus never wore, tho' adopted by Adrian (56).

(L) M. Aurelius wrote the following letter concerning him to the captains of the guards: I have entruſted Albinus, of the family of the Ceionii, with the command of two cohorts. He is, 'tis true, an African, but free from the vices of that country. He is the ſon-in-law of Plautillus, and, beſides, a man of great experience, of a grave and compoſed behaviour, and capable of maintaining the neceſſary diſcipline in a camp: at leaſt, I am ſure we need account of his ſeverity and gravity, for the command of an army. But his ſeverity ſeems to have bordered upon cruelty; for he is ſaid never to have pardoned the leaſt fault, but to have crucified even the centurions, when he found them any ways remiſs in their duty. He was unjuſt to his domeſtics, inſupportable to his wife, and to all ſurly and moroſe. He was very proper in his dreſs, but quite otherwiſe in his repaſts, minding nothing but plenty; for he had an extraordinary appetite, and is ſaid by Capitolinus to have often eat at breakfaſt five hundred figs, an hundred peaches, ten melons, twenty bunches of grapes, a hundred beccaficos, and four hundred oyſters [w]. Sometimes he abſtained altogether from wine, and ſometimes drank to exceſs even in the time of war. He was far from being chaſte, but abhorred and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity all ſorts of unnatural luſt. As he was, notwithſtanding his many vices, a man of great courage and ſkill in military affairs, he was commonly called a ſecond Catiline. The harangue he made to his troops in Britain againſt monarchy gained him the affections of the ſenate to ſuch a degree, that no prince, ſays his hiſtorian, was ever loved by them ſo much as he [x].

(56) Vit. Albin. p. 47.

His character.

Caius Pescennius Niger Justus, as he is ſtyled on ſome medals [y], was deſcended of an equeſtrian family and born at Aquinum. He had but a ſmall eſtate, and little learning; but nevertheleſs raiſed himſelf from the degree of a centurion to the firſt military employments in the empire. He had ſome command in Gaul, where he contracted a great friendſhip need not apprehend any thing from him. I have doubled his ſalary, and deſire you to encourage him, aſſuring him, that his ſervices ſhall not remain unrewarded (57). The ſame prince wrote another letter concerning him, ſoon after the rebellion of Avidius Caſſius, in which he expreſſes himſelf thus: The fidelity of Albinus deſerves the higheſt encomiums; for when the forces in Bithynia were ready to revolt and join Caſſius, he ſpared no pains to maintain them in their duty and defeat their evil deſigns. I therefore think him worthy of the conſulſhip, and accordingly deſign to ſubſtitute him in the room of Caſſius Papirius, who is dangerouſly ill, and, as I am informed, paſt recovery. But of this take no notice till he is dead, leſt it ſhould come to the ears either of Papirius himſelf, or his friends, which would give me great concern (58).

Peſcennius Niger his extraction, preferments and character.

[w] Idem, p. 83. [x] Idem, p. 83. [y] Byrag. p. 264.

(57) Idem ibid. (58) Idem. p. 48.

ſhip with Septimius Severus, at that time governor of the country of Lions, who recommended him to the emperor Commodus, as an excellent ſoldier and experienced commander. He was afterwards made conſul, at the requeſt of the troops under his command [z]. Herodian calls him a gallant ſoldier, an excellent officer, an experienced general, an illuſtrious conſul, and an unfortunate emperor [a]. He kept the ſoldiers to their duty, and would not ſuffer them to exact any thing from the people, nor the officers from the ſoldiers, upon any account whatſoever. He cauſed two tribunes to be ſtoned for having deducted a very inconſiderable ſum from the pay of the men under their command, and condemned ten ſoldiers to be beheaded for ſtealing a fowl; but the whole army interceding in their behalf, he thought it adviſeable to ſpare their lives, and only oblige them to pay to the countryman each the price of ten fowls. He would not allow his ſoldiers, while they were in the field, to drink wine, nor to uſe plate, or have any gold or ſilver about them, when they went to battle, that the enemy might not, in caſe of any misfortune, ſet themſelves off with their ſpoils. He ſuffered no bakers to follow the army, obliging the ſoldiers to content themſelves with biſket. Some troops, that were in garriſon on the frontiers of Egypt, having one day begged leave to drink wine, he returned them no other anſwer, than that they were but a ſmall diſtance from the Nile. He required nothing of the ſoldiers, but what he practiſed himſelf. In his garb and dreſs he little varied from a common ſoldier, and his diet was the ſame with that of the meaneſt in the army. He always led the march on foot, with his head uncovered in all ſeaſons and climates. He obliged even his own domeſtics to carry burdens on their backs, that they might not ſeem to walk at their eaſe, while the ſoldiers were loaded with their arms and baggage. He had conſtantly before his eyes Marius, Hannibal, and other famed commanders of antiquity; and when, upon his being ſaluted emperor, the perſon, who, according to cuſtom, was appointed to pronounce his panegyric, began to commend him, he immediately interrupted the orator, and deſired him to ſay ſomething in praiſe of Marius, of Hannibal, or of ſome other renowned commander, who was dead. "Tell us, ſaid he, "what they have done worthy of imitation; for to praiſe "the living is an uſeleſs taſk, eſpecially to praiſe an emperor, "who can puniſh, reward, proſcribe, and condemn: as for [z] Spart. in Nigr. p. 75. [a] Herod. l. iii. p. 501.

" me, I only deſire to pleaſe while I live; when I am dead, " then praiſe me, if I deſerve it." If he had prevailed, no one doubted but he would have reſtored the empire to its former luſtre, without uſing that cruelty for which Severus is blamed [b]. For though he was naturally ſevere, ſays Herodian [c], yet he governed with great mildneſs, and was always ready to contribute to the diverſions of the people; which gained him the affections of the Syrians, eſpecially of the Antiochians, who delighted in nothing but ſhews and ſpectacles. Spartian commends him on account of his chaſtity, which the Gauls, ſays that writer, admired in him above all his other virtues [d]. On the other hand, Victor the younger ſtyles him a man abandoned to all manner of lewdneſs. Dion Caſſius ſpeaks of him as a perſon no-ways remarkable either for his good or bad qualities [e]. However, it is certain, that he was univerſally eſteemed and beloved by the people of Rome, who all wiſhed to ſee him emperor [f].

Septimius Severus. his character.

SEVERUS was a perſon endowed with extraordinary talents, and in every reſpect infinitely ſuperior both to Albinus and Niger. He was generally eſteemed, and not undeſervedly, the moſt active, vigilant, laborious, and enterpriſing man in the whole empire; inured to labour, indefatigable in every duty of war, equal to the greateſt commanders of antient times, a great maſter of civil affairs, prompt in foreſeeing events, dextrous at concerting ſchemes, a conſtant friend, a dangerous enemy, and equally violent in his love and hatred. He was a great diſſembler, full of deceit, and ever ready to ſacrifice his reputation, and every thing elſe, to his intereſt and ambition [g]. He was naturally inclined to cruelty and avarice, but more to cruelty; for we find ſome inſtances of his generoſity, but none of his humanity; nay, he is ſaid never to have pardoned a fault, or performed a good-natured action [h]. He was an enemy to all pomp and ſhew, frugal in his diet, contenting himſelf for the moſt part with roots and greens, but ſometimes, though ſeldom, drinking to exceſs. In the field, his diet was the ſame with that of the common ſoldiers; he ſhared with them all their labours, and encouraged them more by his example, than by words, to bear with patience the toils of war, which notwithſtanding his his ſeverity, gained him the affections of the ſoldiery [i]. Severus was born at Leptis, a city of Libya Tripolitana, but his anceſtors had been Roman knights, and afterwards admitted into the ſenate; for he was nephew by the father to two conſuls, M. Agrippa and Septimius Severus; the latter was twice conſul. His father, M. Septimius Geta, had another ſon, named likewiſe Geta, and a daughter; but neither her name, nor that of her ſon, has been tranſmitted to us [k]. Severus was born on the eleventh of April in the year 145, the eighth of the reign of Antoninus Pius. He ſtudied firſt in Africa, and afterwards at Rome, the Greek and Latin tongues; declaimed in public, when only eight years old; applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy and eloquence; and excelled, according to Spartian, Aurelius Victor, and Eutropius, in each branch of polite literature. Dion, on the contrary, writes, that he had more inclination than ability to learn the liberal arts [l]; and Spartian owns, that he ſpoke to the end of his life the Latin tongue with the African accent [m]. He was inſtructed in the knowledge of the law, together with Papinianus, by Q. Cervidius Scævola, who publiſhed various books of juriſprudence, whereof ſome fragments are ſtill preſerved in the Pandects [n]. He ſeems to have had likewiſe ſome knowledge of phyſic [o], and is ſaid to have been thoroughly acquainted with judicial aſtrology, a ſcience to which the Africans were generally addicted [p]. In his youth he was accuſed of adultery, but acquitted by Didius Julianus, at that time proconſul of Africa. Afterwards he came to Rome, where, after he had pleaded for ſome time with little ſucceſs at the bar, he was, by the intereſt of his uncle Septimius Severus, admitted by the emperor M. Aurelius into the ſenate, and appointed governor of the iſland of Sardinia; whence he was ſent to command the troops in Africa in quality of lieutenant to the proconſul. Upon his return from Africa, he was created prætor; and after his prætorſhip preferred to the command of the fourth legion, then quartered in Syria. On his journey into that province, he viſited the city of Athens, and received ſome affront there, for which he deprived the inhabitants, when emperor, of many privileges granted

[b] Vit. Nigr. p. 75—77. [c] Herod l. ii. p. 501. & l. iii. p. 518. [d] Vit. Nigr. p. 76. [e] Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 842. [f] Herod. ibid. Vit. Nigr. p. 74. [g] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 837. & l. lxxvi. p. 869. Herod. l. ii. p. 503. Vict. epit. Tertull. apol. c. 4. [h] Herod. l. iii. p. 527.

His extraction.

Education,

And employments.

[i] Idem, l. ii. p. 507. [k] Spart. vit. Sev. p. 64. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 742. Grut. p. 268. [l] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 741. [m] Vit. Sev. p. 71. [n] Vit. Caracall. cum not. Caſaub. p. 132. & Jonſ. l. iii. c. 12. [o] Galen. ther. t. ii. p. 457, 458. [p] Get. vit. p. 90. Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 866.

granted them by his predeceſſors. Next, he was raiſed to the government of Gallia Lugdunenſis, or the country of Lions, where, by his affability and obliging behaviour, he gained the affections of all. From Gaul he was removed to Pannonia, which province he governed with proconſular authority, as he did afterwards that of Sicily. Upon his return to Rome, he was accuſed of having conſulted the aſtrologers about his attaining the empire; but, as Commodus began then to be univerſally hated, he was acquitted, and his accuſer crucified. He was raiſed ſoon after to the conſulſhip, and then appointed commander of all the troops employed in Illyricum to defend the banks of the Danube [q]. He married to his firſt wife one Martia; and upon her death Julia, a native of Emeſa, in Syria, for no other reaſon, but becauſe the aſtrologers had told her, that ſhe was to marry a ſovereign. She is ſtyled in ſeveral inſcriptions Julia Domina Auguſta, the mother of the armies, of the ſenate, of her country, &c. By her Severus had Baſſianus, commonly known by the name of Caracalla, born the fourth of April 188, Geta, born in Milan, the twenty-ſeventh of May 189, and two daughters, who were married after their father's acceſſion to the empire. Julia diſhonoured with her lewdneſs her huſband and family, and had the mortification to hear herſelf publicly reproached by a Caledonian lady with the ſame vices which ſhe pretended to condemn in her [r]. She was likewiſe accuſed of conſpiring againſt her huſband, and charged with ſeveral other crimes by Plautianus, who did all that lay in his power to diſcredit her with the emperor; inſomuch that, to retrieve her reputation, ſhe betook herſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy, and kept continually about her a great number of ſophiſts, philoſophers, mathematicians, geographers, and perſons eminent in the various branches of learning; which has rendered her name famous in hiſtory [t]. Julia had a ſiſter named Mæſa, who was married to one Julius, who had by her two daughters, Soœmis and Mamea, the former the mother of the emperor Heliogabalus, and the latter of Alexander, who ſucceeded him.

His wife Julia.

To reſume now the thread of our hiſtory, and return to Didius Julianus: while he was ſtriving to gain the affections of the Roman people by the mildneſs of his government, news

[q] Vit. Sev. p. 64, 65. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 840. Herod. l. ii. p. 503. [r] Spon. p. 270. Spanh. l. vi p. 628. [s] Aur. Vict. Sever. vit. p 71. Dio, lxxvi. p. 869. [t] Philoſ. vit. Apoll. Tyran. l. i. c. 3. & ſoph. lvi. p. 617.

news was brought him, that Peſcennius Niger had revolted in Syria, and was acknowledged emperor by all the eaſtern nations and the troops under his command. Soon after he received the like tidings from Illyricum, where Severus had been ſaluted, by the army which he commanded there, with the title of Auguſtus. The armies in Gaul likewiſe ſwore allegiance to him, as ſoon as they heard that he had taken upon him the title of emperor. Their example was followed by all the armies, provinces, and cities in Europe, except the city of Byzantium; ſo that Severus having ſecured the provinces behind him, and left ſome troops to guard the banks of the Danube, began his march to Rome. As he was well appriſed, that Albinus, governor of Britain, was in a condition to thwart his deſigns, he wrote an obliging letter to him, wherein he declared his intention of adopting him, and gave him the title of Cæſar, which Albinus aſſumed at the head of his army, with all the badges of his new dignity, beſtowing on that occaſion great encomiums on Severus. As for Niger, Severus did not ſo much as attempt to gain, or rather deceive, him, well knowing, that he would not hearken to any propoſals whatſoever [u]. Julianus, in the mean time, repairing to the ſenate, cauſed Severus to be declared an enemy to his country, and likewiſe his ſoldiers, if they did not abandon him within a limited time. Deputies were even ſent by the ſenate to perſuade the ſoldiers to quit the party of Severus, and join Julianus. Among theſe were Veſpronius Candidus, a conſular of great authority, Valerius Catulinus, who was named to take upon him the command of the troops which Severus had with him, and one Aquilius, a centurion, the chief miniſter of the cruelties of Commodus, with orders to diſpatch Severus as ſoon as his troops had deſerted him. But the deputies, inſtead of exhorting the troops to abandon Severus, joined him themſelves, and encouraged the ſoldiers to purſue their march, and revenge the death of Pertinax. Hereupon Julianus, having firſt paid the prætorian guards the largeſs he had promiſed them, ordered them to their arms, and at the ſame time ſent for the marines, who were on board the fleet at Miſenum, and with the prætorian guards made up a conſiderable army. But as they had been long inured to idleneſs, they ſcarce knew how to make uſe of their arms, and ſhewed great backwardneſs to make head againſt the enemy, who were advancing with long marches, being received every where with loud acclamations, and ſupplied with plenty of proviſions, Peſcennius Niger declared emperor in the eaſt, and Severus in Illyricum.

Severus declared a public enemy.

In his march to Rome he is every where received with loud acclamations.

[u] Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 837. Herod. l. ii. p. 513.

proviſions, upon their giving out, that they were going to revenge the death of Pertinax, a prince univerſally beloved. Julianus, finding he could not depend upon his troops, cauſed the palace to be fortified, as if he could have maintained himſelf there after loſing all the reſt. At the ſame time, he ordered Marcia and Lætus, the chief authors of the death of Commodus, to be murdered, not doubting but they favoured Severus; diſpatched a great number of aſſaſſins, to try if he could by any means murder Severus, with promiſes of immenſe rewards, if they ſucceeded in the attempt; and cauſed an incredible number of children to be inhumanly butchered, in order to make uſe of their blood in the abominable myſteries of magic [w]. While Julianus was thus loſing his time in uſeleſs preparations, Severus arriving at Ravenna, made himſelf maſter of that city and the fleet riding there; which ſo terrified Julianus, that, diſtruſting his troops, he ordered the ſenate to aſſemble on the twenty-ninth of May, when one of his miniſters deſired them in his name to ſend out the veſtals to meet the enemy, and entreat them to retire; which propoſal being rejected as no leſs ridiculous than ineffectual, Julianus, as ſome authors write, was ſo provoked, that he aſſembled his troops, with a deſign to put all the ſenators to the ſword, if they did not comply with his requeſt. But he ſoon changed his mind, and went to the ſenate in perſon, with a propoſal of a quite different nature, which was, that they would paſs a decree, declaring Severus his partner in the empire. The decree paſſed without oppoſition, and was immediately ſent to Severus, who not only rejected the offered aſſociation, but at the inſtigation of Julius Lætus, ordered Tullius Criſpinus, captain of the prætorian guards, who had brought the decree, to be cut in pieces, a report being ſpread, that Criſpinus had private orders to diſpatch him. Hereupon Julianus, being quite at a loſs what to do, and the ſenate declining to aſſiſt him with their advice, ordered the gladiators at Capua to take arms, under the command of Lollianus Titianus, and wrote an obliging letter to Pompeianus, the ſon-in-law of M. Aurelius, who then led a retired life at Tarracina, offering to take him, as he was an excellent commander, for his partner in the empire. But Pompeianus wiſely declined the offer, pleading his old age and the weakneſs of his ſight; which, however, would have ſerved him well, ſays Dion Caſſius, had he ſeen any effectual means of relieving his diſtreſſed Julianus cauſes Severus to be declared his partner in the empire.

[w] Dio, p. 838. Vit. Jul. p. 62.

diſtreſſed country [x]. In the mean time, the troops ſent by Julianus into Umbria to guard the paſſes of the Apennine mountains, declared for Severus; and the prætorian guards themſelves, abandoning the emperor whom they ſet up, agreed not to oppoſe Severus, upon his promiſing them impunity, provided they delivered up to him thoſe who had murdered Pertinax [y]. Julianus, ſeeing himſelf thus deſerted by his troops, ſhut himſelf up in the palace, with Genialis, one of the captains of the guards, and Repentinus his ſon-in-law. The guards, in the mean time, having ſeized ſuch of their comrades as had been any ways concerned in the death of Pertinax, acquainted therewith Silius Meſſala, who had been ſubſtituted either to Falco or Erucius, the ordinary conſuls of this year 193. Meſſala immediately aſſembled the ſenate, when a decree paſſed, depriving Julianus of the empire, ſentencing him to death, declaring Severus emperor, and appointing divine honours to Pertinax. This decree was carried to Severus by ſome of the chief men in the ſenate, who entreated him, in the name of the reſt, to haſten his march to Rome. At the ſame time, the ſenate ſent a band of ſoldiers to the palace, with orders to put Julianus to death; whom they found drowned in tears, and ready to reſign the empire, upon condition that they ſpared his life. Some authors write, that at the ſight of the armed band, he only ſaid, What crime have I committed? whoſe life have I taken away [z]? Others tell us that he implored the faith of Cæſar, giving that title to Severus [a]. Be that as it will, his head was ſtruck off by a common ſoldier, and his body, according to Aurelius Victor, expoſed to public view. Such was the end of Didius Julianus, after he had lived ſixty years, four months, and as many days, and reigned two months and ſix days. Severus, upon his arrival at Rome, delivered his body to his wife and daughter, by whom it was buried in the tomb of his anceſtors on the Via Lavicana, about five miles from Rome [b].

Julianus abandoned by all.

Severus declared emperor and Julianus degraded by the ſenate, and put to death.

SEVERUS received the news of his competitor's death, when he was yet ſome days journey from Rome. However, he purſued his march with his troops in battle-array, and encamped every night, as if he had been in an enemy's country; which filled the city with terror and diſmay. The ſenate deputed an hundred perſons of great diſtinction out of their body to congratulate him upon the death of his rival and his acceſſion

An hundred ſenators ſent to meet Severus.

[x] Dio, in excerpt. Val p. 729. Vit. Jul. p. 63. [y] Dio, p. 838. Herod. p. 510. [z] Dio, ibid. [a] Jul. vit. p. 63. [b] Dio, p. 863 Vit Jul. p. 66.

ſion to the empire. Severus received them in his armour, at the head of his troops, and cauſed them to be ſearched, as if he ſuſpected their fidelity; but afterwards entertained them in a very familiar and friendly manner, preſented them with ſeven hundred pieces of gold, and gave them liberty either to depart immediately, or to ſtay and return to Rome with him. He appointed Flavius Juvenalis captain of the guards, with Veturius Macrinus, whom he had named before to that employment. At the ſame time, he diſpatched an expreſs to Plautianus, enjoining him to ſeize the children of Peſcennius Niger, and of all the officers who ſerved under him. He had the good luck to intercept ſeveral letters and edicts ſent by Niger to the ſenate and people of Rome, which he would not ſuffer to be read to them. When he approached Rome, he cauſed all thoſe to be executed, who had any hand in the death of Pertinax; and ſent orders to the other ſoldiers of the guards to meet him without their arms, and in the attire which they were when they attended the emperor in the great ſolemnities. His orders were obeyed, the guards imagining that they were to attend in that dreſs the emperor's entry. When they arrived in the camp, Severus ſent them word to wait in a body till he was at leiſure to receive and harangue them; and in the mean time gave private orders to his own troops to ſurround them at a diſtance, and ſhut them up on all ſides, while they were intent upon hearing his harangue. He then aſcended the tribunal; and betraying great anger and reſentment in his countenance, reproached them in moſt bitter terms for murdering their prince, and ſuch a prince as Pertinax; for ſelling by auction, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, the empire; and even for abandoning, like ſo many cowards and traitors, Julianus, whom they themſelves had choſen. He told them, that he could inflict no puniſhment upon them anſwerable to the enormity of their crimes; that nevertheleſs he granted them their lives, but commanded them forthwith to quit their horſes and all their military badges, and retire without delay an hundred miles from Rome, ſolemnly declaring, that whoever among them ſhould be found within that diſtance of the city, ſhould irremiſſibly be put to death, and publicly executed. They were thunder-ſtruck with this order; but forced to comply with it, being ſurrounded on all ſides by the armed troops of Severus, who obliged them to quit their horſes, and ſtripped them even of their tunics. Thus ſtripped and degraded,

He diſbands all the prætorian guards.

[c] Vit. Sever. p. 66. & Nigr. p. 75. Herodian. l. iii. p. 526.

graded, they retired with that ſhame and confuſion, which were juſtly owing to the heinouſneſs of their crimes [d]. Dion Caſſius tells us, that one of their horſes followed his old maſter, throwing down and treading under foot all thoſe who endeavoured to ſtop him; inſomuch that the unhappy ſoldier, finding his horſe would not, by any means, leave him, killed him, and running himſelf through with the ſame ſword, fell dead by him. The ſame hiſtorian adds, that the faithful horſe betrayed a kind of joy in dying by his maſter's hand [e]. Severus entered Rome, attended by all his troops under arms, and with the ſtandards of the prætorian guards reverſed. He came to the gate on horſe-back and in his military habit; but there took his gown, and made his entry on foot, accompanied by the ſenators in their robes, with crowns of laurel on their heads; which the people likewiſe wore, who, on this occaſion were all clad in white. The ſtreets through which he paſſed, were ſtrewed with flowers, the houſes adorned, and covered with rich tapeſtry, and the whole city perfumed with ſweet odours. Severus, having viſited the capitol, and the uſual temples, retired to the palace; but the ſoldiers, taking up their quarters in the temples, porticos, and other public buildings, ſpread themſelves all over the city, and committed every-where great diſorders, threatening to plunder the citizens houſes, if they were not plentifully ſupplied with proviſions, for which they would allow nothing. This alarmed the people, and inſpired them with a great averſion to the new emperor [f]. The next morning, Severus went to the ſenate, attended by all his troops under arms; but he had ſcarce begun to ſpeak, when he was interrupted all on a ſudden by dreadful cries of the ſoldiers without, demanding an immenſe ſum of the ſenate, which had been formerly given to the troops that had attended Auguſtus to Rome, and was conſequently, ſaid they, due to them. The ſenate, altogether unappriſed of the cauſe of that uproar, was, as we may well imagine, ſtruck with horror and diſmay. The emperor himſelf betrayed ſome fear; but however, ſtarting up, he went out to them; but could not appeaſe the mutinous multitude, without promiſing them part of what they demanded; that is two hundred and fifty drachmas a man, inſtead of two thouſand five hundred. Then returning to the ſenate, he excuſed himſelf for having aſſumed the title of emperor without their conſent, pretending, that he had done it

His entry into Rome.

The emperor's ſpeech to the ſenate.

The ſoldiers mutiny.

[d] Herod. p. 510. Dio, p. 839. [e] Dio, ibid. [f] Herod. p. 512.

it purely to revenge the death of Pertinax, and deliver them from the tyranny of Julianus. He promiſed to govern with great moderation, and tread in the footſteps of M. Aurelius and Pertinax, adding a ſolemn oath, by which he bound himſelf to the obſervance of all the laws; and particularly ſwore, that no ſenator ſhould, for any crime whatſoever, be put to death in his reign, who had not been firſt tried and condemned by the ſenate; nay, he obliged the ſenate to paſs a decree, declaring ſuch emperors as acted otherwiſe, thoſe who obeyed them therein, and their children, public enemies. This gave great ſatisfaction to the generality of the ſenators; but men of diſcernment, and ſuch as were better acquainted with his dark and reſerved temper, with his falſhood and diſſimulation, gave no credit to his fair promiſes; but, on the contrary, looked upon him as a ſecond Tiberius [g]. However, they unanimouſly conferred upon him all the titles peculiar to the imperial dignity, inveſted him with the tribunitial and proconſular powers, created him high pontiff, &c. Severus acquainted the ſenate with his having beſtowed on Albinus the title of Cæſar, begged they would confirm it to him, cauſed ſeveral medals to be ſtruck with his name, ſtatues to be erected to him, &c. He diſtributed large ſums among the ſoldiery and people, which are taken notice of on ſeveral medals of this year [h]; but what chiefly gained him the hearts of the people, was his conſecrating and inrolling, with extraordinary pomp and ſolemnity, the emperor Pertinax in the number of the gods. This apotheoſis, perhaps the moſt magnificent that had ever been ſeen in Rome, is deſcribed at length by Dion Caſſius [i]. Before he left Rome to march againſt Niger, he cauſed the ſenate to proſcribe all the friends and adherents of Julianus; executed without mercy ſuch of them as were diſcovered, and ſeized, and even attempted, out of hatred to that prince, to aboliſh the decrees of the celebrated civilian Salvius Julianus, his great grandfather. In the next place, he choſe new guards in the room of thoſe whom he had caſhiered, and four times as many, which filled Rome with ſoldiers, and proved very chargeable to the ſtate; for their pay much exceeded that of the other troops. Beſides, the natives only of certain countries, viz. of Spain, Macedon, Noricum, and above all of Italy, had been hitherto admitted to ſerve in the guards; but Severus, without any regard to their countries, choſe the moſt reſolute

The title of Cæſar confirmed to Albinus.

The friends of Julianus proſcribed.

New prætorian guards choſen.

[g] Vit. Sever. p. 66. Herod. p. 512. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 640.
[h] Birag. p. 268. [i] Dio, p. 840.

lute and brave men in his army, and appointed, that, for the future, they ſhould always be taken from among the other troops; by which means the guards, who of late had ſerved only for ſhew, became the flower of the Roman forces; and the hopes of a leſs toilſome, and more honourable and advantageous warfare encouraged the reſt to diſcharge their duty with more punctuality and exactneſs; but on the other hand, the Italian youth, (for the guards had hitherto been moſtly natives of Italy) having no longer that reſource, turned either robbers or gladiators: hence this regulation was no-ways pleaſing, either to the Romans, or to the other inhabitants of Italy [k]. About the ſame time, the emperor gave his two daughters in marriage to Probus and Aetius, and honoured both his ſons-in-law with the conſular dignity. To the former he offered the government of Rome; but he declining that employment, it was conferred upon Domitius Dexter. The emperor, having thus ſettled affairs in Rome, and ſupplied the city with great plenty of corn, ſet out in the beginning of July on his march into the eaſt againſt Niger, whom he had never once named during his ſtay at Rome. His troops mutinied the firſt day at a place called Saxa Rubra, about nine miles from Rome; but the mutiny was ſoon quelled. However, he encamped there the firſt night, when his brother Geta came to wait upon him, expecting ſome great preferment; but Severus ordered him to return to his government, and ſhewed no inclination to employ him. Before he decamped, the children of Peſcennius Niger were brought to him, whom he received and entertained with the ſame kindneſs as if they had been his own. He purſued his march with all poſſible expedition, having diſpatched an expreſs to the commander of the troops in Illyricum, enjoining him to haſten into Thrace, and wait for him there. He ordered Heraclius to attempt the recovery of Bithynia, which province had declared for Niger; and wrote to Albinus in Britain, to hold himſelf ready to march upon the firſt notice [l].

Severus ſets out againſt Niger.

In the mean time, Niger, hearing that Severus had been acknowledged emperor by the ſenate and people of Rome, and was already advancing by long marches againſt him, wrote to the governors of the provinces, enjoining them to guard

Niger prepares for war.

[k] Herod. p. 512. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 840. & in excerpt. Val. p. 733. [l] Vit. Sever. p. 67.

guard the narrow paſſes, eſpecially that of mount Taurus between Cappadocia and Cilicia; raiſed new forces in Antioch and all the other cities of Syria, and ſent deputies to demand ſuccours of the neighbouring princes. He went in perſon to view the fortifications of Byzantium, in which city he left a numerous garriſon, looking upon it as a place of the utmoſt importance. From Byzantium he advanced to Perinthus, called afterwards Heraclea, where, in a ſkirmiſh between his men and thoſe of Severus, whoſe party the city of Perinthus had embraced, a conſiderable number of the latter were ſlain, and among them ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction. Hereupon the ſenate, to curry favour with Severus, declared Niger a public enemy, and likewiſe Æmilianus, then proconſul of Aſia, a perſon of extraordinary talents, long experience, and generally eſteemed the greateſt ſtateſman of his age [m]. Spartian writes, that Niger, improving the advantage he had gained at Perinthus, made himſelf maſter of all Greece, Macedon, and Thrace, and thereupon offered to take Severus for his partner in the empire; which propoſal he rejected with contempt and deriſion [n]. The following year 194, Severus and Albinus were both conſuls the ſecond time, and Niger in all likelihood took upon him the ſame dignity; for on ſome medals he is ſtyled conſul [o]. We know nothing of what paſſed in the war between Niger and Severus, till the arrival of the latter before the city of Byzantium, which he beſieged this year; but meeting with a vigorous reſiſtance from the numerous garriſon, he left ſome of his troops before the place, and ordered the reſt to croſs the ſea and march towards Cyzicus, in the neighbourhood of which city they were met by Æmilianus at the head of a numerous army. Hereupon a battle enſued, in which much blood was ſhed on both ſides; but Æmilianus was in the end defeated, and obliged to ſhelter himſelf firſt in Cyzicus, and afterwards in another city not named in hiſtory, where he was taken, and put to death by the generals of Severus; for the emperor himſelf was not it ſeems, preſent at the battle of Cyzicus [p]. Not long after, another battle was fought between Nicea and Cius, two cities of Bithynia, which proved far more bloody than the former, Niger commanding his own troops in perſon, and Candidus, an officer of great experience, thoſe of Severus. Both armies fought with a fu-

Æmilianus Niger's general, defeated and ſlain.

[m] Herod. l. ii. p. 512, 513. Nig. vit. p. 76. Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 734. [n] Vit. Nigr. p. 67. [o] Birag. 264. [p] Herod. p. 516. Dio, p. 842. Vit. Sev. p. 6

ry hardly to be expreſſed, as appears from Dion Caſſius's account of the engagement; but Niger, in ſpite of his utmoſt efforts, was at laſt obliged to ſave himſelf by flight beyond the ſtreights of mount Taurus; which he cauſed to be fortified and well guarded [s]. After this victory, Severus wrote to Niger, offering to let him live in ſafety, provided he laid down his arms and diſbanded his troops; which Niger ſeemed inclined to do; but was diverted from it by Aurelianus, whoſe daughters were betrothed to his ſons. He therefore retired to Antioch, in order to raiſe there troops and money. In the mean time, the cities of Laodicea and Tyre declaring for Severus, Niger detached againſt them a body of Moors, who pillaged the rebellious cities, put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword, and ſet fire to their houſes, which were in great part conſumed, but afterwards reſtored by Severus. In the mean time, Severus's army, advancing to the foot of mount Taurus, was ſtopped there, and quite diſheartened, at the ſight of the ſtrong works and the great number of troops that defended them; inſomuch, that deſpairing of being able to open themſelves a paſſage, they had ſome thoughts of returning: but an incredible quantity of rain, mixed with ſnow, falling in the night-time, the fortifications were utterly demoliſhed the next day by an impetuous torrent from the mountain; which ſo terrified Niger's men, now perſuaded that the gods favoured the enemy, betook themſelves to flight, and left Severus's troops to enter Cilicia, without offering to make head againſt them. Niger had already raiſed a new army, conſiſting chiefly of the Antiochian youth, who were very zealous and ſanguine in his cauſe; but utter ſtrangers to military diſcipline. However, Niger placed them ſo advantageouſly, that when they were attacked by the regular and well diſciplined troops of Severus, under the command of Valerianus and Anulinus, they not only repulſed them, but would have gained a complete victory, had it not been ſnatched out of their hands by a dreadful and unexpected ſtorm of thunder and lightning; which, diſcharging itſelf in their faces, prevented them from purſuing the advantage they had gained, and diſheartened them to ſuch a degree, that no longer doubting but the gods were averſe to their cauſe, they began to deſpair of ſucceſs and retire. Hereupon Severus's troops, reſuming their courage, renewed the charge, and in the end gained a complete victory. This battle, by far the moſt bloody of the three, was fought on the very ſpot where Alexander the Great

Niger himſelf overthrown.

A third battle, in which Niger is utterly defeated.

s Dio p. 842.

Great firſt vanquiſhed Darius; that is, near the city of Iſſus, at a place called Pylæ Ciliciæ, or the Gates of Cilicia, it being a narrow plain on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, incloſed on one ſide by the ſea, and on the other by ſteep mountains, on which Niger's forces were poſted. Niger is ſaid to have loſt in this battle twenty thouſand men. Of the dead on the ſide of Severus no mention is made in hiſtory. Niger, after this overthrow, retired to Antioch; but not thinking himſelf ſafe there, continued his flight towards the Euphrates, with a deſign as was ſuppoſed, of taking ſhelter among the Parthians: but thoſe who purſued him, overtaking him at a ſmall diſtance from Antioch, cut off his head, and carried it on the point of a ſpear to Severus, who cauſed it to be firſt ſhewn to the inhabitants of Byzantium, and then ſent it to Rome [r]. Thus Dion Caſſius and Herodian; but Spartian tells us, that Niger, being dangerouſly wounded, was taken priſoner, and in that condition brought to Severus, in whoſe preſence he expired [s].

Niger is ſlain.

Severus puniſhes without mercy ſuch as had ſided with Niger.

Severus [t] was not preſent at any of theſe battles; but where-ever he was, (for as to that particular we are left by hiſtorians quite in the dark) he ſoon made all thoſe who had ſided with his competitor feel the effects of his reſentment. He put ſuch of the ſenators to death, as had ſerved under Niger in quality of generals or tribunes. He ſpared the lives of the other ſenators; but baniſhed them to the iſlands, and ſeized their eſtates. He cauſed an infinite number of other perſons of an inferior rank to be publicly executed, without conſidering, whether they had engaged in the war by force or conſtraint. Many, who had never ſeen Niger, were involved in this general maſſacre of his friends and partizans [u]. Herodian writes, that Severus perſuaded Niger's generals, by means of their children, whom he had with him, to betray the cauſe which they had embraced; and, after gaining the victory by their treachery, murdered both them and their children [w]. He firſt baniſhed the wife and children of Niger, and afterwards cauſed them and all thoſe of his family to be murdered, and their eſtates to be confiſcated. Spartian names ſix illuſtrious perſons of the Peſcennian family, who were put to death by his orders [x]. However, he would not ſuffer a pompous inſcription

[r] Herod. l. iii. p. 519, 520. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 843. [s] Nig. vit. p. 76. [t] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 851. & in excerpt. Val. p. 734. [u] Herod. l. iii. p. 521. [w] Vit. Sev. p. 69.

inſcription on the baſis of a ſtatue of Niger at Rome (M) to be erazed, ſaying, Let the world know what an enemy I have conquered [x]. He puniſhed with exemplary ſeverity ſuch cities as had ſided with Niger, eſpecially Antioch, which he deprived of the privileges and title of a city, ſubjecting it as a mere village to Laodicea; which heightened the jealouſy between theſe two neighbouring cities. However, the following year, at the entreaties of his eldeſt ſon, then an infant, he reinſtated the city of Antioch in its former rights and privileges [y]. He obliged ſuch cities as had aſſiſted Niger with money, though not by choice, but conſtraint, to pay four times as much to him; which drew upon him the public hatred: but as he loved money, he was glad of any pretence to raiſe it [z]. The next conſuls were Scapula Tertullus and Tineius Clemens, during whoſe adminiſtration, Severus, paſſing the Euphrates, reduced the inhabitants of Oſrhoene and Adiabene; who, taking advantage of the late diſturbances, had murdered the Roman ſoldiers left among them, and ſhaken off the yoke [a]. He likewiſe entered Arabia; for the Arabians too had either revolted, or joined Niger, but were in the end obliged to ſubmit to Severus [b]. Herodian writes, that he overran all Arabia Felix [c]; and Eutropius and Victor cry up his exploits in that country, ſpeaking of them as if he had been the firſt who reduced Arabia to a Roman province. But Arabia Petræa had long before been made a province by Trajan; and as for Arabia Felix, we do not find it mentioned among the provinces of the empire, either in Severus's time or afterwards. Euſebius tells us, that Severus ſubdued the Adiabenians

He makes war upon the Adiabenians, Arabians and Parthians.

[x] Vit. Nig. p. 79. [y] Herod. l. iii. p. 523. Diog. p. 1021. Vit. Caracal. p. 85. [z] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 737. [a] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 848. [b] Idem, p. 848. [c] Herod. l. iii. p. 528.

(M) The houſe of Niger was ſtill ſtanding in Dioclefian's time, as Spartian informs us, and in one of the rooms his ſtatue done to the life in the black marble of Thebes, with an epigram on the baſis to this purpoſe: Here ſtands the great Niger, the terror of Egypt, the ally of Thebes, who had propoſed a golden age to all. Kings, nations, Rome it ſelf, loved him. He was dear to both the Antoninuſes, and to the whole empire. As his name was Niger, (that is, black) we have cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to him in black marble, that it might anſwer his name. This ſtatue was, as Spartian informs us, a preſent from the king of Thebes to Statius Poſthumius.

nians and Arabians, who had aſſiſted Niger [d]. He likewiſe made war upon the Parthians; but did not bring them under ſubjection, as Spartian pretends [e]. For theſe wars the ſenate decreed him the titles of Arabicus, Parthicus, and Adiabenicus, which, with that of imperator the fifth time, are given him in the inſcriptions of this year 195, the third of his reign [f]. He refuſed the triumph which was likewiſe decreed him, that he might not ſeem to have triumphed for victories gained in a civil war. The title of Parthicus he likewiſe rejected, leſt his aſſuming it ſhould provoke the Parthians [g]. The Scythians deſigned to make war upon him, and had already begun their march; but were ſtopped, and deterred from putting their deſign in execution, by a dreadful ſtorm in which three of their chiefs were ſtruck dead with lightning [h]. In the beginning of the following year, when Cn. Domitius Dexter, governor of Rome, was conſul the ſecond time, with L. Valerius Meſſala Thraſea Priſcus, the city of Byzantium ſurrendered after a three years ſiege. It was at this time by far the greateſt, and the moſt populous and wealthy city of Thrace, fortified with walls of an extraordinary height and breadth, and defended by a great number of towers, ſeven of which were built with ſuch art, that the leaſt noiſe, heard in one of them, was immediately conveyed to all the reſt [i]. This city Niger ſeized at the firſt breaking out of the war, placed a numerous garriſon in it, and ſupplied the inhabitants with great ſtore of warlike machines, moſt of them invented and built by Periſcus, a native of Nicea, and the greateſt engineer of his age. Severus laid ſiege to this place when he firſt arrived in Thrace, left a conſiderable body of troops to carry it on, and, after the defeat and death of Niger, purſued it with the greateſt part of his army by land, and by ſea with all the ſhips he could aſſemble from the different ports of Aſia. The Byzantines defended themſelves, before the death of Niger, and even after his head had been ſhewn to them, with ſuch reſolution and intrepidity as can hardly be expreſſed. They baffled all the attempts of the aſſailants, killed great numbers of them, cruſhed ſuch as approached the walls with huge ſtones, and when ſtones began to fail them, with the ſtatues of their gods and heroes; but in the end they were obliged by famine, after having been reduced to the fatal neceſſity of devouring one one another, to ſubmit, and open their gates to the conqueror, who put all the magiſtrates and ſoldiers to the ſword; but ſpared the engineer Periſcus. The city, with its ſtately theatres, baths, and public buildings was laid in aſhes; the inhabitants were ſtripped of all their effects and publicly ſold for ſlaves, and the walls levelled with the ground; thoſe walls, ſays Dion Caſſius, which were the ſtrongeſt rampart of the Roman empire againſt the incurſions of the barbarians [k]. The chronicle of Alexandria and the modern Greek writers tell us, that Severus himſelf rebuilt in great part the city of Byzantium, calling it Antoninia, from his ſon Caracalla, who aſſumed the name of Antoninus [l]. After the ſurrender of Byzantium, Severus ſent his army, divided into three bodies, under the command of Lætus, Anulinus, and Probus, to reduce part of Meſopotamia; which they did accordingly: and the country they conquered, perhaps Acabene, or Aretacene, was by Severus made a new province, whereof Niſibis was declared the capital. The government of this new province was, like that of Egypt, given only to Roman knights [m].

The city of Byzantium taken.

[d] Euſeb. chron. ad. ann. 199. [e] Spart. in vit. Sever. p. 67. [f] Vit. Sever. p. 67. Goltz. p. 84. [g] Vit. Sever. ibid. [h] Dio, p. 849. [i] Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 847.

And deſtroyed.

AFTER theſe ſucceſſes, Severus began to think of deſtroying Albinus, whom he had lulled aſleep with the title of Cæſar, while he was employed againſt Julianus and Niger. As Albinus was as much beloved by the ſenate, as Severus was hated on account of his cruelty, and many perſons of great diſtinction had even ſolicited him to come to Rome, and there aſſume the title of emperor, Severus thought he could not uſe too much diſpatch in cruſhing him. However, not judging it adviſeable to declare himſelf an open enemy to one who had not given him the leaſt provocation, he had recourſe to treachery, and wrote a pompous letter to the ſenate in his commendation, and another to Albinus himſelf, filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of friendſhip, calling him his deareſt and entirely beloved friend, his brother, his partner in the ſovereign power; but thoſe who brought him this letter had ſecret orders to draw him aſide, under colour of communicating to him in private ſome affairs of the utmoſt importance, and diſpatch him with their daggers. They were likewiſe provided with poiſon, in caſe they could prevail upon any of his domeſtics to adminiſter it to him. After Albinus had read the letter, the aſſaſſins, purſuant to their directions, told him they had ſomething to communicate to him by word of mouth, which required the utmoſt ſecrecy. Hereupon Al-

Severus reſolves to deſtroy Albinus.

Sends aſſaſſins to murder him.

[k] Dio, ibid. Herod. l. iii. p. 523. [l] Chron. Alex p. 620. Suid. p. 724. [m] Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 847——850.

binus deſired them to attend him into a gallery; but obſerving that they took more than ordinary care to prevent others from entering with them, he began to ſuſpect ſome treachery, and cauſed them to be ſeized, and put to the queſtion, when the violence of the torments extorted from them a full confeſſion of the errand on which they were come. Hereupon Albinus betook himſelf to open force; and having aſſembled a mighty army, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in Britain, and thence paſſed over into Gaul, where he was joined by many perſons of great diſtinction, both Gauls and Spaniards. Severus, upon the firſt news of his revolt, leaving the eaſt, haſtened through Thrace and Illyricum into Gaul. Some writers tell us, that before he ſet out on his march, he cauſed a young virgin to be ſacrificed, hoping to learn from her entrails what ſucceſs would attend him in this war [n]. At Viminiacum, a famous city in Upper Mœſia on the Danube, he gave the title of Cæſar to Baſſianus his eldeſt ſon, and on that occaſion diſtributed large ſums among the ſoldiers. At the ſame time, he obliged his ſon to quit the name of Baſſianus, and ſtyle himſelf thenceforth M. Aurelius Antoninus, for whom Severus ever had a great eſteem and veneration [o]. Before Severus reached Gaul, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the troops that had declared for him there and thoſe of Albinus, in one of which, called by Herodian a battle, the generals of Severus were utterly defeated, and their troops diſperſed [p]. This greatly alarmed him, and obliged him to quicken his march, after he had detached part of his troops to guard the narrow paſſes of the Alps, and prevent his competitor from entering Italy. In the mean time, the ſenate declared Albinus a public enemy; after which declaration, one Numerianus, who kept a grammar-ſchool at Rome, haſtening into Gaul, paſſed himſelf there upon the inhabitants for a ſenator ſent by Severus to raiſe troops; and having by this means got together a conſiderable body, he attacked and defeated a detachment of Albinus's horſe, and gained ſome other ſmall advantages; which Severus no ſooner knew, than he wrote to him as a ſenator, believing him to be one, commended his zeal, and commiſſioned him to levy what forces he could. Having therefore raiſed a ſmall army, he continually harraſſed Albinus's men, took many priſoners, and intercepted a great ſum of money, which he ſent to Severus. When Albinus was defeated, he went to wait upon Severus, told Albinus cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor.

Is declared a public enemy.

[n] Suid. p. 257. [o] Vit. Sever. p. 68. [p] Herod. l. iii. p. 524. Sev. vit. p. 68.

told him who he was; but deſpiſing the great riches and honours which the emperor offered him, he accepted only a ſmall penſion, and retiring into the country, ſpent the reſt of his life in quiet and ſolitude [q].

In the beginning of the following year, when Lateranus and Rufinus were conſuls, Severus, having paſſed the Alps in the midſt of winter, approached Lyons, where Albinus then reſided, with a deſign to enter Italy early in the ſpring. He was not a little alarmed at the ſudden and unexpected arrival of Severus; however, having with incredible expedition drawn together his troops quartered in that neighbourhood, he fell upon Lupus, one of Severus's generals, and defeated him with great ſlaughter [r]. Hereupon Severus advanced in perſon againſt his rival; and Albinus not declining the challenge, both armies, to the number of one hundred and fifty thouſand men, were drawn up on the nineteenth of February in the neighbourhood of Lyons, probably in the ſpacious plain between that city and Trevoux. As the fate of the two commanders depended upon this battle, and no leſs a reward was propoſed for the conqueror than the Roman empire; as the Britiſh legions were no-ways inferior either in courage or experience to thoſe of Illyricum, and both armies expected to ſhare the fortune, whatever it was, of their generals, the engagement was one of the moſt ſharp and bloody recorded in hiſtory. After they had fought many hours with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide, Albinus's left wing was utterly defeated, and obliged to take ſhelter in their camp, which the enemy entered in that confuſion, and plundered; but, on the other hand, his right wing, having drawn Severus's men into certain ditches, which they had covered with earth, gained ſo great an advantage over them, that the emperor himſelf, who flew to their aſſiſtance at the head of the prætorian guards, was put into the utmoſt confuſion, and obliged, if we believe Herodian, to ſave himſelf by flight, after having quitted, that he might not be known, all the badges of the imperial dignity [s]. Spartian writes, that he was wounded, and believed dead by the army, who were for creating another emperor in his room [t]; and Dion Caſſius, that his horſe was killed under him, and he himſelf in imminent danger of loſing his life [u]. The ſame author adds, that ſeeing his men fly, he threw himſelf ſword in hand upon the fugitives, and forced them to return Severus marches againſt him.

The two armies engage near Lyons.

Severus in great danger.

[q] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 851. [r] Dio, ibid. [s] Herod. l. iii. p. 524. Dio, p. 851. [t] Vit. Sev. p. 63. [u] Dio, p. 852.

turn to the charge; which they did with ſuch fury, that the enemy, not able to withſtand them, began to give ground; which Lætus perceiving, fell upon them with the whole body of horſe under his command, and completed their overthrow. Lætus had declined engaging ſo long as the victory continued doubtful, with a deſign, as was ſuppoſed, of ſetting up for himſelf, after the two parties had deſtroyed each other [w]; and hence it was, that Severus, as Herodian informs us, inſtead of rewarding him, as he did his other generals, put him ſoon after to death.

Albinus entirely defeated and killed

Albinus's army, no longer able to keep the field, fled to Lyons, whither they were purſued by the conquerors; who, entering the city with the fugitives, firſt plundered it, and then laid it in aſhes [y]. Albinus, who had concealed himſelf in an houſe on the Rhone, finding no means of making his eſcape, laid violent hands on himſelf [z]. Thus Dion Caſſius. But other authors write, that being mortally wounded either by himſelf, or ſome of his own men, he was brought in that condition to Severus, in whoſe preſence he expired [a].

The cruelty of Severus.

Be that as it will, Severus beheld with great pleaſure the dead body of his competitor, rode over it ſeveral times, cauſing his horſe to tread it under foot, left it lying in its gore before his tent, till it was half putrified, and torn in pieces by the dogs, and then ordered the poor remains of it to be thrown into the Rhone. The head he cauſed to be cut off, and ſent it to Rome, ordering it to be ſet up there on a pole in the forum. He pardoned at firſt his wife and children; but ſoon after, changing his mind, he cauſed them to be inhumanly maſſacred, and their bodies to be thrown into the river. The whole family of Albinus, all his friends, and moſt diſtant relations, without diſtinction of ſex or age, were by Severus's orders barbarouſly ſlaughtered, and their eſtates confiſcated. Moſt of the great men of Gaul and Spain, who had ſhewn an attachment to Albinus, underwent the ſame fate. By means of theſe murders and confiſcations, he amaſſed an immenſe treaſure, enriched his ſoldiers, and, at his death, left greater wealth to his children, than any prince had done before him [b].

AFTER this victory, all the cities that had declared for Albinus, were ſoon reduced, and the inhabitants puniſhed, ſome with death, ſome with the confiſcation of their eſtates; ſo that Severus, ſeeing all quiet in Gaul, and likewiſe in Britain, [w] Idem ibid. [x] Herod. l. iii. p. 524. [y] Idem p. 525. [z] Dio, p. 853. [a] Vit. Alb. & Sev. p. 68. [b] Vit. Sev. p. 68.

tain, which he divided into two provinces, ſet out for Rome, leading with him his victorious army. His approach filled the city with terror and diſmay, thoſe who had favoured Albinus, expecting no better treatment than the friends of that unfortunate commander had met with in Gaul. Their apprehenſions were heightened by a letter which Severus wrote to the ſenate, when he ſent the head of Albinus to Rome; for in that letter he complained of their affection to Albinus, as if they had all privately favoured and aſſiſted his declared enemy; reproached them with ingratitude; cried up the conduct and government of Commodus, whom he had never mentioned before but as a tyrant and monſter; and, in ſpeaking of the head of Albinus, uſed this expreſſion; I ſend it to you, that you may thereby know you have provoked me, and ſee with your eyes the effects of my reſentment. Both the ſenate and people were thunder-ſtruck with this letter; they expected nothing but a general maſſacre, the more becauſe they were informed, that Severus had ſeized the papers of Albinus, and by that means diſcovered all his friends and correſpondents. However, as he drew near, the ſenate went out to meet him, and received him with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, attended him to the capitol, and thence to the palace where he ordered great ſums to be diſtributed among the people and ſoldiery. The next day he went to the ſenate, and there read a ſpeech filled with bitter invectives againſt the partizans of Albinus; produced the letters that had been written to him; commended the cruelties of Sylla, of Marius, and of Auguſtus, as neceſſary precautions; aſcribed the ruin of Pompey, and the death of Cæſar, to their unſeaſonable clemency; and mentioning Commodus, ſtyled him a god, and beſtowed the higheſt encomiums upon him; adding, that none but infamous and abandoned wretches could cenſure or blame the conduct of ſuch an excellent prince [c]. Having ended his ſpeech, he returned to the palace, and filled the city with maſſacres and bloodſhed. In a few days forty-two ſenators, moſt of whom had been conſuls or prætors, were ſacrificed to his fury and revenge, and an incredible number of perſons of an inferior rank. Herodian tells us, that he cut off all thoſe, who on account of their birth or riches, bore any ſway in the ſenate or the provinces. Many were condemned and executed upon bare ſuſpicions, and many for no other crime but that of being poſſeſſed of great wealth under a covetous and inhuman tyrant [d].

Severus's letter to the ſenate.

His cruelties in Rome.

While

[c] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 526. Vit. Alb. p. 60. & Sev. p. 68. [d] Dio, p. 853. Herod. p. 527. Vit. Sev. p. 69.

While the city was yet floating in blood, he went to the ſenate, and, out of hatred to the ſenators, cauſed them to rank Commodus with the uſual ceremonies among the gods, to appoint prieſts, and inſtitute an annual feſtival to his honour. He condemned Narciſſus, the famous wreſtler, who had ſtrangled him, to be devoured by the wild beaſts, and ſpared none who were ſuſpected of having been any ways privy to his death [e]. After Severus had ſpent ſome months at Rome, and there cut off, not only the partizans of Albinus, but ſuch as gave him the leaſt umbrage, he took leave of the ſenate, and, with his two ſons Caracalla and Geta, ſet out for the eaſt, with a deſign to make war upon the Parthians, who, under the conduct of their king Vologeſes, had made themſelves maſters of great part of Meſopotamia. He embarqued with his army at Brunduſium, and arriving in Syria, marched ſtrait to Niſibis in Meſopotamia, whence the Parthians retired into their own country upon the firſt news of his approach. He was met on his march by Augarus, or Abgarus, king of Oſrhoene, who ſtyled him his prince and protector, delivered up to him his children as hoſtages, and ſupplied him with a conſiderable body of archers to be employed in his intended expedition againſt the Parthians [f]. The following year, Tib. Saturninus and C. Gallus being conſuls, Severus having made vaſt preparations for the war againſt the Parthians, began his march about the end of the ſummer, judging the autumn the moſt proper ſeaſon for that expedition. He followed the courſe of the Euphrates, the greater part of his army being conveyed down in boats, and the reſt marching on the banks of the river. To paſs from the Euphrates into the Tigris, he cauſed the canal Naarmalcha, made formerly by Adrian, to be cleanſed, and by that means arrived in a ſhort time at Seleucia and Babylon, both which places he found abandoned by the enemy, and took without oppoſition. Thence he advanced to Cteſiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian dominions; which he inveſted, and took after a laborious ſiege, during which his ſoldiers, for want of proviſions, were obliged to feed upon ſuch roots as they found in the fields; which bred various diſtempers in the army. However, the place was in the end forced to ſurrender; but the king who had ſhut himſelf up in it, found means to make his eſcape, attended by a ſmall body of horſe; which was a great diſappointment to Severus. The emperor gave up the city to be plundered by the ſoldiers, who put all the men to Goes into the eaſt to make war upon the Parthians.

He takes Seleucia, Babylon and Cteſiphon.

[e] Vit. Sev. p. 69. [f] Herod. l. iii. p. 528.

to the ſword; but ſpared the women and children, whom, to the number of one hundred thouſand, they ſold for ſlaves.

After the reduction of Cteſiphon, Severus wrote to the ſenate, giving them a pompous account of his exploits, which he cauſed to be repreſented in painting, and expoſed to public view. The ſenate decreed him a triumph, and honoured him with the title of Parthicus Maximus; which is to be ſeen on ſeveral medals of the next and the following years [g]. Spartian tells us, that the army, in the tranſports of their joy for the reduction of Cteſiphon, proclaimed Caracalla, the emperor's eldeſt ſon, his partner in the ſovereign power, and at the ſame time gave the title of Cæſar to his ſecond ſon Geta [h]; which honours were afterwards confirmed to both by the ſenate. Caracalla had entered the eleventh year of his age on the fourth of April of this year 198. Severus, not thinking it adviſeable either to keep Cteſiphon, or purſue Vologeſes, ſet out on his return into Syria about the beginning of winter, loaded with booty. He is ſuppoſed to have concluded a treaty with the Parthians; for we read of no wars between them and the Romans till eighteen years after, and Vologeſes, reigned peaceably to his death, which happened after that of Severus [i]. While Severus was thus employed in the eaſt, ſome diſturbances aroſe in Britain, where the Caledonians, taking up arms, invaded the Roman dominions, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Lupus, whom Severus had appointed governor of Britain, not finding himſelf in a condition to make head againſt that warlike nation with the troops he had with him, and well knowing, that Severus could not ſend him timely aſſiſtance, was forced to purchaſe a peace of the enemy, and, with large ſums, redeem the Roman territories from their daily incurſions [k].

Caracalla made a partner of the empire.

Diſturbances in Britain.

THE following year, when P. Cornelius Aullinus and M. Aufidius Fronto were conſuls, Severus, on his march back into Syria, attacked the city of Atra, Barſemus, king of that place, having formerly ſent conſiderable ſuccours to Niger; but was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having loſt a great many men and moſt of his warlike engines [l]. About this time, Severus cauſed two officers of great diſtinction to be put to death, viz. Julius Criſpus, tribune of the Lætus murdered.

[g] Idem ibid. Dio, p. 854. Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 278. Onuph. in faſt. Goltz. p. 85. [h] Vit. Ser. p. 70. [i] Dio, l. lxxv. p. 854. & in excerpt. Val. p. 746. [k] Idem, p. 851, 866. [l] Idem, p. 844.

the prætorian guards, and Lætus, one of his beſt generals; the former for ſaying, that Severus expoſed his troops wantonly to dangers, and obliged them to undergo great hardſhips only to ſatisfy his private ambition and vanity. Lætus's crime was, according to Herodian, his having acted with treachery in the battle of Lyons, as we have related above. But Dion Caſſius, who commends him, both as an excellent citizen and ſoldier, tells us, that Severus put him to death, for no other reaſon but becauſe he was greatly beloved by the ſoldiers, which the jealous emperor could not bear [m]. After he had allowed ſome reſpite to his harraſſed troops, and amaſſed an immenſe quantity of proviſions and warlike engines, he returned before the city of Atra; but all his efforts againſt that place proving unſucceſsful, he was forced to raiſe the ſiege anew, having loſt, during the eighteen days it laſted, moſt of his machines, and an incredible number of men [n]. Thus did one city baffle all the attempts of Trajan and Severus, the two greateſt commanders among the Roman emperors, as it did afterwards thoſe of Artaxerxes, who, about the year 226, re-eſtabliſhed the Perſian on the ruin of the Parthian empire. Severus ſpent moſt part of the following year, when Tib. Claudius Severus was conſul the ſecond time with C. Aufidius Victorinus, in ſearching after ſuch of Niger's partizans as had not yet been diſcovered, and in gleaning, to uſe the expreſſion of Tertullian [o], after the vintage. Many perſons of diſtinction, who believed themſelves to be ſafe, were on this occaſion ſeized and condemned without mercy, ſuch eſpecially as gave the tyrant any umbrage on account of their birth or riches [p]. The next year, when L. Annius Fabianus and M. Nonius Mucianus were conſuls, Severus gave the manly robe to his eldeſt ſon, though he was then but fourteen years old, and named him conſul with himſelf for the year following. They both entered upon their conſulſhip in Syria; and on that occaſion the emperor gave a largeſs to the ſoldiers.

Severus attacks the city of Atra; but is obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

Severus went, during his conſulſhip, into Arabia, and from thence into Paleſtine, where he remitted the taxes with which he had loaded the inhabitants for their ſteady adherence to Niger. While he was in Paleſtine, he publiſhed an edict, forbidding, under the ſevereſt penalties, the ſubjects of the empire to embrace either the Jewiſh or Chriſtian religion; which gave riſe to the fifth general perſecution [q]. From Paleſtine Severus viſits Arabia, Paleſtine, Egypt, &c.

[m] Idem, p. 855. [n] Idem, l. lxxv. p. 555. [o] Tertul. apol c. 35. [p] Vit. Sev. p. 69. [q] Idem, p. 70. Euſeb. l. vi. c. 2.

leſtine he paſſed into Egypt, where he viſited the tomb of Pompey the Great, and then purſued his rout to Alexandria, to which city he granted a public council or ſenate; a mark of diſtinction which they had often begged in vain of other emperors [r]. During his ſtay in Egypt, he viſited all the cities, and viewed with great attention the curioſities of that antient kingdom, eſpecially the pyramids, the labyrinth, the ſtatue of Memnon, &c. He examined with great care the books he found in the temples, and cauſed ſuch of them as contained any ſecret knowledge to be conveyed into the ſepulchre of Alexander the Great, which he ordered to be ſhut up, that no one might for the future either ſee the body of that prince, or peruſe thoſe books [s].

THE next conſuls were Septimius Geta, the emperor's brother, and Fulvius Plautianus, his great favourite. Some writers call Plautianus the emperor's kinſman; others ſay, that he was only his countryman, being a native of Africa, as was Severus. Be that as it will, all agree, that he was of a very mean deſcent; and ſome add, that in his youth he had been baniſhed, for ſtirring up and heading the populace in a ſedition. However, the emperor favoured him above all the great men in Rome, and was ſo paſſionate for him, that, not in converſation only, but in public, in his ſpeeches to the ſenate and people, he extolled him more than Tiberius had ever done his favourite Sejanus. He created him captain of the prætorian guards, and ſhared with him the power and wealth of the empire; for Plautianus was ſaid to be poſſeſſed of as great riches as Severus himſelf, and thought to be no leſs powerful; at leaſt greater court was paid to his power, than to that of the emperor. The ſenators and ſoldiers ſwore by the fortune of Plautianus; public vows and ſacrifices were offered for his ſafety, as if he had been emperor, and Rome was filled with his ſtatues, moſtly erected by the authority of the ſenate. His table was better ſerved than the emperor's, and his equipage far more magnificent. As there was no acceſs to honours but through his favour, his houſe was conſtantly crouded with ſenators, knights, and great part of the people, all ſolicitous for admiſſion to Plautianus, who was harder of acceſs than the emperor. Geta, the brother of Severus, and the empreſs Julia ſtood no leſs in awe of him than the reſt, well knowing, that his authority was of far greater weight than theirs. This exorbitant power was moſt notoriouſly

Plautianus his chief favourite.

His great power.

[r] Vit. Sev. p. 70. [s] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 737. Vit. Sev. ibid.

